"No, no, you've made a mistake," Biryuk declared, panting; "you're not going to get off. . . ." I rushed in the direction of the noise, and ran up to the scene of the conflict, stumbling at every step. A felled tree lay on the ground, and near it Biryuk was busily engaged holding the thief down and binding his hands behind his back with a kerchief. I came closer. Biryuk got up and set him on his feet. I saw a peasant drenched with rain, in tatters, and with a long, disheveled beard. A sorry little nag, half covered with a stiff mat, was standing by, together with a rough cart. The forester did not utter a word; the peasant too was silent; his head was shaking.

"Let him go," I whispered in Biryuk's ears; "I'll pay for the tree."

Without a word Biryuk took the horse by the mane with his left hand; in his right he held the thief by the belt. "Now turn round, you rat!" he said grimly.

"The bit of an ax there, take it," muttered the peasant.

"No reason to lose it, certainly," said the forester, and he picked up the ax. We started. I walked behind. . . . The rain began sprinkling again, and soon fell in torrents. With difficulty we made our way to the hut. Biryuk pushed the captured horse into the middle of the yard, led the peasant into the room, loosened the knot in the kerchief, and made him sit down in a corner. The little girl, who had fallen asleep near the oven, jumped up and began staring at us in silent terror. I sat down on the locker.

"Ugh, what a downpour!" remarked the forester; "you will have to wait till it's over. Won't you lie down?"

"Thanks."

"I would have shut him in the store loft, on your honor's account," he went on, indicating the peasant; "but you see the bolt—"

"Leave him here; don't touch him," I interrupted.

The peasant stole a glance at me from under his brows. I vowed inwardly to set the poor wretch free, come what might. He sat without stirring on the locker. By the light of the lantern I could make out his worn, wrinkled face, his overhanging yellow eyebrows, his restless eyes, his thin limbs. . . . The little girl lay down on the floor, just at his feet, and again dropped asleep. Biryuk sat at the table, his head in his hands. A cricket chirped in the corner . . . the rain pattered on the roof and streamed down the windows; we were all silent.

"Foma Kuzmitch," said the peasant suddenly in a thick, broken voice; "Foma Kuzmitch!"

"What is it?"

"Let me go."

Biryuk made no answer.

"Let me go . . . hunger drove me to it; let me go."

"I know you," retorted the forester severely; "your set's all alike—all thieves."

"Let me go," repeated the peasant. "Our manager . . . we're ruined, that's what it is—let me go!"

"Ruined, indeed! . . . Nobody need steal."

"Let me go, Foma Kuzmitch. . . . Don't destroy me. Your manager, you know yourself, will have no mercy on me; that's what it is."

Biryuk turned away. The peasant was shivering as though he were in the throes of fever. His head was shaking, and his breathing came in broken gasps.

"Let me go," he repeated with mournful desperation. "Let me go; by God, let me go! I'll pay; see, by God, I will! By God, it was through hunger! . . . the little ones are crying, you know yourself. It's hard for us, see."

"You needn't go stealing, for all that."

"My little horse," the peasant went on, "my poor little horse, at least . . . our only beast . . . let it go."

"I tell you, I can't. I'm not a free man; I'm made responsible. You oughtn't to be spoilt, either."

"Let me go! It's through want, Foma Kuzmitch, want—and nothing else—let me go!"

"I know you!"

"Oh, let me go!"

"Ugh, what's the use of talking to you! sit quiet, or else you'll catch it. Don't you see the gentleman, hey?"

The poor wretch hung his head. . . . Biryuk yawned and laid his head on the table. The rain still persisted. I was waiting to see what would happen.

Suddenly the peasant stood erect. His eyes were glittering, and his face flushed dark red. "Come, then, here; strike yourself, here," he began, his eyes puckering up and the corners of his mouth dropping; "come, cursed destroyer of men's souls! drink Christian blood, drink."

The forester turned round.

"I'm speaking to you, Asiatic, blood-sucker, you!"

"Are you drunk, or what, to set to being abusive?" began the forester, puzzled. "Are you out of your senses, hey?"

"Drunk! not at your expense, cursed destroyer of souls—brute, brute, brute!"

"Ah, you—I'll show you!"

"What's that to me? It's all one; I'm done for; what can I do without a home? Kill me—it's the same in the end; whether it's through hunger or like this—it's all one. Ruin us all—wife, children . . . kill us all at once. But, wait a bit, we'll get at you!"

Biryuk got up.

"Kill me, kill me," the peasant went on in savage tones; "kill me; come, come, kill me. . . ." (The little girl jumped up hastily from the ground and stared at him.) "Kill me, kill me!"

"Silence!" thundered the forester, and he took two steps forward.

"Stop, Foma, stop," I shouted; "let him go. . . . Peace be with him."

"I won't be silent," the luckless wretch went on. "It's all the same—ruin, anyway—you destroyer of souls, you brute; you've not come to ruin yet. . . . But wait a bit; you won't have long to boast of; they'll wring your neck; wait a bit!"

Biryuk clutched him by the shoulder. I rushed to help the peasant. . . .

"Don't touch him, master!" the forester shouted to me.

I should not have feared his threats, and already had my fist in the air; but to my intense amazement, with one pull he tugged the kerchief off the peasant's elbows, took him by the scruff of the neck, thrust his cap over his eyes, opened the door, and shoved him out.

"Go to the devil with your horse!" he shouted after him; "but mind, next time. . . ."

He came back into the hut and began rummaging in the corner.

"Well, Biryuk," I said at last, "you've astonished me; I see you're a splendid fellow."

"Oh, stop that, master," he cut me short with an air of vexation; "please don't speak of it. But I'd better see you on your way now," he added; "I suppose you won't wait for this little rain. . . ."

In the yard there was the rattle of the wheels of the peasant's cart.

"He's off, then!" he muttered; "but next time!"

Half an hour later he parted from me at the edge of the wood.

LEV NIKOLAEVICH TOLSTOY

The Death of Ivan Ilyitch

Inside the great building of the Law Courts, during the interval in the hearing of the Melvinsky case, the members of the judicial council and the public prosecutor were gathered together in the private room of Ivan Yegorovitch Shebek, and the conversation turned upon the celebrated Krasovsky case. Fyodor Vassilievitch hotly maintained that the case was not in the jurisdiction of the court. Yegor Ivanovitch stood up for his own view; but from the first Pyotr Ivanovitch, who had not entered into the discussion, took no interest in it, but was looking through the newspapers which had just been brought in.

"Gentlemen!" he said, "Ivan Ilyitch is dead!"

"You don't say so!"

"Here, read it," he said to Fyodor Vassilievitch, handing him the fresh still damp-smelling paper.

Within a black margin was printed: "Praskovya Fyodorovna Golovin with heartfelt affliction informs friends and relatives of the decease of her beloved husband, member of the Court of Justice, Ivan Ilyitch Golovin, who passed away on the 4th of February. The funeral will take place on Thursday at one o'clock."

Ivan Ilyitch was a colleague of the gentlemen present, and all liked him. It was some weeks now since he had been taken ill; his illness had been said to be incurable. His post had been kept open for him, but it had been thought that in case of his death Alexyeev might receive his appointment, and either Vinnikov or Shtabel would succeed to Alexyeev's. So that on hearing of Ivan Ilyitch's death, the first thought of each of the gentlemen in the room was of the effect this death might have on the transfer or promotion of themselves or their friends.

"Now I am sure of getting Shtabel's place or Vinnikov's," thought Fyodor Vassilievitch. "It was promised me long ago, and the promotion means eight hundred rubles additional income, besides the grants for office expenses."

"Now I shall have to petition for my brother-in-law to be transferred from Kaluga," thought Pyotr Ivanovitch. "My wife will be very glad. She won't be able to say now that I've never done anything for her family."

"I thought somehow that he'd never get up from his bed again," Pyotr Ivanovitch said aloud. "I'm sorry!"

"But what was it exactly was wrong with him?"

"The doctors could not decide. That's to say, they did decide, but differently. When I saw him last, I thought he would get over it."

"Well, I positively haven't called there ever since the holidays. I've kept meaning to go."

"Had he any property?"

"I think there's something, very small, of his wife's. But something quite trifling."

"Yes, one will have to go and call. They live such a terribly long way off."

"A long way from you, you mean. Everything's a long way from your place."

"There, he can never forgive me for living the other side of the river," said Pyotr Ivanovitch, smiling at Shebek. And they began to talk of the great distances between different parts of the town, and went back into the court.

Besides the reflections upon the changes and promotions in the service likely to ensue from this death, the very fact of the death of an intimate acquaintance excited in every one who heard of it, as such a fact always does, a feeling of relief that "it is he that is dead, and not I."

"Only think! he is dead, but here am I all right," each one thought or felt. The more intimate acquaintances, the so-called friends of Ivan Ilyitch, could not help thinking too that now they had the exceedingly tiresome social duties to perform of going to the funeral service and paying the widow a visit of condolence.

The most intimately acquainted with their late colleague were Fyodor Vassilievitch and Pyotr Ivanovitch.

Pyotr Ivanovitch had been a comrade of his at the school of jurisprudence, and considered himself under obligations to Ivan Ilyitch.

Telling his wife at dinner of the news of Ivan Ilyitch's death and his reflections as to the possibility of getting her brother transferred into their circuit, Pyotr Ivanovitch, without lying down for his usual nap, put on his frockcoat and drove to Ivan Ilyitch's.

At the entrance before Ivan Ilyitch's flat stood a carriage and two hired flies. Downstairs in the entry near the hat-stand there was leaning against the wall a coffin-lid with tassels and braiding freshly rubbed up with pipeclay. Two ladies were taking off their cloaks. One of them he knew, the sister of Ivan Ilyitch; the other was a lady he did not know. Pyotr Ivanovitch's colleague, Shvarts, was coming down; and from the top stair, seeing who it was coming in, he stopped and winked at him, as though to say: "Ivan Ilyitch has made a mess of it; it's a very different matter with you and me."

Shvarts's face, with his English whiskers and all his thin figure in his frockcoat, had, as it always had, an air of elegant solemnity; and this solemnity, always such a contrast to Shvarts's playful character, had a special piquancy here. So thought Pyotr Ivanovitch.

Pyotr Ivanovitch let the ladies pass on in front of him, and walked slowly up the stairs after them. Shvarts had not come down, but was waiting at the top. Pyotr Ivanovitch knew what for; he wanted obviously to settle with him where their game of *vint*¹ was to be that evening. The ladies went up to the widow's room; while Shvarts, with his lips tightly and gravely shut and amusement in his eyes, with a twitch of his eyebrows motioned Pyotr Ivanovitch to the right, to the room where the dead man was.

Pyotr Ivanovitch went in, as people always do on such occasions, in uncertainty as to what he would have to do there. One thing he felt sure of—that crossing oneself never comes amiss on such occasions. As to whether it was necessary to bow down while doing so, he did not feel quite sure, and so chose a middle course. On entering the room he began crossing himself, and made a slight sort of bow. So far as the movements of his hands and head permitted him, he glanced while doing so about the room. Two young men, one a high school boy, nephews probably, were going out of the room, crossing themselves. An old lady was standing motionless; and a lady, with her eyebrows queerly lifted, was saying something to her in a whisper. A deacon in a frockcoat, resolute and hearty, was reading something aloud with an expression that precluded all possibility of contradiction. A young peasant who used to wait at table, Gerasim, walking with light footsteps in front of Pyotr Ivanovitch, was sprinkling something on the floor. Seeing this, Pyotr Ivanovitch was at once aware of the faint odour of the decomposing corpse. On his last visit to Ivan Ilyitch Pyotr Ivanovitch had seen this peasant in his room; he was performing the duties of a sicknurse, and Ivan Ilyitch liked him particularly. Pyotr Ivanovitch continued crossing himself and bowing in a direction intermediate between the coffin, the deacon, and the holy pictures on the table in the corner. Then when this action of making the sign of the cross with his hand seemed to him to have been unduly prolonged, he stood still and began to scrutinise the dead man.

The dead man lay, as dead men always do lie, in a peculiarly heavy dead way, his stiffened limbs sunk in the cushions of the coffin, and his head bent back forever on the pillow, and thrust up, as dead men always do, his yellow waxen forehead with bald spots on the sunken temples, and his nose that stood out sharply and, as it were, squeezed on the upper lip. He was much changed, even thinner since Pyotr Ivanovitch had seen him, but his face—as always with the dead—was more handsome, and, above all, more impressive than it had been when he was alive. On the face was an expression of what had to be done having been done, and rightly done. Besides this, there was too in that expression a reproach or a reminder for the living. This reminder seemed to Pyotr Ivanovitch uncalled for, or, at least, to have nothing to do with him. He felt something unpleasant; and so Pyotr Ivanovitch once more crossed himself hurriedly, and, as it struck him, too hurriedly, not quite in accordance with the proprieties, turned and went to the door. Shvarts was waiting for him in the adjoining room, standing with his legs apart and both hands behind his back playing with his top hat. A single glance at the playful, sleek, and elegant figure of Shvarts revived Pyotr Ivanovitch. He felt that he, Shvarts, was above it, and would not give way to depressing impressions.

¹ a card game resembling auction bridge

The mere sight of him said plainly: the incident of the service over the body of Ivan Ilyitch cannot possibly constitute a sufficient ground for recognising the business of the session suspended,—in other words, in no way can it hinder us from shuffling and cutting a pack of cards this evening, while the footman sets four unsanctified candles on the table for us; in fact, there is no ground for supposing that this incident could prevent us from spending the evening agreeably. He said as much indeed to Pyotr Ivanovitch as he came out, proposing that the party should meet at Fyodor Vasilievitch's. But apparently it was Pyotr Ivanovitch's destiny not to play vint that evening. Praskovya Fyodorovna, a short, fat woman who, in spite of all efforts in a contrary direction, was steadily broader from her shoulders downwards, all in black, with lace on her head and her eyebrows as queerly arched as those of the lady standing beside the coffin, came out of her own apartments with some other ladies, and conducting them to the dead man's room, said: "The service will take place immediately; come in."

Shvarts, making an indefinite bow, stood still, obviously neither accepting nor declining this invitation. Praskovya Fyodorovna, recognising Pyotr Ivanovitch, sighed, went right up to him, took his hand, and said, "I know that you were a true friend of Ivan Ilyitch's . . ." and looked at him, expecting from him the suitable action in response to these words. Pyotr Ivanovitch knew that, just as before he had to cross himself, now what he had to do was to press her hand, to sigh and to say, "Ah, I was indeed!" And he did so. And as he did so, he felt that the desired result had been attained; that he was touched, and she was touched.

"Come, since it's not begun yet, I have something I want to say to you," said the widow. "Give me your arm."

Pyotr Ivanovitch gave her his arm, and they moved towards the inner rooms, passing Shvarts, who winked gloomily at Pyotr Ivanovitch.

"So much for our vint! Don't complain if we find another partner. You can make a fifth when you do get away," said his humorous glance.

Pyotr Ivanovitch sighed still more deeply and despondently, and Praskovya Fyodorovna pressed his hand gratefully. Going into her drawing-room, which was upholstered with pink cretonne and lighted by a dismal-looking lamp, they sat down at the table, she on a sofa and Pyotr Ivanovitch on a low ottoman with deranged springs which yielded spasmodically under his weight. Praskovya Fyodorovna was about to warn him to sit on another seat, but felt such a recommendation out of keeping with her position, and changed her mind. Sitting down on the ottoman, Pyotr Ivanovitch remembered how Ivan Ilyitch had arranged this drawing-room, and had consulted him about this very pink cretonne with green leaves. Seating herself on the sofa, and pushing by the table (the whole drawing-room was crowded with furniture and things), the widow caught the lace of her black fichu in the carving of the table. Pyotr Ivanovitch got up to disentangle it for her; and the ottoman, freed from his weight, began bobbing up spasmodically under him. The widow began unhooking her lace herself, and Pyotr Ivanovitch again sat down, suppressing the mutinous ottoman springs under him. But the widow could not quite free herself, and Pyotr Ivanovitch rose again, and again the ottoman became mutinous and popped up with a positive snap. When this was all over, she took out a clean cambric handkerchief and began weeping. Pyotr Ivanovitch had been chilled off by the incident with the lace and the struggle with the ottoman springs, and he sat looking sullen. This awkward position was cut short by the entrance of Sokolov, Ivan Ilyitch's butler, who came in to announce that the place in the cemetery fixed on by Praskovya Fyodorovna would cost two hundred rubles. She left off weeping, and with the air of a victim glancing at Pyotr Ivanovitch, said in French that it was very terrible for her. Pyotr Ivanovitch made a silent gesture signifying his unhesitating conviction that it must indeed be so.

"Please, smoke," she said in a magnanimous, and at the same time, crushed voice, and she began discussing with Sokolov the question of the price of the site for the grave.

Pyotr Ivanovitch, lighting a cigarette, listened to her very circumstantial inquiries as to the various prices of sites and her decision as to the one to be selected. Having settled on the site for the grave, she made arrangements also about the choristers. Sokolov went away.

"I see to everything myself," she said to Pyotr Ivanovitch, moving on one side the albums that lay on the table; and noticing that the table was in danger from the cigarette-ash, she promptly passed an ash-tray to Pyotr Ivanovitch, and said: "I consider it affectation to pretend that my grief prevents me from looking after practical matters. On the contrary, if anything could—not console me . . . but distract me, it is seeing after everything for him." She took out her handkerchief again, as though preparing to weep again; and suddenly, as though struggling with herself, she shook herself, and began speaking calmly: "But I've business to talk about with you."

Pyotr Ivanovitch bowed, carefully keeping in check the springs of the ottoman, which had at once begun quivering under him.

"The last few days his sufferings were awful."

"Did he suffer very much?" asked Pyotr Ivanovitch.

"Oh, awfully! For the last moments, hours indeed, he never left off screaming. For three days and nights in succession he screamed incessantly. It was insufferable. I can't understand how I bore it; one could hear it through three closed doors. Ah, what I suffered!"

"And was he really conscious?" asked Pyotr Ivanovitch.

"Yes," she whispered, "up to the last minute. He said good-bye to us a quarter of an hour before his death, and asked Volodya to be taken away too."

The thought of the sufferings of a man he had known so intimately, at first as a light-hearted boy, a schoolboy, then grown up as a partner at whist, in spite of the unpleasant consciousness of his own and this woman's hypocrisy, suddenly horrified Pyotr Ivanovitch. He saw again that forehead, the nose that seemed squeezing the lip, and he felt frightened for himself. "Three days and nights of awful suffering and death. Why, that may at once, any minute, come upon me too," he thought, and he felt for an instant terrified. But immediately, he could not himself have said how, there came to his support the customary reflection that this had happened to Ivan Ilyitch and not to him, and that to him this must not and could not happen; that in thinking thus he was giving way to depression, which was not the right thing to do, as was evident from Shvarts's expression of face. And making these reflections, Pyotr Ivanovitch felt reassured, and began with interest inquiring details about Ivan Ilyitch's end, as though death were a mischance peculiar to Ivan Ilyitch, but not at all incidental to himself.

After various observations about the details of the truly awful physical sufferings endured by Ivan Ilyitch (these details Pyotr Ivanovitch learned only through the effect Ivan Ilyitch's agonies had had on the nerves of Praskovya Fyodorovna), the widow apparently thought it time to get to business.

"Ah, Pyotr Ivanovitch, how hard it is, how awfully, awfully hard!" and she began to cry again.

Pyotr Ivanovitch sighed, and waited for her to blow her nose. When she had done so, he said, "Indeed it is," and again she began to talk, and brought out what was evidently the business she wished to discuss with him; that business consisted in the inquiry as to how on the occasion of her husband's death she was to obtain a grant from the government. She made a show of asking Pyotr Ivanovitch's advice about a pension. But he perceived that she knew already to the minutest details, what he did not know himself indeed, everything that could be got out of the government on the ground of this death; but that what she wanted to find out was, whether there were not any means of obtaining a little more? Pyotr Ivanovitch tried to imagine such means; but after pondering a little, and out of politeness abusing the government for its stinginess, he said that he believed that it was impossible to obtain more. Then she sighed and began unmistakably looking about for an excuse for getting rid of her visitor. He perceived this, put out his cigarette, got up, pressed her hand, and went out into the passage.

In the dining-room, where was the bric-à-brac clock that Ivan Iyitch had been so delighted at buying, Pyotr Ivanovitch met the priest and several people he knew who had come to the service for the dead, and saw too Ivan Ilyitch's daughter, a handsome young lady. She was all in black. Her very slender figure looked even slenderer than usual. She had a gloomy, determined, almost wrathful expression. She bowed to Pyotr Ivanovitch as though he were to blame in some way. Behind the daughter, with the same offended air on his face, stood a rich young man, whom Pyotr Ivanovitch knew, too, an examining magistrate, the young lady's fiancé, as he had heard. He bowed dejectedly to him, and would have gone on into the dead man's room, when from the staircase there appeared the figure of the son, the high school boy, extraordinarily like Ivan Ilyitch. He was the little Ivan Ilyitch over again as Pyotr Ivanovitch remembered him at school. His eyes were red with crying, and had that look often seen in unclean boys of thirteen or fourteen. The boy, seeing Pyotr Ivanovitch, scowled morosely and bashfully. Pyotr Ivanovitch nodded to him and went into the dead man's room. The service for the dead began—candles, groans, incense, tears, sobs. Pyotr Ivanovitch stood frowning, staring at his feet in front of him. He did not once glance at the dead man, and right through to the end did not once give way to depressing influences, and was one of the first to walk out. In the hall there was no one. Gerasim, the young peasant, darted out of the dead man's room, tossed over with his strong hand all the fur cloaks to find Pyotr Ivanovitch's, and gave it him.

"Well, Gerasim, my boy?" said Pyotr Ivanovitch, so as to say something. "A sad business, isn't it?"

"It's God's will. We shall come to the same," said Gerasim, showing his white, even, peasant teeth in a smile, and, like a man in a rush of extra work, he briskly opened the door, called up the coachman, saw Pyotr Ivanovitch into the carriage, and darted back to the steps as though bethinking himself of what he had to do next.

Pyotr Ivanovitch had a special pleasure in the fresh air after the smell of incense, of the corpse, and of carbolic acid.

"Where to?" asked the coachman.

"It's not too late. I'll still go round to Fyodor Vassilievitch's."

And Pyotr Ivanovitch drove there. And he did, in fact, find them just finishing the first rubber, so that he came just at the right time to take a hand.

II

The previous history of Ivan Ilyitch was the simplest, the most ordinary, and the most awful.

Ivan Ilyitch died at the age of forty-five, a member of the Judicial Council. He was the son of an official, whose career in Petersburg through various ministries and departments had been such as leads people into that position in which, though it is distinctly obvious that they are unfit to perform any kind of real duty, they yet cannot, owing to their long past service and their official rank, be dismissed; and they therefore receive a specially created fictitious post, and by no means fictitious thousands—from six to ten—on which they go on living till extreme old age. Such was the privy councillor, the superfluous member of various superfluous institutions, Ilya Efimovitch Golovin.

He had three sons. Ivan Ilyitch was the second son. The eldest son's career was exactly like his father's, only in a different department, and he was by now close upon that stage in the service in which the same sinecure would be reached. The third son was the unsuccessful one. He had in various positions always made a mess of things, and was now employed in the railway department. And his father and his brothers, and still more their wives, did not merely dislike meeting him, but avoided, except in extreme necessity, recollecting his existence. His sister had married Baron Greff, a Petersburg official of the same stamp as his father-in-law. Ivan Ilyitch was le phénix de la famille,¹ as people said. He was not so frigid and precise as the eldest son, nor so wild as the youngest. He was the happy mean between them—a shrewd, lively, pleasant, and well-bred man. He had been educated with his younger brother at the school of jurisprudence. The younger brother had not finished the school course, but was expelled when in the fifth class. Ivan Ilyitch completed the course successfully. At school he was just the same as he was later on all his life—an intelligent fellow, highly good-humoured and sociable, but strict in doing what he considered to be his duty. His duty he considered whatever was so considered by those persons who were set in authority over him. He was not a toady as a boy, nor later on as a grown-up person; but from his earliest years he was attracted, as a fly to the light, to persons of good standing in the world, assimilated their manners and their views of life, and established friendly relations with them. All the enthusiasms of childhood and youth passed, leaving no great traces in him; he gave way to sensuality and to vanity, and latterly when in the higher classes at school to liberalism, but always keeping within certain limits which were unfailingly marked out for him by his instincts.

At school he had committed actions which had struck him beforehand as great vileness, and gave him a feeling of loathing for himself at the very time he was committing them. But later on, perceiving that such actions were committed also by men of good position, and were not regarded by them as base, he was able, not to regard them as good, but to forget about them completely, and was never mortified by recollections of them.

Leaving the school of jurisprudence in the tenth class, and receiving from his father a sum of money for his outfit, Ivan Ilyitch ordered his clothes at Sharmer's, hung on his watchchain a medallion inscribed respice finem,² said good-bye to the prince who was the principal of his school, had a farewell dinner with his comrades at Donon's, and with all his new fashionable belongings—travelling trunk, linen, suits of clothes, shaving and toilet appurtenances, and travelling rug, all ordered and purchased at the very best shops—set off to take the post of secretary on special commissions for the governor of a province, a post which had been obtained for him by his father.

¹ the phoenix (the paragon) of the family. ² look to the end.

In the province Ivan Ilyitch without loss of time made himself a position as easy and agreeable as his position had been in the school of jurisprudence. He did his work, made his career, and at the same time led a life of well-bred social gaiety. Occasionally he visited various districts on official duty, behaved with dignity both with his superiors and his inferiors; and with exactitude and an incorruptible honesty of which he could not help feeling proud, performed the duties with which he was intrusted, principally having to do with the dissenters. When engaged in official work he was, in spite of his youth and taste for frivolous amusement, exceedingly reserved, official, and even severe. But in social life he was often amusing and witty, and always good-natured, well-bred, and bon enfant,¹ as was said of him by his chief and his chief's wife, with whom he was like one of the family.

In the province there was, too, a connection with one of the ladies who obtruded their charms on the stylish young lawyer. There was a dress-maker, too, and there were drinking bouts with smart officers visiting the neighbourhood, and visits to a certain outlying street after supper; there was a rather cringing obsequiousness in his behaviour, too, with his chief, and even his chief's wife. But all this was accompanied with such a tone of the highest breeding, that it could not be called by harsh names; it all came under the rubric of the French saying, Il faut que la jeunesse se passe.² Everything was done with clean hands, in clean shirts, with French phrases, and, what was of most importance, in the highest society, and consequently with the approval of people of rank.

Such was Ivan Ilyitch's career for five years, and then came a change in his official life. New methods of judicial procedure were established; new men were wanted to carry them out. And Ivan Ilyitch became such a new man. Ivan Ilyitch was offered the post of examining magistrate, and he accepted it in spite of the fact that this post was in another province, and he would have to break off all the ties he had formed and form new ones. Ivan Ilyitch's friends met together to see him off, had their photographs taken in a group, presented him with a silver cigarette-case, and he set off to his new post.

As an examining magistrate, Ivan Ilyitch was

as comme il faut,³ as well-bred, as adroit in keeping official duties apart from private life, and as successful in gaining universal respect, as he had been as secretary of private commissions. The duties of his new office were in themselves of far greater interest and attractiveness for Ivan Ilyitch. In his former post it had been pleasant to pass in his smart uniform from Sharmer's through the crowd of petitioners and officials waiting timorously and envying him, and to march with his easy swagger straight into the governor's private room, there to sit down with him to tea and cigarettes. But the persons directly subject to his authority were few. The only such persons were the district police superintendents and the dissenters, when he was serving on special commissions. And he liked treating such persons affably, almost like comrades; liked to make them feel that he, able to annihilate them, was behaving in this simple, friendly way with them. But such people were then few in number. Now as an examining magistrate Ivan Ilyitch felt that every one—every one without exception—the most dignified, the most self-satisfied people, all were in his hands, and that he had but to write certain words on a sheet of paper with a printed heading, and this dignified self-satisfied person would be brought before him in the capacity of a defendant or a witness; and if he did not care to make him sit down, he would have to stand up before him and answer his questions. Ivan Ilyitch never abused this authority of his; on the contrary, he tried to soften the expression of it. But the consciousness of this power and the possibility of softening its effect constituted for him the chief interest and attractiveness of his new position. In the work itself, in the preliminary inquiries, that is, Ivan Ilyitch very rapidly acquired the art of setting aside every consideration irrelevant to the official aspect of the case, and of reducing every case, however complex, to that form in which it could in a purely external fashion be put on paper, completely excluding his personal view of the matter, and what was of paramount importance, observing all the necessary formalities. All this work was new. And he was one of the first men who put into practical working the reforms in judicial procedure enacted in 1864.

On settling in a new town in his position as examining magistrate, Ivan Ilyitch made new acquaintances, formed new ties, took up a new line, and adopted a rather different attitude. He took up an attitude of somewhat dignified aloofness towards the provincial authorities, while he picked out the best circle among the legal gentlemen and wealthy gentry living in the town, and adopted a tone of slight dissatisfaction with the government, moderate liberalism, and lofty civic virtue. With this, while making no change in the elegance of his get-up, Ivan Ilyitch in his new office gave up shaving, and left his beard free to grow as it liked. Ivan Ilyitch's existence in the new town proved to be very agreeable; the society¹⁰ which took the line of opposition to the governor was friendly and good; his income was larger, and he found a source of increased enjoyment in whist, at which he began to play at this time; and having a faculty for playing cards good-humouredly, and being rapid and exact in his calculations, he was as a rule on the winning side.

¹ Literally: good child.

² Literally: youth must pass.

³ Literally: proper.

After living two years in the new town, Ivan Ilyitch met his future wife. Praskovya Fyodorovna Mihel was the most attractive, clever, and brilliant girl in the set in which Ivan Ilyitch moved. Among other amusements and recreations after his labours as a magistrate, Ivan Ilyitch started a light, playful flirtation with Praskovya Fyodorovna.

Ivan Ilyitch when he was an assistant secretary had danced as a rule; as an examining magistrate he danced only as an exception. He danced now as it were under protest, as though to show "that though I am serving on the new reformed legal³⁰ code, and am of the fifth class in official rank, still if it comes to a question of dancing, in that line, too, I can do better than others." In this spirit he danced now and then towards the end of the evening with Praskovya Fyodorovna, and it was principally during these dances that he won the heart of Praskovya Fyodorovna. She fell in love with him. Ivan Ilyitch had no clearly defined intention of marrying; but when the girl fell in love with him, he put the question to himself: "After all, why not⁴⁰ get married?"

The young lady, Praskovya Fyodorovna, was of good family, nice-looking. There was a little bit of property. Ivan Ilyitch might have reckoned on a more brilliant match, but this was a good match. Ivan Ilyitch had his salary; she, he hoped, would have as much of her own. It was a good family; she was a sweet, pretty, and perfectly comme il faut young woman. To say that Ivan Ilyitch got married because he fell in love with his wife and⁵⁰ found in her sympathy with his views of life, would be as untrue as to say that he got married because the people of his world approved of the match. Ivan Ilyitch was influenced by both considerations; he was doing what was agreeable to himself in securing such a wife, and at the same time doing what persons of higher standing looked upon as the correct thing.

And Ivan Ilyitch got married.

The process itself of getting married and the early period of married life, with the conjugal caresses, the new furniture, the new crockery, the new house linen, all up to the time of his wife's pregnancy, went off very well; so that Ivan Ilyitch had already begun to think that so far from marriage breaking up that kind of frivolous, agreeable, light-hearted life, always decorous and always approved by society, which he regarded as the normal life, it would even increase its agreeableness. But at that point, in the early months of his wife's pregnancy, there came in a new element, unexpected, unpleasant, tiresome and unseemly, which could never have been anticipated, and from which there was no escape.

His wife, without any kind of reason, it seemed to Ivan Ilyitch, de gaieté de cœur,¹ as he expressed it, began to disturb the agreeableness and decorum of their life. She began without any sort of justification to be jealous, exacting in her demands on his attention, squabbled over everything, and treated him to the coarsest and most unpleasant scenes.

At first Ivan Ilyitch hoped to escape from the unpleasantness of this position by taking up the same frivolous and well-bred line that had served him well on other occasions of difficulty. He endeavoured to ignore his wife's ill-humour, went on living light-heartedly and agreeably as before, invited friends to play cards, tried to get away himself to the club or to his friends. But his wife began on one occasion with such energy, abusing him in such coarse language, and so obstinately persisted in her abuse of him every time he failed in carrying out her demands, obviously having made up her mind firmly to persist till he gave way, that is, stayed at home and was as dull as she was, that Ivan Ilyitch took alarm. He perceived that matrimony, at least with his wife, was not invariably conducive to the pleasures and proprieties of life; but, on the contrary, often destructive of them, and that it was therefore essential to erect some barrier to protect himself from these disturbances. And Ivan Ilyitch began to look about for such means of protecting himself. His official duties were the only thing that impressed Praskovya Fyodorovna, and Ivan Ilyitch began to use his official position and the duties arising from it in his struggle with his wife to fence off his own independent world apart.

¹ out of mere wantonness.

With the birth of the baby, the attempts at nursing it, and the various unsuccessful experiments with foods, with the illnesses, real and imaginary, of the infant and its mother, in which Ivan Ilyitch was expected to sympathise, though he never had the slightest idea about them, the need for him to fence off a world apart for himself outside his family life became still more imperative. As his wife grew more irritable and exacting, so did Ivan Ilyitch more and more transfer the centre of gravity of his life to his official work. He became fonder and fonder of official life, and more ambitious than he had been.

Very quickly, not more than a year after his wedding, Ivan Ilyitch had become aware that conjugal life, though providing certain comforts, was in reality a very intricate and difficult business towards which one must, if one is to do one's duty, that is, lead the decorous life approved by society, work out for oneself a definite line, just as in the government service.

And such a line Ivan Ilyitch did work out for himself in his married life. He expected from his home life only those comforts—of dinner at home, of housekeeper and bed which it could give him, and, above all, that perfect propriety in external observances required by public opinion. For the rest, he looked for good-humoured pleasantness, and if he found it he was very thankful. If he met with antagonism and querulousness, he promptly retreated into the separate world he had shut off for himself in his official life, and there he found solace.

Ivan Ilyitch was prized as a good official, and three years later he was made assistant public prosecutor. The new duties of this position, their dignity, the possibility of bringing any one to trial and putting any one in prison, the publicity of the speeches and the success Ivan Ilyitch had in that part of his work,—all this made his official work still more attractive to him.

Children were born to him. His wife became steadily more querulous and ill-tempered, but the line Ivan Ilyitch had taken up for himself in home life put him almost out of reach of her grumbling.

After seven years of service in the same town, Ivan Ilyitch was transferred to another province with the post of public prosecutor. They moved, money was short, and his wife did not like the place they had moved to. The salary was indeed a little higher than before, but their expenses were larger. Besides, a couple of children died, and home life consequently became even less agreeable for Ivan Ilyitch.

For every mischance that occurred in their new place of residence, Praskovya Fyodorovna blamed her husband. The greater number of subjects of conversation between husband and wife, especially the education of the children, led to questions which were associated with previous quarrels, and quarrels were ready to break out at every instant. There remained only those rare periods of being in love which did indeed come upon them, but never lasted long. These were the islands at which they put in for a time, but they soon set off again upon the ocean of concealed hostility, that was made manifest in their aloofness from one another. This aloofness might have distressed Ivan Ilyitch if he had believed that this ought not to be so, but by now he regarded this position as perfectly normal, and it was indeed the goal towards which he worked in his home life. His aim was to make himself more and more free from the unpleasant aspects of domestic life and to render them harmless and decorous. And he attained this aim by spending less and less time with his family; and when he was forced to be at home, he endeavoured to secure his tranquillity by the presence of outsiders. The great thing for Ivan Ilyitch was having his office. In the official world all the interest of life was concentrated for him. And this interest absorbed him. The sense of his own power, the consciousness of being able to ruin any one he wanted to ruin, even the external dignity of his office, when he made his entry into the court or met subordinate officials, his success in the eyes of his superiors and his subordinates, and, above all, his masterly handling of cases, of which he was conscious,—all this delighted him and, together with chats with his colleagues, dining out, and whist, filled his life. So that, on the whole, Ivan's life still went on in the way he thought it should go—agreeably, decorously.

So he lived for another seven years. His eldest daughter was already sixteen, another child had died, and there was left only one other, a boy at the high school, a subject of dissension. Ivan Ilyitch wanted to send him to the school of jurisprudence, while Praskovya Fyodorovna to spite him sent him to the high school. The daughter had been educated at home, and had turned out well; the boy too did fairly well at his lessons.

III

Such was Ivan Ilyitch's life for seventeen years after his marriage. He had been prosecutor a long while by now, and had refused several appointments offered him, looking out for a more desirable post, when there occurred an unexpected incident which utterly destroyed his peace of mind. Ivan Ilyitch had been expecting to be appointed presiding judge in a university town, but a certain Goppe somehow stole a march on him and secured the appointment. Ivan Ilyitch took offence, began upbraiding him, and quarrelled with him and with his own superiors. A coolness was felt towards him, and on the next appointment that was made he was again passed over.

This was in the year 1880. That year was the most painful one in Ivan Ilyitch's life. During that year it became evident on the one hand that his pay was insufficient for his expenses; on the other hand, that he had been forgotten by every one, and that what seemed to him the most monstrous, the cruelest injustice, appeared to other people as a quite commonplace fact. Even his father felt no obligation to assist him. He felt that every one had deserted him, and that every one regarded his position with an income of three thousand five hundred rubles as a quite normal and even fortunate one. He alone, with a sense of the injustice done him, and the everlasting nagging of his wife and the debts he had begun to accumulate, living beyond his means, knew that his position was far from being normal.

The summer of that year, to cut down his expenses, he took a holiday and went with his wife to spend the summer in the country at her brother's.

In the country, with no official duties to occupy him, Ivan Ilyitch was for the first time a prey not to simple boredom, but to intolerable depression; and he made up his mind that things could not go on like that, and that it was absolutely necessary to take some decisive steps.

After a sleepless night spent by Ivan Ilyitch walking up and down the terrace, he determined to go to Petersburg to take active steps and to get transferred to some other department, so as to revenge himself on them, the people, that is, who had not known how to appreciate him.

Next day, in spite of all the efforts of his wife and his mother-in-law to dissuade him, he set off to Petersburg.

He went with a single object before him—to obtain a post with an income of five thousand. He was ready now to be satisfied with a post in any department, of any tendency, with any kind of work. He must only have a post—a post with five thousand, in the executive department, the banks, the railways, the Empress Marya's institutions, even in the customs duties—what was essential was five thousand, and essential it was, too, to get out of the department in which they had failed to appreciate his value.

And, behold, this quest of Ivan Ilyitch's was crowned with wonderful, unexpected success. At Kursk there got into the same first-class carriage F. S. Ilyin, an acquaintance, who told him of a telegram just received by the governor of Kursk, announcing a change about to take place in the ministry—Pyotr Ivanovitch was to be superseded by Ivan Semyonovitch.

The proposed change, apart from its significance for Russia, had special significance for Ivan Ilyitch from the fact that by bringing to the front a new person, Pyotr Petrovitch, and obviously, therefore, his friend Zahar Ivanovitch, it was in the highest degree propitious to Ivan Ilyitch's own plans. Zahar Ivanovitch was a friend and school-fellow of Ivan Ilyitch's.

At Moscow the news was confirmed. On arriving at Petersburg, Ivan Ilyitch looked up Zahar Ivanovitch, and received a positive promise of an appointment in his former department—that of justice.

A week later he telegraphed to his wife: "Zahar Miller's place. At first report I receive appointment."

Thanks to these changes, Ivan Ilyitch unexpectedly obtained, in the same department as before, an appointment which placed him two stages higher than his former colleagues, and gave him an income of five thousand, together with the official allowance of three thousand five hundred for travelling expenses. All his ill-humour with his former enemies and the whole department was forgotten, and Ivan Ilyitch was completely happy.

Ivan Ilyitch went back to the country more light-hearted and good-tempered than he had been for a very long while. Praskovya Fyodorovna was in better spirits, too, and peace was patched up between them. Ivan Ilyitch described what respect every one had shown him in Petersburg; how all those who had been his enemies had been put to shame, and were cringing now before him; how envious they were of his appointment, and still more of the high favour in which he stood at Petersburg.

Praskovya Fyodorovna listened to this, and pretended to believe it, and did not contradict him in anything, but confined herself to making plans for her new arrangements in the town to which they would be moving. And Ivan Ilyitch saw with delight that these plans were his plans; that they were agreed; and that his life after this disturbing hitch in its progress was about to regain its true, normal character of light-hearted agreeableness and propriety.

Ivan Ilyitch had come back to the country for a short stay only. He had to enter upon the duties of his new office on the 10th of September; and besides, he needed some time to settle in a new place, to move all his belongings from the other province, to purchase and order many things in addition; in short, to arrange things as settled in his own mind, and almost exactly as settled in the heart too of Praskovya Fyodorovna.

And now when everything was so successfully arranged, and when he and his wife were agreed in their aim, and were, besides, so little together, they got on with one another as they had not got on together since the early years of their married life. Ivan Ilyitch had thought of taking his family away with him at once; but his sister and his brother-in-law, who had suddenly become extremely cordial and intimate with him and his family, were so pressing in urging them to stay that he set off alone.

Ivan Ilyitch started off; and the light-hearted temper produced by his success, and his good understanding with his wife, one thing backing up another, did not desert him all the time. He found a charming set of apartments, the very thing both husband and wife had dreamed of. Spacious, lofty reception-rooms in the old style, a comfortable, dignified-looking study for him, rooms for his wife and daughter, a schoolroom for his son, everything as though planned on purpose for them. Ivan Ilyitch himself looked after the furnishing of them, chose the wall-papers, bought furniture, by preference antique furniture, which had a peculiar comme-il-faut style to his mind, and it all grew up and grew up, and really attained the ideal he had set before himself. When he had half finished arranging the house, his arrangement surpassed his own expectations. He saw the comme-il-faut character, elegant and free from vulgarity, that the whole would have when it was all ready. As he fell asleep he pictured to himself the reception-room as it would be. Looking at the drawing-room, not yet finished, he could see the hearth, the screen, the étagère, and the little chairs dotted here and there, the plates and dishes on the wall, and the bronzes as they would be when they were all put in their places. He was delighted with the thought of how he would impress Praskovya and Lizanka, who had taste too in this line. They would never expect anything like it. He was particularly successful in coming across and buying cheap old pieces of furniture, which gave a peculiarly aristocratic air to the whole. In his letters he purposely disparaged everything so as to surprise them. All this so absorbed him that the duties of his new office, though he was so fond of his official work, interested him less than he had expected. During sittings of the court he had moments of inattention; he pondered the question which sort of cornices to have on the window-blinds, straight or fluted. He was so interested in this business that he often set to work with his own hands, moved a piece of furniture, or hung up curtains himself. One day he went up a ladder to show a workman, who did not understand, how he wanted some hangings draped, made a false step and slipped; but, like a strong and nimble person, he clung on, and only knocked his side against the corner of a frame. The bruised place ached, but it soon passed off. Ivan Ilyich felt all this time particularly good-humoured and well. He wrote: "I feel fifteen years younger." He thought his house-furnishing would be finished in September, but it dragged on to the middle of October. But then the effect was charming; not he only said so, but every one who saw it told him so too.

In reality, it was all just what is commonly seen in the houses of people who are not exactly wealthy but want to look like wealthy people, and so succeed only in being like one another—hangings, dark wood, flowers, rugs and bronzes, everything dark and highly polished, everything that all people of a certain class have so as to be like all people of a certain class. And in his case it was all so like that it made no impression at all; but it all seemed to him somehow special. When he met his family at the railway station and brought them to his newly furnished rooms, all lighted up in readiness, and a footman in a white tie opened the door into an entry decorated with flowers, and then they walked into the drawing-room and the study, uttering cries of delight, he was very happy, conducted them everywhere, eagerly drinking in their praises, and beaming with satisfaction. The same evening, while they talked about various things at tea, Praskovya Fyodorovna inquired about his fall, and he laughed and showed them how he had gone flying, and how he had frightened the upholsterer.

"It's as well I'm something of an athlete. Another man might have been killed, and I got nothing worse than a blow here; when it's touched it hurts, but it's going off already; just a bruise."

And they began to live in their new abode, which, as is always the case, when they had got thoroughly settled in they found to be short of just one room, and with their new income, which, as always, was only a little—some five hundred rubles—too little, and everything went very well. Things went particularly well at first, before everything was quite finally arranged, and there was still something to do to the place—something to buy, something to order, something to move, something to make to fit. Though there were indeed several disputes between husband and wife, both were so well satisfied, and there was so much to do, that it all went off without serious quarrels. When there was nothing left to arrange, it became a little dull, and something seemed to be lacking, but by then they were making acquaintances and forming habits, and life was filled up again.

Ivan Ilyitch, after spending the morning in the court, returned home to dinner, and at first he was generally in a good humour, although this was apt to be upset a little, and precisely on account of the new abode. Every spot on the table-cloth, on the hangings, the string of a window blind broken, irritated him. He had devoted so much trouble to the arrangement of the rooms that any disturbance of their order distressed him. But, on the whole, the life of Ivan Ilyitch ran its course as, according to his conviction, life ought to do—easily, agreeably, and decorously. He got up at nine, drank his coffee, read the newspaper, then put on his official uniform, and went to the court. There the routine of the daily work was ready mapped out for him, and he stepped into it at once. People with petitions, inquiries in the office, the office itself, the sittings—public and preliminary. In all this the great thing necessary was to exclude everything with the sap of life in it, which always disturbs the regular course of official business, not to admit any sort of relations with people except the official relations; the motive of all intercourse had to be simply the official motive, and the intercourse itself to be only official. A man would come, for instance, anxious for certain information. Ivan Ilyitch, not being the functionary on duty, would have nothing whatever to do with such a man. But if this man's relation to him as a member of the court is such as can be formulated on official stamped paper—within the limits of such a relation Ivan Ilyitch would do everything, positively everything he could, and in doing so would observe the semblance of human friendly relations, that is, the courtesies of social life. But where the official relation ended, there everything else stopped too. This art of keeping the official aspect of things apart from his real life, Ivan Ilyitch possessed in the highest degree; and through long practice and natural aptitude, he had brought it to such a pitch of perfection that he even permitted himself at times, like a skilled specialist as it were in jest, to let the human and official relations mingle. He allowed himself this liberty just because he felt he had the power at any moment if he wished it to take up the purely official line again and to drop the human relation. This thing was not simply easy, agreeable, and decorous; in Ivan Ilyitch's hands it attained a positively artistic character. In the intervals of business he smoked, drank tea, chatted a little about politics, a little about public affairs, a little about cards, but most of all about appointments in the service. And tired, but feeling like some artist who has skilfully played his part in the performance, one of the first violins in the orchestra, he returned home. At home his daughter and her mother had been paying calls somewhere, or else some one had been calling on them; the son had been at school, had been preparing his lessons with his teachers, and duly learning correctly what was taught at the high school. Everything was as it should be. After dinner, if there were no visitors, Ivan Ilyitch sometimes read some book of which people were talking, and in the evening sat down to work, that is, read official papers, compared them with the laws, sorted depositions, and put them under the laws. This he found neither tiresome nor entertaining. It was tiresome when he might have been playing vint; but if there were no vint going on, it was better anyway than sitting alone or with his wife. Ivan Ilyitch's pleasures were little dinners, to which he invited ladies and gentlemen of good social position, and such methods of passing the time with them as were usual with such persons, so that his drawing-room might be like all other drawing-rooms.

Once they even gave a party—a dance. And Ivan Ilyitch enjoyed it, and everything was very successful, except that it led to a violent quarrel with his wife over the tarts and sweetmeats. Praskovya Fyodorovna had her own plan; while Ivan Ilyitch insisted on getting everything from an expensive pastry-cook, and ordered a great many tarts, and the quarrel was because these tarts were left over and the pastry-cook's bill came to forty-five rubles. The quarrel was a violent and unpleasant one, so much so that Praskovya Fyodorovna called him, "Fool, imbecile." And he clutched at his head, and in his anger made some allusion to a divorce. But the party itself was enjoyable. There were all the best people, and Ivan Ilyitch danced with Princess Trufanov, the sister of the one so well known in connection with the charitable association called, "Bear my Burden." His official pleasures lay in the gratification of his pride; his social pleasures lay in the gratification of his vanity. But Ivan Ilyitch's most real pleasure was the pleasure of playing vint. He admitted to himself that, after all, after whatever unpleasant incidents there had been in his life, the pleasure which burned like a candle before all others was sitting with good players, and not noisy partners, at vint; and, of course, a four-hand game (playing with five was never a success, though one pretends to like it particularly), and with good cards, to play a shrewd, serious game, then supper and a glass of wine. And after vint, especially after winning some small stakes (winning large sums was unpleasant), Ivan Ilyitch went to bed in a particularly happy frame of mind.

So they lived. They moved in the very best circle, and were visited by people of consequence and young people.

In their views of their circle of acquaintances, the husband, the wife, and the daughter were in complete accord; and without any expressed agreement on the subject, they all acted alike in dropping and shaking off various friends and relations, shabby persons who swooped down upon them in their drawing-room with Japanese plates on the walls, and pressed their civilities on them. Soon these shabby persons ceased fluttering about them, and none but the very best society was seen at the Golovins. Young men began to pay attention to Lizanka; and Petrishtchev, the son of Dmitry Ivanovitch Petrishtchev, and the sole heir of his fortune, an examining magistrate, began to be so attentive to Lizanka, that Ivan Ilyitch had raised the question with his wife whether it would not be as well to arrange a sledge drive for them, or to get up some theatricals. So they lived. And everything went on in this way without change, and everything was very nice.

IV

All were in good health. One could not use the word ill-health in connection with the symptoms Ivan Ilyitch sometimes complained of, namely, a queer taste in his mouth and a sort of uncomfortable feeling on the left side of the stomach.

But it came to pass that this uncomfortable feeling kept increasing, and became not exactly a pain, but a continual sense of weight in his side and the cause of an irritable temper. This irritable temper continually growing, began at last to mar the agreeable easiness and decorum that had reigned in the Golovin household. Quarrels between the husband and wife became more and more frequent, and soon all the easiness and amenity of life had fallen away, and mere propriety was maintained with difficulty. Scenes became again more frequent. Again there were only islands in the sea of contention—and but few of these—at which the husband and wife could meet without an outbreak. And Praskovya Fyodorovna said now, not without grounds, that her husband had a trying temper. With her characteristic exaggeration, she said he had always had this awful temper, and she had needed all her sweetness to put up with it for twenty years. It was true that it was he now who began the quarrels. His gusts of temper always broke out just before dinner, and often just as he was beginning to eat, at the soup. He would notice that some piece of the crockery had been chipped, or that the food was not nice, or that his son put his elbow on the table, or his daughter's hair was not arranged as he liked it. And whatever it was, he laid the blame of it on Praskovya Fyodorovna. Praskovya Fyodorovna had at first retorted in the same strain, and said all sorts of horrid things to him; but on two occasions, just at the beginning of dinner, he had flown into such a frenzy that she perceived that it was due to physical derangement, and was brought on by taking food, and she controlled herself; she did not reply, but simply made haste to get dinner over. Praskovya Fyodorovna took great credit to herself for this exercise of self-control. Making up her mind that her husband had a fearful temper, and made her life miserable, she began to feel sorry for herself. And the more she felt for herself, the more she hated her husband. She began to wish he were dead; yet could not wish it, because then there would be no income. And this exasperated her against him even more. She considered herself dreadfully unfortunate, precisely because even his death could not save her, and she felt irritated and concealed it, and this hidden irritation on her side increased his irritability.

After one violent scene, in which Ivan Ilyitch had been particularly unjust, and after which he had said in explanation that he certainly was irritable, but that it was due to illness, she said that if he were ill he ought to take steps, and insisted on his going to see a celebrated doctor.

He went. Everything was as he had expected; everything was as it always is. The waiting and the assumption of dignity, that professional dignity he knew so well, exactly as he assumed it himself in court, and the sounding and listening and questions that called for answers that were foregone conclusions and obviously superfluous, and the significant air that seemed to insinuate—you only leave it all to us, and we will arrange everything, for us it is certain and incontestable how to arrange everything, everything in one way for every man of every sort. It was all exactly as in his court of justice. Exactly the same air as he put on in dealing with a man brought up for judgment, the doctor put on for him.

The doctor said: This and that proves that you have such-and-such a thing wrong inside you; but if that is not confirmed by analysis of this and that, then we must assume this and that. If we assume this and that, then—and so on. To Ivan Ilyitch there was only one question of consequence, Was his condition dangerous or not? But the doctor ignored that irrelevant inquiry. From the doctor's point of view this was a side issue, not the subject under consideration; the only real question was the balance of probabilities between a loose kidney, chronic catarrh, and appendicitis. It was not a question of the life of Ivan Ilyitch, but the question between the loose kidney and the intestinal appendix. And this question, as it seemed to Ivan Ilyitch, the doctor solved in a brilliant manner in favour of the appendix, with the reservation that analysis of the water might give a fresh clue, and that then the aspect of the case would be altered. All this was point for point identical with what Ivan Ilyitch had himself done in brilliant fashion a thousand times over in dealing with some man on his trial. Just as brilliantly the doctor made his summing-up, and triumphantly, gaily even, glanced over his spectacles at the prisoner in the dock. From the doctor's summing-up Ivan Ilyitch deduced the conclusion—that things looked bad, and that he, the doctor, and most likely every one else, did not care, but that things looked bad for him. And this conclusion impressed Ivan Ilyitch morbidly, arousing in him a great feeling of pity for himself, of great anger against this doctor who could be unconcerned about a matter of such importance.

But he said nothing of that. He got up, and, laying the fee on the table, he said, with a sigh, "We sick people probably often ask inconvenient questions. Tell me, is this generally a dangerous illness or not?"

The doctor glanced severely at him with one eye through his spectacles, as though to say: "Prisoner at the bar, if you will not keep within the limits of the questions allowed you, I shall be compelled to take measures for your removal from the precincts of the court." "I have told you what I thought necessary and suitable already," said the doctor; "the analysis will show anything further." And the doctor bowed him out.

Ivan Ilyitch went out slowly and dejectedly, got into his sledge, and drove home. All the way home he was incessantly going over all the doctor had said, trying to translate all these complicated, obscure, scientific phrases into simple language, and to read in them an answer to the question, Is it bad—is it very bad, or nothing much as yet? And it seemed to him that the upshot of all the doctor had said was that it was very bad. Everything seemed dismal to Ivan Ilyitch in the streets. The sledge-drivers were dismal, the houses were dismal, the people passing, and the shops were dismal. This ache, this dull gnawing ache, that never ceased for a second, seemed, when connected with the doctor's obscure utterances, to have gained a new, more serious significance. With a new sense of misery Ivan Ilyitch kept watch on it now.

He reached home and began to tell his wife about it. His wife listened; but in the middle of his account his daughter came in with her hat on, ready to go out with her mother. Reluctantly she half sat down to listen to these tedious details, but she could not stand it for long, and her mother did not hear his story to the end.

"Well, I'm very glad," said his wife; "now you must be sure and take the medicine regularly. Give me the prescription; I'll send Gerasim to the chemist's!" And she went to get ready to go out.

He had not taken breath while she was in the room, and he heaved a deep sigh when she was gone.

"Well," he said, "may be it really is nothing as yet."

He began to take the medicine, to carry out the doctor's directions, which were changed after the analysis of the water. But it was just at this point that some confusion arose, either in the analysis or in what ought to have followed from it. The doctor himself, of course, could not be blamed for it, but it turned out that things had not gone as the doctor had told him. Either he had forgotten or told a lie, or was hiding something from him.

But Ivan Ilyitch still went on just as exactly carrying out the doctor's direction, and in doing so he found comfort at first.

From the time of his visit to the doctor Ivan Ilyitch's principal occupation became the exact observance of the doctor's prescriptions as regards hygiene and medicine and the careful observation of his ailment in all the functions of his organism. Ivan Ilyitch's principal interest came to be people's ailments and people's health. When anything was said in his presence about sick people, about deaths and recoveries, especially in the case of an illness resembling his own, he listened, trying to conceal his excitement, asked questions, and applied what he heard to his own trouble.

The ache did not grow less; but Ivan Ilyitch made great efforts to force himself to believe that he was better. And he succeeded in deceiving himself so long as nothing happened to disturb him. But as soon as he had a mischance, some unpleasant words with his wife, a failure in his official work, an unlucky hand at vint, he was at once acutely sensible of his illness. In former days he had borne with such mishaps, hoping soon to retrieve the mistake, to make a struggle, to reach success later, to have a lucky hand. But now he was cast down by every mischance and reduced to despair. He would say to himself: "Here I'm only just beginning to get better, and the medicine has begun to take effect, and now this mischance or disappointment." And he was furious against the mischance or the people who were causing him the disappointment and killing him, and he felt that this fury was killing him, but could not check it. One would have thought that it should have been clear to him that this exasperation against circumstances and people was aggravating his disease, and that therefore he ought not to pay attention to the unpleasant incidents. But his reasoning took quite the opposite direction. He said that he needed peace, and was on the watch for everything that disturbed his peace, and at the slightest disturbance of it he flew into a rage. What made his position worse was that he read medical books and consulted doctors. He got worse so gradually that he might have deceived himself, comparing one day with another, the difference was so slight. But when he consulted the doctors, then it seemed to him that he was getting worse, and very rapidly so indeed. And in spite of this, he was continually consulting the doctors.

That month he called on another celebrated doctor. The second celebrity said almost the same as the first, but put his questions differently; and the interview with this celebrity only redoubled the doubts and terrors of Ivan Ilyitch. A friend of a friend of his, a very good doctor, diagnosed the disease quite differently; and in spite of the fact that he guaranteed recovery, by his questions and his suppositions he confused Ivan Ilyitch even more and strengthened his suspicions. A homœopath gave yet another diagnosis of the complaint, and prescribed medicine, which Ivan Ilyitch took secretly for a week; but after a week of the homœopathic medicine he felt no relief, and losing faith both in the other doctor's treatment and in this, he fell into even deeper depression. One day a lady of his acquaintance talked to him of the healing wrought by the holy pictures. Ivan Ilyitch caught himself listening attentively and believing in the reality of the facts alleged. This incident alarmed him. "Can I have degenerated to such a point of intellectual feebleness?" he said to himself. "Nonsense! it's all rubbish. I must not give way to nervous fears, but fixing on one doctor, adhere strictly to his treatment. That's what I will do. Now it's settled. I won't think about it, but till next summer I will stick to the treatment, and then I shall see. Now I'll put a stop to this wavering!" It was easy to say this, but impossible to carry it out. The pain in his side was always dragging at him, seeming to grow more acute and ever more incessant; it seemed to him that the taste in his mouth was queerer, and there was a loathsome smell even from his breath, and his appetite and strength kept dwindling. There was no deceiving himself; something terrible, new, and so important that nothing more important had ever been in Ivan Ilyitch's life, was taking place in him, and he alone knew of it. All about him did not or would not understand, and believed that everything in the world was going on as before. This was what tortured Ivan Ilyitch more than anything. Those of his own household, most of all his wife and daughter, who were absorbed in a perfect whirl of visits, did not, he saw, comprehend it at all, and were annoyed that he was so depressed and exacting, as though he were to blame for it. Though they tried indeed to disguise it, he saw he was a nuisance to them; but that his wife had taken up a definite line of her own in regard to his illness, and stuck to it regardless of what he might say and do. This line was expressed thus: "You know," she would say to acquaintances, "Ivan Ilyitch cannot, like all other simple-hearted folks, keep to the treatment prescribed him. One day he'll take his drops and eat what he's ordered, and go to bed in good time; the next day, if I don't see to it, he'll suddenly forget to take his medicine, eat sturgeon (which is forbidden by the doctors), yes, and sit up at vint till past midnight."

"Why, when did I do that?" Ivan Ilyitch asked in vexation one day at Pyotr Ivanovitch's.

"Why, yesterday, with Shebek."

"It makes no difference. I couldn't sleep for pain."

"Well, it doesn't matter what you do it for, only you'll never get well like that, and you make us wretched."

Praskovya Fyodorovna's external attitude to her husband's illness, openly expressed to others and to himself, was that Ivan Ilyitch was to blame in the matter of his illness, and that the whole illness was another injury he was doing to his wife. Ivan Ilyitch felt that the expression of this dropped from her unconsciously, but that made it no easier for him.

In his official life, too, Ivan Ilyitch noticed, or fancied he noticed, a strange attitude to him. At one time it seemed to him that people were looking inquisitively at him, as a man who would shortly have to vacate his position; at another time his friends would suddenly begin chaffing him in a friendly way over his nervous fears, as though that awful and horrible, unheard-of thing that was going on within him, incessantly gnawing at him, and irresistibly dragging him away somewhere, were the most agreeable subject for joking. Shvarts especially, with his jocoseness, his liveliness, and his comme-il-faut tone, exasperated Ivan Ilyitch by reminding him of himself ten years ago.

Friends came sometimes to play cards. They sat down to the card-table; they shuffled and dealt the new cards. Diamonds were led and followed by diamonds, the seven. His partner said, "Can't trump," and played the two of diamonds. What then? Why, delightful, capital, it should have been—he had a trump hand. And suddenly Ivan Ilyitch feels that gnawing ache, that taste in his mouth, and it strikes him as something grotesque that with that he could be glad of a trump hand.

He looks at Mihail Mihailovitch, his partner, how he taps on the table with his red hand, and affably and indulgently abstains from snatching up the trick, and pushes the cards towards Ivan Ilyitch so as to give him the pleasure of taking them up, without any trouble, without even stretching out his hand. "What, does he suppose that I'm so weak that I can't stretch out my hand?" thinks Ivan Ilyitch, and he forgets the trumps, and trumps his partner's cards, and plays his trump hand without making three tricks; and what's the most awful thing of all is that he sees how upset Mihail Mihailovitch is about it, while he doesn't care a bit, and it's awful for him to think why he doesn't care.

They all see that he's in pain, and say to him, "We can stop if you're tired. You go and lie down." Lie down? No, he's not in the least tired; they will play the rubber. All are gloomy and silent. Ivan Ilyitch feels that it is he who has brought this gloom upon them, and he cannot disperse it. They have supper, and the party breaks up, and Ivan Ilyitch is left alone with the consciousness that his life is poisoned for him and poisons the life of others, and that this poison is not losing its force, but is continually penetrating more and more deeply into his whole existence.

And with the consciousness of this, and with the physical pain in addition, and the terror in addition to that, he must lie in his bed, often not able to sleep for pain the greater part of the night; and in the morning he must get up again, dress, go to the law-court, speak, write, or, if he does not go out, stay at home for all the four-and-twenty hours of the day and night, of which each one is a torture. And he had to live thus on the edge of the precipice alone, without one man who would understand and feel for him.

V

In this way one month, then a second, passed by. Just before the New Year his brother-in-law arrived in the town on a visit to them. Ivan Ilyitch was at the court when he arrived. Praskovya Fyodorovna had gone out shopping. Coming home and going into his study, he found there his brother-in-law, a healthy, florid man, engaged in unpacking his trunk. He raised his head, hearing Ivan Ilyitch's step, and for a second stared at him without a word. That stare told Ivan Ilyitch everything. His brother-in-law opened his mouth to utter an "Oh!" of surprise, but checked himself. That confirmed it all.

"What! have I changed?"

"Yes, there is a change."

And all Ivan Ilyitch's efforts to draw him into talking of his appearance his brother-in-law met with obstinate silence. Praskovya Fyodorovna came in; the brother-in-law went to see her. Ivan Ilyitch locked his door and began gazing at himself in the looking-glass, first full face, then in profile. He took up his photograph, taken with his wife, and compared the portrait with what he saw in the looking-glass. The change was immense. Then he bared his arm to the elbow, looked at it, pulled the sleeve down again, sat down on an ottoman and felt blacker than night.

"I mustn't, I mustn't," he said to himself, jumped up, went to the table, opened some official paper, tried to read it, but could not. He opened the door, went into the drawing-room. The door into the drawing-room was closed. He went up to it on tiptoe and listened.

"No, you're exaggerating," Praskovya Fyodorovna was saying.

"Exaggerating? You can't see it. Why, he's a dead man. Look at his eyes—there's no light in them. But what's wrong with him?"

"No one can tell. Nikolaev" (that was another doctor) "said something, but I don't know, Leshchetskisky" (this was the celebrated doctor) "said the opposite."

Ivan Ilyitch walked away, went to his own room, lay down, and fell to musing. "A kidney—a loose kidney." He remembered all the doctors had told him, how it had been detached, and how it was loose; and by an effort of imagination he tried to catch that kidney and to stop it, to strengthen it. So little was needed, he fancied. "No, I'll go again to Pyotr Ivanovitch" (this was the friend who had a friend a doctor). He rang, ordered the horse to be put in, and got ready to go out.

"Where are you off too, Jean?"¹ asked his wife with a peculiarly melancholy and exceptionally kind expression.

This exceptionally kind expression exasperated him. He looked darkly at her.

"I want to see Pyotr Ivanovitch."

He went to the friend who had a friend a doctor. And with him to the doctor's. He found him in, and had a long conversation with him.

Reviewing the anatomical and physiological details of what, according to the doctor's view, was taking place within him, he understood it all. It was just one thing—a little thing wrong with the intestinal appendix. It might all come right. Only strengthen one sluggish organ, and decrease the undue activity of another, and absorption would take place, and all would be set right. He was a little late for dinner. He ate his dinner, talked cheerfully, but it was a long while before he could go to his own room to work. At last he went to his study, and at once sat down to work. He read his legal documents and did his work, but the consciousness never left him of having a matter of importance very near to his heart which he had put off, but would look into later. When he had finished his work, he remembered that the matter near his heart was thinking about the intestinal appendix. But he did not give himself up to it; he went into the drawing-room to tea. There were visitors; and there was talking, playing on the piano, and singing; there was the young examining magistrate, the desirable match for the daughter. Ivan Ilyitch spent the evening, as Praskovya Fyodorovna observed, in better spirits than any of them; but he never forgot for an instant that he had the important matter of the intestinal appendix put off for consideration later. At eleven o'clock he said good night and went to his own room. He had slept alone since his illness in a little room adjoining his study. He went in, undressed, and took up a novel of Zola, but did not read it; he fell to thinking. And in his imagination the desired recovery of the intestinal appendix had taken place. There had been absorption, rejection, re-establishment of the regular action.

"Why, it's all simply that," he said to himself. "One only wants to assist nature." He remembered the medicine, got up, took it, lay down on his back, watching for the medicine to act beneficially and overcome the pain. "It's only to take it regularly and avoid injurious influences; why, already I feel rather better, much better." He began to feel his side; it was not painful to the touch. "Yes, I don't feel it—really, much better already." He put out the candle and lay on his side. "The appendix is getting better, absorption." Suddenly he felt the familiar, old, dull, gnawing ache, persistent, quiet, in earnest. In his mouth the same familiar loathsome taste. His heart sank, and his brain felt dim, misty. "My God, my God!" he said, "again, again, and it will never cease." And suddenly the whole thing rose before him in quite a different aspect. "Intestinal appendix! kidney!" he said to himself. "It's not a question of the appendix, not a question of the kidney, but of life and . . . death. Yes, life has been and now it's going, 10 going away, and I cannot stop it. Yes. Why deceive myself? Isn't it obvious to every one, except me, that I'm dying, and it's only a question of weeks, of days—at once perhaps. There was light, and now there is darkness. I was here, and now I am going! Where?" A cold chill ran over him, his breath stopped. He heard nothing but the throbbing of his heart.

¹ French equivalent of Ivan.

"I shall be no more, then what will there be? There'll be nothing. Where then shall I be when I'm no more? Can this be dying? No; I don't want to!" He jumped up, tried to light the candle; and fumbling with trembling hands, he dropped the candle and the candlestick on the floor and fell back again on the pillow. "Why trouble? it doesn't matter," he said to himself, staring with open eyes into the darkness. "Death. Yes, death. And they—all of them—don't understand, and don't want to understand, and feel no pity. They are playing. (He caught through the 30 closed doors the far-away cadence of a voice and the accompaniment.) They don't care, but they will die too. Fools! Me sooner and them later; but it will be the same for them. And they are merry. The beasts!" Anger stifled him. And he was agonisingly, insufferably miserable. "It cannot be that all men always have been doomed to this awful horror!" He raised himself.

"There is something wrong in it; I must be calm I must think it all over from the beginning." And 40 then he began to consider. "Yes, the beginning of my illness. I knocked my side, and I was just the same, that day and the days after; it ached a little, then more, then doctors, then depression, misery, and again doctors; and I've gone on getting closer and closer to the abyss. Strength growing less. Nearer and nearer. And here I am, wasting away, no light in my eyes. I think of how to cure the appendix, but this is death. Can it be death?" Again a horror came over him; gasping 50 for breath, he bent over, began feeling for the matches, and knocked his elbow against the bedside table. It was in his way and hurt him; he felt furious with it, in his anger knocked against it more violently, and upset it. And in despair, breathless, he fell back on his spine waiting for death to come that instant.

The visitors were leaving at that time. Praskovya Fyodorovna was seeing them out. She heard something fall, and came in.

"What is it?"

"Nothing. I dropped something by accident."

She went out, brought a candle. He was lying, breathing hard and fast, like a man who has run a mile, and staring with fixed eyes at her.

"What is it, Jean?"

"No—othing, I say. I dropped something."—"Why speak? She won't understand," he thought.

She certainly did not understand. She picked up the candle, lighted it for him, and went out hastily. She had to say good-bye to a departing guest. When she came back, he was lying in the same position on his back, looking upwards.

"How are you—worse?"

"Yes."

She shook her head, sat down.

"Do you know what, Jean? I wonder if we hadn't better send for Leshtchetsky to see you here?"

This meant calling in the celebrated doctor, regardless of expense. He smiled malignantly, and said no. She sat a moment longer, went up to him, and kissed him on the forehead.

He hated her with all the force of his soul when she was kissing him, and had to make an effort not to push her away.

"Good night. Please God, you'll sleep."

"Yes."

VI

Ivan Ilyitch saw that he was dying, and was in continual despair.

At the bottom of his heart Ivan Ilyitch knew that he was dying; but so far from growing used to this idea, he simply did not grasp it—he was utterly unable to grasp it.

The example of the syllogism that he had learned in Kiseveter's logic—Caius is a man, men are mortal, therefore Caius is mortal—had seemed to him all his life correct only as regards Caius, but not at all as regards himself. In that case it was a question of Caius, a man, an abstract man, and it was perfectly true, but he was not Caius, and was not an abstract man; he had always been a creature quite, quite different from all others; he had been little Vanya with a mamma and papa, and Mitya and Volodya, with playthings and a coachman and a nurse; afterwards with Katenka, with all the joys and griefs and ecstasies of childhood, boyhood, and youth. What did Caius know of the smell of the leathern ball Vanya had been so fond of? Had Caius kissed his mother's hand like that? Caius had not heard the silk rustle of his mother's skirts. He had not made a riot at school over the pudding. Had Caius been in love like that? Could Caius preside over the sittings of the court?

And Caius certainly was mortal, and it was right for him to die; but for me, little Vanya, Ivan Ilyitch, with all my feelings and ideas—for me it's a different matter. And it cannot be that I ought to die. That would be too awful.

That was his feeling.

"If I had to die like Caius, I should have known it was so, some inner voice would have told me so. But there was nothing of the sort in me. And I and all my friends, we felt that it was not at all the same as with Caius. And now here it is!" he said to himself. "It can't be! It can't be, but it is! How is it? How's one to understand it?" And he could not conceive it, and tried to drive away this idea as false, incorrect, and morbid, and to supplant it by other, correct, healthy ideas. But this idea, not as an idea merely, but as it were an actual fact, came back again and stood confronting him.

And to replace this thought he called up other thoughts, one after another, in the hope of finding support in them. He tried to get back into former trains of thought, which in old days had screened off the thought of death. But, strange to say, all that had in old days covered up, obliterated the sense of death, could not now produce the same effect. Latterly, Ivan Ilyitch spent the greater part of his time in these efforts to restore his old trains of thought which had shut off death. At one time he would say to himself, "I'll put myself into my official work; why, I used to live in it." And he would go to the law-courts, banishing every doubt. He would enter into conversation with his colleagues, and would sit carelessly, as his old habit was, scanning the crowd below dreamily, and with both his wasted hands he would lean on the arms of the oak arm-chair just as he always did; and bending over to a colleague, pass the papers to him and whisper to him, then suddenly dropping his eyes and sitting up straight, he would pronounce the familiar words that opened the proceedings. But suddenly in the middle, the pain in his side, utterly regardless of the stage he had reached in his conduct of the case, began its work. It riveted Ivan Ilyitch's attention. He drove away the thought of it, but it still did its work, and then It came and stood confronting him and looked at him, and he felt turned to stone, and the light died away in his eyes, and he began to ask himself again, "Can it be that It is the only truth?" And his colleagues and his subordinates saw with surprise and distress that he, the brilliant, subtle judge, was losing the thread of his speech, was making blunders. He shook himself, tried to regain his self-control, and got somehow to the end of the sitting, and went home with the painful sense that his judicial labours could not as of old hide from him what he wanted to hide; that he could not by means of his official work escape from It. And the worst of it was that It drew him to itself not for him to do anything in particular, but simply for him to look at It straight in the face, to look at It and, doing nothing, suffer unspeakably.

And to save himself from this, Ivan Ilyitch sought amusements, other screens, and these screens he found, and for a little while they did seem to save him; but soon again they were not so much broken down as let the light through, as though It pierced through everything, and there was nothing that could shut It off.

Sometimes during those days he would go into the drawing-room he had furnished, that drawing-room where he had fallen, for which—how bitterly ludicrous it was for him to think of it!—for the decoration of which he had sacrificed his life, for he knew that it was that bruise that had started his illness. He went in and saw that the polished table had been scratched by something. He looked for the cause, and found it in the bronze clasps of the album, which had been twisted on one side. He took up the album, a costly one, which he had himself arranged with loving care, and was vexed at the carelessness of his daughter and her friends. Here a page was torn, here the photographs had been shifted out of their places. He carefully put it to rights again and bent the clasp back.

Then the idea occurred to him to move all this setting up of the albums to another corner where the flowers stood. He called the footman; or his daughter or his wife came to help him. They did not agree with him, contradicted him; he argued, got angry. But all that was very well, since he did not think if It; It was not in sight.

But then his wife would say, as he moved something himself, "Do let the servants do it, you'll hurt yourself again," and all at once It peeped through the screen; he caught a glimpse of It. He caught a glimpse of It, but still he hoped It would hide itself. Involuntarily though, he kept watch on his side; there it is just the same still, aching still, and now he cannot forget it, and It is staring openly at him from behind the flowers. What's the use of it all?

"And it's the fact that here, at that curtain, as if it had been storming a fort, I lost my life. Is it possible? How awful and how silly! It cannot be! It cannot be, and it is."

He went into his own room, lay down, and was again alone with It. Face to face with It, and nothing to be done with It. Nothing but to look at It and shiver.

VII

How it came to pass during the third month of Ivan Ilyitch's illness, it would be impossible to say, for it happened little by little, imperceptibly, but it had come to pass that his wife and his daughter and his son and their servants and their acquaintances, and the doctors, and, most of all, he himself—all were aware that all interest in him for other people consisted now in the question how soon he would leave his place empty, free the living from the constraint of his presence, and be set free himself from his sufferings.

He slept less and less; they gave him opium, and began to inject morphine. But this did not relieve him. The dull pain he experienced in the half-asleep condition at first only relieved him as a change, but then it became as bad, or even more agonising, than the open pain. He had special things to eat prepared for him according to the doctors' prescriptions; but these dishes became more and more distasteful, more and more revolting to him.

Special arrangements, too, had to be made for his other physical needs, and this was a continual misery to him. Misery from the uncleanness, the unseemliness, and the stench, from the feeling of another person having to assist in it.

But just from this most unpleasant side of his illness there came comfort to Ivan Ilyitch. There always came into his room on these occasions to clear up for him the peasant who waited on table, Gerasim.

Gerasim was a clean, fresh, young peasant, who had grown stout and hearty on the good fare in town. Always cheerful and bright. At first the sight of this lad, always cleanly dressed in the Russian style, engaged in this revolting task, embarrassed Ivan Ilyitch.

One day, getting up from the night-stool, too weak to replace his clothes, he dropped on to a soft low chair and looked with horror at his bare, powerless thighs, with the muscles so sharply standing out on them.

Then there came in with light, strong steps Gerasim, in his thick boots, diffusing a pleasant smell of tar from his boots, and bringing in the freshness of the winter air. Wearing a clean hempen apron, and a clean cotton shirt, with his sleeves tucked up on his strong, bare young arms, without looking at Ivan Ilyitch, obviously trying to check the radiant happiness in his face so as not to hurt the sick man, he went up to the night-stool.

"Gerasim," said Ivan Ilyitch faintly.

Gerasim started, clearly afraid that he had done something amiss, and with a rapid movement turned towards the sick man his fresh, good-natured, simple young face, just beginning to be downy with the first growth of beard.

"Yes, your honour."

"I'm afraid this is very disagreeable for you. You must excuse me. I can't help it."

"Why, upon my word, sir!" And Gerasim's eyes beamed, and he showed his white young teeth in a smile. "What's a little trouble? It's a case of illness with you, sir."

And with his deft, strong arms he performed his habitual task, and went out, stepping lightly. And five minutes later, treading just as lightly, he came back.

Ivan Ilyitch was still sitting in the same way in the arm-chair.

"Gerasim," he said, when the latter had replaced the night-stool all sweet and clean, "please help me; come here." Gerasim went up to him. "Lift me up. It's difficult for me alone, and I've sent Dmitry away."

Gerasim went up to him; as lightly as he stepped he put his strong arms round him, deftly and gently lifted and supported him, with the other hand pulled up his trousers, and would have set him down again. But Ivan Ilyitch asked him to carry him to the sofa. Gerasim, without effort, carefully not squeezing him, led him, almost carrying him, to the sofa, and settled him there.

"Thank you; how neatly and well . . . you do everything."

Gerasim smiled again, and would have gone away. But Ivan Ilyitch felt his presence such a comfort that he was reluctant to let him go.

"Oh, move that chair near me, please. No, that one, under my legs. I feel easier when my legs are higher."

Gerasim picked up the chair, and without letting it knock, set it gently down on the ground just at the right place, and lifted Ivan Ilyitch's legs on to it. It seemed to Ivan Ilyitch that he was easier just at the moment when Gerasim lifted his legs higher.

"I'm better when my legs are higher," said Ivan Ilyitch. "Put that cushion under me."

Gerasim did so. Again he lifted his legs to put the cushion under them. Again it seemed to Ivan Ilyitch that he was easier at that moment when Gerasim held his legs raised. When he laid them down again, he felt worse.

"Gerasim," he said to him, "are you busy just now?"

"Not at all, sir," said Gerasim, who had learned among the town-bred servants how to speak to gentlefolks.

"What have you left to do?"

"Why, what have I to do? I've done everything, there's only the wood to chop for to-morrow."

"Then hold my legs up like that—can you?"

"To be sure, I can." Gerasim lifted the legs up. And it seemed to Ivan Ilyitch that in that position he did not feel the pain at all.

"But how about the wood?"

"Don't you trouble about that, sir. We shall have time enough."

Ivan Ilyitch made Gerasim sit and hold his legs, and began to talk to him. And, strange to say, he fancied he felt better while Gerasim had hold of his legs.

From that time forward Ivan Ilyitch would sometimes call Gerasim, and get him to hold his legs on his shoulders, and he liked talking with him. Gerasim did this easily, readily, simply, and with a good-nature that touched Ivan Ilyitch. Health, strength, and heartiness in all other people were offensive to Ivan Ilyitch; but the strength and heartiness of Gerasim did not mortify him, but soothed him.

Ivan Ilyitch's great misery was due to the deception that for some reason or other every one kept up with him—that he was simply ill, and not dying, and that he need only keep quiet and follow the doctor's orders, and then some great change for the better would be the result. He knew that whatever they might do, there would be no result except more agonising sufferings and death. And he was made miserable by this lie, made miserable at their refusing to acknowledge what they all knew and he knew, by their persisting in lying to him about his awful position, and in forcing him too to take part in this lie. Lying, lying, this lying carried on over him on the eve of his death, and destined to bring that terrible, solemn act of his death down to the level of all their visits, curtains, sturgeons for dinner . . . was a horrible agony for Ivan Ilyitch. And, strange to say, many times when they had been going through the regular performance over him, he had been within a hair's-breadth of screaming at them: "Cease your lying! You know, and I know, that I'm dying; so do, at least, give over lying!" But he had never had the spirit to do this. The terrible, awful act of his dying was, he saw, by all those about him, brought down to the level of a casual, unpleasant, and to some extent indecorous, incident (somewhat as they would behave with a person who should enter a drawing-room smelling unpleasant). It was brought down to this level by that very decorum to which he had been enslaved all his life. He saw that no one felt for him, because no one would even grasp his position. Gerasim was the only person who recognised the position, and felt sorry for him. And that was why Ivan Ilyitch was only at ease with Gerasim. He felt comforted when Gerasim sometimes supported his legs for whole nights at a stretch, and would not go away to bed, saying, "Don't you worry yourself, Ivan Ilyitch, I'll get sleep enough yet," or when suddenly dropping into the familiar peasant forms of speech, he added: "If thou weren't sick, but as 'tis, 'twould be strange if I didn't wait on thee." Gerasim alone did not lie; everything showed clearly that he alone understood what it meant, and saw no necessity to disguise it, and simply felt sorry for his sick, wasting master. He even said this once straight out, when Ivan Ilyitch was sending him away.

"We shall all die. So what's a little trouble?" he said, meaning by this to express that he did not complain of the trouble just because he was taking this trouble for a dying man, and he hoped that for him too some one would be willing to take the same trouble when his time came.

Apart from this deception, or in consequence of it, what made the greatest misery for Ivan Ilyitch was that no one felt for him as he would have liked them to feel for him. At certain moments, after prolonged suffering, Ivan Ilyitch, ashamed as he would have been to own it, longed more than anything for some one to feel sorry for him, as for a sick child. He longed to be petted, kissed, and wept over, as children are petted and comforted. He knew that he was an important member of the law-courts, that he had a beard turning grey, and that therefore it was impossible. But still he longed for it. And in his relations with Gerasim there was something approaching to that. And that was why being with Gerasim was a comfort to him. Ivan Ilyitch longs to weep, longs to be petted and wept over, and then there comes in a colleague, Shebek; and instead of weeping and being petted, Ivan Ilyitch puts on his serious, severe, earnest face, and from mere inertia gives his views on the effect of the last decision in the Court of Appeal, and obstinately insists upon them. This falsity around him and within him did more than anything to poison Ivan Ilyitch's last days.

VIII

It was morning. All that made it morning for Ivan Ilyitch was that Gerasim had gone away, and Pyotr the footman had come in; he had put out the candles, opened one of the curtains, and begun surreptitiously setting the room to rights. Whether it were morning or evening, Friday or Sunday, it all made no difference; it was always just the same thing. Gnawing, agonising pain never ceasing for an instant; the hopeless sense of life always ebbing away, but still not yet gone; always swooping down on him that fearful, hated death, which was the only reality, and always the same falsity. What were days, or weeks, or hours of the day to him?

"Will you have tea, sir?"

"He wants things done in their regular order. In the morning the family should have tea," he thought, and only said—

"No."

"Would you care to move on to the sofa?"

"He wants to make the room tidy, and I'm in his way. I'm uncleanness, disorder," he thought, and only said—

"No, leave me alone."

The servant still moved busily about his work. Ivan Ilyitch stretched out his hand. Pyotr went up to offer his services.

"What can I get you?"

"My watch."

Pyotr got out the watch, which lay just under his hand, and gave it to him.

"Half-past eight. Are they up?"

"Not yet, sir. Vladimir Ivanovitch" (that was his son) "has gone to the high school, and Praskovya Fyodorovna gave orders that she was to be waked if you asked for her. Shall I send word?"

"No, no need. Should I try some tea?" he thought.

"Yes, tea . . . bring it."

Pyotr was on his way out. Ivan Ilyitch felt frightened of being left alone. "How keep him? Oh, the medicine. Pyotr, give me my medicine. Oh well, may be, medicine may still be some good." He took the spoon, drank it. "No, it does no good. It's all rubbish, deception," he decided, as soon as he tasted the familiar, mawkish, hopeless taste. "No, I can't believe it now. But the pain, why this pain; if it would only cease for a minute." And he groaned. Pyotr turned round. "No, go on. Bring the tea."

Pyotr went away. Ivan Ilyitch, left alone, moaned, not so much from the pain, awful as it was, as from misery. Always the same thing again and again, all these endless days and nights. If it would only be quicker. Quicker to what? Death, darkness. No, no. Anything better than death!

When Pyotr came in with the tea on a tray, Ivan Ilyitch stared for some time absent-mindedly at him, not grasping who he was and what he wanted. Pyotr was disconcerted by this stare. And when he showed he was disconcerted, Ivan Ilyitch came to himself.

"Oh yes," he said, "tea, good, set it down. Only help me to wash and put on a clean shirt."

And Ivan Ilyitch began his washing. He washed his hands slowly, and then his face, cleaned his teeth, combed his hair, and looked in the looking-glass. He felt frightened at what he saw, especially at the way his hair clung limply to his pale forehead. When his shirt was being changed, he knew he would be still more terrified if he glanced at his body, and he avoided looking at himself. But at last it was all over. He put on his dressing-gown, covered himself with a rug, and sat in the arm-chair to drink his tea. For one moment he felt refreshed; but as soon as he began to drink the tea, again there was the same taste, the same pain. He forced himself to finish it, and lay down, stretched out his legs. He lay down and dismissed Pyotr.

Always the same. A gleam of hope flashes for a moment, then again the sea of despair roars about him again, and always pain, always pain, always heartache, and always the same thing. Alone it is awfully dreary; he longs to call some one, but he knows beforehand that with others present it will be worse. "Morphine again—only to forget again.

"I'll tell him, the doctor, that he must think of something else. It can't go on; it can't go on like this."

One hour, two hours pass like this. Then there is a ring at the front door. The doctor, perhaps. Yes, it is the doctor, fresh, hearty, fat, and cheerful, wearing that expression that seems to say, "You there are in a panic about something, but we'll soon set things right for you." The doctor is aware that this expression is hardly fitting here, ²⁰ but he has put it on once and for all, and can't take it off, like a man who has put on a frockcoat to pay a round of calls.

In a hearty, reassuring manner the doctor rubs his hands.

"I'm cold. It's a sharp frost. Just let me warm myself," he says with an expression, as though it's only a matter of waiting a little till he's warm, and as soon as he's warm he'll set everything to rights.

"Well, now, how are you?"

Ivan Ilyitch feels that the doctor would like to say, "How's the little trouble?" but that he feels that he can't talk like that, and says, "How did you pass the night?"

Ivan Ilyitch looks at the doctor with an expression that asks—

"Is it possible you're never ashamed of lying?"

But the doctor does not care to understand this look.

And Ivan Ilyitch says—

"It's always just as awful. The pain never leaves me, never ceases. If only there were something!"

"Ah, you're all like that, all sick people say that. Come, now, I do believe I'm thawed; even Praskovya Fyodorovna, who's so particular, could find no fault with my temperature. Well, now I can say good morning." And the doctor shakes hands.

And dropping his former levity, the doctor, with a serious face, proceeds to examine the patient, feeling his pulse, to take his temperature, and then ⁴⁰ the tappings and soundings begin.

Ivan Ilyitch knows positively and indubitably that it's all nonsense and empty deception; but when the doctor, kneeling down, stretches over him, putting his ear first higher, then lower, and goes through various gymnastic evolutions over him with a serious face, Ivan Ilyitch is affected by this, as he used sometimes to be affected by the speeches of the lawyers in court, though he was perfectly well aware that they were telling lies all ⁵⁰ the while and why they were telling lies.

The doctor, kneeling on the sofa, was still sounding him, when there was the rustle of Praskovya

Fyodorovna's silk dress in the doorway, and she was heard scolding Pyotr for not having let her know that the doctor had come.

She comes in, kisses her husband, and at once begins to explain that she has been up a long while, and that it was only through a misunderstanding that she was not there when the doctor came.

Ivan Ilyitch looks at her, scans her all over, and sets down against her her whiteness and plumpness, and the cleanness of her hands and neck, and the glossiness of her hair, and the gleam full of life in her eyes. With all the force of his soul he hates her. And when she touches him it makes him suffer from the thrill of hatred he feels for her.

Her attitude to him and his illness is still the same. Just as the doctor had taken up a certain line with the patient which he was not now able ²⁰ to drop, so she too had taken up a line with him—that he was not doing something he ought to do, and was himself to blame, and she was lovingly reproaching him for his neglect, and she could not now get out of this attitude.

"Why, you know, he won't listen to me; he doesn't take his medicine at the right times. And what's worse still, he insists on lying in a position that surely must be bad for him—with his legs in the air."

³⁰ She described how he made Gerasim hold his legs up.

The doctor smiled with kindly condescension that said, "Oh well, it can't be helped, these sick people do take up such foolish fancies; but we must forgive them."

When the examination was over, the doctor looked at his watch, and then Praskovya Fyodorovna informed Ivan Ilyitch that it must, of course, be as he liked, but she had sent to-day for a celebrated doctor, and that he would examine him, and have a consultation with Mihail Danilovitch (that was the name of their regular doctor).

"Don't oppose it now, please. This I'm doing entirely for my own sake," she said ironically, meaning it to be understood that she was doing it all for his sake, and was only saying this to give him no right to refuse her request. He lay silent, knitting his brows. He felt that he was hemmed in by such a tangle of falsity that it was hard to disentangle anything from it.

Everything she did for him was entirely for her own sake, and she told him she was doing for her own sake what she actually was doing for her own sake as something so incredible that he would take it as meaning the opposite.

At half-past eleven the celebrated doctor came. Again came the sounding, and then grave conversation in his presence and in the other room about the kidney and the appendix, and questions and answers, with such an air of significance, that again, instead of the real question of life and death, which was now the only one that confronted him, the question that came uppermost was of the kidney and the appendix, which were doing something not as they ought to do, and were for that reason being attacked by Mihail Danilovitch and the celebrated doctor, and forced to mend their ways.

The celebrated doctor took leave of him with a serious, but not a hopeless face. And to the timid question that Ivan Ilyitch addressed to him while he lifted his eyes, shining with terror and hope, up towards him, Was there a chance of recovery? he answered that he could not answer for it, but that there was a chance. The look of hope with which Ivan Ilyitch watched the doctor out was so piteous that, seeing it, Praskovya Fyodorovna positively burst into tears, as she went out of the door to hand the celebrated doctor his fee in the next room.

The gleam of hope kindled by the doctor's assurance did not last long. Again the same room, the same pictures, the curtains, the wall-paper, the medicine-bottles, and ever the same, his aching suffering body. And Ivan Ilyitch began to moan; they gave him injections, and he sank into oblivion. When he waked up it was getting dark; they brought him his dinner. He forced himself to eat some broth; and again everything the same, and again the coming night.

After dinner at seven o'clock, Praskovya Fyodorovna came into his room, dressed as though to go to a soirée,¹ with her full bosom laced in tight, and traces of powder on her face. She had in the morning mentioned to him that they were going to the theatre. Sarah Bernhardt was visiting the town, and they had a box, which he had insisted on their taking. By now he had forgotten about it, and her smart attire was an offence to him. But he concealed this feeling when he recollected that he had himself insisted on their taking a box and going, because it was an æsthetic pleasure, beneficial and instructive for the children.

Praskovya Fyodorovna came in satisfied with herself, but yet with something of a guilty air. She sat down, asked how he was, as he saw, simply for the sake of asking, and not for the sake of learning anything, knowing indeed that there was nothing to learn, and began telling him how absolutely necessary it was; how she would not have gone for anything, but the box had been taken, and Liza, their daughter, and Petrishtchev (the examining lawyer, the daughter's suitor) were going, and that it was out of the question to let them go alone. But that she would have liked much better to stay with him. If only he would be sure to follow the doctor's prescription while she was away.

"Oh, and Fyodor Dmitryevitch" (the suitor) "would like to come in. May he? And Liza?"

"Yes, let them come in."

The daughter came in, in evening clothes, her fresh young body showing, while his body made him suffer so. But she made a show of it; she was strong, healthy, obviously in love, and impatient of the illness, suffering, and death that hindered her happiness.

Fyodor Dmitryevitch came in too in evening dress, his hair curled à la Capoul,² with his long sinewy neck tightly fenced round by a white collar, with his vast expanse of white chest and strong thighs displayed in narrow black trousers, with one white glove in his hand and a crush opera hat.

Behind him crept in unnoticed the little high school boy in his new uniform, poor fellow, in gloves, and with those awful blue rings under his eyes that Ivan Ilyitch knew the meaning of.

He always felt sorry for his son. And pitiable indeed was his scared face of sympathetic suffering. Except Gerasim, Ivan Ilyitch fancied that Volodya was the only one that understood and was sorry.

They all sat down; again they asked how he was. A silence followed. Liza asked her mother about the opera-glass. An altercation ensued between the mother and daughter as to who had taken it, and where it had been put. It turned into an unpleasant squabble.

Fyodor Dmitryevitch asked Ivan Ilyitch whether he had seen Sarah Bernhardt? Ivan Ilyitch could not at first catch the question that was asked him, but then he said, "No, have you seen her before?"

"Yes, in Adrienne Lecouvreur."

Praskovya Fyodorovna observed that she was particularly good in that part. The daughter made some reply. A conversation sprang up about the art and naturalness of her acting, that conversation that is continually repeated and always the same.

In the middle of the conversation Fyodor Dmitryevitch glanced at Ivan Ilyitch and relapsed

¹ evening affair.

² "à la Capoul," in the Capoul style.

into silence. The others looked at him and became mute, too. Ivan Ilyitch was staring with glittering eyes straight before him, obviously furious with them. This had to be set right, but it could not anyhow be set right. This silence had somehow to be broken. No one would venture on breaking it, and all began to feel alarmed that the decorous deception was somehow breaking down, and the facts would be exposed to all. Liza was the first to pluck up courage. She broke the silence. She tried to cover up what they were all feeling, but inadvertently she gave it utterance.

"If we are going, though, it's time to start," she said, glancing at her watch, a gift from her father; and with a scarcely perceptible meaning smile to the young man, referring to something only known to themselves, she got up with a rustle of her skirts.

They all got up, said good-bye, and went away. When they were gone, Ivan Ilyitch fancied he was easier; there was no falsity—that had gone away with them, but the pain remained. That continual pain, that continual terror, made nothing harder, nothing easier. It was always worse.

Again came minute after minute, hour after hour, still the same and still no end, and ever more terrible the inevitable end.

"Yes, send Gerasim," he said in answer to Pyotr's question.

IX

Late at night his wife came back. She came in on tiptoe, but he heard her, opened his eyes, and made haste to close them again. She wanted to send away Gerasim and sit up with him herself instead. He opened his eyes and said, "No, go away."

"Are you in great pain?"

"Always the same."

"Take some opium."

He agreed, and drank it. She went away.

Till three o'clock he slept a miserable sleep. It seemed to him that he and his pain were being thrust somewhere into a narrow, deep, black sack, and they kept pushing him further and further in, and still could not thrust him to the bottom. And this operation was awful to him, and was accompanied with agony. And he was afraid, and yet wanted to fall into it, and struggled and yet tried to get into it. And all of a sudden he slipped and fell and woke up. Gerasim, still the same, is sitting at the foot of the bed half-dozing peacefully, patient. And he is lying with his wasted legs clad in stockings, raised on Gerasim's shoulders, the same candle burning in the alcove, and the same interminable pain.

"Go away, Gerasim," he whispered.

"It's all right, sir. I'll stay a bit longer."

"No, go away."

He took his legs down, lay sideways on his arm, and he felt very sorry for himself. He only waited till Gerasim had gone away into the next room; he could restrain himself no longer, and cried like a child. He cried at his own helplessness, at his awful loneliness, at the cruelty of people, at the cruelty of God, at the absence of God.

"Why hast Thou done all this? What brought me to this? Why, why torture me so horribly?"

He did not expect an answer, and wept indeed that there was and could be no answer. The pain grew more acute again, but he did not stir, did not call.

He said to himself, "Come, more then; come, strike me! But what for? What have I done to Thee? what for?"

Then he was still, ceased weeping, held his breath, and was all attention; he listened, as it were, not to a voice uttering sounds, but to the voice of his soul, to the current of thoughts that rose up within him.

"What is it you want?" was the first clear idea capable of putting into words that he grasped.

30 "What? Not to suffer, to live," he answered.

And again he was utterly plunged into attention so intense that even the pain did not distract him.

"To live? Live how?" the voice of his soul was asking.

"Why, live as I used to live before—happily and pleasantly."

40 "As you used to live before—happily and pleasantly?" queried the voice. And he began going over in his imagination the best moments of his pleasant life. But strange to say, all these best moments of his pleasant life seemed now not at all what they had seemed then. All—except the first memories of childhood—there, in his childhood there had been something really pleasant in which one could have lived if it had come back. But the creature who had this pleasant experience was no more; it was like a memory of some one else.

As soon as he reached the beginning of what had resulted in him as he was now, Ivan Ilyitch, all that had seemed joys to him then now melted away before his eyes and were transformed into something trivial, and often disgusting.

And the further he went from childhood, the nearer to the actual present, the more worthless and uncertain were the joys. It began with life at the school of jurisprudence. Then there had still been something genuinely good; then there had been gaiety; then there had been friendship; then there had been hopes. But in the higher classes these good moments were already becoming rarer. Later on, during the first period of his official life, at the governor's, good moments appeared; but it was all mixed, and less and less of it was good. 10 And further on even less was good, and the further he went the less good there was.

His marriage . . . as gratuitous as the disillusion of it and the smell of his wife's breath and the sensuality, the hypocrisy! And that deadly official life, and anxiety about money, and so for one year, and two, and ten, and twenty, and always the same thing. And the further he went, the more deadly it became. "As though I had been going steadily downhill, imagining that I was 20 going uphill. So it was in fact. In public opinion I was going uphill, and steadily as I got up it, life was ebbing away from me. . . . And now the work's done, there's nothing left but to die.

"But what is this? What for? It cannot be! It cannot be that life has been so senseless, so loathsome? And if it really was so loathsome and senseless, then why die, and die in agony? There's something wrong.

"Can it be I have not lived as one ought?" suddenly came into his head. "But how not so, when I've done everything as it should be done?" he said, and at once dismissed this only solution of all the enigma of life and death as something utterly out of the question.

"What do you want now? To live? Live how? Live as you live at the courts when the usher booms out: 'The Judge is coming!' . . . The judge is coming, the judge is coming," he repeated to himself. "Here he is, the judge! But I'm not to 40 blame!" he shrieked in fury. "What's it for?" And he left off crying, and turning with his face to the wall, fell to pondering always on the same question, "What for, why all this horror?"

But however much he pondered, he could not find an answer. And whenever the idea struck him, as it often did, that it all came of his never having lived as he ought, he thought of all the correctness of his life and dismissed the strange 50 idea.

X

Another fortnight had passed. Ivan Ilyitch could not now get up from the sofa. He did not like lying in bed, and lay on the sofa. And lying almost all the time facing the wall, in loneliness he suffered all the inexplicable agonies, and in loneliness pondered always that inexplicable question, "What is it? Can it be true that it's death?" And an inner voice answered, "Yes, it is true." "Why these agonies?" and a voice answered, "For no reason." Beyond and besides this there was nothing.

From the very beginning of his illness, ever since Ivan Ilyitch first went to the doctor's, his life had been split up into two contradictory moods, which were continually alternating—one was despair and the anticipation of an uncomprehended and awful death; the other was hope and an absorbed watching over the actual condition of his body. First there was nothing confronting him but a kidney or intestine which had temporarily declined to perform its duties, then there was nothing but unknown awful death, which there was no 10 escaping.

These two moods had alternated from the very beginning of the illness; but the further the illness progressed, the more doubtful and fantastic became the conception of the kidney, and the more real the sense of approaching death.

He had but to reflect on what he had been three months before and what he was now, to reflect how steadily he had been going downhill, for every possibility of hope to be shattered.

Of late, in the loneliness in which he found himself, lying with his face to the back of the sofa, a loneliness in the middle of a populous town and of his numerous acquaintances and his family, a loneliness than which none more complete could be found anywhere—not at the bottom of the sea, not deep down in the earth;—of late in this fearful loneliness Ivan Ilyitch had lived only in imagination in the past. One by one the pictures of his 20 past rose up before him. It always began from what was nearest in time and went back to the most remote, to childhood, and rested there. If Ivan Ilyitch thought of the stewed prunes that had been offered him for dinner that day, his mind went back to the damp, wrinkled French plum of his childhood, of its peculiar taste and the flow of saliva when the stone was sucked; and along with this memory of a taste there rose up a whole series of memories of that period—his nurse, his brother, 30 his playthings. "I mustn't . . . it's too painful," Ivan Ilyitch said to himself, and he brought himself back to the present. The button on the back of the sofa and the creases in the morocco. "Morocco's dear, and doesn't wear well; there was a quarrel over it. But the morocco was different, and different too the quarrel when we tore father's portfolio and were punished, and mamma bought us the tarts." And again his mind rested on his childhood, and again it was painful, and he tried to drive it away and think of something else.

And again at that point, together with that chain of associations, quite another chain of memories came into his heart, of how his illness had grown up and become more acute. It was the same there, the further back the more life there had been. There had been both more that was good in life and more of life itself. And the two began to melt into one. "Just as the pain goes on getting worse and worse, so has my whole life gone on getting worse and worse," he thought. One light spot was there at the back, at the beginning of life, and then it kept getting blacker and blacker, and going faster and faster. "In inverse ratio to the square of the distance from death," thought Ivan Ilyitch. And the image of a stone falling downwards with increasing velocity sank into his soul. Life, a series of increasing sufferings, falls more and more swiftly to the end, the most fearful sufferings. "I am falling." He shuddered, shifted himself, would have resisted, but he knew beforehand that he could not resist; and again, with eyes weary with gazing at it, but unable not to gaze at what was before him, he stared at the back of the sofa and waited, waited expecting that fearful fall and shock and dissolution. "Resistance is impossible," he said to himself. "But if one could at least comprehend what it's for? Even that's impossible. It could be explained if one were to say that I hadn't lived as I ought. But that can't be alleged," he said to himself, thinking of all the regularity, correctness, and propriety of his life. "That really can't be admitted," he said to himself, his lips smiling ironically as though some one could see his smile and be deceived by it. "No explanation! Agony, death. . . . What for?"

XI

So passed a fortnight. During that fortnight an event occurred that had been desired by Ivan Ilyitch and his wife. Petrishtchev made a formal proposal. This took place in the evening. Next day Praskovya Fyodorovna went in to her husband, resolving in her mind how to inform him of Fyodor Dmitryevitch's proposal, but that night there had been a change for the worse in Ivan Ilyitch. Praskovya Fyodorovna found him on the same sofa, but in a different position. He was lying on his face, groaning, and staring straight before him with a fixed gaze.

She began talking of remedies. He turned his stare on her. She did not finish what she had begun saying; such hatred of her in particular was expressed in that stare.

"For Christ's sake, let me die in peace," he said.

She would have gone away, but at that moment the daughter came in and went up to say good morning to him. He looked at his daughter just as at his wife, and to her inquiries how he was, he told her drily that they would soon all be rid of him. Both were silent, sat a little while, and went out.

"How are we to blame?" said Liza to her mother. "As though we had done it! I'm sorry for papa, but why punish us?"

At the usual hour the doctor came. Ivan Ilyitch answered, "Yes, no," never taking his exasperated stare from him, and towards the end he said, "Why, you know that you can do nothing, so let me be."

"We can relieve your suffering," said the doctor. "Even that you can't do; let me be."

The doctor went into the drawing-room and told Praskovya Fyodorovna that it was very serious, and that the only resource left them was opium to relieve his sufferings, which must be terrible. The doctor said his physical sufferings were terrible, and that was true; but even more terrible than his physical sufferings were his mental sufferings, and in that lay his chief misery.

His moral sufferings were due to the fact that during that night, as he looked at the sleepy, good-natured, broad-cheeked face of Gerasim, the thought had suddenly come into his head, "What if in reality all my life, my conscious life, has been not the right thing?" The thought struck him that what he had regarded before as an utter impossibility, that he had spent his life not as he ought, might be the truth. It struck him that those scarcely detected impulses of struggle within him against what was considered good by persons of higher position, scarcely detected impulses which he had dismissed, that they might be the real thing, and everything else might be not the right thing. And his official work, and his ordering of his daily life and of his family, and these social and official interests,—all that might be not the right thing. He tried to defend it all to himself. And suddenly he felt all the weakness of what he was defending. And it was useless to defend it.

"But if it's so," he said to himself, "and I am leaving life with the consciousness that I have lost all that was given me, and there's no correcting it, then what?" He lay on his back and began going over his whole life entirely anew. When he saw the footman in the morning, then his wife, then his daughter, then the doctor, every movement they made, every word they uttered, confirmed for him the terrible truth that had been revealed to him in the night. In them he saw himself, saw all in which he had lived, and saw distinctly that it was all not the right thing; it was a horrible, vast deception that concealed both life and death. This consciousness intensified his physical agonies, multiplied them tenfold. He groaned and tossed from side to side and pulled at the covering over him. It seemed to him that it was stifling him and weighing him down. And for that he hated them.

They gave him a big dose of opium; he sank into unconsciousness; but at dinner-time the same thing began again. He drove them all away, and tossed from side to side.

His wife came to him and said, "Jean, darling, do this for my sake" (for my sake?). "It can't do harm, and it often does good. Why, it's nothing. And often in health people——"

He opened his eyes wide.

"What? Take the sacrament? What for? No. Besides . . ."

She began to cry.

"Yes, my dear. I'll send for our priest, he's so nice."

"All right, very well," he said.

When the priest came and confessed him he was softened, felt as it were a relief from his doubts, and consequently from his sufferings, and there came a moment of hope. He began once more thinking of the intestinal appendix and the possibility of curing it. He took the sacrament with tears in his eyes.

When they laid him down again after the sacrament for a minute, he felt comfortable, and again the hope of life sprang up. He began to think about the operation which had been suggested to him. "To live, I want to live," he said to himself. His wife came in to congratulate him; she uttered the customary words and added—

"It's quite true, isn't it, that you're better?"

Without looking at her, he said, "Yes."

Her dress, her figure, the expression of her face, so the tone of her voice,—all told him the same: "Not the right thing. All that in which you lived and are living is lying, deceit, hiding life and death away from you." And as soon as he had formed that thought, hatred sprang up in him, and with that hatred agonising physical sufferings, and with these sufferings the sense of inevitable, approaching ruin. Something new was happening; there were screwing and shooting pains, and a tightness in his breathing.

The expression of his face as he uttered that "Yes" was terrible. After uttering that "Yes," looking her straight in the face, he turned on to his face, with a rapidity extraordinary in his weakness, and shrieked—

"Go away, go away, let me be!"

XII

From that moment there began the scream that never ceased for three days, and was so awful that through two closed doors one could not hear it without horror. At the moment when he answered his wife he grasped that he had fallen, that there was no return, that the end had come, quite the end, while doubt was still as unsolved, still remained doubt.

"Oo! Oo—o! Oo!" he screamed in varying intonations. He had begun screaming, "I don't want to!" and so had gone on screaming on the same vowel sound—oo!

All those three days, during which time did not exist for him, he was struggling in that black sack into which he was being thrust by an unseen resistless force. He struggled as the man condemned to death struggles in the hands of the executioner, knowing that he cannot save himself. And every moment he felt that in spite of all his efforts to struggle against it, he was getting nearer and nearer to what terrified him. He felt that his agony was due both to his being thrust into this black hole and still more to his not being able to get right into it. What hindered him from getting into it was the claim that his life had been good. That justification of his life held him fast and would not let him get forward, and it caused him more agony than all.

All at once some force struck him in the chest, in the side, and stifled his breathing more than ever; he rolled forward into the hole, and there at the end there was some sort of light. It had happened with him, as it had sometimes happened to him in a railway carriage, when he had thought he was going forward while he was going back, and all of a sudden recognised his real direction.

"Yes, it has all been not the right thing," he said to himself, "but that's no matter." He could, he could do the right thing. "What is the right thing?" he asked himself, and suddenly he became quiet.

This was at the end of the third day, two hours before his death. At that very moment the schoolboy had stealthily crept into his father's room and gone up to his bedside. The dying man was screaming and waving his arms. His hand fell on the schoolboy's head. The boy snatched it, pressed it to his lips, and burst into tears.

At that very moment Ivan Ilyitch had rolled ¹⁰ into the hole, and caught sight of the light, and it was revealed to him that his life had not been what it ought to have been, but that that could still be set right. He asked himself, "What is the right thing?"—and became quiet, listening. Then he felt some one was kissing his hand. He opened his eyes and glanced at his son. He felt sorry for him. His wife went up to him. He glanced at her. She was gazing at him with open mouth, the tears unwiped streaming over her nose and cheeks, a ²⁰ look of despair on her face. He felt sorry for her.

"Yes, I'm making them miserable," he thought. "They're sorry, but it will be better for them when I die." He would have said this, but had not the strength to utter it. "Besides, why speak, I must act," he thought. With a glance to his wife he pointed to his son and said—

"Take away . . . sorry for him. . . . And you too . . ." He tried to say "forgive," but said "forgo" . . . and too weak to correct himself, shook ³⁰ his hand, knowing that He would understand Whose understanding mattered.

And all at once it became clear to him that what had tortured him and would not leave him was suddenly dropping away all at once on both sides and on ten sides and on all sides. He was sorry for them, must act so that they might not suffer. Set them free and be free himself of those agonies. "How right and how simple!" he thought. "And the pain?" he asked himself. "Where's it gone? Eh, where are you, pain?"

He began to watch for it.

"Yes, here it is. Well, what of it, let the pain be. "And death. Where is it?"

He looked for his old accustomed terror of death, and did not find it. "Where is it? What death?" There was no terror, because death was not either.

In the place of death there was light.

"So this is it!" he suddenly exclaimed aloud.

"What joy!"

To him all this passed in a single instant, and the meaning of that instant suffered no change after. For those present his agony lasted another two hours. There was a rattle in his throat, a twitching in his wasted body. Then the rattle and the gasping came at longer and longer intervals.

"It is over!" some one said over him.

He caught those words and repeated them in his soul.

"Death is over," he said to himself. "It's no more."

He drew in a breath, stopped midway in the breath, stretched and died.

FIODOR M. DOSTOYEVSKY

The Christmas Tree and the Wedding

The other day I saw a wedding. . . . But no! I would rather tell you about a Christmas tree. The wedding was superb. I liked it immensely. But the other incident was still finer. I don't know why it is that the sight of the wedding reminded me of the Christmas tree. This is the way it happened:

Exactly five years ago, on New Year's Eve, I was invited to a children's ball by a man high up in the business world, who had his connections, his circle of acquaintances, and his intrigues. So it ¹⁰ seemed as though the children's ball was merely a pretext for the parents to come together and discuss matters of interest to themselves, quite innocently and casually.

I was an outsider, and, as I had no special matters to air, I was able to spend the evening independently of the others. There was another gentleman present who like myself had just stumbled upon this affair of domestic bliss. He was the first to attract my attention. His appearance was not that of a man of birth or high family. He was tall, rather thin, very serious, and well dressed. Apparently he had no heart for the family festivities. The instant he went off into a corner by himself the smile disappeared from his face, and his thick dark brows knitted into a frown. He knew no one except the host and showed every sign of being bored to death, though bravely sustaining the rôle of thorough enjoyment to the end. Later I learned that he was a provincial, had come to the capital on some important, brain-racking business, had brought a letter of recommendation to our host, and our host had taken him under his protection, not at all con amore. It was merely out of politeness that he had invited him to the children's ball.

They did not play cards with him, they did not offer him cigars. No one entered into conversation with him. Possibly they recognised the bird by its feathers from a distance. Thus, my gentleman, not knowing what to do with his hands, was compelled to spend the evening stroking his whiskers. His whiskers were really fine, but he stroked them so assiduously that one got the feeling that the whiskers had come into the world first and afterwards the man in order to stroke them.

There was another guest who interested me. But he was of quite a different order. He was a personage. They called him Julian Mastakovich. At first glance one could tell he was an honoured guest and stood in the same relation to the host as the host to the gentleman of the whiskers. The host and hostess said no end of amiable things to him, were most attentive, wining him, hovering over him, bringing guests up to be introduced, but never leading him to any one else. I noticed tears glisten in our host's eyes when Julian Mastakovich remarked that he had rarely spent such a pleasant evening. Somehow I began to feel uncomfortable in this personage's presence. So, after amusing myself with the children, five of whom, remarkably well-fed young persons, were our host's, I went into a little sitting-room, entirely unoccupied, and seated myself at the end that was a conservatory and took up almost half the room.

The children were charming. They absolutely refused to resemble their elders, notwithstanding the efforts of mothers and governesses. In a jiffy they had denuded the Christmas tree down to the very last sweet and had already succeeded in breaking half of their playthings before they even found out which belonged to whom.

One of them was a particularly handsome little lad, dark-eyed, curly-haired, who stubbornly persisted in aiming at me with his wooden gun. But the child that attracted the greatest attention was his sister, a girl of about eleven, lovely as a Cupid. She was quiet and thoughtful, with large, full, dreamy eyes. The children had somehow offended her, and she left them and walked into the same room that I had withdrawn into. There she seated herself with her doll in a corner.

"Her father is an immensely wealthy business man," the guests informed each other in tones of awe. "Three hundred thousand rubles set aside for her dowry already."

As I turned to look at the group from which I heard this news item issuing, my glance met Julian Mastakovich's. He stood listening to the insipid chatter in an attitude of concentrated attention, with his hands behind his back and his head inclined to one side.

All the while I was quite lost in admiration of the shrewdness our host displayed in the dispensing of the gifts. The little maid of the many-rubled dowry received the handsomest doll, and the rest of the gifts were graded in value according to the diminishing scale of the parents' stations in life. The last child, a tiny chap of ten, thin, red-haired, freckled, came into possession of a small book of nature stories without illustrations or even head and tail pieces. He was the governess's child. She was a poor widow, and her little boy, clad in a sorry-looking little nankeen jacket, looked thoroughly crushed and intimidated. He took the book of nature stories and circled slowly about the children's toys. He would have given anything to play with them. But he did not dare to. You could tell he already knew his place.

I like to observe children. It is fascinating to watch the individuality in them struggling for self-assertion. I could see that the other children's things had tremendous charm for the red-haired boy, especially a toy theatre, in which he was so anxious to take a part that he resolved to fawn upon the other children. He smiled and began to play with them. His one and only apple he handed over to a puffy urchin whose pockets were already crammed with sweets, and he even carried another youngster pickaback—all simply that he might be allowed to stay with the theatre.

But in a few moments an impudent young person fell on him and gave him a pummeling. He did not dare even to cry. The governess came and told him to leave off interfering with the other children's games, and he crept away to the same room the little girl and I were in. She let him sit down beside her, and the two set themselves busily to dressing the expensive doll.

Almost half an hour passed, and I was nearly dozing off, as I sat there in the conservatory half listening to the chatter of the red-haired boy and the dowered beauty, when Julian Mastakovich entered suddenly. He had slipped out of the drawing-room under cover of a noisy scene among the children. From my secluded corner it had not escaped my notice that a few moments before he had been eagerly conversing with the rich girl's father, to whom he had only just been introduced.

He stood still for a while reflecting and mumbling to himself, as if counting something on his fingers.

"Three hundred—three hundred—eleven—twelve—thirteen—sixteen—in five years! Let's say four per cent—five times twelve—sixty, and on these sixty—. Let us assume that in five years it will amount to—well, four hundred. Hm—hm! But the shrewd old fox isn't likely to be satisfied with four per cent. He gets eight or even ten, perhaps. Let's suppose five hundred, five hundred thousand. at least, that's sure. Anything above that for pocket money—hm—"

He blew his nose and was about to leave the room when he spied the girl and stood still. I, behind the plants, escaped his notice. He seemed to me to be quivering with excitement. It must have been his calculations that upset him so. He rubbed his hands and danced from place to place, and kept getting more and more excited. Finally, however, he conquered his emotions and came to a standstill. He cast a determined look at the future bride and wanted to move toward her, but glanced about first. Then, as if with a guilty conscience, he stepped over to the child on tip-toe, smiling, and bent down and kissed her head.

His coming was so unexpected that she uttered a shriek of alarm.

"What are you doing here, dear child?" he whispered, looking around and pinching her cheek.

"We're playing."

"What, with him?" said Julian Mastakovich with a look askance at the governess's child. "You should go into the drawing-room, my lad."

The boy remained silent and looked up at the man with wide-open eyes. Julian Mastakovich glanced round again cautiously and bent down over the girl.

"What have you got, a doll, my dear?"

"Yes, sir." The child quailed a little, and her brow wrinkled.

"A doll? And do you know, my dear, what dolls are made of?"

"No, sir," she said weakly, lowering her head.

"Out of rags, my dear. You, boy, you go back to the drawing-room, to the children," said Julian Mastakovich, looking at the boy sternly.

The two children frowned. They caught hold of each other and would not part.

"And do you know why they gave you the doll?" asked Julian Mastakovich, dropping his voice lower and lower. "No."

"Because you were a good, very good little girl the whole week."

Saying which, Julian Mastakovich was seized with a paroxysm of agitation. He looked round and said in a tone faint, almost inaudible with excitement and impatience:

"If I come to visit your parents will you love me, my dear?"

He tried to kiss the sweet little creature, but the red-haired boy saw that she was on the verge of tears, and he caught her hand and sobbed out loud in sympathy. That enraged the man.

"Go away! Go away! Go back to the other room, to your playmates."

"I don't want him to. I don't want him to! You go away!" cried the girl. "Let him alone! Let him alone!" She was almost weeping.

There was a sound of footsteps in the doorway. Julian Mastakovich started and straightened up his respectable body. The red-haired boy was even more alarmed. He let go the girl's hand, sidled along the wall, and escaped through the drawing-room into the dining-room.

Not to attract attention, Julian Mastakovich also made for the dining-room. He was red as a lobster. The sight of himself in a mirror seemed to embarrass him. Presumably he was annoyed at his own ardour and impatience. Without due respect to his importance and dignity, his calculations had lured and pricked him to the greedy eagerness of a boy, who makes straight for his object—though this was not as yet an object; it only would be so in five years' time. I followed the worthy man into the dining-room, where I saw a remarkable play.

Julian Mastakovich, all flushed with vexation, venom in his look, began to threaten the red-haired boy. The red-haired boy retreated farther and farther until there was no place left for him to retreat to, and he did not know where to turn in his fright.

"Get out of here! What are you doing here? Get out, I say, you good-for-nothing! Stealing fruit, are you? Oh, so, stealing fruit! Get out, you freckle face, go to your likes!"

The frightened child, as a last desperate resort, crawled quickly under the table. His persecutor, completely infuriated, pulled out his large linen handkerchief and used it as a lash to drive the boy out of his position.

Here I must remark that Julian Mastakovich was a somewhat corpulent man, heavy, well-fed, puffy-cheeked, with a paunch and ankles as round as nuts. He perspired and puffed and panted. So strong was his dislike (or was it jealousy?) of the child that he actually began to carry on like a madman.

I laughed heartily. Julian Mastakovich turned. He was utterly confused and for a moment, apparently, quite oblivious of his immense importance. At that moment our host appeared in the doorway opposite. The boy crawled out from under the table and wiped his knees and elbows. Julian Mastakovich hastened to carry his handkerchief, which he had been dangling by the corner, to his nose. Our host looked at the three of us rather suspiciously. But, like a man who knows the world and can readily adjust himself, he seized upon the opportunity to lay hold of his very valuable guest and get what he wanted out of him.

"Here's the boy I was talking to you about," he said, indicating the red-haired child. "I took the liberty of presuming on your goodness in his behalf."

"Oh," replied Julian Mastakovich, still not quite master of himself.

"He's my governess's son," our host continued in a beseeching tone. "She's a poor creature, the widow of an honest official. That's why, if it were possible for you—"

"Impossible, impossible!" Julian Mastakovich cried hastily. "You must excuse me, Philip Alexeyevich, I really cannot. I've made inquiries. There are no vacancies, and there is a waiting list of ten who have a greater right—I'm sorry."

"Too bad," said our host. "He's a quiet, unobtrusive child."

"A very naughty little rascal, I should say," said Julian Mastakovich, wryly. "Go away, boy. Why are you here still? Be off with you to the other children."

Unable to control himself, he gave me a sidelong glance. Nor could I control myself. I laughed straight in his face. He turned away and asked our host, in tones quite audible to me, who that odd young fellow was. They whispered to each other and left the room, disregarding me.

I shook with laughter. Then I, too, went to the drawing-room. There the great man, already surrounded by the fathers and mothers and the host and the hostess, had begun to talk eagerly with a lady to whom he had just been introduced. The lady held the rich little girl's hand. Julian Mastakovich went into fulsome praise of her. He waxed ecstatic over the dear child's beauty, her talents, her grace, her excellent breeding, plainly laying himself out to flatter the mother, who listened scarcely able to restrain tears of joy, while the father showed his delight by a very gratified smile.

The joy was contagious. Everybody shared in it. Even the children were obliged to stop playing so as not to disturb the conversation. The atmosphere was surcharged with awe. I heard the mother of the important little girl, touched to her profoundest depths, ask Julian Mastakovich in the choicest language of courtesy, whether he would honour them by coming to see them. I heard Julian Mastakovich accept the invitation with unfeigned enthusiasm. Then the guests scattered decorously to different parts of the room, and I heard them, with veneration in their tones, extol the business man, the business man's wife, the business man's daughter, and, especially, Julian Mastakovich.

"Is he married?" I asked out loud of an acquaintance of mine standing beside Julian Mastakovich. Julian Mastakovich gave me a venomous look.

"No," answered my acquaintance, profoundly shocked by my—intentional—indiscretion.

Not long ago I passed the Church of —. I was struck by the concourse of people gathered there to witness a wedding. It was a dreary day. A drizzling rain was beginning to come down. I made my way through the throng into the church. The bridegroom was a round, well-fed, pot-bellied little man, very much dressed up. He ran and fussed about and gave orders and arranged things. Finally word was passed that the bride was coming. I pushed through the crowd, and I beheld a marvellous beauty whose first spring was scarcely commencing. But the beauty was pale and sad. She looked distracted. It seemed to me even that her eyes were red from recent weeping. The classic severity of every line of her face imparted a peculiar significance and solemnity to her beauty. But through that severity and solemnity, through the sadness, shone the innocence of a child. There was something inexpressibly naïve, unsettled and young in her features, which, without words, seemed to plead for mercy.

They said she was just sixteen years old. I looked at the bridegroom carefully. Suddenly I recognised Julian Mastakovich, whom I had not seen again in all those five years. Then I looked at the bride again.—Good God! I made my way, as quickly as I could, out of the church. I heard gossiping in the crowd about the bride's wealth—about her dowry of five hundred thousand rubles—so and so much for pocket money.

"Then his calculations were correct," I thought, as I pressed out into the street.

ANTON CHEKHOV

The Cherry Orchard

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ

MADAME RANÉVSKY, a landowner
 ÁNYA, her daughter, aged seventeen
 BARBARA, her adopted daughter, aged twenty-seven LEONÍD GÁYEF, brother of Madame Ranévsky
 LOPÁKHIN, a merchant
 PETER TROPHÍMOF, a student
 SIMEÓNOF-PÍSHTCHIK, a landowner
 CHARLOTTE, a governess
 EPHIKHÓDOF, a clerk
 DUNYÁSHA, a housemaid
 FIRS, man-servant, aged eighty-seven YÁSHA, a young man-servant
 Tramp
 Stationmaster, Post-Office Official, Guests, Servants, etc.

The action takes place on Madame Ranévsky's property

ACT I

A room which is still called the nursery. One door leads to Anya's room. Dawn; the sun will soon rise. It is already May; the cherry trees are in blossom, but it is cold in the garden and there is a morning frost. The windows are closed.

Enter DUNYÁSHA with a candle, and LOPÁKHIN with a book in his hand.

LOPÁK. So the train has come in, thank Heaven. What is the time?

DUNY. Nearly two. [Putting the candle out.] It is light already.

LOPÁK. How late is the train? A couple of hours at least. [Yawning and stretching.] What do you think of me? A fine fool I have made of myself. I came on purpose to meet them at the station and then I went and fell asleep, fell asleep as I sat in my chair. What a nuisance it is! You might have woken me up anyway.

 DUNY. I thought that you had gone. [She listens.] That sounds like them driving up.

LOPÁK. [listening]. No; they have got to get the luggage out and all that. [A pause.] Madame Ranévsky has been five years abroad. I wonder what she has become like. What a splendid creature she is! So easy and simple in her ways. I remember when I was a youngster of fifteen my old father (he used to keep the shop here in the village then) struck me in the face with his fist and set my nose bleeding. We had come, for some reason or other, I forget what, into the courtyard, and he had been drinking. Madame Ranévsky—I remember it like yesterday, still a young girl, and oh, so slender—brought me to the wash-hand stand, here, in this very room, in the nursery. “Don’t cry, little peasant,” she said, “it’ll mend by your wedding.” [A pause.] “Little peasant”! . . . My father, it is true, was a peasant, and here am I in a white waistcoat and brown boots; a silk purse out of a sow’s ear, as you might say; just turned rich, with 20 heaps of money, but when you come to look at it, still a peasant of the peasants. [Turning over the pages of the book.] Here’s this book that I was reading and didn’t understand a word of it; I just sat reading and fell asleep.

DUNY. The dogs never slept all night; they knew that their master and mistress were coming.

LOPÁK. What’s the matter with you, Dunyásha? You’re all . . .

DUNY. My hands are trembling; I feel quite faint.

30 LOPÁK. You are too refined, Dunyásha; that’s what it is. You dress yourself like a young lady; and look at your hair! You ought not to do it; you ought to remember your place.

Enter EPHIKHÓDOF with a nosegay. He is dressed in a short jacket and brightly polished boots which squeak noisily. As he comes in he drops the nosegay.

EPHIK. [picking it up]. The gardener has sent this; he says it is to go in the dining-room. [Handing it to DUNYÁSHA.]

LOPÁK. And bring me some quass.

DUNY. Yes, sir.

[Exit DUNYÁSHA.]

EPHIK. There's a frost this morning, three degrees, and the cherry trees all in blossom. I can't say I think much of our climate; [sighing] that is impossible. Our climate is not adapted to contribute; and I should like to add, with your permission, that only two days ago I bought myself a new pair of boots, and I venture to assure you they do squeak beyond all bearing. What am I to grease them with?

LOPÁK. Get out; I'm tired of you.

EPHIK. Every day some misfortune happens to me; but do I grumble? No; I am used to it; I can afford to smile.

Enter DUNYÁSHA, and hands a glass of quass to LOPÁKHIN.

EPHIK. I must be going. [He knocks against a chair, which falls to the ground.] There you are! [In a voice of triumph.] You see, if I may venture on the expression, the sort of incidents inter alia.²⁰ It really is astonishing! [Exit EPHIKHÓDOF.]

DUNY. To tell you the truth, Yermolái Alexéyitch, Ephikhódof has made me a proposal.

LOPÁK. Hmph!

DUNY. I hardly know what to do. He is such a well-behaved young man, only so often when he talks one doesn't know what he means. It is all so nice and full of good feeling, but you can't make out what it means. I fancy I am rather fond of him. He adores me passionately. He is a most unfortunate man; every day something seems to happen to him. They call him "Twenty-two misfortunes," that's his nickname.

LOPÁK. [listening]. There, surely that is them coming!

DUNY. They're coming! Oh, what is the matter with me? I am all turning cold.

LOPÁK. Yes, there they are, and no mistake. Let's go and meet them. Will she know me again, I wonder? It is five years since we met.

DUNY. I am going to faint! . . . I am going to faint!

Two carriages are heard driving up to the house.

LOPÁKHIN and DUNYÁSHA exeunt quickly. The stage remains empty. A hubbub begins in the neighboring rooms. FÍRS walks hastily across the stage, leaning on a walking-stick. He has been to meet them at the station. He is wearing an old-fashioned livery and a tall hat; he mumbles⁵⁰ something to himself, but not a word is audible. The noise behind the scenes grows louder and louder. A voice says: "Let's go this way." Enter

MADAME RANÉVSKY, ÁNYA, CHARLOTTE, leading a little dog on a chain, all dressed in traveling-dresses; BARBARA in greatcoat, with a kerchief over her head, GÁYEF, SIMEÓNOF-PÍSHTCHIK, LOPÁKHIN, DUNYÁSHA, carrying parcel and umbrella, servants with luggage, all cross the stage.

ÁNYA. Come through this way. Do you remember what room this is, mamma?

¹⁰ MME. R. [joyfully, through her tears]. The nursery.

BARB. How cold it is. My hands are simply frozen. [To MADAME RANÉVSKY.] Your two rooms, the white room and the violet room, are just the same as they were, mamma.

MME. R. My nursery, my dear, beautiful nursery! This is where I used to sleep when I was a little girl. [Crying.] I am like a little girl still. [Kissing GÁYEF and BARBARA and then GÁYEF again.] Barbara has not altered a bit; she is just like a nun; and I knew Dunyásha at once. [Kissing DUNYÁSHA.]

GÁYEF. Your train was two hours late. What do you think of that? There's punctuality for you!

CHARL. [to SIMEÓNOF-PÍSHTCHIK]. My little dog eats nuts.

PÍSHT. [astonished]. You don't say so! Well, I never! [Exeunt all but ÁNYA and DUNYÁSHA.]

DUNY. At last you've come! [She takes off Ánya's overcoat and hat.]

ÁNYA. I have not slept for four nights on the journey. I am frozen to death.

DUNY. It was Lent when you went away. There was snow on the ground; it was freezing; but now! Oh, my dear! [Laughing and kissing her.] How I have waited for you, my joy, my light! Oh, I must tell you something at once, I cannot wait another minute.

ÁNYA [without interest]. What, again?

⁴⁰ DUNY. Ephikhódof, the clerk, proposed to me in Easter Week.

ÁNYA. Same old story. . . . [Putting her hair straight.] All my hairpins have dropped out. [She is very tired, staggering with fatigue.]

DUNY. I hardly know what to think of it. He loves me! Oh, how he loves me!

ÁNYA [looking into her bedroom, affectionately]. My room, my window, just as if I had never gone away! I am at home again! When I wake up in the morning I shall run out into the garden. . . . Oh, if only I could get to sleep! I have not slept the whole journey from Paris, I was so nervous and anxious.

DUNY. Monsieur Trophímof arrived the day before yesterday.

ÁNYA [joyfully]. Peter?

DUNY. He is sleeping outside in the bath-house; he is living there. He was afraid he might be in the way. [Looking at her watch.] I'd like to go and wake him, only Mamzelle Barbara told me not to. "Mind you don't wake him," she said.

Enter BARBARA with bunch of keys hanging from her girdle.

BARB. Dunyásha, go and get some coffee, quick. Mamma wants some coffee.

DUNY. In a minute! [Exit DUNYÁSHA.]

BARB. Well, thank Heaven, you have come. Here you are at home again. [Caressing her.] My little darling is back! My pretty one is back!

ÁNYA. What I've had to go through!

BARB. I can believe you.

ÁNYA. I left here in Holy Week. How cold it was! Charlotte would talk the whole way and keep doing conjuring tricks. What on earth made you tie Charlotte round my neck?

BARB. Well, you couldn't travel alone, my pet. At seventeen!

ÁNYA. When we got to Paris, it was so cold! There was snow on the ground. I can't talk French a bit. Mamma was on the fifth floor of a big house. When I arrived there were a lot of Frenchmen with her, and ladies, and an old Catholic priest with a book, and it was very uncomfortable and full of tobacco smoke. I suddenly felt so sorry for mamma, oh, so sorry! I took her head in my arms and squeezed it and could not let it go, and then mamma kept kissing me and crying.

BARB. [crying]. Don't go on; don't go on!

ÁNYA. She's sold her villa near Mentone already. She's nothing left, absolutely nothing; and I hadn't a farthing either. We only just managed to get home. And mamma won't understand! We got out at a station to have some dinner, and she asks for all the most expensive things and gives the waiters a florin each for a tip; and Charlotte does the same. And Yásha wanted his portion, too. It was too awful! Yásha is mamma's new manservant. We have brought him back with us.

BARB. I've seen the rascal.

ÁNYA. Come, tell me all about everything! Has the interest on the mortgage been paid?

BARB. How could it be?

ÁNYA. Oh, dear! Oh, dear!

BARB. The property will be sold in August.

ÁNYA. Oh, dear! Oh, dear!

LOPÁK. [looking in at the door and mooing like a cow]. Moo-ool [He goes away again.]

BARB. [laughing through her tears, and shaking her fist at the door]. Oh, I should like to give him one!

ÁNYA [embracing BARBARA softly]. Barbara, has he proposed to you?

BARBARA shakes her head.

ÁNYA. And yet I am sure he loves you. Why don't you come to an understanding? What are you waiting for?

BARB. I don't think anything will come of it. He has so much to do; he can't be bothered with me; he hardly takes any notice. Confound the man, I can't bear to see him! Everyone talks about our marriage; everyone congratulates me; but, as a matter of fact, there is nothing in it; it's all a dream. [Changing her tone.] You've got on a brooch like a bee.

ÁNYA [sadly]. Mamma bought it me. [Going into her room, talking gaily, like a child.] When I was in Paris, I went up in a balloon!

BARB. How glad I am you are back, my little pet! My pretty one!

DUNYÁSHA has already returned with a coffee-pot and begins to prepare the coffee.

BARB. [standing by the door]. I trudge about all day looking after things, and I think and think. What are we to do? If only we could marry you to some rich man it would be a load off my mind. I would go into a retreat, and then to Kief, to Moscow; I would tramp about from one holy place to another, always tramping and tramping. What bliss!

ÁNYA. The birds are singing in the garden. What time is it now?

BARB. It must be past two. It is time to go to bed, my darling. [Following ÁNYA into her room.] What bliss!

Enter YÁSHA with a shawl and a traveling-bag.

YÁSHA [crossing the stage, delicately]. May I pass this way, mademoiselle?

DUNY. One would hardly know you, Yásha. How you've changed abroad!

YÁSHA. Ahem! And who may you be?

DUNY. When you left here I was a little thing so like that [indicating with her hand]. My name is Dunyásha, Theodore Kozoyédof's daughter. Don't you remember me?

YÁSHA. Ahem! You little cucumber! [He looks round cautiously, then embraces her. She screams and drops a saucer. Exit YÁSHA hastily.]

BARB. [in the doorway, crossly]. What's all this?

DUNY. [crying]. I've broken a saucer.

BARB. Well, it brings luck.

Enter ÁNYA from her room.

ÁNYA. We must tell mamma that Peter's here.

BARB. I've told them not to wake him.

ÁNYA [thoughtfully]. It's just six years since ¹⁰ papa died. And only a month afterwards poor little Grisha was drowned in the river; my pretty little brother, only seven years old! It was too much for mamma; she ran away, ran away without looking back. [Shuddering.] How well I can understand her, if only she knew! [A pause.] Peter Trophímof was Grisha's tutor; he might remind her.

Enter FIRS in long coat and white waistcoat.

FIRS [going over to the coffee-pot, anxiously]. My mistress is going to take coffee here. [Putting on white gloves.] Is the coffee ready? [Sternly, to DUNYÁSHA.] Here, girl, where's the cream?

DUNY. Oh, dear! oh, dear!

[Exit DUNYÁSHA hastily.]

FIRS [bustling about the coffee-pot]. Ah, you . . . job-lot! [Mumbling to himself.] She's come back from Paris. The master went to Paris once in a post-chaise. [Laughing.]

BARB. What is it, Firs?

FIRS. I beg your pardon? [Joyfully.] My mistress has come home; at last I've seen her. Now I'm ready to die. [He cries with joy.]

Enter MADAME RANÉVSKY, LOPÁKHIN, GÁYEF, and PÍSHTCHIK; PÍSHTCHIK in Russian breeches and coat of fine cloth. GÁYEF as he enters makes gestures as if playing billiards.

MME. R. What was the expression? Let me see. ⁴⁰ "I'll put the red in the corner pocket; double into the middle—"

GÁYEF. I'll chip the red in the righthand top. Once upon a time, Lyuba, when we were children, we used to sleep here side by side in two little cots, and now I'm fifty-one, and can't bring myself to believe it.

LOPÁK. Yes; time flies.

GÁYEF. Who's that?

LOPÁK. Time flies, I say.

GÁYEF. There's a smell of patchouli!

ÁNYA. I am going to bed. Good-night, mamma. [Kissing her mother.]

MME. R. My beloved little girl! [Kissing her hands.] Are you glad you're home again? I can't come to my right senses.

ÁNYA. Good-night, uncle.

GÁYEF [kissing her face and hands]. God bless you, little Ánya. How like your mother you are! [To MADAME RANÉVSKY.] You were just such another girl at her age, Lyuba.

ÁNYA shakes hands with LOPÁKHIN and SIMEÓNOF-PÍSHTCHIK, and exit, shutting her bedroom door behind her.

MME. R. She's very, very tired.

PÍSHT. It must have been a long journey.

BARB. [to LOPÁKHIN and PÍSHTCHIK]. Well, gentlemen, it's past two; time you were off.

MME. R. [laughing]. You haven't changed a bit, Barbara! [Drawing her to herself and kissing her.] I'll just finish my coffee, then we'll all go. [FIRS puts a footstool under her feet.] Thank you, friend. I'm used to my coffee. I drink it day and night. Thank you, you dear old man. [Kissing FIRS.]

BARB. I'll go and see if they've got all the luggage. [Exit BARBARA.]

MME. R. Can it be me that's sitting here? [Laughing.] I want to jump and wave my arms about. [Pausing and covering her face.] Surely I must be dreaming! God knows I love my country. I love it tenderly. I couldn't see out of the window ³⁰ from the train, I was crying so. [Crying.] However, I must drink my coffee. Thank you, Firs; thank you, you dear old man. I'm so glad to find you still alive.

FIRS. The day before yesterday.

GÁYEF. He's hard of hearing.

LOPÁK. I've got to be off for Kharkof by the five-o'clock train. Such a nuisance! I wanted to stay and look at you and talk to you. You're as splendid as you always were.

PÍSHT. [sighing heavily]. Handsomer than ever and dressed like a Parisian . . . Perish my wagon and all its wheels!

LOPÁK. Your brother, Leoníd Andréyitch, says I'm a snob, a money-grubber. He can say what he likes. I don't care a hang. Only I want you to believe in me as you used to; I want your wonderful, touching eyes to look at me as they used to. Merciful God in heaven! My father was your father's serf, and your grandfather's serf before ⁵⁰ him; but you, you did so much for me in the old days that I've forgotten everything, and I love you like a sister—more than a sister.

MME. R. I can't sit still! I can't do it! [Jumping up and walking about in great agitation.] This happiness is more than I can bear. Laugh at me! I am a fool! [Kissing a cupboard.] My darling old cupboard! [Caressing a table.] My dear little table!

GÁYEF. Nurse is dead since you went away.

MME. R. [sitting down and drinking coffee]. Yes, Heaven rest her soul. They wrote and told me.

GÁYEF. And Anastási is dead. Squint-eyed Peter has left us and works in the town at the Police Inspector's now. [GÁYEF takes out a box of sugar candy from his pocket, and begins to eat it.]

PÍSHT. My daughter Dáshenka sent her compliments.

LOPÁK. I long to say something charming and delightful to you. [Looking at his watch.] I'm just off; there's no time to talk. Well, yes, I'll put it in two or three words. You know that your cherry orchard is going to be sold to pay the mortgage: the sale is fixed for the twenty-second of August; but don't you be uneasy, my dear lady; sleep peacefully; there's a way out of it. This is my plan. Listen to me carefully. Your property is only fifteen miles from the town; the railway runs close beside it; and if only you will cut up the cherry orchard and the land along the river into building lots and let it off on lease for villas, you will get at least two thousand five hundred pounds a year out of it.

GÁYEF. Come, come! What rubbish you're talking!

MME. R. I don't quite understand what you mean, Yermolái Alexéyitch.

LOPÁK. You will get a pound a year at least for every acre from the tenants, and if you advertise the thing at once, I am ready to bet whatever you like, by the autumn you won't have a clod of that earth left on your hands. It'll all be snapped up. In two words, I congratulate you; you are saved. It's a first-class site, with a good deep river. Only, of course you will have to put it in order and clear the ground; you will have to pull down all the old buildings—this house, for instance, which is no longer fit for anything; you'll have to cut down the cherry orchard. . . .

MME. R. Cut down the cherry orchard! Excuse me, but you don't know what you are talking about. If there is one thing that's interesting, remarkable in fact, in the whole province, it's our cherry orchard.

LOPÁK. There's nothing remarkable about the orchard except that it's a very big one. It only bears once every two years, and then you don't know what to do with the fruit. Nobody wants to buy it.

GÁYEF. Our cherry orchard is mentioned in Andréyevsky's Encyclopædia.

LOPÁK. [looking at his watch]. If we don't make up our minds or think of any way, on the twenty-second of August the cherry orchard and the whole property will be sold by auction. Come, make up your mind! There's no other way out of it, I swear—absolutely none.

FIRS. In the old days, forty or fifty years ago, they used to dry the cherries and soak 'em and pickle 'em, and make jam of 'em; and the dried cherries . . .

GÁYEF. Shut up, Firs.

FIRS. The dried cherries used to be sent in wagons to Moscow and Kharkof. A heap of money! The dried cherries were soft and juicy and sweet and sweet-smelling then. They knew some way in those days.

MME. R. And why don't they do it now?

FIRS. They've forgotten. Nobody remembers how to do it.

PÍSHT. [to MADAME RANÉVSKY]. What about Paris? How did you get on? Did you eat frogs?

MME. R. Crocodiles.

PÍSHT. You don't say so! Well, I never!

LOPÁK. Until a little while ago there was nothing but gentry and peasants in the villages; but now villa residents have made their appearance. All the towns, even the little ones, are surrounded by villas now. In another twenty years the villa resident will have multiplied like anything. At present he only sits and drinks tea on his veranda, but it is quite likely that he will soon take to cultivating his three acres of land, and then your old cherry orchard will become fruitful, rich and happy. . . .

GÁYEF [angry]. What gibberish!

Enter BARBARA and YÁSHA.

BARB. [taking out a key and noisily unlocking an old-fashioned cupboard]. There are two telegrams for you, mamma. Here they are.

MME. R. [tearing them up without reading them]. They're from Paris. I've done with Paris.

GÁYEF. Do you know how old this cupboard is, Lyuba? A week ago I pulled out the bottom drawer and saw a date burnt in it. That cupboard was made exactly a hundred years ago. What do you think of that, eh? We might celebrate its jubilee. It's only an inanimate thing, but for all that it's a historic cupboard.

PÍSHT. [astonished]. A hundred years? Well, I never!

GÁYEF [touching the cupboard]. Yes, it's a wonderful thing. . . . Beloved and venerable cupboard; honor and glory to your existence, which for more than a hundred years has been directed to the noble ideals of justice and virtue. Your silent summons to profitable labor has never weakened in all these hundred years. [Crying.] You have upheld the courage of succeeding generations of our humankind; you have upheld faith in a better future and cherished in us ideals of goodness and social consciousness. [A pause.]

LOPÁK. Yes. . . .

MME. R. You haven't changed, Leoníd.

GÁYEF [embarrassed]. Off the white in the corner, chip the red in the middle pocket!

LOPÁK. [looking at his watch]. Well, I must be off.

YÁSHA [handing a box to MADAME RANÉVSKY]. Perhaps you'll take your pills now.

PÍSHT. You oughtn't to take medicine, dear lady. It does you neither good nor harm. Give them here, ²⁰ my friend. [He empties all the pills into the palm of his hand, blows on them, puts them in his mouth, and swallows them down with a draught of quass.] There!

MME. R. [alarmed]. Have you gone off your head?

PÍSHT. I've taken all the pills.

LOPÁK. Greedy feller!

Everyone laughs.

FIRS [mumbling]. They were here in Easter Week and finished off a gallon of pickled gherkins.

MME. R. What's he talking about?

BARB. He's been mumbling like that these three years. We've got used to it.

YÁSHA. Advancing age.

CHARLOTTE crosses in a white frock, very thin, tightly laced, with a lorgnette at her waist.

LOPÁK. Excuse me, Charlotte Ivánovna, I've not ⁴⁰ paid my respects to you yet. [He prepares to kiss her hand.]

CHARL. [drawing her hand away]. If one allows you to kiss one's hand, you will want to kiss one's elbow next, and then one's shoulder.

LOPÁK. I'm having no luck today. [All laugh.] Charlotte Ivánovna, do us a conjuring trick.

MME. R. Charlotte, do do us a conjuring trick.

CHARL. No, thank you. I'm going to bed.

[Exit CHARLOTTE. ⁵⁰

LOPÁK. We shall meet again in three weeks. [Kissing Madame Ranévsky's hand.] Meanwhile, good-by. I must be off. [To GÁYEF.] So-long.

[Kissing PÍSHTCHIK.] Ta-ta. [Shaking hands with BARBARA, then with FIRS and YÁSHA.] I hate having to go. [To MADAME RANÉVSKY.] If you make up your mind about the villas, let me know, and I'll raise you five thousand pounds at once. Think it over seriously.

BARB. [angrily]. For Heaven's sake, do go!

LOPÁK. I'm going, I'm going. [Exit LOPÁKHIN.]

GÁYEF. Snob! . . . However, pardon! Barbara's ¹⁰ going to marry him; he's Barbara's young man.

BARB. You talk too much, uncle.

MME. R. Why, Barbara, I shall be very glad. He's a nice man.

PÍSHT. Not a doubt of it. . . . A most worthy individual. My Dáshenka, she says . . . oh, she says . . . lots of things. [Snoring and waking up again at once.] By the by, dear lady, can you lend me twenty-five pounds? I've got to pay the interest on my mortgage tomorrow.

BARB. [alarmed]. We can't! We can't!

MME. R. It really is a fact that I haven't any money.

PÍSHT. I'll find it somewhere. [Laughing.] I never lose hope. Last time I thought, "Now I really am done for, I'm a ruined man," when behold, they ran a railway over my land and paid me compensation. And so it'll be again; something will happen, if not today, then tomorrow. Dáshenka may win the twenty-thousand-pound prize; ³⁰ she's got a ticket in the lottery.

MME. R. The coffee's finished. Let's go to bed.

FIRS [brushing GÁYEF's clothes, admonishingly]. You've put on the wrong trousers again. Whatever am I to do with you?

BARB. [softly]. Anya is asleep. [She opens the window quietly.] The sun's up already; it isn't cold now. Look, mamma, how lovely the trees are. Heavens! what a sweet air! The starlings are singing!

GÁYEF [opening the other window]. The orchard is all white. You've not forgotten it, Lyuba? This long avenue going straight on, straight on, like a ribbon between the trees? It shines like silver on moonlight nights. Do you remember? You've not forgotten?

MME. R. [looking out into the garden]. Oh, my childhood, my pure and happy childhood! I used to sleep in this nursery. I used to look out from here into the garden. Happiness awoke with me every morning; and the orchard was just the same then as it is now; nothing is altered. [Laughing with joy.] It is all white, all white! Oh, my cherry orchard! After the dark and stormy autumn and the frosts of winter you are young again and full of happiness; the angels of heaven have not abandoned you. Oh! if only I could free my neck and shoulders from the stone that weighs them down! If only I could forget my past!

GÁYEF. Yes; and this orchard will be sold to pay our debts, however impossible it may seem. . . .

MME. R. Look! There's mamma walking in the orchard . . . in a white frock! [Laughing with joy.] There she is!

GÁYEF. Where?

BARB. Heaven help you!

MME. R. There's no one there really. It only looked like it; there on the right where the path turns down to the summer-house; there's a white tree that leans over and looks like a woman.

Enter TROPHÍMOF in a shabby student uniform and spectacles.

MME. R. What a wonderful orchard, with its white masses of blossom and the blue sky above!

TROPH. Lyubóf Andréyevna! [She looks round at him.] I only want to say, "How do you do," and go away at once. [Kissing her hand eagerly.] I was told to wait till the morning, but I hadn't the patience.

MADAME RANÉVSKY looks at him in astonishment.

BARB. [crying]. This is Peter Trophímof.

TROPH. Peter Trophímof; I was Grisha's tutor, so you know. Have I really altered so much?

MADAME RANÉVSKY embraces him and cries softly.

GÁYEF. Come, come, that's enough, Lyuba!

BARB. [crying]. I told you to wait till tomorrow, you know, Peter.

MME. R. My little Grisha! My little boy! Grisha . . . my son. . . .

BARB. It can't be helped, mamma. It was the will of God.

TROPH. [gently, crying]. There, there!

MME. R. [crying]. He was drowned. My little boy was drowned. Why? What was the use of that, my dear? [In a softer voice.] Ánya's asleep in there, and I am speaking so loud, and making a noise. . . . But tell me, Peter, why have you grown so ugly? Why have you grown so old?

TROPH. An old woman in the train called me a "moldy gentleman."

MME. R. You were quite a boy then, a dear little student, and now your hair's going and you wear spectacles. Are you really still a student? [Going toward the door.]

TROPH. Yes, I expect I shall be a perpetual student.

MME. R. [kissing her brother and then BARBARA]. Well, go to bed. You've grown old too, Leoníd.

PÍSHT. [following her]. Yes, yes; time for bed. Oh, oh, my gout! I'll stay the night here. Don't forget, Lyubóf Andréyevna, my angel, tomorrow morning . . . twenty-five.

10 GÁYEF. He's still on the same string.

PÍSHT. Twenty-five . . . to pay the interest on my mortgage.

MME. R. I haven't any money, my friend.

PÍSHT. I'll pay you back, dear lady. It's a trifling sum.

MME. R. Well, well, Leoníd will give it you. Let him have it, Leoníd.

GÁYEF [ironical]. I'll give it him right enough! Hold your pocket wide!

MME. R. It can't be helped. . . . He needs it. He'll pay it back.

[Exeunt MADAME RANÉVSKY, TROPHÍMOF, PÍSHTCHIK, and FRS. GÁYEF, BARBARA, and YÁSHA remain.]

GÁYEF. My sister hasn't lost her old habit of scattering the money. [To YÁSHA.] Go away, my lad! You smell of chicken.

YÁSHA [laughing]. You're just the same as you always were, Leoníd Andréyevitch!

GÁYEF. Who's that? [To BARBARA.] What does he say?

BARB. [to YÁSHA]. Your mother's come up from the village. She's been waiting for you since yesterday in the servants' hall. She wants to see you.

YÁSHA. What a nuisance she is!

BARB. You wicked, unnatural son!

YÁSHA. Well, what do I want with her? She might just as well have waited till tomorrow.

40 [Exit YÁSHA.]

BARB. Mamma is just like she used to be; she hasn't changed a bit. If she had her way, she'd give away everything she has.

GÁYEF. Yes. [A pause.] If people recommend very many cures for an illness, that means that the illness is incurable. I think and think, I batter my brains; I know of many remedies, very many, and that means really that there is none. How nice it would be to get a fortune left one by somebody! How nice it would be if Ánya could marry a very rich man! How nice it would be to go to Yaroslav and try my luck with my aunt the Countess. My aunt is very, very rich, you know.

BARB. [crying softly]. If only God would help us!

GÁYEF. Don't howl! My aunt is very rich, but she does not like us. In the first place, my sister married a solicitor, not a nobleman. [ÁNYA appears in the doorway.] She married a man who was not a nobleman, and it's no good pretending that she has led a virtuous life. She's a dear, kind, charming creature, and I love her very much, but whatever mitigating circumstances one may find for her, there's no getting round it that she's a sinful woman. You can see it in her every gesture.

BARB. [whispering]. Ánya is standing in the door!

GÁYEF. Who's that? [A pause.] It's very odd, something's got into my right eye. I can't see properly out of it. Last Thursday when I was down at the District Court . . .

ÁNYA comes down.

BARB. Why aren't you asleep, Ánya?

ÁNYA. I can't sleep. It's no good trying.

GÁYEF. My little pet! [Kissing Ánya's hands and face.] My little girl! [Crying.] You're not my niece; you're my angel; you're my everything. Trust me, trust me. . . .

ÁNYA. I do trust you, uncle. Everyone loves you, everyone respects you; but, dear, dear uncle, you ought to hold your tongue, only to hold your tongue. What were you saying just now about mamma?—about your own sister? What was the good of saying that?

GÁYEF. Yes, yes. [Covering his face with her hand.] You're quite right; it was awful of me! Lord, Lord! Save me from myself! And a little while ago I made a speech over a cupboard. What a stupid thing to do! As soon as I had done it, I knew it was stupid.

BARB. Yes, really, uncle. You ought to hold your tongue. Say nothing; that's all that's wanted.

ÁNYA. If only you would hold your tongue, you'd be so much happier!

GÁYEF. I will! I will! [Kissing Ánya's and Barbara's hands.] I'll hold my tongue. But there's one thing I must say; it's business. Last Thursday, when I was down at the District Court, a lot of us were there together, we began to talk about this and that, one thing and another, and it seems I could arrange a loan on note of hand to pay the interest into the bank.

BARB. If only Heaven would help us!

GÁYEF. I'll go in on Tuesday and talk it over again. [To BARBARA.] Don't howl! [To ÁNYA.]

Your mamma shall have a talk with Lopákhin. Of course he won't refuse her. And as soon as you are rested you must go to see your grandmother, the Countess, at Yaroslav. We'll operate from three points, and the trick is done. We'll pay the interest, I'm certain of it. [Taking sugar candy.] I swear on my honor, or whatever you will, the property shall not be sold. [Excitedly.] I swear by my hope of eternal happiness! There's my hand on it. Call me a base, dishonorable man if I let it go to auction. I swear by my whole being!

ÁNYA [calm again and happy]. What a dear you are, uncle, and how clever! [Embraces him.] Now I'm easy again. I'm easy again! I'm happy!

Enter FIRS.

FIRS [reproachfully]. Leoníd Andréyevitch, have you no fear of God? When are you going to bed?

GÁYEF. I'm just off—just off. You get along,

20 FIRS. I'll undress myself all right. Come, children, by-bye! Details tomorrow, but now let's go to bed. [Kissing ÁNYA and BARBARA.] I'm a good Liberal, a man of the eighties. People abuse the eighties, but I think that I may say I've suffered something for my convictions in my time. It's not for nothing that the peasants love me. We ought to know the peasants; we ought to know with what . . .

ÁNYA. You're at it again, uncle!

BARB. Why don't you hold your tongue, uncle?

FIRS [angrily]. Leoníd Andréyevitch!

GÁYEF. I'm coming; I'm coming. Now go to bed. Off two cushions in the middle pocket! I start another life! . . .

[Exit, with FIRS hobbling after him.]

ÁNYA. Now my mind is at rest. I don't want to go to Yaroslav; I don't like grandmamma; but my mind is at rest, thanks to Uncle Leoníd. [She sits down.]

BARB. Time for bed. I'm off. Whilst you were 40 away there's been a scandal. You know that nobody lives in the old servants' quarters except the old people, Ephim, Pauline, Evstignéy, and old Karp. Well, they took to having in all sorts of queer fish to sleep there with them. I didn't say a word. But at last I heard they had spread a report that I had given orders that they were to have nothing but peas to eat; out of stinginess, you understand? It was all Evstignéy's doing. "Very well," I said to myself, "you wait a bit." So I sent 50 for Evstignéy. [Yawning.] He comes. "Now then, Evstignéy," I said, "you old imbecile, how do you dare . . ." [Looking at ÁNYA.] Ánya, Ánya! [A pause.] She's asleep. [Taking ÁNYA's arm.] Let's go to bed. Come along. [Leading her away.]

Sleep on, my little one! Come along; come along!
[They go towards Anya's room. In the distance beyond the orchard a shepherd plays his pipe. TROPHÍMOF crosses the stage and, seeing BARBARA and ANYA, stops.] 'Sh! She's asleep, she's asleep! Come along, my love.

ANYA [drowsily]. I'm so tired! Listen to the bells! Uncle, dear uncle! Mamma! Uncle!

BARB. Come along, my love! Come along.

[Exeunt BARBARA and ANYA to the bedroom.]

TROPH. [with emotion]. My sunshine! My spring!

ACT II

In the open fields; an old crooked half-ruined shrine. Near it a well; big stones, apparently old tombstones; an old bench. Road to the estate beyond. On one side rise dark poplar trees. Beyond them begins the cherry orchard. In the distance a row of telegraph poles, and, far away on the horizon, the dim outlines of a big town, visible only in fine, clear weather. It is near sunset.

CHARLOTTE, YÁSHA, and DUNYÁSHA sit on the bench. EPHIKHÓDOF stands by them and plays on a guitar; they meditate. CHARLOTTE wears an old peaked cap. She has taken a gun from off her shoulders and is mending the buckle of the strap.

CHARL. [thoughtfully]. I have no proper passport. I don't know how old I am; I always feel I am still young. When I was a little girl my father and mother used to go about from one country fair to another, giving performances, and very good ones, too. I used to do the salto mortale and all sorts of tricks. When papa and mamma died, an old German lady adopted me and educated me. Good! When I grew up I became a governess. But where I come from and who I am, I haven't a notion. Who my parents were—very likely they weren't married—I don't know. [Taking a cucumber from her pocket and beginning to eat.] I don't know anything about it. [A pause.] I long to talk so, and I have no one to talk to, I have no friends or relations.

EPHIK. [playing on the guitar and singing].

"What is the noisy world to me?"

Oh, what are friends and foes?"

How sweet it is to play upon a mandolin!

DUNY. That's a guitar, not a mandolin. [She looks at herself in a hand-glass and powders her face.]

EPHIK. For the madman who loves, it is a mandolin. [Singing.]

"Oh, that my heart were cheered
By the warmth of requited love."

YÁSHA joins in.

10 CHARL. How badly these people do sing! Fool Like jackals howling!

DUNY. [to YÁSHA]. What happiness it must be to live abroad!

YÁSHA. Of course it is; I quite agree with you. [He yawns and lights a cigar.]

EPHIK. It stands to reason. Everything abroad has attained a certain culmination.¹

YÁSHA. That's right.

EPHIK. I am a man of cultivation; I have studied various remarkable books, but I cannot fathom the direction of my preferences; do I want to live or do I want to shoot myself, so to speak? But in order to be ready for all contingencies, I always carry a revolver in my pocket. Here it is. [Showing revolver.]

CHARL. That's done. I'm off. [Slinging the rifle over her shoulder.] You're a clever fellow, Ephikhódof, and very alarming. Women must fall madly in love with you. Brrr! [Going.] These 30 clever people are all so stupid; I have no one to talk to. I am always alone, always alone; I have no friends or relations, and who I am, or why I exist, is a mystery. [Exit slowly.]

EPHIK. Strictly speaking, without touching upon other matters, I must protest inter alia that destiny treats me with the utmost rigor, as a tempest might treat a small ship. If I labor under a misapprehension, how is it that when I woke up this morning, behold, so to speak, I perceived sitting on my chest a spider of preternatural dimensions, like that? [Indicating with both hands.] And if I go to take a draught of quass, I am sure to find something of the most indelicate character, in the nature of a cockroach. [A pause.] Have you read Buckle? [A pause.—To DUNYÁSHA.] I should like to trouble you, Avdotya Fëdorovna,² for a momentary interview.

DUNY. Talk away.

EPHIK. I should prefer to conduct it tête-à-tête. 50 [Sighing.]

DUNY. [confused]. Very well, only first please

¹ This represents a similar blunder in the Russian.

² Pronounced: Fvodorovna.

fetch me my cloak. It's by the cupboard. It's rather damp here.

EPHIK. Very well, mademoiselle. I will go and fetch it, mademoiselle. Now I know what to do with my revolver.

[Takes his guitar and exit, playing.]

YÁSHA. Twenty-two misfortunes! Between you and me, he's a stupid fellow. [Yawning.]

DUNY. Heaven help him, he'll shoot himself! [A pause.] I have grown so nervous, I am always in a twitter. I was quite a little girl when they took me into the household, and now I have got quite disused to common life, and my hands are as white as white, like a lady's. I have grown so refined, so delicate and genteel, I am afraid of everything. I'm always frightened. And if you deceive me, Yásha, I don't know what will happen to my nerves.

YÁSHA [kissing her]. You little cucumber! Of course every girl ought to behave herself properly; there's nothing I dislike as much as when girls aren't proper in their behavior.

DUNY. I've fallen dreadfully in love with you. You're so educated; you can talk about anything! [A pause.]

YÁSHA [yawning]. Yes. . . . The way I look at it is this; if a girl falls in love with anybody, then I call her immoral. [A pause.] How pleasant it is to smoke one's cigar in the open air. [Listening.] There's someone coming. It's the missis and the rest of 'em. . . . [DUNYÁSHA embraces him hastily.] Go towards the house as if you'd just been for a bathe. Go by this path or else they'll meet you and think that I've been walking out with you. I can't stand that sort of thing.

DUNY. [coughing softly]. Your cigar has given me a headache.

[Exit DUNYÁSHA. YÁSHA remains sitting by the shrine.]

Enter MADAME RANÉVSKY, GÁYEF, and LOPÁKHIN.

LOPÁK. You must make up your minds once and for all. Time waits for no man. The question is perfectly simple. Are you going to let off the land for villas or not? Answer in one way; yes or no? Only one word!

MME. R. Who's smoking horrible cigars here? [She sits down.]

GÁYEF. How handy it is now they've built that railway. [Sitting.] We've been into town for lunch and back again. . . . Red in the middle! I must just go up to the house and have a game.

MME. R. There's no hurry.

LOPÁK. Only one word—yes or no! [Entreatingly.] Come, answer the question!

GÁYEF [yawning]. Who's that?

MME. R. [looking into her purse]. I had a lot of money yesterday, but there's hardly any left now. Poor Barbara tries to save money by feeding us all on milk soup; the old people in the kitchen get nothing but peas, and yet I go squandering aimlessly. . . . [Dropping her purse and scattering gold coins; vexed.] There, I've dropped it all!

YÁSHA. Allow me, I'll pick it up. [Collecting the coins.]

MME. R. Yes, please do, Yásha! Whatever made me go into town for lunch? I hate your horrid restaurant with the organ, and the tablecloths all smelling of soap. Why do you drink so much, Leoníd? Why do you eat so much? Why do you talk so much? You talked too much at the restaurant again, and most unsuitably, about the seventies, and the decadents. And to whom? Fancy talking about decadents to the waiters!

LOPÁK. Quite true.

GÁYEF [with a gesture]. I'm incorrigible, that's plain. [Irritably to YÁSHA.] What do you keep dodging about in front of me for?

YÁSHA [laughing]. I can't hear your voice without laughing.

GÁYEF [to MADAME RANÉVSKY]. Either he or I . . .

MME. R. Go away, Yásha; run along.

YÁSHA [handing MADAME RANÉVSKY her purse]. I'll go at once. [Restraining his laughter with difficulty.] This very minute. [Exit YÁSHA.]

LOPÁK. Derigánof, the millionaire, wants to buy your property. They say he'll come to the auction himself.

MME. R. How did you hear?

LOPÁK. I was told so in town.

GÁYEF. Our aunt at Yaroslav has promised to send something; but I don't know when, or how much.

LOPÁK. How much will she send? Ten thousand pounds? Twenty thousand pounds?

MME. R. Oh, come. . . . A thousand or fifteen hundred at the most.

LOPÁK. Excuse me, but in all my life I never met anybody so frivolous as you two, so crazy and unbusiness-like! I tell you in plain Russian your property is going to be sold, and you don't seem to understand what I say.

MME. R. Well, what are we to do? Tell us what you want us to do.

LOPÁK. Don't I tell you every day? Every day I say the same thing over and over again. You must lease off the cherry orchard and the rest of the estate for villas; you must do it at once, this very moment; the auction will be on you in two twos! Try and understand. Once you make up your mind there are to be villas, you can get all the money you want, and you're saved.

MME. R. Villas and villa residents, oh, please, . . . it's so vulgar!

GÁYEF. I quite agree with you.

LOPÁK. I shall either cry, or scream, or faint. I can't stand it! You'll be the death of me. [To GÁYEF.] You're an old woman!

GÁYEF. Who's that?

LOPÁK. You're an old woman! [Going.]

MME. R. [frightened]. No, don't go. Stay here, there's a dear! Perhaps we shall think of some way.

LOPÁK. What's the good of thinking!

MME. R. Please don't go; I want you. At any rate, it's gayer when you're here. [A pause.] I keep expecting something to happen, as if the house were going to tumble down about our ears.

GÁYEF [in deep abstraction]. Off the cushion on the corner; double into the middle pocket. . . .

MME. R. We have been very, very sinful!

LOPÁK. You! What sins have you committed?

GÁYEF [eating candy]. They say I've devoured all my substance in sugar candy. [Laughing.]

MME. R. Oh, the sins that I have committed. . . . I've always squandered money at random like a mad-woman; I married a man who made nothing but debts. My husband drank himself to death on champagne; he was a fearful drinker. Then for my sins I fell in love and went off with another man; and immediately—that was my first punishment—a blow full on the head . . . here, in this very river . . . my little boy was drowned; and I went abroad, right, right away, never to come back any more, never to see this river again. . . . I shut my eyes and ran, like a mad thing, and he came after me, pitiless and cruel. I bought a villa at Mentone, because he fell ill there, and for three years I knew no rest day or night; the sick man tormented and wore down my soul. Then, last year, when my villa was sold to pay my debts, I went off to Paris, and he came and robbed me of everything, left me and took up with another woman, and I tried to poison myself. . . . It was all so stupid, so humiliating. . . . Then suddenly I longed to be back in Russia, in my own country, with my little girl. . . . [Wiping away her tears.] Lord, Lord, be merciful to me; forgive my sins!

Do not punish me any more! [Taking a telegram from her pocket.] I got this today from Paris. . . . He asks to be forgiven, begs me to go back. . . . [Tearing up the telegram.] Isn't that music that I hear? [Listening.]

GÁYEF. That's our famous Jewish band. You remember? Four fiddles, a flute, and a double bass.

MME. R. Does it still exist? We must make them come up sometime; we'll have a dance.

LOPÁK. [listening]. I don't hear anything. [Singing softly.]

"The Germans for a fee will turn

A Russ into a Frenchman."

[Laughing.] I saw a very funny piece at the theater last night; awfully funny!

MME. R. It probably wasn't a bit funny. You people oughtn't to go and see plays; you ought to try to see yourselves; to see what a dull life you lead, and how much too much you talk.

LOPÁK. Quite right. To tell the honest truth, our life's an imbecile affair. [A pause.] My papa was a peasant, an idiot; he understood nothing; he taught me nothing; all he did was to beat me, when he was drunk, with a walking-stick. As a matter of fact I'm just as big a blockhead and idiot as he was. I never did any lessons; my handwriting's abominable; I write so badly I'm ashamed before people; like a pig.

MME. R. You ought to get married.

LOPÁK. Yes, that's true.

MME. R. Why not marry Barbara? She's a nice girl.

LOPÁK. Yes.

MME. R. She's a nice straightforward creature; works all day; and what's most important, she loves you. You've been fond of her for a long time.

LOPÁK. Well, why not? I'm quite willing. She's a very nice girl. [A pause.]

GÁYEF. I've been offered a place in a bank. Six hundred pounds a year. Do you hear?

MME. R. You in a bank! Stay where you are.

Enter FIRS, carrying an overcoat.

FIRS [to GÁYEF]. Put this on, please, master; it's getting damp.

GÁYEF [putting on the coat]. What a plague you are, Firs!

FIRS. What's the use. . . . You went off and never told me. [Examining his clothes.]

MME. R. How old you've got, Firs!

FIRS. I beg your pardon?

LOPÁK. She says how old you've got!

FIRS. I've been alive a long time. When they found me a wife, your father wasn't even born yet. [Laughing.] And when the Liberation came I was already chief valet. But I wouldn't have any Liberation then; I stayed with the master. [A pause.] I remember how happy everybody was, but why they were happy they didn't know themselves.

LOPÁK. It was fine before then. Anyway they used to flog 'em.

FIRS [mishearing him]. I should think so! The peasants minded the masters, and the masters minded the peasants, but now it's all higgledy-piggledy; you can't make head or tail of it.

GÁYEF. Shut up, Firs. I must go into town again tomorrow. I've been promised an introduction to a general who'll lend money on a bill.

LOPÁK. You'll do no good. You won't even pay the interest; set your mind at ease about that.

MME. R. [to LOPÁKHIN]. He's only talking nonsense. There's no such general at all.

Enter TROPHÍMOF, ÁNYA and BARBARA.

GÁYEF. Here come the others.

ÁNYA. Here's mamma.

MME. R. [tenderly]. Come along, come along . . . my little ones. . . . [Embracing ÁNYA and BARBARA.] If only you knew how much I love you both! Sit beside me . . . there, like that. [Everyone sits.] LOPÁK. The Perpetual Student's always among the girls.

TROPH. It's no affair of yours.

LOPÁK. He's nearly fifty and still a student.

TROPH. Stop your idiotic jokes!

LOPÁK. What are you losing your temper for, silly?

TROPH. Why can't you leave me alone?

LOPÁK. [laughing]. I should like to know what your opinion is of me.

TROPH. My opinion of you, Yermolái Alexéyitch, is this. You're a rich man; you'll soon be a millionaire. Just as a beast of prey which devours everything that comes in its way is necessary for the conversion of matter, so you are necessary, too. [All laugh.]

BARB. Tell us something about the planets, Peter, instead.

MME. R. No. Let's go on with the conversation we were having yesterday.

TROPH. What about?

GÁYEF. About the proud man.

TROPH. We had a long talk yesterday, but we didn't come to any conclusion. There is something mystical in the proud man in the sense in which you use the words. You may be right from your point of view, but, if we look at it simple-mindedly, what room is there for pride? Is there any sense in it, when man is so poorly constructed from the physiological point of view, when the vast majority of us are so gross and stupid and profoundly unhappy? We must give up admiring ourselves. The only thing to do is to work.

GÁYEF. We shall die all the same.

TROPH. Who knows? And what does it mean, to die? Perhaps man has a hundred senses, and when he dies only the five senses that we know perish with him, and the other ninety-five remain alive.

MME. R. How clever you are, Peter!

LOPÁK. [ironically]. Oh, extraordinary!

TROPH. Mankind marches forward, perfecting its strength. Everything that is unattainable for us now will one day be near and clear; but we must work; we must help with all our force those who seek for truth. At present only a few men work in Russia. The vast majority of the educated people that I know seek after nothing; do nothing, and are as yet incapable of work. They call themselves the "Intelligentsia," they say "thou" and "thee" to the servants, they treat the peasants like animals, learn nothing, read nothing serious, do absolutely nothing, only talk about science, and understand little or nothing about art. They are all serious; they all have solemn faces; they only discuss important subjects; they philosophize; but meanwhile the vast majority of us, ninety-nine per cent, live like savages; at the least thing they curse and punch people's heads; they eat like beasts and sleep in dirt and bad air; there are bugs everywhere, evil smells, damp and moral degradation. . . . It's plain that all our clever conversations are only meant to distract our own attention and other people's. Show me where those crèches are, that they're always talking so much about; or those reading-rooms. They are only things people write about in novels; they don't really exist at all. Nothing exists but dirt, vulgarity, and Asiatic ways. I am afraid of solemn faces; I dislike them; I am afraid of solemn conversations. Let us rather hold our tongues.

LOPÁK. Do you know, I get up at five every morning; I work from morning till night; I am always handling my own money or other people's, and I see the sort of men there are about me. One only has to begin to do anything to see how few honest and decent people there are. Sometimes, as I lie awake in bed, I think: "O Lord, you have given us mighty forests, boundless fields and immeasurable horizons, and, we living in their midst, ought really to be giants."

MME. R. Oh, dear, you want giants! They are all very well in fairy stories; but in real life they are rather alarming.

EPHIKHÓDOF passes at the back of the scene, playing on his guitar.

MME. R. [pensively]. There goes Ephikhódof.

ÁNYA [pensively]. There goes Ephikhódof.

GÁYEF. The sun has set.

TROPH. Yes.

GÁYEF [as if declaiming, but not loud]. O Nature, wonderful Nature, you glow with eternal light; beautiful and indifferent, you whom we call our mother, uniting in yourself both life and death, you animate and you destroy. . . .

BARB. [entreatingly]. Uncle!

ÁNYA. You're at it again, uncle.

TROPH. You'd far better double the red into the middle pocket.

GÁYEF. I'll hold my tongue! I'll hold my tongue!

They all sit pensively. Silence reigns, broken only by the mumbling of old FIRS. Suddenly a distant sound is heard as if from the sky, the sound of a string breaking, dying away, melancholy.

MME. R. What's that?

LOPÁK. I don't know. It's a lifting-tub given way somewhere away in the mines. It must be a long way off.

GÁYEF. Perhaps it's some sort of bird . . . a heron, or something.

TROPH. Or an owl. . . .

MME. R. [shuddering]. There is something uncanny about it!

FIRS. The same thing happened before the great misfortune: the owl screeched and the samovar kept humming.

GÁYEF. What great misfortune?

FIRS. The Liberation. [A pause.]

MME. R. Come, everyone, let's go in; it's getting late. [To ÁNYA.] You've tears in your eyes. What is it, little one? [Embracing her.]

ÁNYA. Nothing, mamma. I'm all right.

TROPH. There's someone coming.

A Tramp appears in a torn white peaked cap and overcoat. He is slightly drunk.

TRAMP. Excuse me, but can I go through this way straight to the station?

GÁYEF. Certainly. Follow this path.

TRAMP. I am uncommonly obliged to you, sir. [Coughing.] We're having lovely weather. [Declaiming.] "Brother, my suffering brother" . . . "Come forth to the Volga. Who moans?" . . . [To BARBARA.] Mademoiselle, please spare a sixpence for a hungry fellow-countryman.

BARBARA, frightened, screams.

LOPÁK. [angrily]. There's a decency for every indecency to observe!

MME. R. Take this; here you are. [Fumbling in her purse.] I haven't any silver. . . . Never mind, take this sovereign.

TRAMP. I am uncommonly obliged to you, madam. [Exit Tramp. Laughter.]

BARB. [frightened]. I'm going! I'm going! Oh, mamma, there's nothing for the servants to eat at home, and you've gone and given this man a sovereign.

MME. R. What's to be done with your stupid old mother? I'll give you up everything I have when I get back. Yermolái Alexéyitch, lend me some more money.

LOPÁK. Very good.

MME. R. Come along, everyone; it's time to go in. We've settled all about your marriage between us, Barbara. I wish you joy.

BARB. [through her tears]. You mustn't joke about such things, mamma.

LOPÁK. Amelia, get thee to a nunnery, go!

GÁYEF. My hands are all trembling; it's ages since I had a game of billiards.

LOPÁK. Amelia, nymphlet, in thine orisons remember me.

MME. R. Come along. It's nearly supper-time.

BARB. How he frightened me! My heart is simply throbbing.

LOPÁK. Allow me to remind you, the cherry orchard is to be sold on the twenty-second of August. Bear that in mind; bear that in mind!

[Exeunt Omnes except TROPHÍMOF and ÁNYA.]

ÁNYA [laughing]. Many thanks to the Tramp for frightening Barbara; at last we are alone.

TROPH. Barbara's afraid we shall go and fall in love with each other. Day after day she never leaves us alone. With her narrow mind she cannot understand that we are above love. To avoid everything petty, everything illusory, everything that prevents one from being free and happy, that is the whole meaning and purpose of our life. Forward! We march on irresistibly towards that bright star which burns far, far before us! Forward! Don't tarry, comrades!

ÁNYA [clasping her hands]. What beautiful things you say! [A pause.] Isn't it enchanting here today!

TROPH. Yes, it's wonderful weather.

ÁNYA. What have you done to me, Peter? Why is it that I no longer love the cherry orchard as I did? I used to love it so tenderly; I thought there was no better place on earth than our garden.

TROPH. All Russia is our garden. The earth is ¹⁰ great and beautiful; it is full of wonderful places. [A pause.] Think, Ánya, your grandfather, your great-grandfather and all your ancestors were serf-owners, owners of living souls. Do not human spirits look out at you from every tree in the orchard, from every leaf and every stem? Do you not hear human voices? . . . Oh! it is terrible. Your orchard frightens me. When I walk through it in the evening or at night, the rugged bark on the trees glows with a dim light, and the cherry ²⁰ trees seem to see all that happened a hundred and two hundred years ago in painful and oppressive dreams. Well, well, we have fallen at least two hundred years behind the times. We have achieved nothing at all as yet; we have not made up our minds how we stand with the past; we only philosophize, complain of boredom, or drink vodka. It is so plain that, before we can live in the present, we must first redeem the past, and have done with it; and it is only by suffering that we can redeem ³⁰ it, only by strenuous, unremitting toil. Understand that, Ánya.

ÁNYA. The house we live in has long since ceased to be our house; and I shall go away, I give you my word.

TROPH. If you have the household keys, throw them in the well and go away. Be free, be free as the wind.

ÁNYA [enthusiastically]. How beautifully you put it!

TROPH. Believe what I say, Ánya; believe what I say. I'm not thirty yet; I am still young, still a student; but what I have been through! I am hungry as the winter; I am sick, anxious, poor as a beggar. Fate has tossed me hither and thither; I have been everywhere, everywhere. But wherever I have been, every minute, day and night, my soul has been full of mysterious anticipations. I feel the approach of happiness, Ánya; I see it coming. . . .

ÁNYA [pensively]. The moon is rising.

ΕΡΗΚΗΔΟΦ is heard still playing the same sad tune on his guitar. The moon rises. Somewhere beyond the poplar trees, BARBARA is heard calling for ÁNYA: "Ánya, where are you?"

TROPH. Yes, the moon is rising. [A pause.] There it is, there is happiness; it is coming towards us, nearer and nearer; I can hear the sound of its footsteps. . . . And if we do not see it, if we do not know it, what does it matter? Others will see it.

BARB. [without]. Ánya? Where are you?

TROPH. There's Barbara again! [Angrily.] It really is too bad!

ÁNYA. Never mind. Let us go down to the river. It's lovely there.

TROPH. Come on!

[Exeunt ÁNYA and TROPHÍMOF.]

BARB. [without]. Ánya! Ánya!

ACT III

A sitting-room separated by an arch from a big drawing-room behind. Chandelier lighted. The Jewish band mentioned in Act II is heard playing on the landing. Evening. In the drawing-room they are dancing the grand rond. SIMEÓNOF-PÍSHTCHIK is heard crying, "Promenade à une

The dancers come down into the sitting-room. The first pair consists of PÍSHTCHIK and CHARLOTTE; the second of TROPHÍMOF and MADAME RANÉVSKY; the third of ÁNYA and the Post-Office Official; the fourth of BARBARA and the Station-master, etc., etc. BARBARA is crying softly and wipes away the tears as she dances. In the last pair comes DUNYÁSHA. They cross the sitting-room.

PÍSHT. "Grand rond, balances. . . . Les cavaliers à genou et remerciez vos dames."

⁴⁰ FIRS in evening dress carries seltzer water across on a tray. PÍSHTCHIK and TROPHÍMOF come down into the sitting-room.

PÍSHT. I am a full-blooded man; I've had two strokes already; it's hard work dancing, but, as the saying goes, "If you run with the pack, bark or no, but anyway wag your tail." I'm as strong as a horse. My old father, who was fond of his joke, rest his soul, used to say, talking of our pedigree, that the ancient stock of the Simeónof-Pishtchiks ⁵⁰ was descended from that very horse that Caligula made a senator. . . . [Sitting.] But the worst of it is, I've got no money. A hungry dog believes in nothing but meat. [Snoring and waking up again at once.] I'm just the same. . . . It's nothing but money, money, with me.

TROPH. Yes, it's quite true, there is something horse-like about your build.

PÍSHT. Well, well . . . a horse is a jolly creature . . . you can sell a horse.

A sound of billiards being played in the next room.

BARBARA appears in the drawing-room beyond the arch.

TROPH. [teasing her]. Madame Lopákhin! Madame Lopákhin.

BARB. [angrily]. Moldy gentleman!

TROPH. Yes, I'm a moldy gentleman, and I'm proud of it.

BARB. [bitterly]. We've hired the band, but where's the money to pay for it? [Exit BARBARA.]

TROPH. [to PÍSHTCHIK]. If the energy which you have spent in the course of your whole life in looking for money to pay the interest on your loans ²⁰ had been diverted to some other purpose, you would have had enough of it, I dare say, to turn the world upside down.

PÍSHT. Nietzsche the philosopher, a very remarkable man, very famous, a man of gigantic intellect, says in his works that it's quite right to forge bank notes.

TROPH. What, have you read Nietzsche?

PÍSHT. Well . . . Dáshenka told me. . . . But I'm in such a hole, I'd forge 'em for twopence. I've ³⁰ got to pay thirty-one pounds the day after tomorrow. . . . I've got thirteen pounds already. [Feeling his pockets; alarmed.] My money's gone! I've lost my money! [Crying.] Where's my money got to? [Joyfully.] Here it is, inside the lining. . . . It's thrown me all in a perspiration.

Enter MADAME RANÉVSKY and CHARLOTTE.

MME. R. [humming a lezginka]. Why is Leoníd so long? What can he be doing in the town? [To ⁴⁰ DUNYÁSHA.] Dunyásha, ask the musicians if they'll have some tea.

TROPH. The sale did not come off, in all probability.

MME. R. It was a stupid day for the musicians to come; it was a stupid day to have this dance. . . . Well, well, it doesn't matter. . . . [She sits down and sings softly to herself.]

CHARL. [giving PÍSHTCHIK a pack of cards]. Here is a pack of cards. Think of any card you like.

PÍSHT. I've thought of one.

CHARL. Now shuffle the pack. That's all right. Give them here, oh, most worthy Mr. Píshtchik.

Ein, zwei, drei! Now look and you'll find it in your side pocket.

PÍSHT. [taking a card from his side pocket]. The Eight of Spades! You're perfectly right. [Astonished.] Well, I never!

CHARL. [holding the pack on the palm of her hand, to TROPHÍMOF]. Say quickly, what's the top card?

TROPH. Well, say the Queen of Spades.

¹⁰ CHARL. Right! [To PÍSHTCHIK.] Now, then, what's the top card?

PÍSHT. Ace of Hearts.

CHARL. Right! [She claps her hands; the pack of cards disappears.] What a beautiful day we've been having.

A mysterious female voice answers her as if from under the floor: "Yes, indeed, a charming day, mademoiselle."

CHARL. You are my beautiful idea.

THE VOICE. "I think you also ferry beautiful, mademoiselle."

STATIONMASTER [applauding]. Bravo, Miss Ventriquoist!

PÍSHT. [astonished]. Well, I never! Bewitching Charlotte Ivánovna, I'm head over ears in love with you.

CHARL. In love! [Shrugging her shoulders.] Are you capable of love? Guter Mensch, aber schlechter ³⁰ Musikant!

TROPH. [slapping PÍSHTCHIK on the shoulder]. You old horse!

CHARL. Now, attention, please; one more trick. [Taking a shawl from a chair.] Now here's a shawl, and a very pretty shawl; I'm going to sell this very pretty shawl. [Shaking it.] Who'll buy? who'll buy?

PÍSHT. [astonished]. Well, I never!

CHARL. Ein, zwei, drei! [She lifts the shawl quickly; behind it stands ÁNYA, who drops a curtsy, runs to her mother, kisses her, then runs up into the drawing-room amid general applause.]

MME. R. [applauding]. Bravo! bravo!

CHARL. Once more. Ein, zwei, drei! [She lifts up the shawl; behind it stands BARBARA, bowing.]

PÍSHT. [astonished]. Well, I never!

CHARL. That's all. [She throws the shawl over PÍSHTCHIK, makes a curtsy and runs up into the drawing-room.]

⁵⁰ PÍSHT. [hurrying after her]. You little rascal . . . there's a girl for you, there's a girl. . . . [Exit.]

MME. R. And still no sign of Leoníd. What he's doing in the town so long, I can't understand. It must be all over by now; the property's sold; or the auction never came off; why does he keep me in suspense so long?

BARB. [trying to soothe her]. Uncle has bought it, I am sure of that.

TROPH. [mockingly]. Of course he has.

BARB. Grannie sent him a power of attorney to buy it in her name and transfer the mortgage. She's done it for Ánya's sake. I'm perfectly sure that Heaven will help us and uncle will buy it.

MME. R. Your Yaroslav grannie sent fifteen hundred pounds to buy the property in her name—she doesn't trust us—but it wouldn't be enough even to pay the interest. [Covering her face with her hands]. My fate is being decided today, my fate . . .

TROPH. [teasing BARBARA]. Madame Lopákhin!

BARB. [angrily]. Perpetual Student! He's been sent down twice from the University.

MME. R. Why do you get angry, Barbara? He calls you Madame Lopákhin for fun. Why not? You can marry Lopákhin if you like; he's a nice, interesting man; you needn't if you don't; nobody wants to force you, my pet.

BARB. I take it very seriously, mamma, I must confess. He's a nice man and I like him.

MME. R. Then marry him. There's no good putting it off that I can see.

BARB. But, mamma, I can't propose to him myself. For two whole years everybody's been talking about him to me, everyone; but he either says nothing or makes a joke of it. I quite understand. He's making money; he's always busy; he can't be bothered with me. If I only had some money, even a little, even ten pounds, I would give everything up and go right away. I would go into a nunnery.

TROPH. [mocking]. What bliss!

BARB. [to TROPHÍMOF]. A student ought to be intelligent. [In a gentler voice, crying]. How ugly you've grown, Peter; how old you've grown! [She stops crying; to MADAME RANÉVSKY]. But I can't live without work, mamma. I must have something to do every minute of the day.

Enter YÁSHA.

YÁSHA [trying not to laugh]. Ephikhódof has broken a billiard cue.

[Exit YÁSHA.]

BARB. What's Ephikhódof doing here? Who gave him leave to play billiards? I don't understand these people.

[Exit BARBARA.]

MME. R. Don't tease her, Peter. Don't you see that she's unhappy enough already?

TROPH. I wish she wouldn't be so fussy, always meddling in other people's affairs. The whole summer she's given me and Ánya no peace; she is afraid we'll work up a romance between us. What business is it of hers? I'm sure I never gave her any ground; I'm not likely to be so commonplace. We are above love!

MME. R. Then I suppose I must be beneath love. [Deeply agitated]. Why doesn't Leoníd come? Oh, if only I knew whether the property's sold or not! It seems such an impossible disaster, that I don't know what to think. . . . I'm bewildered . . . I shall burst out screaming, I shall do something idiotic. Save me, Peter; say something to me, say something. . . .

TROPH. Whether the property is sold today or whether it's not sold, surely it's all one? It's all over with it long ago; there's no turning back; the path is overgrown. Be calm, dear Lyubóf Andréyevna. You mustn't deceive yourself any longer; for once you must look the truth straight in the face.

MME. R. What truth? You can see what's truth, and what's untruth, but I seem to have lost the power of vision; I see nothing. You settle every important question so boldly; but tell me, Peter, isn't that because you're young, because you have never solved any question of your own as yet by suffering? You look boldly ahead; isn't it only that you don't see or divine anything terrible in the future; because life is still hidden from your young eyes? You are bolder, honester, deeper than we are, but reflect, show me just a finger's breadth of consideration, take pity on me. Don't you see? I was born here, my father and mother lived here, and my grandfather; I love this house; without the cherry orchard my life has no meaning for me, and if it must be sold, then for Heaven's sake, sell me too! [Embracing TROPHÍMOF and kissing him on the forehead]. My little boy was drowned here. [Crying]. Be gentle with me, dear, kind Peter.

TROPH. You know I sympathize with all my heart.

MME. R. Yes, yes, but you ought to say it somehow differently. [Taking out her handkerchief and dropping a telegram]. I am so wretched today, you can't imagine! All this noise jars on me, my heart jumps at every sound. I tremble all over; but I can't shut myself up; I am afraid of the silence when I'm alone. Don't be hard on me, Peter; I love you like a son. I would gladly let Ánya marry you, I swear it; but you must work, Peter; you must get your degree. You do nothing; Fate tosses you about from place to place; and that's not right. It's true what I say, isn't it? And you must do something to your beard to make it grow better. [Laughing.] I can't help laughing at you.

TROPH. [picking up the telegram]. I don't wish to be an Adonis.

MME. R. It's a telegram from Paris. I get them every day. One came yesterday, another today. That savage is ill again; he's in a bad way. . . . He asks me to forgive him, he begs me to come; and I really ought to go to Paris and be with him. You look at me sternly; but what am I to do, Peter? What am I to do? He's ill, he's lonely, he's unhappy. Who is to look after him? Who is to keep him from doing stupid things? Who is to give him his medicine when it's time? After all, why should I be ashamed to say it? I love him, that's plain. I love him, I love him. . . . My love is like a stone tied round my neck; it's dragging me down to the bottom; but I love my stone. I can't live without it. [Squeezing Trophimof's hand.] Don't think ill of me, Peter; don't say anything! Don't say anything!

TROPH. [crying]. Forgive my bluntness, for Heaven's sake; but the man has simply robbed you.

MME. R. No, no, no! [Stopping her ears.] You mustn't say that!

TROPH. He's a rascal; everybody sees it but yourself; he's a petty rascal, a ne'er-do-weel . . .

MME. R. [angry but restrained]. You're twenty-six or twenty-seven, and you're still a Lower School boy!

TROPH. Who cares?

MME. R. You ought to be a man by now; at your age you ought to understand people who love. You ought to love someone yourself, you ought to be in love! [Angrily.] Yes, yes! It's not purity with you; it's simply you're a smug, a figure of fun, a freak. . . .

TROPH. [horrified]. What does she say?

MME. R. "I am above love"! You're not above love; you're simply what Firs calls a "job-lot." At your age you ought to be ashamed not to have a mistress!

TROPH. [aghast]. This is awful! What does she say? [Going quickly up into the drawing-room, clasping his head with his hands.] This is something awful! I can't stand it; I'm off . . . [Exit, but returns at once.] All is over between us!

[Exit to landing.]

MME. R. [calling after him]. Stop, Peter! Don't be ridiculous; I was only joking! Peter!

TROPHÍMOF is heard on the landing going quickly down the stairs, and suddenly falling down them with a crash. ÁNYA and BARBARA scream. A moment later the sound of laughter.

MME. R. What has happened?

ÁNYA runs in.

ÁNYA [laughing]. Peter's tumbled downstairs.

[She runs out again.]

MME. R. What a ridiculous fellow he is! [The Stationmaster stands in the middle of the drawing-room beyond the arch and recites Alexey Tolstoy's poem, "The Sinner." Everybody stops to listen, but after a few lines the sound of a waltz is heard from the landing and he breaks off. All dance. TROPHÍMOF, ÁNYA, BARBARA, and MADAME RANÉVSKY enter from the landing.]

MME. R. Come, Peter, come, you pure spirit. . . . I beg your pardon. Let's have a dance. [She dances with TROPHÍMOF. ÁNYA and BARBARA dance.]

Enter FIRS, and stands his walking-stick by the side door. Enter YÁSHA by the drawing-room; he stands looking at the dancers.

YÁSHA. Well, grandfather?

FIRS. I'm not feeling well. In the old days it was generals and barons and admirals that danced at our dances, but now we send for the Postmaster and the Stationmaster, and even they make a favor of coming. I'm sort of weak all over. The old master, their grandfather, used to give us all sealing wax, when we had anything the matter. I've taken sealing wax every day for twenty years and more. Perhaps that's why I'm still alive.

YÁSHA. I'm sick of you, grandfather. [Yawning.] I wish you'd die and have done with it.

FIRS. Ah! you . . . job-lot. [He mumbles to himself.]

TROPHÍMOF and MADAME RANÉVSKY dance beyond the arch and down into the sitting-room.

MME. R. Merci. I'll sit down. [Sitting.] I'm tired.

Enter ÁNYA.

ÁNYA [agitated]. There was somebody in the kitchen just now saying that the cherry orchard was sold today.

MME. R. Sold? Who to?

ÁNYA. He didn't say who to. He's gone. [She dances with TROPHÍMOF. Both dance up into the drawing-room.]

YÁSHA. It was some old fellow chattering; a stranger.

FIRS. And still Leoníd Andréyitch doesn't come. He's wearing his light overcoat, demi-saison; he'll catch cold as like as not. Ah, young wood, green wood!

MME. R. This is killing me. Yásha, go and find out who it was sold to.

YÁSHA. Why, he's gone long ago, the old man. [Laughs.]

MME. R. [vexed]. What are you laughing at? What are you glad about?

YÁSHA. He's a ridiculous fellow is Ephikhódof. Nothing in him. Twenty-two misfortunes!

MME. R. Firs, if the property is sold, where will you go to?

FIRS. Wherever you tell me, there I'll go.

MME. R. Why do you look like that? Are you ill? You ought to be in bed.

FIRS [ironically]. Oh, yes, I'll go to bed, and who'll hand the things round, who'll give orders? I've the whole house on my hands.

YÁSHA. Lyubóf Andréyevna! Let me ask a favor of you; be so kind; if you go to Paris again, take me with you, I beseech you. It's absolutely impossible for me to stay here. [Looking about; sotto voce.] What's the use of talking? You can see for yourself this is a barbarous country; the people have no morals; and the boredom! The food in the kitchen is something shocking, and on the top of it old Firs going about mumbling irrelevant nonsense. Take me back with you; be so kind!

Enter PÍSHTCHIK.

PÍSHT. May I have the pleasure . . . a bit of a waltz, charming lady? [MADAME RANÉVSKY takes his arm.] All the same, enchanting lady, you must let me have eighteen pounds. [Dancing.] Let me have . . . eighteen pounds.

[Exeunt dancing through the arch. 40]

YÁSHA [singing to himself].

"Oh, wilt thou understand
The turmoil of my soul?"

Beyond the arch appears a figure in gray tall hat and check trousers, jumping and waving its arms. Cries of "Bravo, Charlotte Ivánovna."

DUNY. [stopping to powder her face]. Mamselle Ánya tells me I'm to dance; there are so many gentlemen and so few ladies. But dancing makes me so giddy and makes my heart beat, Firs Nikoláyevitch; and just now the gentleman from the postoffice said something so nice to me, oh, so nice! It quite took my breath away. [The music stops.]

FIRS. What did he say to you?

DUNY. He said, "You are like a flower."

YÁSHA [yawning]. Cad! [Exit YÁSHA.]

DUNY. Like a flower! I am so ladylike and refined, I dote on compliments.

FIRS. You'll come to a bad end.

Enter EPHIKHÓDOF.

EPHIK. You are not pleased to see me, Avdótya Fyódorovna, no more than if I were some sort of insect. [Sighing.] Ah! Life! Life!

DUNY. What do you want?

EPHIK. Undoubtedly perhaps you are right. [Sighing.] But of course, if one regards it, so to speak, from the point of view, if I may allow myself the expression, and with apologies for my frankness, you have finally reduced me to a state of mind. I quite appreciate my destiny; every day some misfortune happens to me, and I have long since grown accustomed to it, and face my fortune with a smile. You have passed your work to me, and although I . . .

DUNY. Let us talk of this another time, if you please; but now leave me in peace. I am busy meditating. [Playing with her fan.]

EPHIK. Every day some misfortune befalls me, and yet if I may venture to say so, I meet them with smiles and even laughter.

Enter BARBARA from the drawing-room.

BARB. [to EPHIKHÓDOF]. Haven't you gone yet, Simeon? You seem to pay no attention to what you're told. [To DUNYÁSHA.] You get out of here, Dunyásha. [To EPHIKHÓDOF.] First you play billiards and break a cue, and then you march about the drawing-room as if you were a guest!

EPHIK. Allow me to inform you that it's not your place to call me to account.

BARB. I'm not calling you to account; I'm merely talking to you. All you can do is to walk about from one place to another, without ever doing a stroke of work; and why on earth we keep a clerk at all Heaven only knows.

EPHIK. [offended]. Whether I work, or whether I walk, or whether I eat, or whether I play billiards is a question to be decided only by my elders and people who understand.

BARB. [furious]. How dare you talk to me like that! How dare you! I don't understand things, don't I? You clear out of here this minute! Do you hear me? This minute!

EPHIK. [flinching]. I must beg you to express yourself in genteeler language.

BARB. [beside herself]. You clear out this instant second! Out you go! [Following him as he retreats towards the door.] Twenty-two misfortunes! Make yourself scarce! Get out of my sight!

[Exit EPHIKHÓDOF.]

EPHIK. [without]. I shall lodge a complaint against you.

BARB. What! You're coming back, are you? 10 [Seizing the walking-stick left at the door by FIRS.] Come on! Come on! Come on! I'll teach you! Are you coming? Are you coming? Then take that. [She slashes with the stick.]

Enter LOPÁKHIN.

LOPÁK. Many thanks; much obliged.

BARB. [still angry, but ironical]. Sorry!

LOPÁK. Don't mention it. I'm very grateful for your warm reception.

BARB. It's not worth thanking me for. [She walks away, then looks round and asks in a gentle voice:] I didn't hurt you?

LOPÁK. Oh, no, nothing to matter. I shall have a bump like a goose's egg, that's all.

Voices from the drawing-room: "Lopákhin has arrived! Yermolái Alexéyitch!"

PÍSHT. Let my eyes see him, let my ears hear him! [He and LOPÁKHIN kiss.] You smell of 30 brandy, old man. We're having a high time, too.

Enter MADAME RANÉVSKY.

MME. R. Is it you, Yermolái Alexéyitch? Why have you been so long? Where is Leoníd?

LOPÁK. Leoníd Andréyitch came back with me. He's just coming.

MME. R. [agitated]. What happened? Did the sale come off? Tell me, tell me!

LOPÁK. [embarrassed, afraid of showing his pleasure]. The sale was all over by four o'clock. We missed the train and had to wait till half-past eight. [Sighing heavily.] Ouf! I'm rather giddy. . . .

Enter GÁYEF. In one hand he carries parcels; with the other he wipes away his tears.

MME. R. What happened, Lénia? Come, Lénia? [Impatiently, crying.] Be quick, be quick, for Heaven's sake!

GÁYEF [answering her only with an up-and-down gesture of the hand; to FIRS, crying]. Here, take these. . . . Here are some anchovies and Black Sea herrings. I've had nothing to eat all day. Lord, what I've been through! [Through the open door of the billiard-room comes the click of the billiard balls and YÁSHA's voice: "Seven, eighteen!" GÁYEF's expression changes; he stops crying.] I'm frightfully tired. Come and help me change, Firs. [He goes up through the drawing-room, FIRS following.]

PÍSHT. What about the sale? Come on, tell us all about it.

MME. R. Was the cherry orchard sold?

LOPÁK. Yes.

MME. R. Who bought it?

LOPÁK. I did. [A pause. MADAME RANÉVSKY is overwhelmed at the news. She would fall to the ground but for the chair and table by her. BARBARA takes the keys from her belt, throws them on the floor in the middle of the sitting-room, and exits.] I bought it. Wait a bit; don't hurry me; my head's in a whirl; I can't speak. . . . [Laughing.] When 30 we got to the sale, Derigánof was there already. Leoníd Andréyitch had only fifteen hundred pounds, and Derigánof bid three thousand more than the mortgage right away. When I saw how things stood, I went for him and bid four thousand. He said four thousand five hundred. I said five thousand five hundred. He went up by five hundreds, you see, and I went up by thousands. . . . Well, it was soon over. I bid nine thousand more than the mortgage, and got it; and now the cherry orchard is mine! Mine! [Laughing.] Heavens alive! Just think of it! The cherry orchard is mine! Tell me that I'm drunk; tell me that I'm off my head; tell me that it's all a dream! . . . [Stamping his feet.] Don't laugh at me! If only my father and my grandfather could rise from their graves and see the whole affair, how their Yermolái, their flogged and ignorant Yermolái, who used to run about barefooted in the winter, how this same Yermolái had bought a property that hasn't its equal for beauty anywhere in the whole world! I have bought the property where my father and grandfather were slaves, where they weren't even allowed into the kitchen. I'm asleep, it's only a vision, it isn't real. . . . 'Tis the fruit of imagination, wrapped in the mists of ignorance. [Picking up the keys and smiling affectionately.] She's thrown down her keys; she wants to show that she's no longer mistress here. . . . [Jingling them together.] Well, well, what's the odds? [The musicians are heard tuning up.] Hey, musicians, play! I want to hear you. Come, everyone, and see Yermolái Lopákhin lay his ax to the cherry orchard, come and see the trees fall down! We'll fill the place with villas; our grandsons and great-grandsons shall see a new life here. . . . Strike up, music!

The band plays. MADAME RANÉVSKY sinks into a chair and weeps bitterly.

LOPÁK. [reproachfully]. Oh, why, why didn't you listen to me? You can't put the clock back now, poor dear. [Crying.] Oh, that all this were past and over! Oh, that our unhappy topsy-turvy life were changed!

PÍSHT. [taking him by the arm, sotto voce]. She's crying. Let's go into the drawing-room and leave her alone to . . . Come on. [Taking him by the arm, and going up toward the drawing-room.]

LOPÁK. What's up? Play your best, musicians! Let everything be as I want. [Ironically.] Here comes the new squire, the owner of the cherry orchard! [Knocking up by accident against a table and nearly throwing down the candelabra.] Never mind, I can pay for everything!

[Exit with PÍSHTCHIK. Nobody remains in the drawing-room or sitting-room except MADAME RANÉVSKY, who sits huddled together, weeping bitterly. The band plays softly.]

Enter ÁNYA and TROPHÍMOF quickly. ÁNYA goes to her mother and kneels before her. TROPHÍMOF stands in the entry to the drawing-room.

ÁNYA. Mamma! Are you crying, mamma? My dear, good, sweet mamma! Darling, I love you! I bless you! The cherry orchard is sold; it's gone; it's quite true, it's quite true. But don't cry, mamma, you've still got life before you, you've still got your pure and lovely soul. Come with me, darling; come away from here. We'll plant a new garden, still lovelier than this. You will see it and understand, and happiness, deep, tranquil happiness will sink down on your soul, like the sun at eventide, and you'll smile, mamma. Come, darling, come with me!

ACT IV

Same scene as Act I. There are no window curtains, no pictures. The little furniture left is stacked in a corner, as if for sale. A feeling of emptiness. By the door to the hall and at the back of the scene are piled portmanteaux, bundles, etc. The door is open and the voices of BARBARA and ÁNYA are audible.

LOPÁKHIN stands waiting. YÁSHA holds a tray with small tumblers full of champagne. EPHIKHÓDOF is tying up a box in the hall. A distant murmur of voices behind the scene; the Peasants have come to say good-by.

GÁYEF [without]. Thank you, my lads, thank you.

YÁSHA. The common people have come to say good-by. I'll tell you what I think, Yermolái Alexéyitch; they're good fellows but rather stupid.

The murmur of voices dies away.

Enter MADAME RANÉVSKY and GÁYEF from the hall. She is not crying, but she is pale, her face twitches, she cannot speak.

GÁYEF. You gave them your purse, Lyuba. That was wrong, very wrong!

MME. R. I couldn't help it, I couldn't help it! [Exeunt both.]

²⁰ LOPÁK. [calling after them through the doorway.] Please come here! Won't you come here? Just a glass to say good-by. I forgot to bring any from the town, and could only raise one bottle at the station. Come along. [A pause.] What, won't you have any? [Returning from the door.] If I'd known, I wouldn't have bought it. I shan't have any either. [YÁSHA sets the tray down carefully on a chair.] Drink it yourself, Yásha.

YÁSHA. Here's to our departure! Good luck to them that stay! [Drinking.] This isn't real champagne, you take my word for it.

LOPÁK. Sixteen shillings a bottle. [A pause.] It's devilish cold in here.

YÁSHA. The fires weren't lighted today; we're all going away. [He laughs.]

LOPÁK. What are you laughing for?

YÁSHA. Just pleasure.

LOPÁK. Here we are in October, but it's as calm and sunny as summer. Good building weather. [Looking at his watch and speaking off.] Don't forget that there's only forty-seven minutes before the train goes. You must start for the station in twenty minutes. Make haste.

Enter TROPHÍMOF in an overcoat, from out of doors.

TROPH. I think it's time we were off. The carriages are round. What the deuce has become of my goloshes? I've lost 'em. [Calling off.] Ánya, my goloshes have disappeared. I can't find them any-⁵⁰ where!

LOPÁK. I've got to go to Kharkof. I'll start in the same train with you. I'm going to spend the winter at Kharkof. I've been loafing about all this time with you people, eating my head off for want of work. I can't live without work, I don't know what to do with my hands; they dangle about as if they didn't belong to me.

TROPH. Well, we're going now, and you'll be able to get back to your beneficent labors.

LOPÁK. Have a glass.

TROPH. Not for me.

LOPÁK. Well, so you're off to Moscow?

TROPH. Yes, I'll see them into the town, and go on to Moscow tomorrow.

LOPÁK. Well, well, . . . I suppose the professors haven't started their lectures yet; they're waiting till you arrive.

TROPH. It's no affair of yours.

LOPÁK. How many years have you been up at the University?

TROPH. Try and think of some new joke; this one's getting a bit flat. [Looking for his goloshes.] Look here, I dare say we shan't meet again, so let me give you a bit of advice as a keepsake: Don't flap your hands about! Get out of the habit of flapping. Building villas, prophesying that villa residents will turn into small freeholders, all that sort of thing is flapping, too. Well, when all's said and done, I like you. You have thin, delicate, artist fingers; you have a delicate artist soul.

LOPÁK. [embracing him]. Good-by, old chap. Thank you for everything. Take some money off me for the journey if you want it.

TROPH. What for? I don't want it.

LOPÁK. But you haven't got any.

TROPH. Yes, I have. Many thanks. I got some for a translation. Here it is, in my pocket. [Anxiously.] I can't find my goloshes anywhere!

BARB. [from the next room]. Here, take your garbage away! [She throws a pair of goloshes on the stage.]

TROPH. What are you so cross about, Barbara? Humph! . . . But those aren't my goloshes!

LOPÁK. In the spring I sowed three thousand acres of poppy and I have cleared four thousand pounds net profit. When my poppies were in flower, what a picture they made! So you see, I cleared four thousand pounds; and I wanted to lend you a bit because I've got it to spare. What's the good of being stuck up? I'm a peasant. . . . As man to man . . .

TROPH. Your father was a peasant; mine was a chemist; it doesn't prove anything. [LOPÁKHIN takes out his pocketbook with paper money.] Shut up, shut up. . . . If you offered me twenty thousand pounds I would not take it. I am a free man; nothing that you value so highly, all of you, rich and poor, has the smallest power over me; it's like thistledown floating on the wind. I can do without you; I can go past you; I'm strong and proud. Mankind marches forward to the highest truth, to the highest happiness possible on earth, and I march in the foremost ranks.

LOPÁK. Will you get there?

TROPH. Yes. [A pause.] I will get there myself, or I will show others the way.

The sound of axes hewing is heard in the distance.

LOPÁK. Well, good-by, old chap; it is time to start. Here we stand swaggering to each other, and life goes by all the time without heeding us. When I work for hours without getting tired, I get easy in my mind and I seem to know why I exist. But God alone knows what most of the people in Russia were born for. . . . Well, who cares? It doesn't affect the circulation of work. They say Leoníd Andréyitch has got a place; he's going to be in a bank and get six hundred pounds a year. . . . He won't sit it out, he's too lazy.

ÁNYA [in the doorway]. Mamma says, will you stop them cutting down the orchard till she has gone?

TROPH. Really, haven't you got tact enough for that? [Exit TROPHÍMOF by the hall.]

LOPÁK. Of course, I'll stop them at once.—What fools they are! [Exit after TROPHÍMOF.]

30 ÁNYA. Has Firs been sent to the hospital?

YÁSHA. I told 'em this morning. They're sure to have sent him.

ÁNYA [to EPHIKHÓDOF, who crosses]. Simeon Panteláyitch, please find out if Firs has been sent to the hospital.

YÁSHA [offended]. I told George this morning. What's the good of asking a dozen times?

EPHIK. Our centenarian friend, in my conclusive opinion, is hardly worth tinkering; it's time he was despatched to his forefathers. I can only say I envy him. [Putting down a portmanteau on a bandbox and crushing it flat.] There you are! I knew how it would be! [Exit.]

YÁSHA [jeering]. Twenty-two misfortunes!

BARB. [without]. Has Firs been sent to the hospital?

ÁNYA. Yes.

BARB. Why didn't they take the note to the doctor?

ÁNYA. We must send it after them.

[Exit ÁNYA.]

BARB. [from the next room]. Where's Yásha? Tell him his mother is here. She wants to say good-by to him.

YÁSHA [with a gesture of impatience]. It's enough to try the patience of a saint!

DUNYÁSHA has been busying herself with the luggage. Seeing YÁSHA alone, she approaches him.

DUNY. You might just look once at me, Yásha. You are going away, you are leaving me. [Crying and throwing her arms round his neck.]

YÁSHA. What's the good of crying? [Drinking champagne.] In six days I shall be back in Paris. Tomorrow we take the express, off we go, and that's the last of us! I can hardly believe it's true. Vive la France! This place don't suit me. I can't bear it . . . it can't be helped. I have had enough barbarism; I'm fed up. [Drinking champagne.] What's the good of crying? You be a good girl, and you'll have no call to cry.

DUNY. [powdering her face and looking into a glass]. Write me a letter from Paris. I've been so fond of you, Yásha, ever so fond! I am a delicate creature, Yásha.

YÁSHA. Here's somebody coming. [He busies himself with the luggage singing under his breath.]

Enter MADAME RANÉVSKY, GÁYEF, ÁNYA, and CHARLOTTE.

GÁYEF. We'll have to be off; it's nearly time. [Looking at YÁSHA.] Who is it smells of red herring?

MME. R. We must take our seats in ten minutes. [Looking round the room.] Good-by, dear old house; good-by, grandpapa! When winter is past and spring comes again, you will be here no more; they will have pulled you down. Oh, think of all these walls have seen! [Kissing ÁNYA passionately.] My treasure, you look radiant, your eyes flash like two diamonds. Are you happy?—very happy?

ÁNYA. Very, very happy. We're beginning a new life, mamma.

GÁYEF [gaily]. She's quite right; everything's all right now. Till the cherry orchard was sold we were all agitated and miserable; but once the thing was settled finally and irrevocably, we all calmed down and got jolly again. I'm a bank clerk now; I'm a financier . . . red in the middle! And you, Lyuba, whatever you may say, you're looking ever so much better, not a doubt about it.

MME. R. Yes, my nerves are better; it's quite true. [She is helped on with her hat and coat.] I sleep well now. Take my things out, Yásha. We must be off. [To ÁNYA.] We shall soon meet again, darling. . . . I'm off to Paris; I shall live on the money your grandmother sent from Yaroslav to buy the property. God bless your grandmother! I'm afraid it won't last long.

ÁNYA. You'll come back very, very soon, won't you, mamma? I'm going to work and pass the examination at the Gymnase and get a place and help you. We'll read all sorts of books together, won't we, mamma? [Kissing her mother's hands.] We'll read in the long autumn evenings, we'll read heaps of books, and a new, wonderful world will open up before us. [Meditating.] . . . Come back, mamma!

MME. R. I'll come back, my angel. [Embracing her.]

Enter LOPÁKHIN. CHARLOTTE sings softly.

GÁYEF. Happy Charlotte, she's singing.

CHARL. [taking a bundle of rags, like a swaddled baby]. Hush-a-by, baby, on the tree-top . . . [The baby answers, "Wah, wah."] Hush, my little one, hush, my pretty one! ["Wah, wah."] You'll break your mother's heart. [She throws the bundle down on the floor again.] Don't forget to find me a new place, please. I can't do without it.

LOPÁK. We'll find you a place, Charlotte Ivánovna, don't be afraid.

GÁYEF. Everybody's deserting us. Barbara's going. Nobody seems to want us.

CHARL. There's nowhere for me to live in the town. I'm obliged to go. [Hums a tune.] What's the odds?

Enter PÍSHTCHIK.

LOPÁK. Nature's masterpiece!

PÍSHT. [panting]. Oy, oy, let me get my breath again! . . . I'm done up! . . . My noble friends! . . . Give me some water.

GÁYEF. Wants some money, I suppose. No, thank you; I'll keep out of harm's way. [Exit.]

PÍSHT. It's ages since I have been here, fairest lady. [To LOPÁKHIN.] You here? Glad to see you, you man of gigantic intellect. Take this; it's for you. [Giving LOPÁKHIN money.] Forty pounds! I still owe you eighty-four.

LOPÁK. [amazed, shrugging his shoulders]. It's like a thing in a dream! Where did you get it from?

PÍSHT. Wait a bit. . . . I'm hot. . . . A most remarkable thing! Some Englishmen came and found some sort of white clay on my land. [To MADAME RANÉVSKY.] And here's forty pounds for you, lovely, wonderful lady. [Giving her money.] The rest another time. [Drinking water.] Only just now a young man in the train was saying that some . . . some great philosopher advises us all to jump off roofs. . . . Jump, he says, and there's an end of it. [With an astonished air.] Just think of that! More water!

LOPÁK. Who were the Englishmen?

PÍSHT. I leased them the plot with the clay on it for twenty-four years. But I haven't any time now . . . I must be getting on. I must go to Znoikof's, to Kardamónof's. . . . I owe everybody money. [Drinking.] Good-by to everyone; I'll look in on Thursday.

MME. R. We're just moving into town, and to-morrow I go abroad.

PÍSHT. What! [Alarmed.] What are you going into town for? Why, what's happened to the furniture? . . . Trunks? . . . Oh, it's all right. [Crying.] It's all right. People of powerful intellect . . . those Englishmen. It's all right. Be happy . . . God be with you . . . It's all right. Everything in this world has to come to an end. [Kissing Madame Ranévsky's hand.] If ever the news reaches you that I have come to an end, give a thought to the old . . . horse, and say, "Once there lived a certain Siméonof-Píshtchik. Heaven rest his soul." . . . Remarkable weather we're having. . . . Yes. . . . [Goes out deeply moved. Returns at once and says from the doorway:] Dáshenka sent her compliments. [Exit.]

MME. R. Now we can go. I have only two things on my mind. One is poor old Firs. [Looking at her watch.] We can still stay five minutes.

ÁNYA. Firs has been sent to the hospital already, 30 mamma. Yásha sent him off this morning.

MME. R. My second anxiety is Barbara. She's used to getting up early and working, and now that she has no work to do she's like a fish out of water. She has grown thin and pale and taken to crying, poor dear. . . . [A pause.] You know very well, Yermolái Alexéyitch, I always hoped . . . to see her married to you, and as far as I can see, you're looking out for a wife. [She whispers to ÁNYA, who nods to CHARLOTTE, and both exeunt.] 40 She loves you; you like her; and I can't make out why you seem to fight shy of each other. I don't understand it.

LOPÁK. I don't understand it either, to tell you the truth. It all seems so odd. If there's still time I'll do it this moment. Let's get it over and have done with it; without you there, I feel as if I should never propose to her.

MME. R. A capital idea! After all, it doesn't take more than a minute. I'll call her at once.

LOPÁK. And here's the champagne all ready. [Looking at the glasses.] Empty; someone's drunk it. [YÁSHA coughs.] That's what they call lapping it up and no mistake!

MME. R. [animated]. Capital! We'll all go away. . . . Allez, Yásha. I'll call her. [At the door.] Barbara, leave all that and come here. Come along!

[Exeunt MADAME RANÉVSKY and YÁSHA.]

LOPÁK. [looking at his watch]. Yes.

A pause. A stifled laugh behind the door; whispering; at last enter BARBARA.

BARB. [examining the luggage]. Very odd; I can't find it anywhere. . . .

LOPÁK. What are you looking for?

BARB. I packed it myself, and can't remember. [A pause.]

LOPÁK. Where are you going today, Varvára Mikháilovna?

BARB. Me? I'm going to the Ragulins. I'm engaged to go and keep house for them, to be house-keeper or whatever it is.

LOPÁK. Oh, at Yashnevo? That's about fifty miles from here. [A pause.] Well, so life in this house is over now.

BARB. [looking at the luggage]. Wherever can it be? Perhaps I put it in the trunk. . . . Yes, life here is over now; there won't be any more . . .

LOPÁK. And I'm off to Kharkof at once . . . by the same train. A lot of business to do. I'm leaving Ephikhódof to look after this place. I've taken him on.

BARB. Have you?

LOPÁK. At this time last year snow was falling already, if you remember; but now it's fine and sunny. Still, it's cold for all that. Three degrees of frost.

BARB. Were there? I didn't look. [A pause.] Besides, the thermometer's broken. [A pause.]

A VOICE [at the outer door]. Yermolái Alexéyitch!

LOPÁK. [as if he had only been waiting to be called]. I'm just coming! [Exit LOPÁKHIN quickly.]

BARBARA sits on the floor, puts her head on a bundle and sobs softly. The door opens and MADAME RANÉVSKY comes in cautiously.

MME. R. Well? [A pause.] We must be off.

BARB. [no longer crying, wiping her eyes]. Yes, it's time, mamma. I shall get to the Ragulins all right today, so long as I don't miss the train.

MME. R. [calling off]. Put on your things, Ánya.

Enter ÁNYA, then GÁYEF and CHARLOTTE. GÁYEF wears a warm overcoat with a hood. The servants and drivers come in. EPHIKHÓDOF busies himself about the luggage.

MME. R. Now we can start on our journey.

ÁNYA [delighted]. We can start on our journey!

GÁYEF. My friends, my dear, beloved friends! Now that I am leaving this house forever, can I keep silence? Can I refrain from expressing those emotions which fill my whole being at such a moment?

ÁNYA [pleadingly]. Uncle!

BARB. Uncle, what's the good?

GÁYEF [sadly]. Double the red in the middle ¹⁰ pocket. I'll hold my tongue.

Enter TROPHÍMOF, then LOPÁKHIN.

TROPH. Come along, it's time to start.

LOPÁK. Ephikhódof, my coat.

MME. R. I must sit here another minute. It's just as if I had never noticed before what the walls and ceilings of the house were like. I look at them hungrily, with such tender love. . . .

GÁYEF. I remember, when I was six years old, ²⁰ how I sat in this window on Trinity Sunday, and watched father starting out for church.

MME. R. Has everything been cleared out?

LOPÁK. Apparently everything. [To EPHIKHÓDOF, putting on his overcoat.] See that everything's in order, Ephikhódof.

EPHIK. [in a hoarse voice]. You trust me, Yermolái Alexéyitch.

LOPÁK. What's up with your voice?

EPHIK. I was just having a drink of water. I ³⁰ swallowed something.

YÁSHA [contemptuously]. Cad!

MME. R. We're going, and not a soul will be left here.

LOPÁK. Until the spring.

BARBARA pulls an umbrella out of a bundle of rugs, as if she were brandishing it to strike. LOPÁKHIN pretends to be frightened.

BARB. Don't be so silly! I never thought of such ⁴⁰ a thing.

TROPH. Come, we'd better go and get in. It's time to start. The train will be in immediately.

BARB. There are your goloshes, Peter, by that portmanteau. [Crying.] What dirty old things they are!

TROPH. [putting on his goloshes]. Come along.

GÁYEF [much moved, afraid of crying]. The train . . . the station . . . double the red in the middle; doublette to pot the white in the cor- ⁵⁰ ner. . . .

MME. R. Come on!

LOPÁK. Is everyone here? No one left in there? [Locking the door.] There are things stacked in there; I must lock them up. Come on!

ÁNYA. Good-by, house! Good-by, old life!

TROPH. Welcome new life!

[Exit with ÁNYA. BARBARA looks round the room, and exit slowly. Exeunt YÁSHA, and CHARLOTTE with her dog.]

LOPÁK. Till the spring, then. Go on, everybody. ^{So-long!} [Exit.]

MADAME RANÉVSKY and GÁYEF remain alone. They seem to have been waiting for this, throw their arms round each other's necks and sob restrainedly and gently, afraid of being overheard.

GÁYEF [in despair]. My sister! my sister!

MME. R. Oh, my dear, sweet, lovely orchard! My life, my youth, my happiness, farewell! Farewell!

ÁNYA [calling gaily, without]. Mamma!

TROPH. [gay and excited]. Aoo!

MME. R. One last look at the walls and the windows. . . . Our dear mother used to love to walk up and down this room.

GÁYEF. My sister! my sister!

ÁNYA [without]. Mamma!

TROPH. [without]. Aoo!

MME. R. We're coming.

[Exeunt. The stage is empty. One hears all the doors being locked, and the carriages driving away. All is quiet. Amid the silence the thud of the axes on the trees echoes sad and lonely. The sound of footsteps. FIRS appears in the doorway, right. He is dressed, as always, in his long coat and white waistcoat; he wears slippers. He is ill.]

FIRS [going to the door, left, and trying the handle]. Locked. They've gone. [Sitting on the sofa.] They've forgotten me. Never mind! I'll sit here. Leonid Andréyitch is sure to put on his cloth coat instead of his fur. [He sighs anxiously.] He hadn't me to see. Young wood, green wood! [He mumbles something incomprehensible.] Life has gone by as if I'd never lived. [Lying down.] I'll lie down. There's no strength left in you; there's nothing, nothing. Ah, you . . . job-lot! [He lies motionless. A distant sound is heard, as if from the sky, the sound of a string breaking, dying away, melancholy. Silence ensues, broken only by the stroke of the ax on the trees far away in the cherry orchard.]

BOOK TWO

OUR INHERITANCE FROM

LITERATURE IN OUR OWN TONGUE:

THE WELL OF ENGLISH

INTRODUCTION TO BOOK TWO

The second half of this collection is devoted to the two important literatures which have been written in the English language since it assumed its present general form after the Norman Conquest. Already we have examined the beginnings of literature in England by the small migratory Anglo-Saxon tribes. The long history that has made their purely Germanic tongue, through a happy admixture of French and Latin elements and through more than a thousand years of stirring events, the most widely-used of all world languages has produced an extraordinarily vital literature. No one today comes into so rich an inheritance of great books as we who use the same speech as Wordsworth and Milton and Shakespeare.

Though somewhat detailed treatment of various periods is given elsewhere, let us see the chief directions in which history and literature have moved since the days of the Anglo-Saxons.

When we first meet the English people in the sixth century they have but recently arrived in the island of Britain from their older home in Northern Germany. They were of Low Germanic stock and language, closely related to the Dutch and Flemish of today. Their civilization was Germanic, and therefore in contrast with that of the Celtic peoples whom they combated in England and Scotland. Later they were to be influenced by a succession of impacts from Scandinavia. For a long time the Danes harried the English and eventually ruled England, and of course left their mark on its people.

The greatest single event in English history, however, was the Norman Conquest (1066). This brought about a change in society, in language, and in literature. On the rather grim, melancholy, provincial Anglo-Saxon civilization there was now superimposed a culture from France. Though these conquerors were originally from Scandinavia, they had already acquired the language and the cultivation of the French. Now these people were the rulers and the Anglo-Saxons the conquered. Three centuries of this relationship produced the characteristic Englishman and the English language, with its large admixture of French, as we know it today. During these centuries England began its imperial expansion by the conquests of Wales and Ireland. And it produced one great poet, Geoffrey Chaucer.

After almost destroying itself in the suicidal struggles of the fifteenth century England recovered remarkably, and by the beginning of the seventeenth century it was one of the strong powers of Europe. It had absorbed the culture of the Italian Renaissance, it had begun an ambitious program of world exploration, it was about to add Scotland to the holdings of its crown, and it had successfully resisted the Spanish Armada. All this was part of one of the most brilliant reigns in European history, a high point in national life and literature. This was the age of Elizabeth and Shakespeare.

INTRODUCTION TO BOOK TWO

In the seventeenth century the English people engaged in such a series of internal religious and political conflicts that many of the most valuable and talented citizens went away in colonies to America. In England the whole century passed before the civil wars and revolutions ended in a settlement that has remained almost unchallenged until the present day. This century of conflict produced many charming poets in its early part, some masters of sonorous prose, some satirists, and a number of ribald comedy writers. But it also gave us Bacon, Pepys, Bunyan, and Dryden, not to speak of the great voice of Puritanism, John Milton.

The eighteenth century witnessed the phenomenal growth of the British Empire, which began to spread over the entire world. Its one setback was the loss of those American colonies that have become the United States. The literature of the early eighteenth century was highly influenced by French writings of the time and gained in logic and preciseness. If there was a tendency to get away from common life, this was remedied before the middle of the century by the new interest in democracy. Enthusiasm for nature, for the Middle Ages, for strange and faraway countries, and for emotional display paved the way for the great romantic writers who were to come at the beginning of the nineteenth century. The rise of the modern novel and its large reading public also helped to democratize literature. Pope, Addison, Steele, and Defoe illustrate the early part of the century; Goldsmith, Burns, and Blake, the latter part. At the end of the eighteenth century appeared a brilliant group of portrait painters—Reynolds, Gainsborough, Lawrence, and Romney.

By 1798 the Romantic movement in literature had arrived with the work of Wordsworth and Coleridge. This phase of English literature lasted until about 1830, when the writers we know as Victorians began. In the Romantic period there had been a brief enthusiasm for the French Revolution with its doctrine of the rights of man, but this was followed by a conservative reaction. The problems of the age of Victoria were not simply democracy. The expanded Empire brought its many complications. New inventions had caused an Industrial Revolution, and new scientific discoveries had aroused new conflicts in religious thought. There was a ferment of new ideas in economics, sociology, and world relations. All this resulted in an extraordinary intellectual and literary activity. Our present age tends to look back on the Victorian era with a touch of scorn. We have yet to show that we can equal its great thinkers and writers.

In America there were two centuries of colonization before any important literature began. A great difference between English and American literature is the fact that racially the English type has been well set ever since the Renaissance, whereas America has always been a melting pot, never more so than in the colonial days. American writers have always looked to England for their models and yet have always striven to be American. Some have gone to one extreme, others to the other. But a realization of this conflict of purpose helps much in an understanding of American literature.

ANGLO-SAXON POETRY

For the long centuries of the occupation of England by the Britons and the four or five centuries of Roman rule there remains not a line of literature. It is only after the Anglo-Saxons had come over from the Continent in the fifth and sixth centuries and conquered the Britons, and had been in possession of the land for some two hundred years that they began to write. Literature hardly existed in England before the eighth century, and even then for a long time it was to be written in a language as remote from Modern English as German or Swedish.

In our discussion of the Germanic peoples we have already observed that the tribes who came to England were closely related to the peoples who now live in Holland and Flanders. They were more remotely akin to the Germans and Scandinavians, and with the latter peoples had many elements of culture in common. When these Anglo-Saxons came to England they consisted of three groups: the Angles, who settled in the east, the center, and the north; the Saxons, who occupied the south and west; and the Jutes, who confined themselves to the southeastern county of Kent.

From the continent these invaders brought their Germanic customs and legends. They were still pagan and had many of the same religious practices and beliefs as the Norse, whose myths we have already examined. From the end of the sixth century onward they became Christianized and gradually dropped many of their older practices, though not a few lived on and assumed a Christian coloring. Through much of Old English poetry Christian and heathen elements appear side by side.

We have in several of the poems some excellent pictures of the life of these people. The king's court was the focus of the tribal activity and received much attention from the poet. In the oldest of the poems, Widsith, appears a picture of the minstrel wandering from one king to another and bringing entertainment to the group of warriors who surrounded the ruler. This scene is repeated in Deor's Lament, where we see the minstrel in misfortune, and also in the best of the poems, Beowulf. The Germanic legends which we find not only in this poem but also in Waldhere and The Fight at Finnsburh give us the very spirit of the heroic age which seems to lie not very far in the past. Here, centuries before it is told elsewhere, we find the story of Sigurd and the dragon.

The best way to enter into the life of these Old English is, of course, through the Beowulf. This poem, though not written before the eighth century, represents a tradition going back to the old life on the continent. The scenery is English, but the tale is of tribes in Scandinavia; and the culture reflected is best seen in the remains of these northern peoples. The traveler today at Uppsala in Sweden can observe the huge burial mounds of the ancient kings and feel that these men must have been like Hrothgar and Hygelac.

ANGLO-SAXON POETRY

A study of Beowulf rewards us in many ways. The heroic legend is handled so vigorously that there are very few passages where the interest flags. The demonic enemies are made frightful to the reader, as they were to the hero who met them in battle. The fighting, the joy, and despair of those who waited the event, the bearing of the hero, the reception of foreign guests at court, the gracious queen sharing in their entertainment—all these live in the ringing lines of this epic.

The student will soon accustom himself to certain peculiar stylistic effects, which Beowulf shares with nearly all Old English poems. One of these is the use of "kennings." The sea is "the gannet's bath," the king is "the ring-giver." These epithets become conventional, so that we expect them rather than the plain name. Aside from these "kennings" many metaphors occur, but only a few similes.

Generally speaking, Old English poems are not written in stanza form. To this rule Deor's Lament is an exception. Here we have the scop, or minstrel, out of favor with his chief. He consoles himself by recalling tragic stories of the past—one of them a well-known Norse myth—and ending each stanza with the heartening refrain: "That has passed over, so this may depart." Old English has several other short lyrics reflecting different aspects of the life of the time. The Wanderer and The Seafarer express the English love of the sea—in spite of its cruelty. The Ruined City gives the melancholy reflection of the barbarously surrounded Anglo-Saxon poet as he views the decayed splendors of the old Roman baths.

From the Latin writings that they were fast mastering, the Old English became interested in the composing of riddles. Of these there are nearly a hundred. They are seldom hard to guess, but their interest is in their close description of objects and events of common life.

Christianity plays an ever-increasing part in Old English literature. A number of poems tell stories taken from the Bible. There are poetic retellings of Genesis, Exodus, and Daniel. In The Christ of Cynewulf we have parts of the New Testament story beautifully reworked. There are also a number of legends of the saints, such as Cynewulf's Andreas and Elene. From the book of Judith, of the Old Testament Apocrypha, one of the most pleasing of the Old English poems has been made. Though what we have is a fragment, it must be almost complete. The characterization of the heroine so that her beauty and gentleness are always remembered in spite of her bloody deed, is very skillful. She is, of course, pictured as an Anglo-Saxon heroine, in spite of the Jewish setting.

Perhaps the finest piece of devotional poetry in Old English is The Dream of the Rood. The telling of the story of the crucifixion by the cross itself gave the poet an opportunity to make the great event in Christian history a living memory. Many centuries were to pass before any greater poem was to be written in English.

Before beginning a study of Anglo-Saxon poetry, the student should realize that no matter what form of translation we may read, it was all written in the same metrical form, and one which we no longer use. It is imitated in the translations here given to the poems other than Beowulf. The lines have four accents divided into two half-lines of two accents each. Instead of rhyme, there is alliteration. That is, the beginning sounds of these accented syllables echo each other. The involved rules for these correspondences are not needed in order to get the effect. The italicized letters in the following lines from the Judith will make the plan clear.

Then a *b*and of *b*old knights *b*usily gathered,
Keen men 'at the *c*onflict; with *c*ourage they stepped forth
Bearing *b*anners, *b*rave-hearted companions,
And *f*ared to the *f*ight, *f*orth in right order.

With an ear tuned to this peculiar metrical effect, the reader should be able to find in Old English poetry many things to stimulate his imagination. That much of the phraseology, the "kennings," the metaphors, the parallel constructions, is conventional does not change the fact that the writers of these poems expressed some of the darker moods with an extraordinary sincerity and power. They could also be tender and could write appealing descriptions of paradise. They had, of course, no humor in their poems, but they showed the serious qualities of the English race in their purity. The development that would round them out into the English that we know came only with their conquest and submergence by their Norman neighbors from the south. And the same mixture would create the English language as we know it today.

BEOWULF

PROLOGUE

Of the Danish kings, they who were ancestors to Hrothgar, and of the passing of Scyld.

Lo! we have learned of the glory of the kings who ruled the Spear-Danes in the olden time, how those princes wrought mighty deeds. Oft did Scyld¹ of the Sheaf wrest the mead-benches from bands of warriors, from many a tribe. The hero bred awe in them from the time when first he was found helpless and outcast; for this he met with comfort, waxed great beneath the sky and throve in honors, until all the neighboring tribes beyond the ocean-paths were brought to serve him and pay him tribute. That was a good king!

In after-time there was born to him in his hall, a young heir whom God sent for a comfort to that people. He saw their sore distress, how in time past² they had long suffered for lack of a chief.

Therefore, the Lord of life, the King of glory, granted him honor in this world. Beowulf,³ son of Scyld, was renowned in Danish lands; his fame was spread abroad. So ought a youth to win favor by giving gifts unto his father's friends, that afterwards willing companions may attend him in his age, and the people serve him in time of war.⁴ It is by noble deeds that a man shall prosper in any land.

When at length the fated hour was come, Scyld,
the valiant, departed unto the keeping of the Lord.
Then his dear companions bore him down to the ocean-flood, even as he himself had bidden them, while as yet the friend of the Scyldings ruled them with his words and long did reign over them, dear

Beowulf, translated by Chauncey B. Tinker. Used by permission of Henry Holt and Company.
The footnotes are Professor Tinker's.

¹ That is, "Shield," the defense of his people. He had apparently been found, an outcast babe, adrift in an open boat, with a sheaf of wheat for bed. The term has here become a sort of patronymic.

² Before the coming of Scyld.

³ Not the hero of the poem; nothing else is known of him.

⁴ One of the hortatory sentences in which the Beowulf abounds. A wise young prince will not neglect to win the favor of his father's Comitatus by suitable largess.

prince of the land. There at the harbor stood a ship with curving prow, all icy, eager to be gone—meet for a prince. And in the ship's bosom, hard by the mast, they laid that famous hero, their dear lord, the giver of treasure. Many treasures were there, abundance of ornaments brought from afar. Never have I heard men tell of a ship more splendidly laden with battle-weapons and war-harness, with swords and coats of mail. Upon his breast lay many precious things which were to go far out with him into the realm of the waters. Verily no fewer of their gifts and tribal treasures did this people bestow upon him than they who at his birth sent him forth alone over the wave, babe as he was. Moreover, they set up a golden banner, high above his head, and let the sea bear him away, giving him over to the deep. Sad at heart were they, sorrowful in spirit. No man can truly say—no lord of hall, or hero under heaven—into whose hands that burden fell.

PART I

BEOWULF AND GRENDEL

I

Of Hrothgar, son of Healfdene and king of the Scyldings, and how he built a fair mead-hall, which he named Heorot. How the merriment in the hall angered Grendel, an evil monster.

Then Beowulf⁵ of the Scyldings, dear king of the nation, was long famous in the cities and among the peoples—the prince, his father, had departed from his home⁶—till high Healfdene was born to him in after-time. He, while he lived, old and fierce in war, ruled graciously over the Scyldings. To him there were born into the world four children after this order: Heorogar, leader of armies, Hrothgar, and Halga the Good; Queen Elan, I have heard, was the dear wife of Ongentheow, the brave Scylding.⁷

Then to Hrothgar was given success in battle, glory in warfare, so that his loyal kinsmen gladly obeyed him, until the young warriors were grown, a mighty band. It came into his heart to command his men to build a hall, a mead-hall greater than any that the children of men had ever heard of, and therein to give gifts of all kinds to old and young, as God had prospered him, save the people's land and the lives of men.⁸

And I heard men tell how the work of adorning the people's hall was allotted unto many a tribe, far and wide throughout this earth. After a season—quickly, as man's work prospereth—it came to pass that it was completed for him, this greatest of halls. And he fashioned for it the name of Heorot,⁹ he whose word had power far and near. He broke not his promise; but gave out rings and treasure at the feast. High and pinnacled, the hall towered aloft. Yet it awaited the surging blaze of hostile fire; nor was it long thereafter that fatal hatred was destined to arise between father-in-law and son-in-law, after the deadly strife.¹⁰

Then that mighty spirit¹¹ who dwelt in darkness bore in his wrath for a season to hear each day the merriment, loud in the hall. There was the sound of the harp, the clear song of the gleeman. He spoke, who could recount from of old the creation of men, told how the Almighty made the earth,¹² the fair-faced land, and the waters that compass it about; how, exultant in victory, He set the sun and moon as lights to lighten the dwellers in the land. He adorned all the regions of the earth with leaf and branch, and created life in every-30 thing that lives and moves.

Thus the king's men lived, blissful and happy, until a certain one, a fiend of hell, began to plot mischief. This grim foe was called Grendel, a mighty stalker of the marches, who haunted the moors, the fens, and fastnesses. The wretched being had long inhabited the abode of the monster kind, e'er since the Creator had condemned him. The Lord eternal wreaked vengeance upon the kindred of Cain, because of the murder—the slaying of Abel. He got no pleasure in the feud, but for that wicked deed the Lord banished him far from mankind. From him there woke to life all evil broods—monsters and elves and sea-beasts, and giants too, who long time strove with God. He gave them their reward.

⁵ Not the hero; cf. p. 992.

⁶ Died.

⁷ The rendering of this sentence is extremely uncertain, owing to the corruption of the MS. Nothing else is known of the people mentioned.

⁸ He respected rights of property and personal liberty.

⁹ "Hart"; probably so called from its decoration with antlers.

¹⁰ Epic prophecy; a reference to some tale of the fate of Heorot, familiar to the audience.

¹¹ Grendel.

¹² Cf. Psalms 148; Æneid I, 742 ff.

II

Grendel falls upon Heorot and slays thirty heroes. Hrothgar and his men are helpless before the monster, and the destruction is continued for twelve winters.

As soon as night was come, he set out for the high-built hall, to see how the Ring-Danes were faring after the drinking of the mead. And he found therein a band of warrior-nobles sleeping after feast. They knew naught of sorrow, that wretched lot of all mankind. The creature of destruction, fierce and greedy, wild and furious, was ready straight. He seized thirty thanes upon their bed. Then back he returned to his abode, exulting in his booty, back to his lair with his fill of slaughter.

Then at dawn, with break of day, Grendel's deeds were manifest to men, and the voice of weeping was uplifted—a great cry at morn, after their feast. The great lord, the prince exceeding good, sat joyless, when they had looked upon the track of the monster, the accursed foe; the mighty hero suffered, sorrowing for his thanes. Too great was that strife, too loathsome and lasting.

It was no longer than a single night ere he wrought more deeds of murder; he recked not of the feud and the crime—he was too fixed in them. Then, when the hatred of that thane of hell was fully known to them, truly told by tokens manifest, it was easy to find the man who sought him out a resting-place elsewhere more at large, a bed among the bowers of the hall. He kept himself thereafter further aloof and more secure, whosoever escaped the fiend.

Thus he held sway, and alone against them all fought accursedly, until that best of houses stood empty. Long was the time: for twelve winters the friend of the Scyldings suffered distress, yea, every woe, uttermost sorrow. And so it became known to the children of men—sadly told in song—that Grendel had long been fighting against Hrothgar, and for many a season had waged a bitter war and wicked feud, an unending strife. He would not stay the waste of life out of compassion toward any of the Danish race, compounding with them for tribute, and none of the wise men could look for a fair ransom from the destroyer's hands. The dread monster, like a dark shadow of death, kept pursuing warrior and youth; he trapped and ensnared them. Night after night he haunted the misty moors. Men know not whither hell's sorcerers wander in their rounds.

Thus the enemy of man, the terrible lone wanderer, oft wrought many a foul deed, much grievous affliction. In the dark of the night-tide he took up his abode in Heorot, the hall brightly adorned. Hrothgar could not approach the throne, precious in the sight of God, nor did he know His love.¹³

Mighty grief and heart-break was this for the kind lord of the Scyldings to bear. Many mighty men oft sat in council and deliberated together touching what it were best for great-hearted men to do against these sudden terrors. Sometimes they vowed sacrifices at their idol-fanes; the people prayed aloud that the Destroying Spirit¹⁴ would aid them in the torment that had fallen upon them. Such was their custom,¹⁵ such their heathen faith; the thoughts of their heart were turned on hell; they knew not the Creator, Judge of deeds; they wist not of the Lord God; verily, they knew naught of the worship of the Ruler of heaven, the King of glory.

Woe unto him who through deadly hate¹⁶ is doomed to thrust his soul into the fiery abyss, to hope for no comfort, no change in anywise. But blessed is the man who at his death may go unto the Lord and find refuge in the Father's bosom.

III

In the far country of the Geats, Beowulf hears of Grendel's deeds, and resolves to go to the help of Hrothgar. He makes him ready a great ship and sails with his men to the country of the Danes. On landing he is accosted by the shore-guard.

So the son of Healfdene¹⁷ kept ever brooding over his sorrow. The wise hero could not stay the suffering; too grievous, too long and heart-sickening, was the struggle which had come upon that people, a cruel plague, greatest of evils that walk by night.

A thane of Hygelac,¹⁸ great among the Geats, heard of these deeds of Grendel in his native land.

¹³ The subject of this sentence, not plainly indicated in the original, may perhaps be Grendel. One spot was inviolate. But no thoroughly satisfactory explanation has ever been given.

¹⁴ The devil.

¹⁵ The rest of the section is usually regarded as the interpolation of a Christian scribe.

¹⁶ The notion is not clear; hatred of the new Christianity, perhaps.

¹⁷ Hrothgar.

¹⁸ Beowulf, hero of the poem.

In his strength he was the best of men in the day of this life, noble and mighty. He bade make ready for him a goodly ship, saying that he would go over the ocean-road unto that war-king, the great prince, since he had need of men. Little did his prudent thanes blame him for that journey, though he was dear to them; they encouraged him in his high purpose, and looked for good omens. The hero had warriors, chosen from among the Geats, the keenest he could find. Fifteen in all went down ¹⁰ unto the ship. A skilled mariner pointed out the land-marks unto them.

Time wore on. The ship was upon the waves, the boat under the cliff. The ready warriors mounted the prow. The ocean-streams dashed the waves upon the beach. The men bore rich armor into the bosom of the ship, splendid war-harness. The warriors pushed off their tight-fitted craft on the willing adventure. So, driven by the wind, the bark most like unto a bird, sped foamy-necked ²⁰ across the waves, until, about the same hour the second day, the curving prow had journeyed on so far that the sailors caught sight of land, saw gleaming cliffs and lofty hills, broad ocean-headlands. Thus the sea was crossed, and the voyage ended. Then the Weder people ¹⁹ went quickly up ashore, and made fast their ship, while their mail-coats and battle-raidment clashed. And they thanked God that their sea-paths had been easy.

The guard of the Scyldings, he who had been set ³⁰ to watch the headland, saw them from the cliff, bearing over the gangway their bright shields and ready weapons. His heart was spurred with longing to know who the men were. So the thane of Hrothgar went down to the shore, riding upon his horse. He shook his spear mightily with his hands, and asked in fitting words: "What warriors are ye, in coats of mail, who come hither, sailing your great ship over the sea, the ocean-paths? I have been warden of the coast and have kept watch by ⁴⁰ the sea that no foe with force of ships might do harm in the Danish land. No shield-bearers have ever tried more openly to land here, nor did ye know at all the password, the agreement of the warriors, our kinsmen. Never have I seen a mightier hero upon earth, a mightier man in armor, than is one of you. He is no common thane decked out with weapons, unless his face, his matchless countenance, belie him. But now I must know your lineage from you, ye false spies, ere ye go further ⁵⁰ in the land of the Danes. Now ye seafarers, strangers from afar, give ear to my plain counsel: it were best to make known forthwith whence ye are come."

IV

Beowulf makes answer touching the purpose of his coming, and is guided by the coast-warden to Heorot.

The chieftain, leader of the band, answered him again and unlocked the treasure of his speech: "We are men of the Geatish kin, and Hygelac's hearth-companions. My father was well known among the peoples, a noble prince named Ecgtheow.²⁰ He lived many winters ere, full of years, he went his way from home. Him well nigh every wise man remembers, the wide world over. With friendly purpose we are come to thy lord, the son of Healfdene, guardian of the people. Give us thy gracious counsel; we have a great errand to the mighty lord of the Danes. Naught secret shall there be in that which I intend. Thou knowest if it be, as we have heard for a truth, that some foe among the Scyldings, a secret destroyer, causes on dark nights by the terror of his coming unutterable evil, shame and slaughter. Now by my great mind I may perchance give counsel to Hrothgar, how he, the wise and good, can overcome the foe; if this burden of anguish be destined ever to leave ⁴⁰ him, release come once again, and the waves of care wax cooler; or else, ever after, shall he suffer seasons of affliction, wretched misery, long as the noblest of houses stands there in its lofty place."

The warden spoke, the fearless servant, there where he sat upon his horse: "A keen shield-warrior, he who judges well, must know the difference between words and deeds. I learn that this is a band friendly to the lord of the Scyldings. Go forth, then, with your weapons and your armor. I will guide you. Likewise, I will command the thanes, my kinsmen, to guard your ship with honor against every foe, the new-tarred boat there upon the strand, until the bark with curving prow bear the dear master back over the ocean-streams to Wedermark. Unto so brave a man be it granted to endure unharmed the shock of conflict."

Then they departed along their way; the boat lay quiet, the broad-bosomed ship rested on her moorings, fast at anchor. The boar-images above their golden cheek-guards glistened; ²¹ bright were ¹⁹ Another name for the Geats.

²⁰ Nothing further is known of the events here touched upon.

²¹ Carven figures worn as charms upon the helmet.

they, and hardened in the fire—there the boar kept guard. The men hurried on in warlike mood; they hastened, marching on together, till they caught sight of the well-built hall, stately and bright with gold. It was the greatest among the dwellings of men beneath the skies; in it dwelt the king, and its light shone over many lands. Then the bold chief²² pointed out to them that radiant dwelling of brave men that they might straightway go to it. He—himself a warrior—turned his horse and spoke a word to them: “It is time for me to go. May the Almighty Father by his grace keep you safe in your adventures. I will down to the sea to keep watch against hostile bands.”

V

Beowulf and his men come to Heorot. They are met by the herald, who tells their coming to King Hrothgar.

The street was brightly set with stones;²³ this path guided the band of men. The byrnie gleamed, hard and hand-locked, the bright iron rings sang in the armor, as they came marching to the hall in battle-harness. Weary of the sea, they placed their shields, bucklers wondrous hard, against the wall of the house; they sat down upon the benches.²⁴ Their byrnies rang, harness of heroes. Their ashen spears stood together, gray-shafted weapons of the seamen. This armored band was well adorned³⁰ with weapons.

Then a proud warrior asked the heroes concerning their lineage: “Whence bring ye your plated shields, your gray war-shirts, and your visored helmets and this group of spears? I am Hrothgar’s servant and herald. Never have I seen so great a band of strangers of more courageous mood. I think that ye have sought out Hrothgar nowise as exiles, but from valor and out of the greatness of your hearts.”

And the proud lord of the Weder people, famed for his strength, answered him again; he spoke a word to him, bold under his helmet: “We are table-companions of Hygelac. Beowulf is my name. I will tell my errand to the son of Healfdene, the great king thy lord, if he will grant us to draw nigh to him who is so good.”

Wulfgar spoke (he was a chief of the Wendels, his boldness was known to many, his wisdom and might): “I will ask the friend of the Danes, king⁵⁰ of the Scyldings, giver of rings, the mighty lord, touching thy journey, as thou dost entreat, and will straightway make known to thee what answer the good king thinketh meet to give me.”

And he went quickly to where Hrothgar was sitting, old and exceeding white-haired, with his company of thanes; the valiant man went until he stood before the face of the lord of the Danes—he knew the custom of the court. Wulfgar spoke to his friendly lord: “Hither are come across the sea-waves travelers, Geatish men from a far country. Warriors call their chieftain Beowulf. They beg to have speech with thee, my lord. Refuse not to converse with them, O gracious Hrothgar. In their equipment they seem worthy of the esteem of heroes, and verily the chief who led the warriors hither is a man of valor.”

VI

Beowulf is graciously welcomed by the king, and thereupon tells how he will fight with Grendel.

Then spoke Hrothgar, defense of the Scyldings: “I knew him when he was a child; his aged father was called Ecgtheow, to whom at his home Hrethel the Geat gave his only daughter in marriage. His bold son is now come hither to a loyal friend. Moreover, seafarers, who carried thither rich gifts as good-will offerings to the Geats, have said that he, strong in battle, had in the grip of his hand the strength of thirty men. Him holy God hath sent us, as I hope, to be a gracious help to the West-Danes against the terror of Grendel. I shall proffer the hero gifts for his boldness. Make haste and bid all the band of kinsmen come in together unto us. Say to them, moreover, that they are welcome among the Danish people.”

Then Wulfgar came to the door of the hall and announced the word from within: “My victorious⁴⁰ lord, prince of the East-Danes, bids me say that he knows your noble lineage, and that ye, as men of stout courage, are welcome unto him hither over the billows of the sea. Now ye may go in unto Hrothgar in your war-array, under your helmets; but let your spears, shafts of slaughter, here await the issue of your words.”

Then the mighty one arose with many a warrior round him—it was a noble group of thanes. Some remained and guarded the armor as the chief bade them. The heroes hastened, as the guide led them under the roof of Heorot. The great-hearted man, bold under his helmet, went on until he stood within the hall. Beowulf spoke—on him gleamed his byrnie, his coat of mail linked by the smith's craft: "Hail to thee, Hrothgar! I am Hygelac's kinsman and thane. Many an exploit have I undertaken in the days of my youth. In my native land I learned of Grendel's deeds; for seafarers say that this hall, this best of houses, stands empty and useless for all men, as soon as evening light is hidden ¹⁰ under the vault of heaven. And my people, even the best and wisest men among them, urged me, King Hrothgar, to come to thee, for they knew the strength of my might. They had themselves beheld when I came from the fight, stained with the blood of my foes. There had I bound five of my enemies, destroyed a giant race, and slain by night the sea-beasts on the wave.²⁵ I endured great distress, avenged the affliction of the Weder people—they who had suffered woes. I ground the angry foe in pieces. And now I alone will decide the fight with Grendel, the giant monster. One boon I beg of thee, prince of the Bright Danes, defense of the Scyldings:—Deny me not, thou shield of warriors, friend of the people, now I am come so far, that I alone, I and my band of thanes, this my brave company, may cleanse Heorot of the evil that has come upon it. I have learned, too, that the monster in his rashness recks not of weapons. Therefore, that the heart of Hygelac my lord may be glad- ²⁰ dened because of me, I scorn to carry sword or broad shield, the yellow buckler, into the fight; but with my hands I will grapple the fiend and fight for life, foe against foe. He whom death taketh must rely upon the judgment of the Lord. I think that if he can prevail in the hall of war he will fearlessly devour the Geats even as he has often devoured the best of the Hrethmen.²⁶ Thou shalt have no need to bury my head if death take me, for he will have me, all red with gore; he will ⁴⁰ bear away the corpse to feast upon it; the lone wanderer will pitilessly eat it, staining his moor-haunts; thou needst not then take more thought for the sustenance of my body. But send thou to Hygelac, if the fight take me, the matchless mail, best of armors, that guards my breast; it is a relic of Hrethel,²⁷ and the work of Weland.²⁸ Wyrð²⁹ ever goeth her destined course."

²² The coast-guard.

²³ Notice the poet’s interest in a paved road.

²⁴ Outside the hall.

VII

Hrothgar makes answer touching the deeds of Grendel. They feast in Heorot.

Then spoke Hrothgar, defense of the Scyldings: "With kindly help, my friend Beowulf, thou hast come to fight in our defense. Thy father fought the greatest of feuds, for he slew with his hand Heatholaf among the Wylfings; wherefore the Weder people, in dread of war, could not harbor him.³⁰ From there he fled over the rolling waves to the South-Danes, the honored Scyldings; at the time when I first ruled the Danish folk, and in my youth held the wealthy city of heroes, rich in treasure, for Heorogar, Healfdene's son, was dead, my elder brother lifeless;—he was a better man than I. Afterwards I settled that feud with money; I sent olden treasures³¹ to the Wylfings across the ocean's back; and Ecgtheow swore oaths to me.³²

"Sorrowful am I in soul to tell to any man what shame and sudden mischief Grendel has wrought for me in Heorot out of his hateful thoughts. My hall-troop,³³ my warrior-band, is melted away. Wyrð hath swept them away into the horrid clutch of Grendel. God alone can easily check the deeds of that mad foe. Full oft my warriors, after the drinking of the beer, have boastfully vowed over their ale-cups to await with their dread swords the onset of Grendel in the hall. Then in the morning, when shone the day, this mead-hall, this lordly house, was all stained with blood, the benches reeking with gore—the hall was drenched in blood. So, the fewer loyal men, beloved warriors, had I then because of those whom death did snatch away. Sit now to the feast, and unseal to men as thy mind moveth thee, the thoughts of thy heart, and all thy confidence of victory."

Then in the mead-hall a bench was made ready for the Geatmen, one and all. Thither the stout-hearted men went to sit in the pride of their strength. A thane did service, who bore a chased ²⁵ Cf. the tale on p. 996.

²⁶ Danes.

²⁷ His grandfather, once king of the Geats.

²⁸ The mythical smith of English and Norse legend. Cf. Deor's Lament.

²⁹ The Germanic goddess of Fate.

³⁰ He had forfeited his tribal rights by the murder of Heatholaf. Nothing further is known of the incident.

³¹ Wergild for Heatholaf.

³² To serve him, or to keep the peace.

³³ Comitatus. For the whole subject of this important institution, see Tacitus, Germania 13-14.

ale-flagon in his hand, and poured out the bright mead. At times a bard sang, clear-voiced in Heorot. There was merriment among the heroes, no little company of Danes and Weders.

VIII AND IX

Unferth, a thane of Hrothgar, grows jealous of Beowulf and taunts him, raking up old tales of a swimming-match with Breca. Beowulf is angered and boastfully tells the truth touching that adventure, and puts Unferth to silence. Queen Wealhtheow passes the cup. Hrothgar commends Heorot to the care of Beowulf.

Unferth, the son of Ecglaf, who sat at the feet of the lord of the Scyldings, spoke, and stirred up a quarrel; the coming of Beowulf, the brave seafarer, vexed him sore, for he would not that any other man under heaven should ever win more glories in this world than he himself. "Art thou that Beowulf who didst strive with Breca on the broad sea and didst contend with him in swimming, when ye two, foolhardy, made trial of the waves and for a mad boast risked your lives in the deep water? None, friend or foe, could turn you from the sorry venture when ye two swam out upon the sea. But ye enfolded the ocean-streams with your arms, measured the sea-streets, buffeted the water with your hands, gliding over the deep. The ocean was tossing with waves, a winter's sea. Seven nights ye toiled in the power of the waters; and he overcame thee in the match, for he had the greater strength. Then at morning-tide the sea cast him up on the coast of the Heathoræmas, whence he, beloved of his people, went to his dear fatherland, the country of the Brondings, and his own fair city where he was lord of a stronghold, and of subjects and treasure. Verily the son of Beanstan made good all his boast against thee. Wherefore, though thou hast ever been valiant in the rush of battle, I look to a grim fight, yea, and a worse issue for thee, if thou darest for the space of one night abide near Grendel."

Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke: "Well! thou hast said a deal about Breca in thy drunkenness, Unferth my friend, and hast talked much of his adventure. The truth now I tell, that I had more sea strength, more battling with the waves, than any man else. We talked of this when boys, and boasted, being yet in the days of our youth, that we would venture our lives out at sea; and we performed it even so. Naked in our hands, we held our hard swords as we swam, purposing to defend us against the whales. He, nowise swifter on the flood, could not swim far from me through the waves, nor would I part from him. Thus we two were in the sea for the space of five nights,⁸⁴ till the flood, the tossing waves, coldest of weathers, and darkening night drove us apart, and a fierce north wind beat down upon us;—rough were the waves. The wrath of the sea-fish was roused; then my shirt of mail, hard and hand-wrought, was of help to me against the foes; my woven armor, gold-adorned, lay upon my breast. An evil monster dragged me to the bottom; the grim foe held me fast in its clutch; yet it was granted me to strike the creature with the point of my war-sword; the fierce struggle carried off the mighty sea-beast by my hand.⁸⁵

"Thus did the evil creatures often press me hard, but as was meet, I served them well with my war-sword; they had no joyous fill, by eating me, wicked destroyers, sitting round their feast nigh the bottom of the sea; but on the morrow, wounded by my sword, slain by the dagger, they lay up along the sea-strand so that they could nevermore hinder seafarers on their course in the deep channel.

"Light came from the east, the bright beacon of the Lord; the waves were stilled, and I could descry the sea-headlands, those wind-swept walls. Wyrd often saveth the warrior not doomed to die, if he be of good courage. Howbeit, it was granted me to slay nine sea-beasts with the sword. Never yet have I heard of a more desperate nightly struggle under the vault of heaven, nor of a man more sore beset in ocean-streams; yet I escaped with my life from the clutch of my foes, though spent with my adventure. The sea, the current of the flood, bore me on to the land of the Finns.

"Naught have I heard of like exploits on thy part, naught of the terror of thy sword. Breca never yet, nay, nor either of you, hath wrought so boldly in the play of battle with blood-stained swords—I boast not much of that—though thou wast the slayer of thine own brethren, thy next of kin; for that thou shalt be damned in hell, good though thy wit may be. I say to thee truly, thou son of Ecglaf, that Grendel, the fell monster, had never wrought against thy lord so many awful deeds, this shame in Heorot, were thy mind and heart so fierce in battle as thou thyself sayest. But he has found that he need not greatly fear the enmity, the dread attack, of thy people, the Victor-Scyldings. He takes forced tribute from you; he spares none of the Danish people, but he preys at will upon you; he kills and feasts, and looks not for resistance from the Spear-Danes. I, however, will show him ere long the strength and courage of the Geats in fight. Thereafter let him who may, go proudly to the mead-drinking when the morning-light of another day, the sun in its radiance,¹⁰ shines from the south over the children of men."

⁸⁴ Is this to be understood as a correction of Unferth's extravagance in saying seven?

⁸⁵ This fight should be compared with the encounter with Grendel's mother, pages 1004 ff.

Then rejoiced the giver of treasure, the gray-haired king, famous in battle; the prince of the Bright-Danes trusted in him for help; the shepherd of the people heard from Beowulf his firm resolve. And the laughter³⁶ of the thanes arose; loud rang the din and joyous were their words.

Wealhtheow, Hrothgar's queen, went forth, mindful of courtesies; in her gold array she greeted²⁰ the men in the hall. The noble lady first gave the cup to him who guarded the land of the East-Danes; she bade him, beloved of his people, be blithe at the beer-drinking. The victorious³⁷ king partook in gladness of the feast and the hall-cup. Then the lady of the Helmings moved about to old and young in every part of the hall, handing the costly cup, until the moment came when the diademed queen, noble of mind, bore the cup to Beowulf. She greeted the lord of the Geats, and³⁰ thanked God, discreet in her words, that the desire of her heart was brought to pass, that she might put her trust in some hero for relief from all her affliction. That warrior, fierce in strife, received the cup from Wealhtheow; and then, eager for the fight, Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke and said: "I made this vow when I put to sea and embarked with my band of men; that I would either wholly fulfill the desire of your people, or fall in struggle, fast in the grip of the fiend. I will bravely accom-⁴⁰plish noble deeds or abide mine end in this mead-hall." These words, these boastings of the Geat, were well-pleasing to the lady; the noble queen, in her array of gold, went to sit by her lord.

Then again as of old³⁸ the great word was spoken in that hall; joyous was the company—there was the sound of a mighty people—until of a sudden the son of Healfdene was minded to go to his evening rest; for he knew that the monster intended war upon the high hall, as soon as men could no more see the light of the sun, and shadowy creatures came gliding forth, wan beneath the clouds, night darkening over all.³⁹ The whole company arose. Hrothgar greeted Beowulf—hero greeted hero—and wished him well, wished him the mastery in the wine-hall, and spoke this word: "Never, since I could lift hand and shield, have I entrusted unto any man this royal hall of the Danes save now to thee. Have thou and hold this best of houses; bethink thee of thy mighty deeds, show forth thy valiant strength, be watchful against the foe. Thy desires shall not be unsatisfied, if thou escape with thy life from the great adventure."

X

They leave Beowulf and his men alone in the hall. Grendel draws nigh.

And Hrothgar, lord of the Scyldings, went out of the hall with his company of men; for the warrior-chief was minded to go unto Wealhtheow, his queen and consort. The glorious king,⁴⁰ as men have learned, had set a guardian in the hall to wait for Grendel; Beowulf did special service for the lord of the Danes, keeping watch against the coming of the monster. Verily, the chief of the Geats trusted surely in his mighty strength and in the favor of the Lord. Then he put off his iron byrnie and took the helmet from his head; his jeweled sword, choicest of weapons, he gave to his thane, bidding him take charge of his war-armor. Then, ere he mounted upon his bed, Beowulf, the great Geat, spoke a boastful word: "I deem myself no-wise lesser than Grendel in my deeds of warfare; therefore, not with the sword will I quell him and take his life, though I am fully able. He knows not the use of good weapons—how to strike at me, and hew my shield—famed though he be in evil deeds; but we two this night will forego the sword if he dare come to the fight without a weapon. Thereafter let all-knowing God, the holy Lord, adjudge the victory to whichever it be, as seemeth meet to Him."

Then the brave warrior laid him down and the pillow received the face of the hero, and round about him many a bold seaman sank down upon his bed. None of them thought ever again to reach the home he loved, his kinsfolk, or the town where ³⁶ Perhaps at the discomfiture of Unferth.

³⁷ The epithet, as often, is purely formal.

³⁸ Before the coming of Grendel; or perhaps, before Wealhtheow's entry.

³⁹ Cf. Macbeth 3. 2, l. 50.

⁴⁰ Perhaps meaning God.

he was bred; for they had heard that a bloody death had already destroyed far too many of the Danish men in that wine-hall. But the Lord wove victory for them, granting unto the Weder people comfort and help, inasmuch as they were all to overcome their foe by one man's might and by his single strength. And thus the truth is manifest that Almighty God hath ruled mankind throughout all time.

In the gloom of the night came stalking that ranger of the dark. The watchmen ⁴¹ slept, they who had been set to guard the horn-gabled hall—all slept, save one—for it was well known to men that the ruthless destroyer could not drag them beneath the shades when the Creator willed it not. But Beowulf, wrathfully watching for the foe, awaited in anger the issue of the fight.

XI

Grendel comes into Heorot and devours one of the men. Beowulf grapples the monster.

Then from the moorland, beneath the misty hillsides, came Grendel drawing near; and God's wrath was on him. The deadly foe was thinking to ensnare some man in that high hall. On he strode beneath the clouds, until he could see full well the wine-hall, the gilded house of men, all bright with gold. This was not the first time that he had sought out Hrothgar's home, but never in all the days of his life, before or since, did he meet among hall-thanes, warriors more sturdy. So the creature, of all joys bereft, came roaming on unto the hall. The door, though fast in fire-hardened bands, sprang open straightway, soon as he touched it with his hands. Thus, plotting evil, he burst open the entrance to the hall, for he was swollen with rage. Quickly thereafter the fiend was treading the bright-paved floor, moving on in wrathful mood. Out of his eyes started a loathsome light, most like to flame. He saw in the hall many warriors, a kindred band together, a group of clansmen all asleep. And he laughed in his heart. The cursed monster thought to take the life from each body, ere the day broke; for the hope of a plentiful feast was come to him. But he was not fated to devour any more of the race of men after that night.

The mighty kinsman of Hygelac was watching to see how the deadly foe would go about his swift attacks. The monster thought not of tarrying, but on a sudden, for his first move, he seized upon a sleeping thane, rent him in pieces unawares, bit into the flesh, drank the blood from the veins, and swallowed him in huge pieces. In a moment he had devoured the whole corpse, even the hands and feet. He stepped on nearer and seized with his hands the great-hearted warrior on his bed. The fiend clutched at him with his claw, but Beowulf quickly grasped it with deadly purpose, fastening upon the arm. Straightway that master of evils discovered that never in this world in all the corners of the earth, had he met in any man a mightier hand-grip. He was troubled in heart and soul; but he could get away never the faster for that. He was eager to be off; he wished to flee away into the darkness, to rejoin the horde of devils. He was not faring there as in former days. Then the good kinsman of Hygelac bethought him of his speech at even; he stood upright and grappled him fast; his fingers burst and bled. ⁴² The giant was making off. The hero followed close. The monster was minded to fling loose, if he could, and flee away thence to the fen-hollows; but he knew that the strength of his arm was in the grasp of an angry foe. A dire journey had the destroyer made to Heorot.

Loud rang the lordly hall. All the Danes dwelling in that city, nobles and heroes every one, were struck with terror. Furious were both the mad-dened wrestlers. The house re-echoed. It was a great wonder that the wine-hall withstood these battling foemen, that the fair building fell not to the ground; save that all within and without it was so firmly strengthened by iron bands, cunningly forged. There, as I have heard men tell, many a mead-bench, gold-adorned, started from its base, where the fierce ones were struggling. The wise councilors of the Scyldings had thought that none among men would ever be able to wreck by force this goodly house, bedecked with bones, nor to destroy it by craft, unless perchance the fire's embrace should swallow it in smoke. ⁴³

A noise arose, oft renewed; a ghastly terror fell on all the North-Danes who heard the shrieking in the house, heard God's enemy yelling out his horrid song, chant of the vanquished—Hell's captive howling o'er his wound. He held him fast who in his strength was the mightiest of men in the day of this life.

⁴¹ The Geats.

⁴² Grendel's fingers burst as a result of Beowulf's grip.

⁴³ A hint of the subsequent fate of Heorot; see p. 991.

XII

Beowulf has the victory, and tears out Grendel's arm. The monster escapes to the fen with his death-wound.

The defense of heroes would by no means let the murderer escape alive—he counted his life of no avail to any of the people. There many a warrior of Beowulf's drew his old sword; they thought to protect the life of their lord, the great prince, if so they might. They knew not, those brave warriors, when they plunged into the fight, thinking to hack the monster on every side and take his life, that not the choicest blade on earth nor battle-ax could graze that foul destroyer; for he had bound by a spell weapons of war and every edged sword. Yet he was doomed to die a wretched death in the day of this life; the outcast spirit must needs journey far away into the power of fiends. There found that foe to God, who oft ere now in mirthful mood had wrought mischief for the children of men, that his wound-proof body availed him not, for the valiant kinsman of Hygelac had got him by the hand. Hateful to each was the life of the other. The evil beast endured sore pain of body. Upon his shoulder a gaping wound appeared; the sinews sprang asunder, the flesh was rent apart. The glory of the fight was given to Beowulf. Grendel, sick to death, was doomed to flee thence and find out his joyless abode beneath the fen-banks. Full well he knew that the end of his life was come, the appointed number of his days. By that deadly fight the desire of all the Danes was satisfied.

Thus he who came from far, wise and valiant in spirit, had cleansed Hrothgar's hall and freed it from danger. He rejoiced in the night's work, in his heroic deeds. The lord of the Geats had made good his boast to the East-Danes, for he had saved them out of all their affliction, the harrowing torment, no little sorrow, which they had suffered and were doomed to bear in sad necessity. A token of the fight was seen, when, beneath the spacious roof, the warrior flung down the hand and arm and shoulder—the whole limb and claw of Grendel.

XIII

The Danes rejoice. They go and look upon the mere whither Grendel escaped, and return to Heorot, racing their horses and listening to the tale of the bard.

In the morning, as I have heard, many warriors were about the gift-hall; chieftains came from far and near to gaze upon the wonder, the traces of the foe. Grievous seemed his death to none of those who beheld the tracks of the inglorious one; how he, weary at heart, vanquished in strife, doomed and hunted, took his last steps to the Nicors' mere. There the waters were seething with blood, the awful surge of the waves welled up, all mingled with blood and hot gore. Death-doomed he discolored all the flood, when, in his joyless lair, he laid down his life, his heathen soul; there Hell got him.

Thence returned the thanes and many a youth from their glad journey, proudly riding from the mere upon their horses, heroes upon white steeds. There was proclaimed the greatness of Beowulf. Full oft 'twas said that south or north, between the seas, o'er all the broad earth beneath the arch of heaven, none among shield-bearing warriors was of higher worth, none more worthy of kingdom. They did not in the least say aught against their own kind lord, gracious Hrothgar, for he was a good king.

At times the warriors made their yellow steeds gallop or run a race, where the ways seemed good to them and known for their excellence.

At times one of the king's thanes, whose memory was full of songs,⁴⁵ laden with vaunting rimes, who knew old tales without number, invented a new story, a truthful tale; the man deftly narrated the adventure of Beowulf, and cunningly composed other skillful lays with interwoven words.

THE LAY OF SIGEMUND

The bard sings how Sigemund, the Volsung, slew a mighty dragon; and how Heremod, a Danish king, was a sore burden to his people, much unlike Beowulf.

He told everything that he had heard of the mighty exploits of Sigemund, much that had ne'er been told:—the battle-toil of the Wælsing,⁴⁶ distant journeyings, feuds and crimes, of which the children of men knew nothing, save Fitela,⁴⁷ the nephew who ⁴⁴ Sea-beasts'.

⁴⁵ Songs boasting of personal prowess, or of the might of national heroes.

⁴⁶ Volsung. See the Norse saga. This is one of the earliest extant references to the Volsung myth, centuries older than the Norse saga and the German poem.

⁴⁷ Sinfiotli, his sister's son.

was with his uncle when he would repeat aught touching these things; for they were comrades at need in every strife. They had slain with their swords many of the monster broods. Sigemund, after his death, attained no little glory, since, brave in battle, he had slain the dragon who kept guard over the treasure. Alone beneath the gray rock, the prince ventured the daring deed, nor was Fitela with him. Nevertheless, it was granted unto him that his sword, the noble iron, pierced the wondrous serpent and stood fast in the wall. The dragon died the death. 10 The dread warrior had won by his valor the enjoyment of the treasure, all at his own will. The son of Wæls⁴⁸ loaded his sea-boat and bore the glittering treasures into the bosom of his ship. Heat consumed the serpent. In his daring exploits he was by far the most famed of adventurers among the nations, this defense of warriors; wherefore he throve in days gone by.

After Heremod's⁴⁹ war-strength waned, his power and might, he was betrayed into the hands of his enemies, the Eotens,⁵⁰ and sent speedily away. Over- 20 whelming sorrows disabled him too long; he became a lifelong care to his people, to all his nobles. Oft had the hero's life been bewailed in former days by many a prudent man, who had trusted his lord for protection from harm—trusted that the prince would prosper, attain his father's lordship, guard the nation, the treasure and sheltering city, the realm of heroes, fatherland of the Scyldings. Beowulf, the kinsman of Hygelac, was more gracious to all the children of men and to his friends. Sorrow befell Heremod.

At times, in races with their steeds, they measured the yellow roads. And the morning-light was thrust forth and urged onwards.⁵¹ Many a stout-hearted warrior went to the high hall to see the great wonder. Likewise, the king himself, guardian of the treasure, famed for his virtues, walked forth in glory from the bower with a great company; and his queen with him, amidst a bevy of maidens, passed up the path to the mead-hall.

XIV

Hrothgar and his men look upon Grendel's arm in Heorot. The king and Beowulf speak touching the fight.

Hrothgar spoke:—he went to the hall, stood in the entrance, gazed on the high roof bright with gold, and on the arm of Grendel: "Now for this sight be thanks to God straightway! Much evil, many hardships, have I endured at the hands of Grendel; but God, the King of glory, can evermore work wonder upon wonder. It was but now that I thought never to be delivered from any of my woe, while this best of houses stood drenched with blood and gore. The affliction scattered all my wise men, who thought that they could nevermore defend this stronghold of the people from hated foes, from demons and devils. Now, through the might of the Lord, a man hath wrought a deed which all of us erewhile with our craft were unable to compass. Lo! the woman, whoe'er she be, that gave birth to this son among the tribes of men may say, if she be yet alive, that our God of old hath been gracious unto her in child-bearing.

"Now, O Beowulf, thou best of men, I will love thee like a son within my heart. Hold fast henceforth this our new-made kinship. Thou shalt not lack any good thing of earth within my power. Full oft for lesser deeds have I given rich gifts of honor unto a meaner warrior, a weaker in the fight. By thy deeds thou hast attained that thy glory liveth for ever and ever. May the Almighty ever reward thee as now He hath."

Then spoke Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow: "Fighting with great good-will, we wrought that mighty 30 deed; boldly we met the power of the unknown. But I would indeed that thou couldst have seen the creature himself in full gear, the fiend wearied nigh to fainting. Grappling him there, I thought to fix him fast on his death-bed so that he should lie struggling for life in my grip, unless his body vanished utterly away.⁵² But I could not stop his going, for the Lord willed it not. I did not cleave well unto the mortal foe, for the fiend was too powerful upon his feet. Yet, in saving his life, he 40 left his claw behind, his arm and shoulder, to mark his track. But the wretched creature has not bought him any solace thus, none the longer will the evil-doer live, weighed down by sin. But pain has got him close in its deadly clasp, within its baleful bonds. There, stained with sin, shall he abide the Great Doom—how the glorious Judge shall assign him his portion."

⁴⁸ Volsung, Sigemund.

⁴⁹ This incident, so awkwardly introduced, is probably intended to contrast the craven with the hero. Sigemund is compared, Heremod contrasted, with Beowulf. Heremod was an old king of the Danes—Scyld's predecessor possibly.

⁵⁰ Finns.

⁵¹ The metaphorical expression may be derived from the launching of a boat. Day advanced.

⁵² By virtue of his magic power.

Then, in his boastful speech, that son of Ecglaf⁵³ kept more silent touching warlike deeds, after all the nobles had beheld the arm before them, there upon the lofty roof, the fiendish claw, won by the hero's might. Most like to steel were all the nails, the hand-spurs, horrible spikes of the heathen foe. All declared that no warrior's sword, albeit keen, could have grazed the monster so as to strike off that bloody talon.

XV

They adorn Heorot for the feast. Hrothgar bestows gifts upon Beowulf.

Straightway it was bidden that Heorot be adorned within by the hand of man. Many men there were and women to prepare that hall of feasting and of guests. Along the walls shone hangings wrought with gold, many wondrous sights for all who gaze upon such things. That bright house had been greatly shattered, though all within was fast with iron bands. The hinges had been torn away. The roof alone was saved unhurt, when the monster, stained with wicked deeds, despairing of life, turned him to flight.

Death is not easily escaped, try it who will; but every living soul among the children of men dwelling upon the earth goeth of necessity unto his destined place, where the body, fast in its narrow bed, sleepeth after feast.⁵⁴

Now the time was come for the son of Healfdene to go into the hall; the king himself was minded to partake of the feast. Never have I heard that that people in greater company gathered more bravely about their king. Then those happy men sat them down upon the benches; they rejoiced in the feasting. Their great-hearted kinsmen, Hrothgar and Hrothulf,⁵⁵ with fair courtesy quaffed many a bowl of mead in the high hall. Heorot was filled with friends. In that day the Scylding people⁴⁰ had done no deeds of guile.

Then the son of Healfdene gave to Beowulf, in reward of victory, a golden ensign, a brodered banner, a helmet, and a byrnie; many men saw a mighty treasure-sword borne to the hero. Beowulf quaffed the cup in the hall. He needed not to be ashamed before warriors of those sumptuous gifts. Few have I heard of at the ale-bench who gave to others in more friendly wise four treasures, gold-adorned. About the crown of the helmet there was a wreath all wrought with wires, which protected the head, so that the tempered sword could not greatly injure it, when the shielded warrior went out against his foe.

¹⁰ Moreover, the defense of heroes bade that eight horses with golden bridles be led into the hall⁵⁶ under the barriers. Upon one of them there was a saddle, cunningly wrought, adorned with jewels;—it had been the battle-seat of the high king, when the son of Healfdene was minded to take part in the play of swords;⁵⁷ the might of the far-famed hero failed never at the front, while the slain were falling. And then the prince of the Ingwines⁵⁸ gave over to Beowulf the possession of these, both²⁰ the horses and the armor; bade him enjoy them well. Thus, like a true man, did the great lord, the guardian of treasure and heroes, repay the storm of the fight with horses and treasure, so that none can dispraise them, none who wills to speak the truth aright.

XVI AND XVII

Hrothgar bestows gifts upon Beowulf's men. The bard sings the lay of King Finn.

³⁰ And moreover, the lord of heroes, at the mead-bench, bestowed a treasure, some heirloom, upon each of those who crossed the ocean-paths with Beowulf. And he bade that gold he paid for the man whom Grendel had wickedly slain,⁵⁹ as he would have slain more of them, had not all-knowing God and the hero's courage turned that fate from them; for the Lord ruled over all the children of men, even as now He doth; wherefore is understanding best in every place, and prudence of heart. He who long dwelleth in this world endureth much of good and evil in these days of strife.

There were singing and music blended together concerning Healfdene's battle-chieftain:⁶⁰ the harp

⁵³ Unferth.

⁵⁴ This impressive, but irrelevant, passage is probably a bit of interpolation.

⁵⁵ Hrothgar's nephew, the Hrolf Kraki of Norse literature. His later quarrel with his uncle is prophetically hinted in the following sentences.

⁵⁶ It is a common occurrence in old ballads and romances to ride a horse directly into the hall.

Cf. Malory's Morte d'Arthur, 2. 3, et passim.

⁵⁷ War.

⁵⁸ Danes.

⁵⁹ So that Beowulf should not lose the weregild for his murdered man.

⁶⁰ Hnæf in the following tale.

was struck, a lay oft sung, when Hrothgar's bard was to awaken joy in hall along the mead-bench.

THE LAY OF KING FINN

How Hnæf of the Scyldings fell in an ancient feud with Finn, king of the Eotens, he who had carried off his sister, Hildeburh; and how Hengest, brother to Hnæf and Hildeburh, made a treaty with Finn, and dwelt with the Eotens for a season, until they feared him and slew him. And of the last great fight when Finn was slain; and how Queen Hildeburh was restored to her people.

Hnæf of the Scyldings, the hero of the Half-Danes, was doomed to fall upon the Frisian slaughter-field at the hands of the sons of Finn, what time the peril got hold on them. Nor in truth did Hildeburh need to praise the good faith of the Eotens; she, all blameless, was bereft of her dear sons and brothers in the battle; wounded by the spear they fell according to their fate—a sorrowful woman she. Not without cause did the daughter of Hoc⁶¹ bewail Fate's decree when morn was come—when she beheld her murdered kinsmen beneath the sky, there where she had erstwhile had the greatest of earth's joys. War swept away all the thanes of Finn, save but a few, so that he could nowise give battle to Hengest upon the field, nor save by fighting the wretched remnant from the prince's thane. But the Frisians offered Hengest terms: that they would fully prepare for him another great building, a hall and high throne, so that he might have equal power with the sons of the Eotens, and that Finn, son of Folwald, would daily, at the giving of the gifts, do honor to the Danes, would do honor to the troop of Hengest with rings, with even as much costly treasure of plated gold, as that where-with he would rejoice the Frisians in the mead-hall. Then on both sides they made a fast-binding treaty of peace; Finn swore an oath unto Hengest, absolutely and unreservedly, that he would honorably rule the sad remnant according to the decree of his councilors, so that no man there by word or deed should break the pact, or ever do it violence by guileful craft, although they, lordless men, followed the slayer of their own prince, as they must do perforce; and if any of the Frisians should with taunting words recall that feud, then the edge of the sword was to avenge it. The oath was sworn and massive gold was brought up from the hoard.

The best of the warriors⁶² among the Battle-Scyldings was ready at the funeral pile; upon the pyre were clearly to be seen the blood-stained sark, the swine of gold, the boar-helm iron-hard, and many a hero who had perished of his wounds—these had fallen in the struggle. And Hildeburh bade them commit her own son to the flames at Hnæf's pyre, burn the body, laying it on the pile. The hapless woman wept upon his shoulder, lamented him in song. Uprose the warrior in the flame; the greatest of funeral fires rolled upward to the clouds; it roared before the mound. The heads were melted, the gashes were burst open, the blood gushed forth from the wounds upon the body. Flame, that greediest of spirits, swallowed up all of both peoples whom war had snatched away. Gone was their glory.

Bereft of their friends, the warriors departed to their dwellings, to see Friesland, their homes, and high city. And Hengest dwelt with Finn all that blood-stained winter, wholly without strife; yet he was mindful of his native land, although he could not drive over the mere his ring-stemmed ship. The sea surged in the storm, fought with the wind. Winter locked the waves in its icy bond, till that a new year came unto the dwellings of earth, as still it doth, and the days gloriously bright which ever observe the season. Thus was the winter spent, and fair was the bosom of earth.

Then the exile⁶³ was minded to be gone; the guest departed from the courts. But he was thinking more of vengeance than of the sea-voyage, if haply he might bring to pass a deadly conflict and so commemorate the sons of the Eotens. Therefore he escaped not the lot of mortals when the son of Hunlaf thrust into his breast the flashing sword, best of blades; wherefore its edges were well known among the Eotens. Likewise, thereafter, dire death by the sword befell the brave-hearted Finn in his own home, when Guthlaf and Oslaf, after the sea-journey, mournfully lamented the fierce struggle—blamed him for their share of sorrow. He could not retain the wavering spirit within his breast.

And the hall was covered with the bodies of foes, and King Finn, likewise, was slain in the midst of his guardsmen, and the queen was taken. The Scylding warriors bore to their ships all the possessions of the king of the land—whatever they could find in Finn's home of jewels and curious gems. They bore the noble lady over the sea-paths to the land of the Danes, led her to her people.

The lay was sung, the gleeman's tale was ended. Mirth rose high again, clear sounded the noise of revelry. The cup-bearers poured out wine from wondrous vessels. And Wealhtheow came forth with a crown of gold upon her head, and went to where were seated uncle and nephew, those two good friends;—as yet there was peace between them, each to the other true.⁶⁴ There also sat Unferth, the spokesman, at the feet of the lord of the Scyldings; every man of them trusted his spirit,

⁶¹ Hildeburh.
⁶² Hnæf.

⁶³ Hengest.

⁶⁴ See p. 991 and note.

yea, and that he had good courage, although he dealt not uprightly with his kinsmen in the play of swords.⁶⁵

And the lady of the Scyldings spoke: "Take this cup, my sovereign lord, giver of treasure. Rejoice, thou prince of the people, and speak kind words unto the Geats, as is well-fitting. Be gracious toward the Geats and mindful of gifts; for now thou hast peace both far and near. It has been told me that thou wouldst gladly have this warrior for a son.⁶⁶ Heorot, the bright gift-hall, is cleansed. Give, then, while thou mayst, many rewards, and bequeath people and realm to thy kinsmen, when thou must go hence unto the appointed doom. I know that my gracious Hrothulf will honorably rule the youth,⁶⁶ if thou, lord of the Scyldings, leave the world ere he. I think that he will requite our offspring well, if he bethink him of our benefits toward him in time past, when he was a child, of all that we did for his pleasure and ²⁰ honor."

Then she turned to where her sons were sitting, Hrethric and Hrothmund, and the offspring of heroes, all the youth together; and there by the two brothers sat that brave man, Beowulf the Geat.

XVIII

The queen giveth gifts to Beowulf, and a fair collar which King Hygelac wore in aftertime. They ³⁰ feast, and the heroes rest in Heorot.

A cup was borne to him, and friendly greeting offered, and twisted gold graciously presented him: two armlets, rings, and armor, and the goodliest of collars I have ever heard of upon earth. Never heard I of a fairer among the treasured jewels of heroes beneath the sky, ne'er since Hama bore away to the bright city the collar of the Brisings,⁶⁷ the fair gem and its casket; he fled the cunning ⁴⁰ snares of Eormanric, and chose everlasting gain.⁶⁸ This ring had Hygelac, the Geat, grandson of Swerting, on his last raid,⁶⁹ when, beneath his banner, he defended his treasure and guarded the plunder of battle. Wyrð took him away, when he, foolhardy, suffered woe in feud with the Frisians; for that mighty chieftain bore the jewel with its precious stones over the arching sea; and he fell beneath his shield. Then the body of the king came into the possession of the Franks, his breast-mail, and the jewel, too; meaner warriors stripped the body after the slaughter of battle; the corpses of the Geats were strewed upon the ¹⁰ field.

The hall resounded. Wealhtheow spoke before the host and said: "Receive with joy this collar, dear Beowulf, beloved youth, and use this armor—treasures of our people—and prosper well; show thyself strong; and be kind in thy counsel to these youths. I will be mindful of thy reward. Thou hast brought it to pass that men shall give thee honor evermore, in all the earth, far as the sea encompasseth its windswept walls. Be, while thou livest, a prosperous prince; much treasure truly I wish thee. Be thou friendly to my son, guarding his happy state.⁷⁰ Here is each hero true to the other, gentle of spirit, and loyal to his lord; the thanes are obedient, the people ready at call. Ye warriors, cheered with wine, do as I bid ye."

Then she went to her seat. There was the choicest of feasts; the men drank wine. They knew not Wyrð, cruel destiny, as it had gone forth of old unto many a hero.

When even was come, and Hrothgar, the ruler, had departed to his lodge unto his evening rest, countless heroes guarded the house as they had oft of yore. They made bare the bench and spread upon it beds and pillows. Doomed and nigh unto death, one of the revelers laid him down to rest in the hall. At their heads they placed their battle-shields, bright bucklers. There upon the bench above each hero were clearly to be seen the towering helm, the ringèd coat of mail, the ⁴⁰ mighty spear. It was their wont to be ever ready for battle, whether at home or in the field, ready for either, even at the moment when their chief had need of them. That was a good people.

⁶⁵ See Beowulf's charge against him, p. 996.

⁶⁶ Act as regent.

⁶⁷ Beowulf's collar is compared to the famous Brising necklace, which, according to the Elder Edda, is the property of the goddess Freya; apparently it later came into the possession of Hermanric the Ostrogoth (Eormanric), from whom it was stolen by one Hama. The later history of Beowulf's jewel follows, somewhat after the manner of the Homeric account of Agamemnon's scepter.

⁶⁸ Probably entered a monastery.

⁶⁹ One of the few authentic historical allusions in the poem. The account of the raid of "Chochilaicus" (Hygelac) may be found in the Historia Francorum of Gregory of Tours. The event occurred about ⁵¹² A.D.

⁷⁰ Probably in case of his father's death, which she referred to a moment since.

PART II

BEOWULF AND GRENDEL'S MOTHER

XIX

Grendel's mother cometh to avenge her son. She seizes Æschere in Heorot.

Then they sank to sleep. But one paid dearly for his evening rest, as had often happened when Grendel haunted that gold-hall and wrought evil till his end came, death for his sins. It now became evident to men that, though the foe was dead, there yet lived for a long time after the fierce combat, an avenger—Grendel's mother. The witch, woman-monster, brooded over her woes, she who was doomed to dwell among the terrors of the waters, in the cold streams, from the time when Cain slew with the sword his only brother, his own father's son; then he departed, banished, marked with murder, fleeing from the joys of men and dwelt in the wilderness. From him there woke to life many Fate-sent demons. One of these was Grendel,⁷¹ a fierce wolf, full of hatred. But he had found at Heorot a man on the watch, waiting to give him battle. Then the monster grappled with him, but Beowulf bethought him of his mighty strength, the gift of God, and in Him as the Almighty he trusted for favor, for help and succor; in this trust he overcame the fiend, laid low that spirit of hell. Then Grendel, enemy to mankind, went forth joyless to behold the abode of death. But his mother, still wroth and ravenous, determined to go a sad journey to avenge the death of her son; and she came to Heorot, where the Ring-Danes lay asleep about the hall. Straightway terror fell upon the heroes once again when Grendel's mother burst in upon them. But the fear was less than in the time of Grendel, even as the strength of maids, or a woman's rage in war, is less than an armed man's, what time the hilted sword, hammer-forged, stained with blood, cleaves with keen blade the boar on foeman's helmet. There above the benches in the hall the hard-edged sword was drawn, and many a shield upreared, fast in the hand; none thought of helm or broad corslet when the terror got hold of him. She was in haste, for she was discovered; she wished to get thence with her life. Of a sudden she clutched one of the heroes, and was off to the fen. The mighty warrior, the famed hero whom the hag murdered in his sleep, was the dearest to Hrothgar of all the men in his band of comrades between the seas. Beowulf was not there; for another lodging-place had been assigned to the mighty Geat after the giving of treasure. A cry arose in Heorot. All in its gore she had taken the famous arm;⁷² sorrow was renewed in the dwellings. No good exchange was that which cost both peoples the lives of friends.

Then the old king, the hoary warrior, was sad at heart when he learned that his chief thane had lost his life, that his dearest friend was dead. Straightway Beowulf, the hero blessed with victory, was brought to the bower; the prince, the noble warrior, went at daybreak with his comrades to where the prudent king was waiting to know if perchance the Almighty would ever work a happy change for him, after grievous tidings. And the hero, famed in war, strode up the hall with his band of thanes—while loud the room resounded—to greet the wise lord of the Ingwines; he asked if his night had been restful, as he had wished.

XX

Hrothgar lamenteth for Æschere. He tells Beowulf of the monster and her haunt.

Hrothgar, defense of the Scyldings, spoke: "Ask not after bliss,—sorrow in hall is renewed for the Danish folk. Æschere is dead, Yrmenlaf's elder brother, my councilor and my adviser, who stood by me, shoulder to shoulder, when we warded our heads in battle, while hosts rushed together and helmets crashed. Like Æschere should every noble be—an excellent hero. He was slain in Heorot by a restless destroyer.

"I know not whither the awful monster, exulting in her prey, has turned her homeward steps, rejoicing in her fill. She has avenged the strife in which thou slewest Grendel yesternight, grappling fiercely with him, for that he too long had wasted and destroyed my people. He fell in the fight, forfeiting his life, and now another is come, a mighty and a deadly foe, thinking to avenge her son. She has carried the feud further; wherefore it may well seem a heavy woe to many a thane who grieveth in spirit for his treasure-giver. Low lies the hand which did satisfy all your desires.

"I have heard the people dwelling in my land,

⁷¹ This repetition of the events of the earlier part may serve to show that the author was conscious of his transition to a new subject. It is even possible that the recitation of the story may sometimes have begun at or near this point.

⁷² Grendel's.

hall-rulers, say that they had often seen two such mighty stalkers of the marches, spirits of otherwhere, haunting the moors. One of them, as they could know full well, was like unto a woman; the other miscreated being, in the image of man wandered in exile (save that he was larger than any man), whom in the olden time the people named Grendel. They knew not if he ever had a father among the spirits of darkness. They dwell in a hidden land amid wolf-haunted slopes and savage fen-paths, the wind-swept cliffs where the mountain-stream falleth, shrouded in the mists of the headlands, its flood flowing underground. It is not far thence in measure of miles that the mere lieth. Over it hang groves in hoary whiteness; a forest with fixed roots bendeth over the waters. There in the night-tide is a dread wonder seen—a fire on the flood. There is none of the children of men so wise that he knoweth the depths thereof. Although hard pressed by hounds, the heath-ranging stag, with mighty horns, may seek out that forest, driven from afar, yet sooner will he yield up life and breath upon the bank than hide his head within its waters. Cheerless is the place. Thence the surge riseth, wan to the clouds, when the winds stir up foul weather, till the air thicken and the heavens weep.

"Now once again help rests with thee alone. Thou knowest not yet the spot, the savage place where thou mayst find the sinful creature. Seek it out, if thou dare. I will reward thee, as I did before, with olden treasures and with twisted gold, if thou get thence alive."

XXI

They track Grendel's mother to the mere. Beowulf slayeth a sea-monster.

Then spoke Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow: "Sorrow not, thou wise man. It is better for a man to avenge his friend than mourn exceedingly. Each of us must abide the end of the worldly life, wherefore let him who may, win glory ere he die; thus shall it be best for a warrior when life is past. Arise, O guardian of the kingdom, let us straightway go and look upon the tracks of Grendel's dam. I promise thee this: she shall not escape to the covert, neither into the bosom of the earth, nor to mountain-wood, nor to the bottom of the sea, go where she will. This day do thou bear in patience every woe of thine, as I expect of thee."

Then the old man leapt up and thanked God, the mighty Lord, for what that man had said. And they bridled Hrothgar's horse, a steed with curling mane. The wise prince rode stately forth, and with him fared a troop of shielded warriors. Footprints were clearly seen along the forest-path, her track across the land. She had gone forth, over the murky moor, and borne away lifeless that best of thanes, who with Hrothgar ruled the hall.

And the offspring of princes went over steep and rocky slopes and narrow ways, straight lonely passes, an unknown course; over sheer cliffs and many a sea-beast's haunt. He, with a few prudent men, went on before to view the spot, until he suddenly came upon mountain-trees o'erhanging the gray rock—a cheerless wood. Beneath it lay a water, bloody and troubled. All the Danes, all the friends of the Scyldings, each hero and many a thane, sad at heart, then suffered sore distress; for there upon the sea-cliff they found the head of Æschere. The waters were seething with blood and hot gore—the people gazed.

At times the horn sang out an eager lay. All the troop sat down. They saw in the water many of the serpent kind, strange dragons swimming the deep. Likewise they saw sea-monsters lying along the headland-slopes, serpents and wild beasts, such as oft at morning-tide make a journey, fraught with sorrow, over the sail-road. They sped away, bitter and swollen with wrath, when they heard the sound, the song of the battle-horn. But the lord of the Geats with bow and arrow took the life of one of them, as it buffeted the waves, so that the hard shaft pierced the vitals; he was then the slower in swimming the sea, for death seized him. Straightway he was hard pressed with the sharp barbs of hooked spears, fiercely attacked, and drawn up on the cliff, a wondrous wave-tosser. The men looked on the strange and grisly beast.

Then Beowulf girded him with noble armor; he took no thought for his life. His byrnie, hand-woven, broad, and of many colors, was to search out the deeps. This armor could well protect his body so that the grip of the foe could not harm his breast, nor the clutch of the angry beast do aught against his life. Moreover, the white helmet guarded his head, even that which was to plunge into the depths of the mere, passing through the tumult of the waters; it was all decked with gold, encircled with noble chains, as the weapon-smith wrought it in days of yore; wondrously he made it, and set it about with boar-figures so that no brand nor battle-sword could bite it.⁷³

⁷³ See p. 993, note 21.

Nor was that the least of his mighty aids which Hrothgar's spokesman ⁷⁴ lent him in his need—the name of the hilted sword was Hrunting, and it was one of the greatest among olden treasures; its blade was of iron, stained with poison-twigs, hardened with blood of battle; it had never failed any man whose hand had wielded it in fight, any who durst go on perilous adventures to the field of battle—it was not the first time that it had need to do high deeds. Surely when the son of Ecglaf, strong in his might, lent that weapon to a better swordsman, he did not remember what he had said when drunk with wine; as for him, he durst not risk his life beneath the warring waves and do a hero's deeds; there he lost the glory, the fame of valor. It was not so with the other when he had armed him for the fight.

XXII

Beowulf bids farewell to Hrothgar and plunges into the mere. The monster seizes upon him. They fight.

Then spoke Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow: "Remember, thou great son of Healfdene, wise chieftain, gracious friend of men, now that I am ready for this exploit, what we two spoke of aforetime; that, if I must needs lose my life for thee, thou wouldst ever be as a father to me when I was gone hence. Guard thou my thanes, my own comrades, if the fight take me, and do thou also send unto Hygelac the treasures that thou gavest me, beloved Hrothgar. Then, when the son of Hrethel, lord of the Geats, shall look upon that treasure, he may behold and see by the gold that I found a bountiful benefactor, and enjoyed these gifts while I might. And do thou let Unferth, that far-famed man, have the old heirloom, the wondrous wavy sword of tempered blade. I will win glory with Hrunting, or death shall take me."

After these words the lord of the Weder-Geats ⁴⁰ boldly made haste; he would await no answer, but the surging waters swallowed up the warrior. It was the space of a day ere he got sight of the bottom.

Soon the blood-thirsty creature, she who had lived for a hundred seasons, grim and greedy, in the waters' flow, found that one was there from above seeking out the abode of monsters. She seized upon the warrior and clutched him with her horrid claws; nevertheless she did no harm ⁵⁰ to his sound body, for the ringèd armor girt him round about, so that she could not pierce the byrnie, the linkèd coat of mail, with her hateful fingers.

Then the mere-wolf, when she came to the bottom, bore the ring-prince to her dwelling, so that he could nowise wield his weapons, brave though he was; for many monsters came at him, many a sea-beast with awful tusks broke his battle-sark—the evil creatures pressed him hard.

Then the hero saw that he was in some dreadful hall, where the water could not harm him a whit; the swift clutch of the current could not touch him, because of the roofed hall. He saw a fire-light, a gleaming flame brightly shining. Then the hero got sight of the mighty mere-woman—the she-wolf of the deep. He made at her fiercely with his war-sword. His hand did not refuse the blow, so that the ringèd blade sang out a greedy war-song on her head. But the stranger found that the gleaming sword would make no wound, nor harm her life; so the blade failed the prince at need. It had aforetime endured many a hard fight, had often cleft the helmet and the byrnie of the doomed; this was the first time that the precious treasure ever failed of its glory. Yet the kinsman of Hygelac, heedful of great deeds, was steadfast of purpose, not faltering in courage. Then the angry warrior threw from him the carved sword, strong and steel-edged, studded with jewels, and it lay upon the ground. He trusted to his strength, to the mighty grip of his hand. So must a brave man do when he thinketh to win lasting praise in war—he taketh no thought for his life.

Then the lord of the War-Geats, shrinking not from the fight, seized Grendel's mother by the shoulder, and full of wrath, the valiant in battle threw his deadly foe so that she fell to the floor. Speedily she paid him his reward again with fierce grapplings and clutched at him, and being wearied, he stumbled and fell, he, the champion, strongest of warriors. Then she leapt and sat upon him, and drew her dagger, broad and brown-edged, to avenge her son, her only offspring. But on his shoulder lay his woven coat of mail; it saved his life, barring the entrance against point and blade. Then the son of Ecgtheow, chief of the Geats, would have perished beneath the sea-bottom, had not his byrnie, his hard war-shirt aided him, and Holy God, the wise Lord, brought victory to pass, the King of heaven easily adjudging it aright. Thereafter he stood up again.

XXIII

Beowulf lays hold upon a giant sword and slays the evil beast. He finds Grendel's dead body and cuts off the head, and swims up to his thanes upon the shore. They go back to Heorot.

⁷⁴ Unferth.

Then he saw among the armor a victorious blade, an old sword of the giant-age, keen-edged, the glory of warriors; it was the choicest of weapons—save that it was larger than any other man was able to carry into battle—good, and splendidly wrought, for it was the work of the giants. And the warrior of the Scyldings seized the belted hilt; savage and angry, he drew forth the ring-sword, and, hopeless of life, smote so fiercely that the hard sword caught her by the neck, breaking the ring-bones; the blade drove right through her doomed body, and she sank upon the floor. The sword was bloody; the hero exulted in his deed.

The flame burst forth; light filled the place, even as when the candle of heaven is shining brightly from the sky. He gazed about the place and turned him to the wall; the thane of Hygelac, angry and resolute, lifted the great weapon by the hilts. The blade was not worthless to the warrior, for he wished to repay Grendel straightway for the many attacks which he had made upon the West-Danes—oftener far than once—what time he slew Hrothgar's hearth-companions in their slumber and devoured fifteen of the sleeping Danes and carried off as many more, a horrid prey. The fierce warrior had given him his reward, so that he now saw Grendel lying lifeless in his resting-place, spent with his fight, so deadly had the combat been for him in Heorot. The body bounded far when it suffered a blow after death, a mighty sword-stroke. And thus he smote off the head.

Soon the prudent men who were watching the mere with Hrothgar saw that the surging waves were all troubled, and the water mingled with blood. The old men, white-haired, talked together of the hero, how they thought that the prince would never come again to their great lord, exultant in victory; for many believed that the seawolf had rent him in pieces.

Then came the ninth hour of the day. The bold Scyldings left the cliff, the bounteous friend of men departed to his home. But the strangers sat there, sick at heart, and gazed upon the mere; they longed but did not ever think to see their own dear lord again.

Meanwhile the sword, that war-blade, being drenched with blood, began to waste away in icicles of steel; it melted wondrously like ice when the Father looseneth the frost, unwindeth the ropes that bind the waves; He who ruleth the times and seasons, He is a God of righteousness. The lord of the Weder-Geats took no treasure from that hall, although he saw much there, none save the head, and the hilt bright with gold; the blade had melted, the graven sword had burned away, so hot had been the blood, so venomous the strange spirit that had perished there.

Soon he was swimming off, he who had survived the onset of his foes; he plunged up through the water. The surging waves were cleansed, the wide expanse where that strange spirit had laid down her life and the fleeting days of this world.

And the defense of seamen came to land, stoutly swimming; he rejoiced in his sea-spoil, the great burden that he bore with him. And his valiant band of thanes went unto him, giving thanks to God; they rejoiced in their chief, for that they could see him safe and sound. Then they quickly loosed helm and byrnie from the valiant man. The mere grew calm, but the water beneath the clouds was stained with the gore of battle.

They set forth along the foot-path glad at heart; the men, kingly bold, measured the earth-ways, the well-known roads. They bore away the head from the sea-cliff—a hard task for all those men, great-hearted as they were; four of them must needs bear with toil that head of Grendel upon a spear to the gold-hall. And forthwith the fourteen Geats, bold and warlike, came to the hall, and their brave lord in their midst trod the meadows. And the chief of the thanes, the valiant man crowned with glory, the warrior brave in battle, went in to greet Hrothgar. And Grendel's head was borne by the hair into the hall where the men were drinking—a terror alike to heroes and to queen. The people gazed upon that wondrous sight.

XXIV AND XXV

Beowulf tells of his fight, and Hrothgar discourses. They feast in Heorot. In the morning the Geats make ready to depart.

Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke: "Behold, O son of Healfdene, lord of the Scyldings, we have joyfully brought thee this sea-spoil which here thou lookest on, a token of glory. Hardly did I escape with my life; painfully fighting under the waters, I ventured on the work. The struggle would have well-nigh failed me, had not God shielded me. Nor could I do aught with Hrunting in the fight, though that be a good weapon; but the Ruler of the people—full often hath He guided friendless men—granted that I saw an old and mighty sword hanging all beauteous on the wall; so I drew that weapon forth. And I slew in fight the keepers of that house, for occasion favored me. But the war-sword, the graven blade, burned away when the blood gushed forth, hottest of battle-gore. The hilt I bore away from the enemy, avenging, as was meet, their crimes, the slaughter of the Danes. I promise thee that thou, with a troop of thy men, mayst sleep in Heorot free from care, thou and all the thanes of thy people, young and old; thou needest not fear death for them from that quarter, as formerly thou didst, O lord of the Scyldings.”¹⁰

Then the golden hilt, the ancient work of giants, was given into the hands of the aged warrior, the hoary leader in battle. After the fall of the devils, this work of cunning smiths came into the possession of the lord of the Danes; when the fierce-hearted enemy of God, guilty of murder, quitted this world, he and his mother too, it passed into the keeping of the best of kings between the seas, the best of those who gave out gifts of money in the Danish land.

Hrothgar spoke; he looked upon the hilt, the old heirloom on which was graven the beginning of the ancient strife, what time the flood, the rushing ocean, destroyed the giant race.¹⁵ They had behaved frowardly. That people was estranged from the eternal Lord; wherefore the Ruler gave them their final reward in the flood of waters. And on the guard of shining gold was rightly graven, set forth and told in runic letters, for whom the sword had first been made, that best of blades, with its twisted hilt brightly adorned with snakes.³⁰

Then the wise son of Healfdene spoke—silent were they all: “Lo! the aged ruler who remembereth far-off days, he who doeth righteousness and truth among the people, may say that this hero was born of the nobler stock. The fame of thee, my friend Beowulf, is spread abroad among every people far and wide. Thou dost hold it all with meekness; yea, all thy might with prudence of mind. I will make good my compact with thee, even as we did agree aforetime. Thou shalt be a lasting comfort to thy people, a help to warriors.”

“Not so was Heremod⁷⁶ to the children of Ecgwela, the Honor-Scyldings. He throve not for their welfare, but became the destruction and the deadly plague of the Danish people; for in his rage he slew his table-companions, the friends of his bosom, until he, the great prince, went forth alone, far from the joys of men. Although mighty God advanced him and set him above all men in strength and in the joys of power, yet there grew up a blood-thirsty spirit in his heart; he gave no treasure to the Danes, as was meet, so that he lived joyless, suffering punishment for his hostility in the lasting wretchedness of his people. Learn thou from this; lay hold upon manly virtue. With the wisdom of many winters I have told this tale for thee.

“Wonderful it is to tell how mighty God, in His great spirit, giveth wisdom unto mankind and land and noble rank. He ruleth over all. But at times He letteth the thoughts of a man’s heart stray toward the satisfaction of his own desires; He giveth him worldly joys in his fatherland, a fenced city of men to hold; He maketh whole regions of the earth subject unto him, a wide domain, so that in his blindness he considereth not his end. He dwelleth in plenty; no whit doth sickness or age beset him; sorrow darkeneth not his spirit; nowhere doth strife appear, or deadly hate; but all the world moveth to his will.

“He knoweth no worse state, until at length²⁰ much pride grows and flourishes within him, while the watchman is sleeping, the keeper of the soul. Too deep is that slumber, encompassed with sorrows; the Adversary is at hand, who shooteth from his bow in evil wise; and the helmeted man is smitten in the breast with a bitter arrow, being unable to ward off the crooked counsels of the Accursèd Spirit. Too little seemeth that which he hath long possessed. He is covetous in his froward heart; he doth not gloryingly bestow the plated rings, and he forgetteth and despiseth the future, by reason of the bounteous honors which God, the King of glory, hath accorded him.

“But in the end it is brought to pass that the failing body wasteth away; and falleth doomed. Another succeedeth, one who giveth out the treasure, nothing loath, the prince’s store of riches laid up of old—naught to fear hath he.

“Keep thee from deadly envy, then, beloved Beowulf, best of men, and choose thou the better course, everlasting gain. Incline thee not to pride, O mighty warrior. Now the flower of thy strength lasteth for a season, but soon sickness or sword shall cut thee off from thy strength, or the embrace of fire, or the surge of the flood, or the stab of the sword, or the flight of the spear, or wretched age; or else the light of thine eyes shall fail and grow dim, and forthwith death shall overcome thee, O noble hero.

“Thus I ruled over the Ring-Danes fifty years beneath the sky, and defended them in battle with spear and sword from many a tribe throughout the world; insomuch that I thought I had no foe beneath the breadth of heaven. Lo! all this was changed for me in my land; joy changed to sorrow, when Grendel, my foe of old, fell upon my home. Ever in my heart I suffered great sorrow because of this persecution. Wherefore thanks be to God, our everlasting Lord, that I have lived to see with mine eyes this gory head, now the old strife is over.

⁷⁵ Genesis 4, 1.

⁷⁶ See p. 1000 and note 49.

"Go now to thy seat, honored warrior, partake in the joy of the feasting. Thou and I will share full many treasures when morning is come."

The Geat was glad at heart, and went straightway to his seat, as the wise king bade him. Then once again a fair feast was made ready as before for those brave men in the hall.

The helm of night loured dark over the warriors. All the company arose; the aged man, the gray-haired Scylding, was minded to go to his bed. And the Geat, the brave shield-warrior, had an exceeding great desire of rest. Forthwith the hall-thane, he who duly supplied all the warrior's needs, such as seafarers must have in that day, guided forth that traveler from afar, wearied with his venture. And the great-hearted hero rested him.

The hall towered aloft, vast and gold-adorned. The guest slept within, until the black raven, blithe of heart, announced the joy of heaven, and the bright sun came gliding over earth. The warriors hastened, the heroes longed to be returning to their people; the great-hearted guest wished to take ship and go far thence.

And the hero bade the son of Ecglaf⁷⁷ bear away Hrunting, bade him take the sword, beloved weapon; he thanked him for lending it, said that he counted it a good war-friend, a mighty in battle; he uttered no word in blame of that edged sword—he was a great-hearted man!

And when the warriors, eager for the voyage, were ready armed, the chief, dear in the sight of the Danes, went to the throne where the other was; the hero, bold in battle, gave greeting to Hrothgar.

XXVI

Beowulf bids farewell to Hrothgar and the aged king weeps at his departure. He giveth him many treasures. The Geats go down to the sea.

Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke: "Now we seafarers, travelers from afar, would say that we purpose to return unto Hygelac. We have been well entertained here to our heart's desire: thou hast been good to us. If, then, O lord of men, I can win upon earth more of thy heart's love than I have yet done, I shall be ready at once for warlike deeds. If I learn beyond the course of the waters that thy neighbors beset thee sore, as did thine enemies in days gone by, I will bring a thousand thanes and warriors to help thee. I know that Hygelac, lord of the Geats, shepherd of the people, young though he be, will further me by word and deed that I may do honor to thee and bring to thine aid the shafted spear and the succor of my strength, when thou hast need of men. Moreover, if Hrethric, the king's son, take service at the Geatish court, he will find there many friends; far countries are best sought out by him who is strong within himself."

Hrothgar spoke and answered him again: "The all-knowing Lord hath sent these words into thy mind; I never heard one so young in life speak more wisely. Thou art strong in thy might, and prudent of mind, wise in thy discourse. I count it likely that, if ever the spear or fierce warfare or sickness or weapon take away thy lord, the heir of Hrethel, shepherd of the people, and if thou be yet alive, the Sea-Geats will have none better to choose as king, as guardian of treasure and heroes, if haply thou be willing to govern the kingdom of thy folk. Thy great heart delighteth me more and more, dear Beowulf. Thou hast brought it to pass that there shall be peace between our people, the Geat folk and the Spear-Danes; and strife shall cease, the evil feuds which they have endured in time past. We shall have treasure in common while I rule over this wide realm; many friends shall greet one another with good things across the ganet's bath; the ringed ship shall bring gifts and love-tokens over the sea. I know that the peoples are firmly united toward friend and toward foe, blameless in every way, after the olden customs."

And moreover the son of Healfdene, shelter of warriors, gave unto him twelve treasures within the hall; he bade him go in safety with these gifts unto his own dear people, and quickly come again. And the king of noble lineage, lord of the Scyldings, kissed that best of thanes and clasped him round the neck; tears fell from the gray-haired man. The wise and aged king looked for either thing,⁷⁹ but rather for the second, that they would never meet again, brave in the council. The hero was so dear to him that he could not contain his welling grief,

⁷⁷ Unferth.

⁷⁸ The sea.

⁷⁹ A knotty passage, perhaps corrupt. There were two possibilities, the passage seems to imply: that Hrothgar might see Beowulf again, and that he might not.

for in his breast secret longing after the dear man, fast bound within his heart, burned through his blood.

Then Beowulf, the warrior proud of his gold, exulting in his treasure, went thence treading the grassy plain. The ship awaited her lord, riding at anchor. And, as they went, Hrothgar's gift was praised full oft. He was a king, blameless in every wise, until old age, which has often wasted many a man, took from him the joys of strength.

XXVII

Beowulf presents to the coast-warden a golden sword. The Geats return unto their land. They bear the treasures to the hall where dwells King Hygelac with his queen, Hygd. The tale of Thrytho told.

Then the band of brave retainers came to the sea; they wore ringèd armor, woven shirts of mail. The land-warden beheld the heroes when they came again, even as he had done before. But not with insult did he greet the guests from the peak of the cliff, but rode toward them, as they came unto their ship, saying that the Weder people, the bright-coated warriors, were welcome.

Then the spacious bark, the ring-stemmed ship upon the beach, was laden with the armor, with the horses and the treasures; the mast towered high over the wealth from Hrothgar's hoard. Beowulf gave to the boat-warden a sword all bound with gold, so that he was the more honored thereafter at the mead-bench because of that treasure and heirloom.

And he departed in his ship, driving the deep waters asunder; he left the Danish land. Then a sail, one of the sea-cloths, was fastened to the mast. The sea-craft groaned. The wind blowing over the waters did not drive the bark from her course; the ship sailed on: with wreathèd prow she floated forth, foamy-necked, over the waters of the sea, until the men could descry the Geatish cliffs, the well-known headlands. The keel, driven by the wind, bounded up, and stood ashore. Straightway the harbor-guard was ready at the water's edge, he who upon the beach had long been looking out afar, eager for the dear men. He bound the broad-bosomed ship with anchor-ropes fast to the shore, lest the force of the waves should drive the fair boat away.

And Beowulf bade them bear up ashore the princely treasure, the jewels and the beaten gold. It was not far thence for them to go unto the giver of treasure, Hygelac, son of Hrethel; there at home he dwells with his companions, nigh the sea-wall.

Fair was the house; its lord a brave king, great in hall. Hygd, daughter of Hæreth, was very young, was wise and well nurtured, although she had lived but few winters within the castle walls; yet she was not mean-spirited, and nowise sparing in gifts of precious treasures to the Geats.

THE TALE OF THRYTHO

Much unlike Hygd was a queen named Thrytho, proud and wrathful, until Offa subdued her.

Thrytho,⁸⁰ the fierce queen of the people, showed forth wrath and evil dire; no brave man among the dear comrades durst venture by day to look upon her with his eyes, none save her lord; else he might count on deadly bonds, hand-woven, being destined for him. Straightway after his seizure the sword was appointed for use, so that the carved weapon might decide it, and tell forth the baleful murder. Such is no queenly custom for a woman to practice, peerless though she be—that a weaver of peace⁸¹ should attempt the life of a dear retainer because of pretended insult.

But the kinsman of Hemming⁸² checked this. The ale-drinkers told another story, how that she wrought less evil to the people, fewer deeds of hate after she was given, all gold-adorned, to the young warrior of noble lineage, when she at her father's bidding, journeyed over the dark waters unto Offa's hall. There, while she lived, she enjoyed her destiny upon the throne, famed for her goodness. She held high love toward the prince of heroes who, as I have heard, was the best of all mankind between the seas, best of all the race of men on earth. Therefore Offa, bold with the spear, was honored far and wide for gifts and warfare. Wisely he ruled his native land. From him sprang Eomær, kinsman of Hemming, grandson of Garmund, skillful in warfare, for the help of heroes.

XXVIII

Beowulf is received by Hygelac, and telleth of his meeting with Grendel. Of Freawaru.

Then the brave chief went forth over the sands with his companions, treading the sea-beach, the wide-stretching shores. The candle of the world was shining, the sun in its course beaming from ⁸⁰ This account of Thrytho is apparently introduced to contrast her with Hygd; so Beowulf (p. 1008) was praised by contrast with Heremod.

⁸¹ This kenning for a queen is significant in many ways.

⁸² Offa.

the south. They went their ways; boldly betook them to where, as they had heard, the young and gracious war-king, shelter of heroes, slayer of Ongentheow,⁸³ was giving out rings within his city. Speedily Beowulf's coming was announced to Hygelac, how that the shelter of warriors, his shield-comrade, was come back alive to the hall, come back to the court, safe from combat. Straightway the hall within was made ready for the travelers, even as the ruler bade.

Then he who had scaped from the strife sat by the king himself, kinsman by kinsman, after his lord with courtly speech had greeted the loyal hero with mighty words. And Hæreth's daughter passed about the hall, pouring out the mead; for she loved the people; she bore the mead-cup to the hands of the heroes.

Then Hygelac began to question his companions full fairly in the lofty hall, for he was spurred with longing to know touching the adventures of the Sea-Geats: "How fared ye in your journeying, dear Beowulf, when thou on a sudden didst resolve to seek combat far away over the salt waters, battle in Heorot? Didst thou in aught lessen the well-known woe of Hrothgar, the mighty lord? I have nourished brooding care and scrow in my heart, for I put no trust in the journey of my beloved thane. Long did I entreat thee not to attack the deadly beast, but let the South-Danes themselves put an end to their strife with Grendel. I give thanks unto God that I am suffered to see thee safe."

Beowulf, son of Ecgtheow, spoke: "Known unto many, my lord Hygelac, is the famous meeting 'twixt Grendel and me, and our fighting there on the field where he had wrought much sorrow for the Victor—⁸⁴ Scyldings and misery evermore. All that I avenged, so that none of Grendel's kin on earth need boast of that fray at twilight, not even he of the loathed race who shall live the longest in the midst of the moorland."

"When I came into that country, I went first into the ring-hall to greet Hrothgar. Straightway the great kinsman of Healfdene, when he knew my mind, gave me a seat with his own son. It was a joyous host; I have never seen greater joy at the mead among any hall-guests beneath the vault of heaven. At times the great queen, the peace and bond of peoples,⁸⁵ passed all about the hall, and cheered the hearts of the young retainers; oft-times she gave a ring to some warrior ere she went to her seat. At times Hrothgar's daughter bore the ale-cup before the nobles, unto the warriors in order. I heard those in the hall call her Freawaru as she 10 gave studded treasure to the heroes."

FREAWARU ⁸⁶

How Freawaru, daughter to Hrothgar, is betrothed to Ingeld of the Heathobards, they who were Hrothgar's enemies of old. And how Ingeld will be provoked to the murder of a thane who attends on Freawaru; and how Ingeld's love for that lady will wane.

"Young and gold-adorned, she is promised to the glad son of Froda; this has seemed good to the lord of the Scyldings, defender of the kingdom, and he counts it a gain—by this marriage to allay many deadly feuds and strifes. Yet, oft and not rarely, in any place after a prince has fallen, it is but a little time that the deadly spear lies at rest, fair though the bride may be.

"Wherefore it may well displease the lord of the Heathobards and all the thanes of that people when he goes into hall with his lady, that his warriors attend on a noble scion of the Danes,⁸⁷ for on him gleam the heirlooms of their fathers, hard and ring-adorned, once the Heathobards' treasure, while they could still wield their weapons, until in an evil day they led astray into battle their dear companions and their own lives.

"Then speaks one over the beer, an old warrior who sees the heirloom and who remembers all the slaughter of the men; and his soul is wrathful; and, sore at heart, he begins to try the spirit of the young warrior by the thoughts of his breast, begins to waken war-fury, and speaks this word: 'Knowst thou the sword, my friend, the precious blade that thy father bore into battle, when he wore his helmet for the last time, and the Danes, the bold Scyldings, slew him, and held the battle-field, because Withergild ⁸⁸ was laid low after the fall of heroes? Now some stripping, offspring of those murderers, walks our hall

⁸³ In Part III of the Beowulf we are told that Ongentheow was slain by Eofor, one of Hygelac's men. It is proper for the retainer to attribute his glory to his lord. See Agricola 8, and Germania 14.

⁸⁴ The epithet is here either purely formal (cf. p. 997), or touched with sarcasm.

⁸⁵ Cf. p. 1010, and note 81.

⁸⁶ This episode, a fine piece of epic prophecy, refers to a tale probably well known to the poet's audience—the fight of Ingeld and Hrothgar. Our knowledge of the story is derived chiefly from the Widsith (see lines 45 ff.), which is the only other Old English poem that contains mention of the more important characters of the Beowulf.

⁸⁷ Heathobards, that is, are obliged to serve some Dane who has come in attendance on Freawaru.

⁸⁸ Nothing is known of him.

exulting in the spoil, boasts of that slaughter, and wears the treasure which thou shouldst rightly have.'

"Thus he ever goads him and stirs his memory with galling words, until the hour comes that the lady's⁸⁹ thane, because of his father's deeds, sleeps in blood after the sword-stroke, forfeiting his life; but the other escapes thence alive, for well he knows the land. Thus the warrior's oaths on both sides are broken, for deadly hate wells up in Ingeld's heart, and the love of the woman grows cooler within him, because of overwhelming woe.

"Therefore I count not sincere the faith of the Heathobards nor their part in the peace with the Danes, nor do I count their friendship firm."

"I must say on and tell again of Grendel, that thou mayst fully know, O king, to what issue the grappling came. After the jewel of heaven had glided over earth, the furious monster, the dread night-foe, came to find us out, where we all unharmed were watching over the hall. There slaughter and an awful death befell Hondscio, for he was doomed; that girded warrior was the first to fall, for Grendel bit him and slew him, our great kinsman-thane; he devoured the whole body of the man we loved. Yet none the sooner would the bloody-toothed murderer, bent on destruction, get him from the hall with empty hands. But he made trial of me and seized upon me with his ready claw. His pouch, wondrous and large, was hanging, fast in cunning bonds; it was all curiously wrought with dragon-skins and strange device of fiends. The bold ill-doer thought to put me therein, me, all sinless, and many another; but he could not so, when I in wrath arose and stood upright. It is too long to recount how I paid the enemy of that people a reward for his every crime. There, O my lord, did I bring glory to thy people by my deeds. He escaped and fled away—a little while he enjoyed the delights of life; but his right arm he left in Heorot, marking his track, and humbled, in woeful mood, fell thence to the bottom of the mere.

"When morning was come and we had sat down to the feast, the lord of the Scyldings richly rewarded me for that great fight, with beaten gold and many a treasure. There was song and glee. The aged Scylding, when he had asked of many things, told of the days of yore. At times a brave warrior touched the joyous harp, that instrument of mirth; at times he told a tale, truthful and sad; at times the great-hearted king would relate aright some strange legend; at times the hoary warrior, stricken with age, would lament his youth and battle-strength; his heart swelled within him as, old in winters, he thought on all the number of his days.

"So all day long we took our pleasure there, until another night came unto men. And straight thereafter, Grendel's mother was ready for vengeance; sorrowful she journeyed, for death and the war-¹⁰ wrath of the Geats had taken her son. The she-monster avenged her child. Furiously she slew a warrior. Life went from Æschere, the aged counselor. Nor could the Danes, when morning was come, burn the corpse with fire, nor lay the beloved man upon the funeral pile, for in her fiendish clutch she had borne away the body beneath the mountain stream. That was the bitterest of all the griefs that had long befallen Hrothgar, prince of the people. Then the king, heavy-hearted, besought me by thy life to do a hero's deed, to venture my life and win glory in the rush of waters; he promised me reward.

"Then, as is well known, I found the grim and awful guardian of the deep. And there we fought for a time, hand to hand; the mere was welling with gore. With a mighty sword I smote off the head of Grendel's mother in that sea-hall. Hardly did I get thence with my life, but not yet was I doomed. Thereafter the son of Healfdene, defense of warriors, gave me many treasures.

XXXI⁹⁰

Beowulf maketh an end of his story, and giveth Hygelac all the gifts which he had of Hrothgar. Hygelac rewardeth him again.

"So the king of that people lived in seemly wise. I lost not my reward, the meed of valor, for the son of Healfdene gave me gifts to use at mine own will, which I will bring and gladly offer thee, O hero-king. Every good thing comes from thee, and I have few blood-kinsmen saving thee, O Hygelac."

And he bade them bring in the boar head-crest, the helm towering in battle, the gray byrnie, and the splendid war-sword, and thereupon he uttered these words: "Hrothgar, the wise prince, gave me this battle-armor, bidding me, with express words to give thee first his kindly greeting; and he said that King Heorogar,⁹¹ lord of the Scyldings, long possessed it, nevertheless he would not give the breast-mail to his own son, bold Heoroward, gracious though he was to him. Do thou enjoy it well."

⁸⁹ Freawaru's.

⁹⁰ The numbers XXIX and XXX are wanting in the MS., but no part of the text is lost.

⁹¹ Hrothgar's own brother.

I have learned that four dappled horses, all alike, followed upon the gift of the armor; graciously he presented unto him the horses and the treasures. So should a kinsman do, and nowise weave a cunning snare for his fellow, and plot the death of his comrade with secret craft. Full loyal was that nephew to Hygelac, the battle-strong; each took thought for the other's joy.

I have heard that he gave to Hygd the necklace, the wondrous jewel curiously wrought, which Wealhtheow, a king's daughter, had given him, and three horses therewith, slender and brightly saddled. Thereafter was her breast adorned, even from the time when she received the circlet.

Thus the son of Ecgtheow behaved himself in glorious wise, he who was famed for his warfare and for his gracious deeds; full honorably he lived, nor did he slay his hearth-companions when they²⁰ were drunken;⁹² his heart was not cruel, but the brave warrior with the greatest care of all mankind held fast the bounteous gift which God had given him.

Long had he been despised,⁹³ so that the sons of the Geats had esteemed him not, nor would the leader of the war-hosts do him much honor at the mead-bench; oft had they deemed him slothful, an unwarlike prince. That glorious man was rewarded for his every sorrow.

Then the king, the defense of heroes, strong in battle, bade them bring in the heirloom of Hrethel, all decked with gold,—there was no dearer sword¹⁰ among the treasures of the Geats.⁹⁴ He laid it in Beowulf's lap; and he gave to him seven thousand pieces of money, and a hall and a princely seat. The twain, by right of birth, held land in the nation, a home and its rights, but Hygelac had the broad kingdom, and therein he was the greater man.⁹⁵

[In Part III Beowulf has become king and has reigned fifty years. A great fire-dragon who has watched over a treasure hoard wastes the land. The poem describes the burning of Beowulf's hall and the great fight in which the king kills the dragon but receives his own death wound. The epic closes with the burning of Beowulf's body and the praise of the hero.]

OTHER ANGLO-SAXON POEMS

Deor's Lament

To Weland¹ came woes and wearisome trial,
And cares oppressed the constant earl;
His lifelong companions were pain and sorrow,
And winter-cold weeping: his ways were oft hard,

After Nithhad had struck the strong man low,
Cut the supple sinew-bands of the sorrowful earl.

That has passed over: so this may depart!⁶

Beadohild bore her brother's death
Less sorely in soul than herself and her plight

When she clearly discovered her cursed condition,¹⁰

That unwed she should bear a babe to the world.

She never could think of the thing that must happen.

That has passed over: so this may depart!

Much have we learned of Mæthhild's life:

How the courtship of Geat was crowned with grief,¹⁵

How love and its sorrows allowed him no sleep.

That has passed over: so this may depart!

⁹² This strange praise may be contrasted with the criticism of the evil Heremod, p. 1008.

⁹³ His youth, like that of Brutus, had given no promise of his later glory.

⁹⁴ Beowulf already possessed his coat of mail.

⁹⁵ The implication is merely that Beowulf is now the second man in the nation.

Other Anglo-Saxon Poems. Translated by Stith Thompson. Used by permission of Scott, Foresman and Company.

¹ Weland was the blacksmith of the Norse gods, corresponding to Vulcan of Roman myth. The crafty king Nithhad captured him, fettered and hamstrung him, and robbed him of his magic ring. By the help of Nithhad's daughter, Beadohild, he recovered the ring and his power to fly. Before leaving, he stupefied Beadohild with liquor and violated her. She later bore him a child (see stanza 2).

Theodoric held for thirty winters
The town of the Mærings: that was told unto many.

That has passed over: so this may depart! 20

We all have heard of Eormanric²
Of the wolfish heart: a wide realm he had
Of the Gothic kingdom. Grim was the king.
Many men sat and bemoaned their sorrows,
Woefully watching and wishing always 25
That the cruel king might be conquered at last.
That has passed over: so this may depart!

Sad in his soul he sittith joyless,
Mournful in mood. He many times thinks That no end will e'er come to the cares he endures. 30

Then must he think how throughout the world
The gracious God often gives his help
And manifold honors to many an earl
And sends wide his fame; but to some he gives woes. 34

Of myself and my sorrows I may say in truth
That I was happy once as the Heodenings' scop,
Dear to my Lord. Dear was my name.
Many winters I found a worthy following,
Held my lord's heart, till Heorrenda came, 39
The skillful singer, and received the land-right
That the proud helm of earls had once promised to me!

That has passed over: so this may depart!

Riddles

A Storm I

What man is so clever, so crafty of mind,
As to say for a truth who sends me a-traveling?
When I rise in my wrath, raging at times,
Savage is my sound. Sometimes I travel, 4
Go forth among the folk, set fire to their homes
And ravage and rob them; then rolls the smoke
Gray over the gables; great is the noise,
The death-struggle of the stricken. Then I stir up the woods

And the fruitful forests; I fell the trees,
I, roofed over with rain, on my reckless journey, 10

Wandering widely at the will of heaven.
I bear on my back the bodily raiment,
The fortunes of folk, their flesh and their spirits,
Together to sea. Say who may cover me, 14
Or what I am called, who carry this burden?

A Storm II

At times I travel in tracks undreamed of,
In vasty wave-depths to visit the earth,
The floor of the ocean. Fierce is the sea
..... the foam rolls high;
The whale-pool roars and rages loudly; 5
The streams beat the shores, and they sling at times

Great stones and sand on the steep cliffs,
With weeds and waves, while wildly striving Under the burden of billows on the bottom of ocean

The sea-ground I shake. My shield of waters
I leave not ere he lets me who leads me always
In all my travels. Tell me, wise man, 12
Who was it that drew me from the depth of the ocean

When the streams again became still and quiet,
Who before had forced me in fury to rage? 15

A Storm III

At times I am fast confined by my Master,
Who sendeth forth under the fertile plain
My broad bosom, but bridles me in.
He drives in the dark a dangerous power
To a narrow cave, where crushing my back 5
Sits the weight of the world. No way of escape
Can I find from the torment; so I tumble about The homes of heroes. The halls with their gables,

The tribe-dwellings tremble; the trusty walls shake,

Steep over the head. Still seems the air 10
Over all the country and calm the waters,
Till I press in my fury from my prison below,
Obeying His bidding who bound me fast
In fetters at first when he fashioned the world,
In bonds and in chains, with no chance of escape 15
From his power who points out the paths I must follow.

Downward at times I drive the waves,
Stir up the streams; to the strand I press
The flint-gray flood: the foamy wave
Lashes the wall. A lurid mountain 20
Rises on the deep; dark in its trail
Stirred up with the sea a second one comes
And close to the coast it clashes and strikes
On the lofty hills. Loud soundeth the boat,
The shouting of shipmen. Unshaken abide 25

² King of the Goths. Died about 375 A.D.

The stone cliffs steep through the strife of the waters,
 The dashing of waves, when the deadly tumult
 Crowds to the coast. Of cruel strife
 The sailors are certain if the sea drive their craft
 With its terrified guests on the grim rolling tide;
 They are sure that the ship will be shorn of its power,
 Be deprived of its rule, and will ride foam-covered
 On the ridge of the waves. Then arises a panic,
 Fear among folk of the force that commands me,
 Strong on my storm-track. Who shall still that power?
 At times I drive through the dark wave-vessels
 That ride on my back, and wrench them asunder
 And lash them with sea-streams; or let them again
 Glide back together. It is the greatest of noises,
 Of clamoring crowds, of crashes the loudest,
 When clouds as they strive in their courses shall strike
 Edge against edge; inky of hue
 In flight o'er the folk bright fire they sweat,
 A stream of flame; destruction they carry
 Dark over men with a mighty din.
 Fighting they fare. They let fall from their bosom
 A deafening rain of rattling liquid,
 Of storm from their bellies. In battle they strive,
 The awful army; anguish arises,
 Terror of mind to the tribes of men,
 Distress in the strongholds, when the stalking goblins,
 The pale ghosts shoot with their sharp weapons.
 The fool alone fears not their fatal spears;
 But he perishes too if the true God send Straight from above in streams of rain,
 Whizzing and whistling the whirlwind's arrows,
 The flying death. Few shall survive
 Whom that violent guest in his grimness shall visit.
 I always stir up that strife and commotion;
 Then I bear my course to the battle of clouds,
 Powerfully strive and press through the tumult,
 Over the bosom of the billows; bursteth loudly

The gathering of elements. Then again I descend
 In my helmet of air and hover near the land,
 And lift on my back the load I must bear,
 Minding the mandates of the mighty Lord.
 So I, a tried servant, sometimes contend:
 Now under the earth; now from over the waves
 I drive to the depths; now dropping from heaven,
 I stir up the streams, or strive to the skies,
 Where I war with the welkin. Wide do I travel,
 Swift and noisily. Say now my name,
 Or who raises me up when rest is denied me,
 Or who stays my course when stillness comes to me?

A Swan

My robe is noiseless when I roam the earth,
 Or stay in my home, or stir up the water.
 At times I am lifted o'er the lodgings of men
 By the aid of my trappings and the air above.
 The strength of the clouds then carries me far,
 Bears me on its bosom. My beautiful ornament,
 My raiment rustles and raises a song,
 Sings without tiring. I touch not the earth
 But wander a stranger over stream and wood.

A Horn

I was once an armed warrior. Now the worthy youth
 Gorgeously gears me with gold and silver,
 Curiously twisted. At times men kiss me.
 Sometimes I sound and summon to battle
 The stalwart company. A steed now carries me
 Across the border. The courser of the sea
 Now bears me o'er the billows, bright in my trappings.
 Now a comely maiden covered with jewels
 Fills my bosom with beer. On the board now I lie
 Lidless and lonely and lacking my trappings.
 Now fair in my fretwork at the feast I hang
 In my place on the wall while warriors drink.
 Now brightened for battle, on the back of a steed
 A war-chief shall bear me. Then the wind I shall breathe, Shall swell with sound from someone's bosom.
 At times with my voice I invite the heroes,
 The warriors to wine; or I watch for my master

And sound an alarm and save his goods, Put the robber to flight. Now find out my name.

*A Bible*¹

A stern destroyer struck out my life,
Deprived me of power; he put me to soak,
Dipped me in water, dried me again,
And set me in the sun, where I straightway lost
The hairs that I had. Then the hard edge 5
Of the keen knife cut me and cleansed me of soil;
Then fingers folded me. The fleet quill of the bird
With speedy drops spread tracks often
Over the brown surface, swallowed the tree-dye,
A deal of the stream, stepped again on me, 10
Traveled a black track. With protecting boards
Then a crafty one covered me, enclosed me with hide,
Made me gorgeous with gold. Hence I am glad and rejoice
At the smith's fair work with its wondrous adornments.
Now may these rich trappings, and the red dye's tracings, 15
And all works of wisdom spread wide the fame
Of the Sovereign of nations! Read me not as a penance!
If the children of men will cherish and use me,
They shall be safer and sounder and surer of victory,
More heroic of heart and happier in spirit, 20
More unfailing in wisdom. More friends shall they have,
Dear and trusty, and true and good,
And faithful always, whose honors and riches Shall increase with their love, and who cover their friends
With kindness and favors and clasp them fast
With loving arms. I ask how men call me 26
Who aid them in need. My name is far famed.
I am helpful to men, and am holy myself.

The Dream of the Rood

Lo, I shall tell you the truest of visions,
A dream that I dreamt in the dead of night
While people reposed in peaceful sleep.

I seemed to see the sacred tree
Lifted on high in a halo of light, 5
The brightest of beams; that beacon was wholly
Gorgeous with gold; glorious gems stood
Fair at the foot; and five were assembled,
At the crossing of the arms. The angels of God looked on,
Fair through the firmament. It was truly no foul sinner's cross, 10
For beholding his sufferings were the holy spirits,
The men of earth and all of creation.
Wondrous was that victory-wood, and I wounded and stained
With sorrows and sins. I saw the tree of glory
Blessed and bright in brilliant adornments, 15
Made joyous with jewels. Gems on all sides
Full rarely enriched the rood of the Savior.
Through the sight of that cross I came to perceive
Its stiff struggle of old, when it started first To bleed on the right side. I was broken and cast down with sorrow; 20
The fair sight inspired me with fear. Before me the moving beacon Changed its clothing and color. At times it was covered with blood Fearful and grimy with gore. At times with gold 'twas adorned.
Then I lay and looked for a long time
And saw the Savior's sorrowful tree 25
Until I heard it lift high its voice.
The worthiest of the wood-race formed words and spoke:
"It was ages ago—I shall always remember—
When first I was felled at the forest's edge,
My strong trunk stricken. Then strange enemies took me 30
And fashioned my frame to a cross; and their felons I raised on high.
On their backs and shoulders they bore me to the brow of the lofty hill.
There the hated ones solidly set me. I saw there the Lord of Mankind Struggling forward with courage to climb my sturdy trunk.
I dared not then oppose the purpose of the
Lord, 35
So I bent not nor broke when there burst forth a trembling

¹ A manuscript Bible written on vellum. The preparation of the skin is first described and then the writing.

From the ends of the earth. Easily might I Destroy the murderers, but I stood unmoved.
 "The Young Hero unclothed him —it was the holy God—
 Strong and steadfast; he stepped to the high gallows, 40
 Not fearing the look of the fiends, and there he freed mankind.
 At his blessed embrace I trembled, but bow to the earth I dared not,
 Or forward to fall to the ground, but fast and true I endured.
 As a rood I was raised up; a royal King I bore,
 The Lord of heavenly legions. I allowed myself never to bend. 45
 Dark nails through me they drove; so that dastardly scars are upon me,
 Wounds wide open; but not one of them dared
 I to harm.
 They cursed and reviled us together. I was covered all over with blood,
 That flowed from the Savior's side when his soul had left the flesh.
 Sorrowful the sights I have seen on that hill, 50
 Grim-visaged grief: the God of mankind I saw
 And his frightful death. The forces of darkness
 Covered with clouds the corpse of the Lord,
 The shining radiance; the shadows darkened
 Under the cover of clouds. Creation all wept,
 The king's fall bewailed. Christ was on the rood. 56
 Finally from afar came faithful comrades
 To the Savior's side, and I saw it all.
 Bitter the grief that I bore, but I bowed me low to their hands;
 My travail was grievous and sore. They took then God Almighty, 60
 From loathsome torment they lifted him. The warriors left me deserted,
 To stand stained with blood. I was stricken and wounded with nails.
 Limb-weary they laid him there, and at their Lord's head they stood.
 They beheld there the Ruler of heaven; and they halted a while to rest, Tired after the terrible struggle. A tomb then they began to make, 65
 His friends in sight of his foes. Of the fairest of stone they built it,
 And set their Savior upon it. A sorrowful dirge they chanted,
 Lamented their Master at evening, when they made their journey home, Tired from their loved Lord's side. And they left him with the guard.
 We crosses stood there streaming with blood,
 And waited long after the wailing ceased 71
 Of the brave company. The body grew cold,
 The most precious of corpses. Then they pulled us down,
 All to the earth —an awful fate!
 They buried us low in a pit. But the loved disciples of Christ, 75
 His faithful friends made search and found me
 and brought me to light,
 And gorgeously decked me with gold and with silver.
 "Now mayst thou learn, my beloved friend,
 That the work of the wicked I have worthily borne,
 The most trying of torments. The time is now come 80
 When through the wide world I am worshiped and honored,
 That all manner of men, and the mighty creation,
 Hold sacred this sign. On me the Son of God Death-pangs endured. Hence, dauntless in glory,
 I rise high under heaven, and hold out salvation 85
 To each and to all who have awe in my presence.
 "Long ago I was the greatest and most grievous of torments,
 Most painful of punishments, till I pointed aright
 The road of life for the race of men.
 "Lo, a glory was given by the God of Creation 90
 To the worthless wood —by the Warden of heaven—
 Just as Mary, his mother, the maiden blessed,
 Received grace and glory from God Almighty,
 And homage and worship over other women.
 "And now I bid thee, my best of comrades,
 That thou reveal this vision to men. 96
 Tell them I am truly the tree of glory,
 That the Savior sorrowed and suffered upon me
 For the race of men and its many sins,
 And the ancient evil that Adam wrought. 100
 "He there tasted of death; but in triumph he rose,
 The Lord in his might and gave life unto men.
 Then he ascended to heaven, and hither again

Shall the Savior descend to seek mankind
 On the day of doom, the dreaded Ruler 105
 Of highest heaven, with his host of angels.
 Then will he adjudge with justice and firmness Rewards to the worthy whose works have deserved them,
 Who loyally lived their lives on the earth.
 Then a feeling of fear shall fill every heart 110
 For the warning they had in the words of their Master:
 He shall demand of many where the man may be found
 To consent for the sake of his Savior to taste
 The bitter death as He did on the cross.
 They are filled with fear and few of them think 115
 What words they shall speak in response to Christ.
 Then no feeling of fright or fear need he have
 Who bears on his heart the brightest of tokens,
 But there shall come to the kingdom through the cross and its power
 All the souls of the saved from the sorrows of earth, 120
 Of the holy who hope for a home with their Lord."
 Then I adored the cross with undaunted
 courage,
 With the warmest zeal, while I watched alone
 And saw it in secret. My soul was eager To depart on its path, but I have passed through many 125
 An hour of longing. Through all my life
 I shall seek the sight of that sacred tree
 Alone more often than all other men
 And worthily worship it. My will for this service

Is steadfast and sturdy, and my strength is ever
 In the cross of Christ. My comrades of old, 131
 The friends of fortune, all far from the earth
 Have departed from the world and its pleasures and have passed to the King of Glory,
 And high in the heavens with the holy God
 Are living eternally. And I long for the time
 To arrive at last when the rood of the Lord, 136
 Which once so plainly appeared to my sight,
 Shall summon my soul from this sorrowful life,
 And bring me to that bourne where bliss is unending 139
 And happiness of heaven, where the holy saints
 All join in a banquet, where joy is eternal.
 May he set me where always in after time
 I shall dwell in glory with God's chosen ones
 In delights everlasting. May the Lord be my friend,
 Who came to earth and of old on the cross 145
 Suffered and sorrowed for the sins of men.
 He broke there our bonds and bought for us life
 And a heavenly home. The hearts were now filled
 With blessings and bliss, which once burned with remorse.
 To the Son was his journey successful and joyful 150
 And crowned with triumph, when he came with his troops,
 With his gladsome guests into God's kingdom,
 The Almighty Judge's, and brought joy to the angels,
 And the host of the holy who in heaven before
 Dwelt in glory when their God arrived, 155
 The Lord Most High, at his home at last.

ENGLISH IN THE MAKING

When in 1066 William the Conqueror and his Norman warriors overcame the English, the purely Anglo-Saxon history of England closed. For two hundred years the older population occupied an inferior social and economic position. The English language became the speech of laborers and serfs. Nobles and gentry spoke French and probably few of them ever troubled to learn the speech of the lower classes. We still use the English calf for the animal in the field, but the French veal when it is served up for My Lord's table, and so with cow and beef, or sheep and mutton. This social stratification between the languages kept them apart, so that when Layamon wrote his long English poem, the Brut, about 1205, he used but a handful of French words. A number of causes, however, brought it about that in the following century the two languages mixed very readily. By 1340, when Chaucer appeared, English had assumed almost its present proportion of Anglo-Saxon and French. This peculiar mixture of the most favorable elements of a Germanic and a Romance tongue was a most fortunate vehicle of expression for our first great poet, as it has been for all his successors.

Meantime both for speaking and writing, the clergy were using Latin, just as were the churchmen and all learned men from one end of Europe to the other. These Englishmen were thus right in the main stream of European culture. Their efforts were by no means confined to the laborious writing of chronicles. Many of them had been wandering scholars and had perhaps composed naughty student songs to be sung on all the roads of the Continent. They carried on philosophical debates with other Schoolmen from all over Europe. They read and retold the great international tales. They kept up the interest in the Latin classics and copied the ancient manuscripts. And they wrote saints' legends and sermons and allegories without end, and beautiful hymns. In this one period of a real international language they did their part to keep England from becoming a mere island far removed from the vigorous culture of Europe.

The Norman nobility also kept England in close touch with those social refinements that by the twelfth century were becoming the chief concern of certain of the great courts in France. The ideas of courtesy and of chivalric love became ever more prominent, especially from the time of Henry II (1154-1189) and his French queen, Eleanor of Aquitaine. The great devotion to the Virgin Mary that rose to a climax in this period was carried over into a general glorification of womanhood. Knights, in the romances at least, began to perform deeds of valor in order to secure the favor of their ladies, who now treated them disdainfully. A whole code of chivalric conduct came into being—an absurd code in many ways, but in the long run it made for a more gracious social life.

ENGLISH IN THE MAKING

Aside from ideals of courtesy the French undoubtedly added much to our literature during these formative twelfth and thirteenth centuries. English writing begins to display humor here and there, and a strong vein of satire. The frank French fabliaux with their extreme realism begin to appear in English. The florid imagination of the Orient, whether acquired through the Crusades or otherwise, also adds to the variety of literary possibilities ready for development by Geoffrey Chaucer. Moreover, the thirteenth century, through much trial and error, had evolved metrical forms that were suitable for the new composite language.

In the two centuries preceding Chaucer the most important literary products of England were the Romances. We have already seen in our discussion of French literature that for the most part France was the home of these tales of chivalry. But England played a large part in their development, especially in those centering in the Court of King Arthur.

Many different things are called Medieval Romances—not only long metrical tales of knights and their warfare, which is the most usual form, but also short poetic lays similar to fairy tales, and even long prose stories. The writers of the time recognized several “cycles” of romance: (1) Troy, (2) Alexander, (3) Charlemagne, (4) Arthur. Besides these main subjects there were many others; for instance, the oriental romances, of which we have seen a charming example in Aucassin and Nicolette.

In England the Arthurian is the most important cycle. Arthur himself was a British leader against the English invaders, but this fact became obscured with the centuries. He lived in the sixth century. By 1135 Geoffrey of Monmouth was making of him a great hero who should bring glory to England as Charlemagne had done to France. After Geoffrey's time the tales of Arthur received contributions from many sources, so that in the final development of the story which we see in Malory, about 1470, there are at least Celtic, French, and English elements. A careful study of the romances will show how this story has grown bit by bit. Each author has added a detail or an interpretation until at the end it is impossible to make a consistent story or show consistent characterization. Arthur is now the great world conqueror, now a weakling. Gawain is hero or villain.

In English the two finest products of Romance are Sir Gawain and the Green Knight and Malory's Morte d'Arthur. The Gawain poem was written somewhere in western England in the fourteenth century. It is in an alliterative meter much like the Old English poetry. Professor Banks has imitated this form with rare success in the version we use. The fine descriptive passages in the poem and the real dramatic interest have always been justly admired.

Malory wrote his long prose retelling of all the Arthurian romances at the very end of the Middle Ages. Indeed it was one of the first books to be issued in England from the newly-invented printing press. He used as the basis for his composition various poems and prose works. He speaks often of “the French book.” But whatever his sources, he has succeeded in bringing the material all together into a rather unified whole and stamping it all with his characteristic style. To most English readers Malory's story of King Arthur—perhaps modified by Tennyson—seems the only possible account of these romantic events.

At the same time as the minstrels and court poets were writing romances, the common people were having their entertainments, as they had had for thousands of years. They told tales and jokes, they had feasts and ceremonies, they danced, and they sang songs. The history of the English and Scottish ballads that began to develop in the late Middle Ages is not very clear, but we know that there must have been a great deal of singing of narrative songs in both these countries down to the beginning of the nineteenth century. These narrative songs had in English a favorite metrical form—a four line stanza with four, three, four, and three feet to the line and with the second and fourth rhyming. In most of our ballads this form is found.

As finally collected in the nineteenth century there are some 305 of these ballads, representing the poetic enjoyment of the great unlettered masses who have sung them. They have their own power, which one must come to feel by hearing them sung. For they are not poems but songs.

SIR GAWAIN AND THE GREEN KNIGHT

When the siege and assault ceased at Troy,¹ and the city Was broken, and burned all to brands and to ashes, The warrior who wove there the web of his treachery Tried was for treason, the truest on earth. 'T was Æneas, who later with lords of his lineage Provinces quelled, and became the possessors 6 Of well-nigh the whole of the wealth of the West Isles. Then swiftly to Rome rich Romulus journeyed, And soon with great splendor builded that city, Named with his own name, as now we still know it. 10 Ticius to Tuscany turns for his dwellings; In Lombardy Langobard lifts up his homes; And far o'er the French flood fortunate Brutus With happiness Britain on hillsides full broad Doth found. 15 War, waste, and wonder there Have dwelt within its bound; And bliss has changed to care In quick and shifting round. And after this famous knight founded his Britain, 20 Bold lords were bred there, delighting in battle,	Who many times dealt in destruction. More mar- vels Befell in those fields since the days of their finding Than anywhere else upon earth that I know of. Yet of all kings who came there was Arthur most comely; 25 My intention is, therefore, to tell an adventure Strange and surprising, as some men consider, A strange thing among all the marvels of Arthur. And if you will list to the lay for a little, Forthwith I shall tell it, as I in the town 30 Heard it told As it doth fast endure In story brave and bold, Whose words are fixed and sure, Known in the land of old. 35 In Camelot Arthur the King lay at Christmas, With many a peerless lord princely companioned, The whole noble number of knights of the Round Table; Here right royally held his high revels, Care-free and mirthful. Now much of the com- pany, 40 Knightly born gentlemen, joyously jousted, Now came to the court to make caroles; so kept they For full fifteen days this fashion of feasting,
---	--

Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. Translated into the original meter by Theodore Banks. Used by permission of F. S. Crofts and Company.

¹ The tradition was that Brutus, or Brut, the great-grandson of Æneas, who had settled in Britain, was ancestor of the British kings.

All meat and all mirth that a man might devise.
 Glorious to hear was the glad-hearted gaiety, 45
 Dancing at night, merry din in the daytime;
 So found in the courts and the chambers the fortunate
 Ladies and lords the delights they best loved.
 In greatest well-being abode they together:
 The knights whose renown was next to the Saviour's, 50
 The loveliest ladies who ever were living,
 And he who held court, the most comely of kings.
 For these fine folk were yet in their first flush of youth

Seated there,
 The happiest of their kind, 55
 With a king beyond compare.
 It would be hard to find
 A company so fair.

And now while the New Year was young were the nobles
 Doubly served as they sat on the dais, 60
 When Arthur had come to the hall with his court,
 In the chapel had ceased the singing of mass;
 Loud shouts were there uttered by priests and by others,
 Anew praising Noel, naming it often.
 Then hastened the lords to give handsel, cried loudly 65
 These gifts of the New Year, and gave them in person;
 Debated about them busily, briskly.
 Even though they were losers, the ladies laughed loudly,
 Nor wroth was the winner, as well ye may know.
 All this manner of mirth they made till meat-time, 70
 Then when they had washed, they went to be seated,
 Were placed in the way that appeared most proper,
 The best men above. And Guinevere, beautiful,
 Was in the midst of the merriment seated
 Upon the rich dais, adorned all about: 75
 Fine silks on all sides, and spread as a canopy
 Tapestries treasured of Tars and Toulouse,
 Embroidered and set with stones most splendid—
 They'd prove of great price if ye pence gave to buy them

Some day. 80
 The comeliest was the Queen,
 With dancing eyes of gray.
 That a fairer he had seen
 No man might truly say.

But Arthur would eat not till all were attended;
 Youthfully mirthful and merry in manner, 86
 He loved well his life, and little it pleased him
 Or long to be seated, or long to lie down,
 His young blood and wild brain were so busy and brisk.

Moreover, the King was moved by a custom 90
 He once had assumed in a spirit of splendor:
 Never to fall to his feast on a festival
 Till a strange story of something eventful
 Was told him, some marvel that merited credence
 Of kings, or of arms, or all kinds of adventures;
 Or someone besought him to send a true knight 96
 To join him in proving the perils of jousting
 Life against life, each leaving the other
 To have, as fortune would help him, the fairer lot.
 This, when the King held his court, was his custom 100

At every fine feast 'mid his followers, freemen,
 In hall.

And so with countenance clear
 He stands there strong and tall,
 Alert on that New Year, 105
 And makes much mirth with all.

At his place the strong King stands in person, full courtly
 Talking of trifles before the high table.
 There sat the good Gawain by Guinevere's side,
 And Sir Agravain, he of the Hard Hand, also, 110
 True knights, and sons of the sister of Arthur.
 At the top, Bishop Baldwin the table begins,
 And Ywain beside him ate, Urien's son.
 On the dais these sat, and were served with distinction;
 Then many a staunch, trusty man at the side tables. 115
 The first course was served to the sharp sound of trumpets,
 With numerous banners beneath hanging brightly.
 Then newly the kettledrums sounded and noble pipes;
 Wild and loud warbles awakened such echoes
 That many a heart leaped on high at their melody. 120
 Came then the choice meats, cates rare and costly,
 Of fair and fresh food such profusion of dishes
 'T was hard to find place to put by the people
 The silver that carried the various stews

On the cloth. 125
 Each to his best loved fare
 Himself helps, nothing loth;

Each two, twelve dishes share,
Good beer and bright wine both.

And now I will say nothing more of their service,
For well one may know that naught there was wanted.

Now another new noise drew nigh of a sudden,
To let all the folk take their fill of the feast.
And scarcely the music had ceased for a moment,
The first course been suitably served in the court,
When a being most dreadful burst through the hall-door,

Among the most mighty of men in his measure.
From his throat to his thighs so thick were his sinews,

His loins and his limbs so large and so long,
That I hold him half-giant, the hugest of men,
And the handsomest, too, in his height, upon horseback.

Though stalwart in breast and in back was his body,
His waist and his belly were worthily small;
Fashioned fairly he was in his form, and in features

Cut clean. 145

Men wondered at the hue
That in his face was seen.
A splendid man to view
He came, entirely green.

All green was the man, and green were his garments:

A coat, straight and close, that clung to his sides,
A bright mantle on top of this, trimmed on the inside

With closely-cut fur, right fair, that showed clearly,
The lining with white fur most lovely, and hood too,

Caught back from his locks, and laid on his shoulders,

Neat stockings that clung to his calves, tightly stretched,

Of the same green, and under them spurs of gold shining

Brightly on bands of fine silk, richly barred;
And under his legs, where he rides, guards of leather.

His vesture was verily color of verdure:

Both bars of his belt and other stones, beautiful,

Richly arranged in his splendid array

On himself and his saddle, on silken designs.

'T would be truly too hard to tell half the trifles

Embroidered about it with birds and with flies
In gay, verdant green with gold in the middle;
The bit-studs, the crupper, the breast-trappings' pendants,

And everything metal enameled in emerald.
The stirrups he stood on the same way were colored,

His saddle-bows too, and the studded nails splendid,

That all with green gems ever glimmered and glinted.

The horse he bestrode was in hue still the same,

Indeed;

Green, thick, and of great height,
And hard to curb, a steed
In broidered bridle bright
That such a man would need.

This hero in green was habited gaily,
And likewise the hair on the head of his good horse;

Fair, flowing tresses enfolded his shoulders,
And big as a bush a beard hung on his breast.

This, and the hair from his head hanging splendid,
Was clipped off evenly over his elbows,

In cut like a king's hood, covering the neck,
So that half of his arms were held underneath it.
The mane of the mighty horse much this resembled,

Well curled and combed, and with many knots covered,

Braided with gold threads about the fair green,
Now a strand made of hair, now a second of gold.

The forelock and tail were twined in this fashion,
And both of them bound with a band of bright green.

For the dock's length the tail was decked with stones dearly,

And then was tied with a thong in a tight knot,
Where many bright bells of burnished gold rang.

In the hall not one single man's seen before this
Such a horse here on earth, such a hero as on him

Goes.

That his look was lightning bright Right certain were all those Who saw. It seemed none might Endure beneath his blows.

Yet the hero carried nor helmet nor hauberk,
But bare was of armor, breastplate or gorget,

Spear-shaft or shield, to thrust or to smite.

But in one hand he bore a bough of bright holly,

That grows most greenly when bare are the groves,
 In the other an ax, gigantic, awful,
 A terrible weapon, wondrous to tell of.
 Large was the head, in length a whole ell-yard,
 The blade of green steel and beaten gold both; 210
 The bit had a broad edge, and brightly was burnished,
 As suitably shaped as sharp razors for shearing.
 This steel by its strong shaft the stern hero gripped:
 With iron it was wound to the end of the wood,
 And in work green and graceful was everywhere
 graven. 215
 About it a fair thong was folded, made fast
 At the head, and oft looped down the length of the handle.
 To this were attached many splendid tassels,
 On buttons of bright green richly embroidered.
 Thus into the hall came the hero, and hastened
 Direct to the dais, fearing no danger. 221
 He gave no one greeting, but haughtily gazed,
 And his first words were, "Where can I find him who governs
 This goodly assemblage? for gladly that man
 I would see and have speech with." So saying, from toe 225

To crown

On the knights his look he threw,
 And rolled it up and down;
 He stopped to take note who
 Had there the most renown. 230

There sat all the lords, looking long at the stranger,
 Each man of them marveling what it might mean
 For a horse and a hero to have such a hue.
 It seemed to them green as the grown grass, or greener,
 Gleaming more bright than on gold green enamel.
 The nobles who stood there, astonished, drew nearer, 236
 And deeply they wondered what deed he would do.
 Since never a marvel they'd met with like this one,
 The folk all felt it was magic or phantasy. 239
 Many great lords then were loth to give answer,
 And sat stone-still, at his speaking astounded,
 In swooning silence that spread through the hall.
 As their speech on a sudden was stilled, fast asleep
 They did seem.
 They felt not only fright 245
 But courtesy, I deem.

Let him address the knight,
 Him whom they all esteem.

This happening the King, ever keen and courageous,
 Saw from on high, and saluted the stranger 250
 Suitably, saying, "Sir, you are welcome.
 I, the head of this household, am Arthur;
 In courtesy light, and linger, I pray you,
 And later, my lord, we shall learn your desire."
 "Nay, so help me He seated on high," quoth the hero, 255
 "My mission was not to remain here a moment;
 But, sir, since thy name is so nobly renowned,
 Since thy city the best is considered, thy barons
 The stoutest in steel gear that ride upon steeds,
 Of all men in the world the most worthy and brave, 260
 Right valiant to play with in other pure pastimes,
 Since here, I have heard, is the highest of courtesy—Truly, all these things have brought me at this time.
 Sure ye may be by this branch that I bear
 That I pass as in peace, proposing no fight. 265
 If I'd come with comrades, equipped for a quarrel,
 I have at my home both hauberk and helmet,
 Shield and sharp spear, brightly shining, and other Weapons to wield, full well I know also.
 Yet softer my weeds are, since warfare I wished not; 270
 But art thou as bold as is bruited by all,
 Thou wilt graciously grant me the game that I ask for

By right."

Arthur good answer gave,
 And said, "Sir courteous knight, 275
 If battle here you crave,
 You shall not lack a fight."

"Nay, I ask for no fight; in faith, now I tell thee
 But beardless babes are about on this bench.
 Were I hasped in my armor, and high on a horse,
 Here is no man to match me, your might is so feeble. 281
 So I crave but a Christmas game in this court;
 Yule and New Year are come, and here men have
 courage;
 If one in this house himself holds so hardy,
 So bold in his blood, in his brain so unbalanced
 To dare stiffly strike one stroke for another, 286
 I give this gisarme, this rich ax, as a gift to him,
 Heavy enough, to handle as pleases him;

Bare as I sit, I shall bide the first blow.
 If a knight be so tough as to try what I tell, 290
 Let him leap to me lightly; I leave him this weapon,
 Quitclaim it forever, to keep as his own;
 And his stroke here, firm on this floor, I shall suffer,
 This boon if thou grant'st me, the blow with another
 To pay; 295
 Yet let his spite be
 A twelvemonth and a day.
 Come, let us quickly see
 If one here aught dare say."

If at first he had startled them, stiller then sat
 there 300
 The whole of the court, low and high, in the hall.
 The knight on his steed turned himself in his saddle,
 And fiercely his red eyes he rolled all around,
 Bent his bristling brows, with green gleaming brightly,
 And waved his beard, waiting for one there to rise. 305
 And when none of the knights spoke, he coughed right noisily,
 Straightened up proudly, and started to speak:
 "What!" quoth the hero, "Is this Arthur's household,
 The fame of whose fellowship fills many kingdoms?
 Now where is your vainglory? Where are your victories? 310
 Where is your grimness, your great words, your anger?
 For now the Round Table's renown and its revel
 Is worsted by one word of one person's speech,
 For all shiver with fear before a stroke's shown."
 Then so loudly he laughed that the lord was grieved greatly, 315
 And into his fair face his blood shot up fiercely
 For shame.
 As wroth as wind he grew,
 And all there did the same.
 The King that no fear knew 320
 Then to that stout man came.

And said, "Sir, by heaven, strange thy request is;
 As folly thou soughtest, so shouldest thou find it.
 I know that not one of the knights is aghast
 Of thy great words. Give me thy weapon, for God's sake, 325

And gladly the boon thou hast begged I shall grant thee."
 He leaped to him quickly, caught at his hand,
 And fiercely the other lord lights on his feet.
 Now Arthur lays hold of the ax by the handle,
 As if he would strike with it, swings it round
 sternly. 330
 Before him the strong man stood, in stature
 A head and more higher than all in the house.
 Stroking his beard, he stood with stern bearing,
 And with a calm countenance drew down his coat,
 No more frightened or stunned by the ax Arthur flourished 335
 Than if on the bench someone brought him a flagon

Of wine.
 Gawain by Guinevere
 Did to the King incline:
 "I pray in accents clear 340
 To let this fray be mine."

"If you now, honored lord," said this knight to King Arthur,
 "Would bid me to step from this bench, and to stand there
 Beside you—so could I with courtesy quit then
 The table, unless my liege lady disliked it— 345
 I'd come to your aid before all your great court.
 For truly I think it a thing most unseemly
 So boldly to beg such a boon in your hall here,
 Though you in person are pleased to fulfill it, While here on the benches such brave ones are seated, 350
 Than whom under heaven, I think, none are higher
 In spirit, none better in body for battle.
 I am weakest and feeblest in wit, I know well,
 And my life, to say truth, would be least loss of any.
 I only since you are my uncle have honor; 355
 Your blood the sole virtue I bear in my body.
 Unfit is this foolish affair for you. Give it
 To me who soonest have sought it, and let
 All this court if my speech is not seemly, decide
 Without blame." 360
 The nobles gather round,
 And all advise the same:
 To free the King that's crowned,
 And Gawain give the game.

The King then commanded his kinsman to rise, 365

And quickly he rose up and came to him courteously,

Kneeled by the King, and caught the weapon,
He left it graciously, lifted his hand,

And gave him God's blessing, and gladly bade him

Be sure that his heart and his hand both were hardy. 370

"Take care," quoth the King, "how you start, coz, your cutting,

And truly, I think, if rightly you treat him,
That blow you'll endure that he deals you after."

Weapon in hand, Gawain goes to the hero,
Who boldly remains there, dismayed none the more. 375

Then the knight in the green thus greeted Sir Gawain,

"Let us state our agreement again ere proceeding.
And now first, sir knight, what your name is I beg
That you truly will tell, so in that I may trust."

"In truth," said the good knight, "I'm called Sir Gawain, 380

Who fetch you this blow, whatsoever befalls,
And another will take in return, this time twelve-month,

From you, with what weapon you will; with no other

I'll go."

The other made reply: 385

"By my life here below,
Gawain, right glad am I
To have you strike this blow.

By God," said the Green Knight, "Sir Gawain, it pleases me—

Here, at thy hand, I shall have what I sought. 390

Thou hast rightly rehearsed to me, truly and readily,

All of the covenant asked of King Arthur;
Except that thou shalt, by thy troth, sir, assure me

Thyself and none other shalt seek me, wherever Thou thinkest to find me, and fetch thee what wages 395

Are due for the stroke that today thou dost deal me

Before all this splendid assembly." "Where should I,"

Said Gawain, "go look for the land where thou livest?

The realm where thy home is, by Him who hath wrought me,

I know not, nor thee, sir, thy court nor thy name.
Truly tell me thy title, and teach me the road, 401

And I'll use all my wit to win my way thither.

And so by my sure word truly I swear."

"'T is enough. No more now at New Year is needed,"

The knight in the green said to Gawain the courteous: 405

"If truly I tell when I've taken your tap

And softly you've struck me, if swiftly I tell you
My name and my house and my home, you may then

Of my conduct make trial, and your covenant keep; 409

And if no speech I speak, you speed all the better:
No longer need look, but may stay in your land.

But ho!

Take your grim tool with speed,

And let us see your blow."

Stroking his ax, "Indeed," 415

Said Gawain, "gladly so."

With speed then the Green Knight took up his stand,

Inclined his head forward, uncovering the flesh,
And laid o'er his crown his locks long and lovely,

And bare left the nape of his neck for the business.
His ax Gawain seized, and swung it on high; 421

On the floor his left foot he planted before him,
And swiftly the naked flesh smote with his weapon.

The sharp edge severed the bones of the stranger,
Cut through the clear flesh and cleft it in twain,
So the blade of the brown steel bit the ground deeply. 426

The fair head fell from the neck to the floor,
So that where it rolled forth with their feet many spurned it.

The blood on the green glistened, burst from the body;

And yet neither fell nor faltered the hero, 430

But stoutly he started forth, strong in his stride;

Fiercely he rushed 'mid the ranks of the Round Table,

Seized and uplifted his lovely head straightway;
Then back to his horse went, laid hold of the bridle,

Stepped into the stirrup and strode up aloft, 435

His head holding fast in his hand by the hair.

And the man as soberly sat in his saddle

As if he unharmed were, although now headless, Instead.

His trunk around he spun, 440
That ugly body that bled.

Frightened was many a one
When he his words had said.

For upright he holds the head in his hand,
And confronts with the face the fine folk on the dais. 445

It lifted its lids, and looked forth directly,
Speaking this much with its mouth, as ye hear:
"Gawain, look that to go as agreed you are ready,
And seek for me faithfully, sir, till you find me,
As, heard by these heroes, you vowed in this hall.
To the Green Chapel go you, I charge you, to get Such a stroke as you struck. You are surely deserving, 452

Sir knight, to be promptly repaid at the New Year.

As Knight of the Green Chapel many men know
me;

If therefore to find me you try, you will fail not;
Then come, or be recreant called as befits thee." 456
With furious wrench of the reins he turned round,
And rushed from the hall-door, his head in his hands,

So the fire of the flint flew out from the foal's hoofs.

Not one of the lords knew the land where he went to, 460

No more than the realm whence he rushed in among them.

What then?

The King and Gawain there
At the Green Knight laughed again;
Yet this the name did bear 465
Of wonder among men.

Though much in his mind did the courtly King marvel,

He let not a semblance be seen, but said loudly
With courteous speech to the Queen, most comely:
"Today, my dear lady, be never alarmed; 470
Such affairs are for Christmas well fitted to sing of
And gaily to laugh at when giving an interlude,
'Mid all the company's caroles, most courtly.
None the less I may go now to get my meat;
For I needs must admit I have met with a marvel." 475

He glanced at Sir Gawain, and gladsomely said:
"Now, sir, hang up thine ax; enough it has hewn."
O'er the dais 't was placed, to hang on the dosser,
That men might remark it there as a marvel,
And truly describing, might tell of the wonder.
Together these two then turned to the table, 481

The sovereign and good knight, and swiftly men
served them

With dainties twofold, as indeed was most fitting,
All manner of meat and of minstrelsy both.
So the whole day in pleasure they passed till night fell 485

O'er the land.

Now take heed Gawain lest,
Fearing the Green Knight's brand,
Thou shrinkest from the quest
That thou hast ta'en in hand. 490

II

This sample had Arthur of strange things right early,

When young was the year, for he yearned to hear boasts.

Though such words when they went to be seated were wanting,

Yet stocked are they now with hand-fulls of stern work.

In the hall glad was Gawain those games to begin,
But not strange it would seem if sad were the ending; 496

For though men having drunk much are merry in mind,

Full swift flies a year, never yielding the same,
The start and the close very seldom according.
So past went this Yule, and the year followed after,
Each season in turn succeeding the other. 501

There came after Christmas the crabbed Lenten,
With fish and with plainer food trying the flesh;
But then the world's weather with winter contends;

Down to earth shrinks the cold, the clouds are uplifted; 505

In showers full warm descends the bright rain,
And falls on the fair fields. Flowers unfold;
The ground and the groves are green in their garments;

Birds hasten to build, blithesomely singing
For soft summer's solace ensuing on slopes 510 Everywhere.

The blossoms swell and blow,
In hedge-rows rich and rare,
And notes most lovely flow
From out the forest fair. 515

After this comes the season of soft winds of summer,
When Zephyrus sighs on the seeds and the green plants.

The herb that then grows in the ground is right happy,
When down from the leaves drops the dampening
dew 519

To abide the bright sun that is blissfully shining.
But autumn comes speeding, soon grows severe,
And warns it to wax full ripe for the winter.
With drought then the dust is driven to rise,
From the face of the fields to fly to the heaven.
With the sun the wild wind of the welkin is struggling;
525

The leaves from the limbs drop, and light on the ground;

And withers the grass that grew once so greenly.
Then all ripens that formerly flourished, and rots;
And thus passes the year in yesterdays many,
And winter, in truth, as the way of the world is,
Draws near, 531

Till comes the Michaelmas moon
With pledge of winter sere.
Then thinks Sir Gawain soon
Of his dread voyage drear. 535

Till the tide of Allhallows with Arthur he tarried;

The King made ado on that day for his sake
With rich and rare revel of all of the Round Table,
Knights most courteous, comely ladies,
All of them heavy at heart for the hero. 540
Yet nothing but mirth was uttered, though many Joyless made jests for that gentleman's sake.
After meat, with sorrow he speaks to his uncle,
And openly talks of his travel, saying:

"Liege lord of my life, now I ask of you leave. 545
You know my case and condition, nor care I
To tell of its troubles even a trifle.

I must, for the blow I am bound to, tomorrow
Go seek as God guides me the man in the green."
Then came there together the best in the castle:
Ywain, Eric, and others full many, 551
Sir Dodinel de Sauvage, the Duke of Clarence,
Lancelot, Lyonel, Lucan the good,
Sir Bors and Sir Bedevere, both of them big men,
Mador de la Port, and many more nobles. 555
All these knights of the court came near to the King

With care in their hearts to counsel the hero;
Heavy and deep was the dole in the hall
That one worthy as Gawain should go on that errand,

To suffer an onerous stroke, and his own sword
To stay. 561

The knight was of good cheer:

"Why should I shrink away
From a fate stern and drear?
A man can but essay." 565

He remained there that day; in the morning made ready.

Early he asked for his arms; all were brought him.
And first a fine carpet was laid on the floor,
And much was the gilt gear that glittered upon it.
Thereon stepped the strong man, and handled the steel, 570

Dressed in a doublet of Tars that cost dearly,
A hood made craftily, closed at the top,
And about on the lining bound with a bright fur.
Then they set on his feet shoes fashioned of steel,
And with fine greaves of steel encircled his legs.
Knee-pieces to these were connected, well polished,
Secured round his knees with knots of gold. 577
Then came goodly cuisses, with cunning enclosing
His thick, brawny thighs; with thongs they attached them.

Then the man was encased in a coat of fine mail,
With rings of bright steel on a rich stuff woven,
Braces well burnished on both of his arms, 582
Elbow-pieces gay, good, and gloves of plate,
All the goodliest gear that would give him most succor

That tide: 585

Coat armor richly made,
His gold spurs fixed with pride,
Girt his unfailing blade
By a silk sash to his side.

When in arms he was clasped, his costume was costly; 590
The least of the lacings or loops gleamed with gold.

And armed in this manner, the man heard mass,
At the altar adored and made offering, and afterward

Came to the King and all of his courtiers,
Gently took leave of the ladies and lords; 595
Him they kissed and escorted, to Christ him commending.

Then was Gringolet ready, girt with a saddle
That gaily with many a gold fringe was gleaming,
With nails studded newly, prepared for the nonce.
The bridle was bound about, barred with bright
gold; 600

With the bow of the saddle, the breastplate, the splendid skirts,
Crupper, and cloth in adornment accorded,
With gold nails arrayed on a groundwork of red,

That glittered and glinted like gleams of the sun.
Then he caught up his helm, and hastily kissed
it; 605

It stoutly was stapled and stuffed well within,
High on his head, and hasped well behind,
With a light linen veil laid over the visor, Embroidered and bound with the brightest of gems

On a silken border; with birds on the seams 610
Like painted parroquets preening; true love-knots
As thickly with turtle doves tangled as though
Many women had been at the work seven winters

In town.

Great was the circle's price 615
Encompassing his crown;
Of diamonds its device,
That were both bright and brown.

Then they showed him his shield, sheer gules, whereon shone

The pentangle painted in pure golden hue. 620
On his baldric he caught, and about his neck cast
it;

And fairly the hero's form it befitted.
And why that great prince the pentangle suited Intend I to tell, in my tale though I tarry.

'T is a sign that Solomon formerly set 625
As a token, for so it doth symbol, of truth.

A figure it is that with five points is furnished;
Each line overlaps and locks in another,
Nor comes to an end; and Englishmen call it Everywhere, hear I, the endless knot. 630

It became then the knight and his noble arms also,
In five ways, and five times each way still faithful.
Sir Gawain was known as the good, refined gold,
Graced with virtues of castle, of villainy void,

Made clean. 635

So the pentangle new
On shield and coat was seen,
As man of speech most true,
And gentlest knight of mien.

First, in his five wits he faultless was found;
In his five fingers too the man never failed; 641
And on earth all his faith was fixed on the five wounds

That Christ, as the creed tells, endured on the cross.

Wheresoever this man was midmost in battle,
His thought above everything else was in this, 646
To draw all his fire from the fivefold joys
That the fair Queen of Heaven felt in her child.
And because of this fitly he carried her image

Displayed on his shield, on its larger part,
That whenever he saw it his spirit should sink not.
The fifth five the hero made use of, I find, 651
More than all were his liberalness, love of his fellows,

His courtesy, chasteness, unchangeable ever,
And pity, all further traits passing. These five
In this hero more surely were set than in any. 655
In truth now, fivefold they were fixed in the knight,

Linked each to the other without any end,
And all of them fastened on five points unfailing;
Each side they neither united nor sundered,
Evermore endless at every angle, 660
Where equally either they ended or started.
And so his fair shield was adorned with this symbol,

Thus richly with red gold wrought on red gules,
So by people the pentangle perfect 't was called
As it ought. 665

Gawain in arms is gay;
Right there his lance he caught,
And gave them all good-day
For ever, as he thought.

He set spurs to his steed, and sprang on his way
So swiftly that sparks from the stone flew behind
him. 671

All who saw him, so seemly, sighed, sad at heart;
The same thing, in sooth, each said to the other,
Concerned for that comely man: "Christ, 't is a shame

Thou, sir knight, must be lost whose life is so noble! 675

To find, faith! his equal on earth is not easy.
'T would wiser have been to have acted more warily,

Dubbed yonder dear one a duke. He seems clearly
To be in the land here a brilliant leader:
So better had been than brought thus to naught,
By an elf-man beheaded for haughty boasting. 681
Who e'er knew any king such counsel to take,
As foolish as one in a Christmas frolic?"

Much was the warm water welling from eyes
When the seemingly hero set out from the city 685
That day.

Nowhere he abode,
But swiftly went his way;
By devious paths he rode,
As I the book heard say. 690

Through the realm of Logres now rides this
lord,

Sir Gawain, for God's sake, no game though he thought it.

Oft alone, uncompanioned he lodges at night
Where he finds not the fare that he likes set before him.

Save his foal, he'd no fellow by forests and hills;
On the way, no soul but the Savior to speak to. 696
At length he drew nigh unto North Wales, and leaving

To left of him all of the islands of Anglesey,
Fared by the forelands and over the fords
Near the Holy Head; hastening hence to the mainland, 700

In Wyrall he went through the wilderness. There, Lived but few who loved God or their fellows with good heart.

And always he asked of any he met,
As he journeyed, if nearby a giant they knew of,
A green knight, known as the Knight of the Green Chapel. 705

All denied it with nay, in their lives they had never

Once seen any hero who had such a hue
Of green.

The knight takes roadways strange
In many a wild terrene; 710
Often his feelings change
Before that chapel's seen.

Over many cliffs climbed he in foreign countries;

From friends far sundered, he fared as a stranger;
And wondrous it were, at each water or shore 715

That he passed, if he found not before him a foe,
So foul too and fell that to fight he could fail not.

The marvels he met with amount to so many Too tedious were it to tell of the tenth part.

For sometimes with serpents he struggled and wolves too, 720

With wood-trolls sometimes in stony steepes dwelling,

And sometimes with bulls and with bears and with boars;

And giants from high fells hunted and harassed him.

If he'd been not enduring and doughty, and served God,

These doubtless would often have done him to death. 725

Though warfare was grievous, worse was the winter,

When cold, clear water was shed from the clouds
That froze ere it fell to the earth, all faded.

With sleet nearly slain, he slept in his armor
More nights than enough on the naked rocks, 730
Where splashing the cold stream sprang from the summit,

And hung in hard icicles high o'er his head.
Thus in peril and pain and desperate plights,
Till Christmas Eve wanders this wight through the country

Alone. 735

Truly the knight that tide
To Mary made his moan,
That she direct his ride
To where some hearth-fire shone.

By a mount on the morn he merrily rides 740
To a wood dense and deep that was wondrously wild;

High hills on each hand, with forests of hoar oaks
Beneath them most huge, a hundred together.

Thickly the hazel and hawthorn were tangled,
Everywhere mantled with moss rough and ragged,

With many a bird on the bare twigs, mournful,
That piteously piped for pain of the cold. 747

Sir Gawain on Gringolet goes underneath them
Through many a marsh and many a mire,

Unfriended, fearing to fail in devotion, 750
And see not His service, that Sire's, on that very

night
Born of a Virgin to vanquish our pain.

And so sighing he said: "Lord, I beseech Thee,
And Mary, the mildest mother so dear,

For some lodging wherein to hear mass full lowly,
And matins, meekly I ask it, tomorrow; 756

So promptly I pray my pater and ave
And creed."

Thus rode he as he prayed,
Lamenting each misdeed; 760
Often the sign he made,
And said, "Christ's cross me speed."

He scarcely had signed himself thrice, ere he saw

In the wood on a mound a moated mansion,
Above a fair field, enfolded in branches 765

Of many a huge tree hard by the ditches:
The comeliest castle that knight ever kept.

In a meadow 't was placed, with a park all about,
And a palisade, spiked and pointed, set stoutly

Round many a tree for more than two miles. 770
The lord on that one side looked at the stronghold

That shimmered and shone through the shapely oak trees;

Then duly his helm doffed, and gave his thanks humbly

To Jesus and Julian, both of them gentle,
For showing him courtesy, hearing his cry. 775

"Now good lodging," quoth Gawain, "I beg you to grant me."

Then with spurs in his gilt heels he Gringolet strikes,

Who chooses the chief path by chance that conducted

The man to the bridge-end ere many a minute
Had passed. 780

The bridge secure was made,
Upraised; the gates shut fast;
The walls were well arrayed.
It feared no tempest's blast.

The hero abode on his horse by the bank 785
Of the deep, double ditch that surrounded the dwelling.

The wall stood wonderfully deep in the water,
And again to a huge height sprang overhead;
Of hard, hewn rock that reached to the cornices,
Built up with outworks under the battlements 790
Finely; at intervals, turrets fair fashioned,
With many good loopholes that shut tight; this
lord

Had ne'er looked at a barbican better than this one.

Further in he beheld the high hall; here and there
Towers were stationed set thickly with spires, 795
With finials wondrously long and fair fitting,
Whose points were cunningly carven, and craftily.
There numerous chalk-white chimneys he noticed That bright from the tops of the towers were gleaming.

Such pinnacles painted, so placed about everywhere, 800

Clustering so thick 'mid the crenels, the castle
Surely appeared to be shaped to cut paper.
The knight on his foal it fair enough fancies
If into the court he may manage to come,
In that lodging to live while the holiday lasts 805
With delight.

A porter came at call.
His mission learned, and right
Civilly from the wall
Greeted the errant knight. 810

Quoth Gawain: "Good sir, will you go on my errand,
Harbor to crave of this house's high lord?"

"Yea, by Peter. I know well, sir knight," said the porter,

"You're welcome as long as you list here to tarry."
Then went the man quickly, and with him, to welcome 815

The knight to the castle, a courteous company.
Down the great drawbridge they dropped, and went eagerly

Forth; on the frozen earth fell on their knees
To welcome this knight in the way they thought worthy;

Threw wide the great gate for Gawain to enter.
He bid them rise promptly, and rode o'er the bridge. 821

His saddle several seized as he lighted,
And stout men in plenty stabled his steed.
And next there descended knights and esquires
To lead to the hall with delight this hero. 825
When he raised his helmet, many made haste
From his hand to catch it, to care for the courtly man.

Some of them took then his sword and his shield
both. 828

Then Gawain graciously greeted each knight;
Many proud men pressing to honor that prince,
To the hall they led him, all hasped in his harness,
Where fiercely a fair fire flamed on the hearth.
Then came the lord of this land from his chamber
To fittingly meet the man on the floor,
And said: "You are welcome to do what your will is; 835

To hold as your own, you have all that is here
In this place."

"Thank you," said Gawain then
"May Christ reward this grace."
The two like joyful men 840
Each other then embrace.

Gawain gazed at the man who so graciously greeted him;
Doughty he looked, the lord of that dwelling,
A hero indeed huge, hale, in his prime; 844
His beard broad and bright, its hue all of beaver;
Stern, and on stalwart shanks steadily standing;
Fell faced as the fire, in speech fair and free.
In sooth, well suited he seemed, thought Gawain,
To govern as prince of a goodly people.
To his steward the lord turned, and strictly commanded 850

To send men to Gawain to give him good service;
And prompt at his bidding were people in plenty.
To a bright room they brought him, the bed nobly decked

With hangings of pure silk with clear golden hems.

And curious coverings with comely panels, 855
Embroidered with bright fur above at the edges;
On cords curtains running with rings of red gold;
From Tars and Toulouse were the tapestries cover-
ing

The walls; under foot on the floor more to match.
There he soon, with mirthful speeches, was stripped 860

Of his coat of linked mail and his armor; and quickly

Men ran, and brought him rich robes, that the best He might pick out and choose as his change of apparel.

When lapped was the lord in the one he selected,
That fitted him fairly with flowing skirts, 865
The fur by his face, in faith it seemed made,
To the company there, entirely of colors,
Glowing and lovely; beneath all his limbs were.
That never made Christ a comelier knight

They thought. 870

On earth, or far or near,
It seemed as if he ought
To be a prince sans peer
In fields where fierce men fought.

A chair by the chimney where charcoal was burning 875

For Gawain was fitted most finely with cloths,
Both cushions and coverlets, cunningly made.
Then a comely mantle was cast on the man,
Of a brown, silken fabric bravely embroidered,
Within fairly furred with the finest of skins, 880
Made lovely with ermine, his hood fashioned likewise.

He sat on that settle in clothes rich and seemly;
His mood, when well he was warmed, quickly mended.

Soon was set up a table on trestles most fair;
With a clean cloth that showed a clear white it was covered 885

With top-cloth and salt-cellar, spoons too of silver.
When he would the man washed, and went to his meat,

And seemly enough men served him with several Excellent stews in the best manner seasoned,

Twofold as was fitting, and various fishes; 890
In bread some were baked, some broiled on the coals,

Some seethed, some in stews that were savored with spices;

And ever such subtly made sauces as pleased him.
He freely and frequently called it a feast,
Most courtly; the company there all acclaimed him
Well-bred. 896

"But now this penance take,
And soon 't will mend," they said.
That man much mirth did make,
As wine went to his head. 900

They enquired then and queried in guarded questions

Tactfully put to the prince himself,
Till he courteously owned he came of the court
The lord Arthur, gracious and goodly, alone holds,
Who rich is and royal, the Round Table's King;
And that Gawain himself in that dwelling was seated, 906

For Christmas come, as the case had befallen.
When he learned that he had that hero, the lord
Laughed loudly thereat so delightful he thought it.
Much merriment made all the men in that castle
By promptly appearing then in his presence; 911
For all prowess and worth and pure polished manners

Pertain to his person. He ever is praised;
Of all heroes on earth his fame is the highest.
Each knight full softly said to his neighbor, 915
"We now shall see, happily, knightly behavior,
And faultless terms of talking most noble;
What profit 's in speech we may learn without seeking,

For nurture's fine father has found here a welcome;

In truth God has graciously given His grace 920
Who grants us to have such a guest as Gawain
When men for His birth's sake sit merry and sing.

To each

Of us this hero now
Will noble manners teach; 925
Who hear him will learn how
To utter loving speech."

When at length the dinner was done, and the lords

Had risen, the night-time nearly was come.
The chaplains went their way to the chapels 930
And rang right joyfully, just as they should do,
For evensong solemn this festival season.

To this goes the lord, and the lady likewise;
She comes in with grace to the pew closed and comely,
And straightway Gawain goes thither right gaily;

The lord by his robe took him, led to a seat, 936 Acknowledged him kindly and called him by name,

Saying none in the world was as welcome as he was.

He heartily thanked him; the heroes embraced,
And together they soberly sat through the service.
Then longed the lady to look on the knight, 941
And emerged from her pew with many fair maidens;

In face she was fairest of all, and in figure,
In skin and in color, all bodily qualities;
Lovelier, Gawain thought, even than Guinevere.
He goes through the chancel to greet her, so gracious. 946

By the left hand another was leading her, older
Than she, a lady who looked as if aged,
By heroes around her revered highly.
The ladies, however, unlike were to look on: 950
If fresh was the younger, the other was yellow;
Rich red on the one was rioting everywhere,
Rough wrinkled cheeks hung in rolls on the other;
One's kerchiefs, with clear pearls covered and many,

Displayed both her breast and her bright throat all bare, 955
Shining fairer than snow on the hillsides falling;
The second her neck in a neck-cloth enswathed,
That enveloped in chalk-white veils her black chin;

Her forehead in silk was wrapped and enfolded
Adorned and tricked with trifles about it 960
Till nothing was bare but the lady's black brows,
Her two eyes, her nose, and her lips, all naked,
And those were bleared strangely, and ugly to see.
A goodly lady, so men before God

Might decide! 965

Her body thick and short
Her hips were round and wide;
One of more pleasant sort
She led there by her side.

When Gawain had gazed on that gay one so gracious 970

In look, he took leave of the lord and went toward them,

Saluted the elder, bowing full lowly,
The lovelier lapped in his two arms a little,
And knightly and comely greeted and kissed her.
They craved his acquaintance, and quickly he asked 975

To be truly their servant if so they desired it.

They took him between them, and led him with talk

To the sitting-room's hearth; then straightway for spices

They called, which men sped to unsparingly bring,
And with them as well pleasant wine at each com-
ing. 980

Up leaped right often the courteous lord, Urged many a time that the men should make merry,

Snatched off his hood, on a spear gaily hung it,
And waved it, that one for a prize might win it
Who caused the most mirth on that Christmas season. 985

"I shall try, by my faith, to contend with the finest Ere hoodless I find myself, helped by my friends."
Thus with laughing speeches the lord makes merry
That night, to gladden Sir Gawain with games.

So they spent 990

The evening in the hall.
The king for lights then sent,
And taking leave of all
To bed Sir Gawain went.

On the morn when the Lord, as men all remember, 995
Was born, who would die for our doom, in each dwelling

On earth grows happiness greater for His sake;
So it did on that day there with many a dainty:
With dishes cunningly cooked at meal-times,
With doughty men dressed in their best on the dais. 1000

The old lady was seated the highest; beside her
Politely the lord took his place, I believe;
The gay lady and Gawain together sat, mid-most,
Where fitly the food came, and afterward fairly Was served through the hall as beseemed them the best, 1005

Of the company each in accord with his station.
There was meat and mirth, there was much joy,
too troublous

To tell, though I tried in detail to describe it;
Yet I know both the lovely lady and Gawain
So sweet found each other's society (pleasant 1010
And polished their converse, courtly and private;
Unfailing their courtesy, free from offense)
That surpassing, in truth, any play of a prince was Their game.

1015

There trumpets, drums and airs
Of piping loudly came.
Each minded his affairs,
And those two did the same.

Much mirth was that day and the day after made,

And the third followed fast, as full of delight.
Sweet was the joy of St. John's day to hear of, 1021
The last, as the folk there believed, of the festival.
Guests were to go in the gray dawn, and therefore
They wondrously late were awake with their wine,
And danced delightful, long lasting caroles. 1025
At length when 't was late they took their leave,
Each strong man among them to start on his way.
Gawain gave him good-day; then the good man laid hold of him,

Led to the hearth in his own room the hero;
There took him aside, and gave suitable thanks
For the gracious distinction that Gawain had given
In honoring his house that holiday season, 1032
And gracing his castle with courteous company.
"I'll truly as long as I live be the better
That Gawain at God's own feast was my guest."
"Gramercy," said Gawain, "by God, sir, not mine
Is the worth, but your own; may the high King
reward you. 1037

I am here at your will to work your behest,
As in high and low it behooves me to do

By right." 1040

The lord intently tries Longer to hold the knight;
Gawain to him replies
That he in no way might.

Then the man with courteous question enquired 1045

What dark deed that feast time had driven him forth,

From the King's court to journey alone with such courage,

Ere fully in homes was the festival finished.

"In sooth," said the knight, "sir, ye say but the truth;

From these hearths a high and a hasty task took
me. 1050

Myself, I am summoned to seek such a place

As to find it I know not whither to fare.

I'd not fail to have reached it the first of the New Year,

So help me our Lord, for the whole land of Logres;

And therefore, I beg this boon of you here, sir;

Tell me, in truth, if you ever heard tale 1056

Of the Chapel of Green, of the ground where it stands,

And the knight, green colored, who keeps it. By solemn

Agreement a tryst was established between us,
That man at that landmark to meet if I lived.

And now there lacks of New Year but little; 1061
I'd look at that lord, if God would but let me,
More gladly than own any good thing, by God's Son.

And hence, by your leave, it behooves me to go;
I now have but barely three days to be busy. 1065
As fain would I fall dead as fail of my mission."
Then laughing the lord said: "You longer must stay,

For I'll point out the way to that place ere the time's end,

The ground of the Green Chapel. Grieve no further; 1069

For, sir, you shall be in your bed at your ease
Until late, and fare forth the first of the year,
To your meeting place come by mid-morning, to do
there

Your pleasure.

Tarry till New Year's day,
Then rise and go at leisure. 1075
I'll set you on your way;
Not two miles is the measure."

Then was Gawain right glad, and gleefully laughed.

"Now for this more than anything else, sir, I thank
you. 1079

I have come to the end of my quest; at your will
I shall bide, and in all things act as you bid me."

The lord then seized him, and set him beside him,
And sent for the ladies to better delight him.

Seemly the pleasure among them in private. 1084
So gay were the speeches he spoke, and so friendly,

The host seemed a man well-nigh mad in behavior.
He called to the knight there, crying aloud:

"Ye have bound you to do the deed that I bid you.
Here, and at once, will you hold to your word,
sir?"

"Yes, certainly, sir," the true hero said; 1090

"While I bide in your house I obey your behest."

"You have toiled," said the lord; "from afar have traveled,

And here have caroused, nor are wholly recovered
In sleep or in nourishment, know I for certain.

In your room you shall linger, and lie at your ease
Tomorrow till mass-time, and go to your meat 1096

When you will, and with you my wife to amuse
you

With company, till to the court I return.

You stay

And I shall early rise, 1100

And hunting go my way."
Bowling in courteous wise,
Gawain grants all this play.

"And more," said the man, "let us make an agreement:

Whatever I win the wood shall be yours; 1105
And what chance you shall meet shall be mine in exchange.

Sir, let's so strike our bargain and swear to tell truly

Whate'er fortune brings, whether bad, sir, or better."

Quoth Gawain the good: "By God, I do grant it.
What pastime you please appears to me pleasant."
"On the beverage brought us the bargain is made," 1111

So the lord of the land said. All of them laughed,
And drank, and light-heartedly reveled and dalled,

Those ladies and lords, as long as they liked.
Then they rose with elaborate politeness, and lingered, 1115

With many fair speeches spoke softly together.
Right lovingly kissed, and took leave of each other.
Gay troops of attendants with glimmering torches
In comfort escorted each man to his couch

To rest. 1120

Yet ere they left the board
Their promise they professed Often. That people's lord
Could well maintain a jest.

III

Betimes rose the folk ere the first of the day;
The guests that were going then summoned their grooms, 1126

Who hastily sprang up to saddle their horses,
Packed their bags and prepared all their gear.
The nobles made ready, to ride all arrayed;
And quickly they leaped and caught up their bridles, 1130

And started, each wight on the way that well pleased him.

The land's beloved lord not last was equipped
For riding, with many a man too. A morsel
He hurriedly ate when mass he had heard,
And promptly with horn to the hunting field hastened. 1135

And ere any daylight had dawned upon earth,
Both he and his knights were high on their horses.
The dog-grooms, accomplished, the hounds then coupled,

The door of the kennel unclosed, called them out,
On the bugle mightily blew three single notes; 1140
Whereupon bayed with a wild noise the brachets,
And some they turned back that went straying, and punished.

The hunters, I heard, were a hundred. To station
They go,

The keepers of the hounds, 1145
And off the leashes throw.
With noise the wood resounds
From the good blasts they blow.

At the first sound of questing, the wild creatures quaked;

The deer fled, foolish from fright, in the dale,
To the high ground hastened, but quickly were halted 1151

By beaters, loud shouting, stationed about
In a circle. The harts were let pass with their high heads,

And also the bucks, broad-antlered and bold;
For the generous lord by law had forbidden 1155
All men with the male deer to meddle in close season.

The hinds were hemmed in with hey! and ware!
The does to the deep valleys driven with great din.
You might see as they loosed them the shafts swiftly soar—

At each turn of the forest their feathers went flying— 1160

That deep into brown hides bit with their broad heads;

Lo! they brayed on the hill-sides, bled there, and died,

And hounds, fleet-footed, followed them headlong.
And hunters after them hastened with horns

So loud in their sharp burst of sound as to sunder
The cliffs. What creatures escaped from the shooters, 1166

Hunted and harried from heights to the waters,
Were pulled down and rent at the places there ready;

Such skill the men showed at these low-lying stations,

So great were the greyhounds that quickly they got them 1170

And dragged them down, fast as the folk there might look

At the sight.

Carried with bliss away,
The lord did oft alight,
Oft gallop; so that day 1175
He passed till the dark night.

Thus frolicked the lord on the fringe of the forest,

And Gawain the good in his gay bed reposed,
Lying snugly, till sunlight shone on the walls,
'Neath a coverlet bright with curtains about it.
As softly he slumbered, a slight sound he heard
At his door, made with caution, and quickly it opened. 1182

The hero heaved up his head from the clothes;
By a corner he caught up the curtain a little,
And glanced out with heed to behold what had happened. 1185

The lady it was, most lovely to look at,
Who shut the door after her stealthily, slyly,
And turned toward the bed. Then the brave man, embarrassed,

Lay down again subtly to seem as if sleeping;
And stilly she stepped, and stole to his bed, 1190
There cast up the curtain, and creeping within it,
Seated herself on the bedside right softly,
And waited a long while to watch when he woke.
And the lord too, lurking, lay there a long while,
Wondering at heart what might come of this happening, 1195

Or what it might mean—a marvel he thought it.
Yet he said to himself, "T would be surely more seemly

By speaking at once to see what she wishes."
Then roused he from sleep, and stretching turned toward her,

His eyelids unlocked, made believe that he wondered, 1200

And signed himself so by his prayers to be safer
From fall.

Right sweet in chin and cheek,
Both white and red withal,
Full fairly she did speak 1205
With laughing lips and small.

"Good morrow, Sir Gawain," that gay lady said,
"You're a sleeper unwary, since so one may steal
in.

In a trice you are ta'en! If we make not a truce,
In your bed, be you certain of this, I shall bind
you." 1210

All laughing, the lady delivered those jests.
"Good morrow, fair lady," said Gawain the merry,
"You may do what you will, and well it doth
please me,

For quickly I yield me, crying for mercy;
This method to me seems the best—for I must!"
So the lord in turn jested with laughter right joyous. 1216

"But if, lovely lady, you would, give me leave,
Your prisoner release and pray him to rise,
And I'd come from this bed and clothe myself better;

So could I converse with you then with more comfort." 1220

"Indeed no, fair sir," that sweet lady said,
"You'll not move from your bed; I shall manage you better;

For here—and on that side too—I shall hold you,
And next I shall talk with the knight I have taken.
For well do I know that your name is Sir Gawain, 1225

By everyone honored wherever you ride;
Most highly acclaimed is your courtly behavior
With lords and ladies and all who are living.
And now you're here, truly, and none but we two;
My lord and his followers far off have fared; 1230
Other men remain in their beds, and my maidens;
The door is closed, and secured with a strong hasp;

Since him who delights all I have in my house,
My time, as long as it lasts, I with talking
Shall fill. 1235

My body's gladly yours;
Upon me work your will.
Your servant I, perforce,
And now, and shall be still."

"In faith," quoth Sir Gawain, "a favor I think
it, 1240

Although I am now not the knight you speak of;
To reach to such fame as here you set forth,
I am one, as I well know myself, most unworthy.
By God, should you think it were good, I'd be glad

If I could or in word or action accomplish 1245
Your ladyship's pleasure—a pure joy 't would prove."

"In good faith, Sir Gawain," the gay lady said,
"Ill-bred I should be if I blamed or belittled
The worth and prowess that please all others.
There are ladies enough who'd be now more delighted 1250

To have you in thralldom, as here, sir, I have you,
To trifle gaily in talk most engaging,
To give themselves comfort and quiet their cares,
Than have much of the gold and the goods they command. 1254

But to Him I give praise that ruleth the heavens,
That wholly I have in my hand what all wish."

So she Gave him good cheer that day,

She who was fair to see.
To what she chanced to say 1260
With pure speech answered he.

Quoth the merry man, "Madam, Mary reward
you,
For noble, in faith, I've found you, and generous.
People by other pattern their actions,
But more than I merit to me they give praise;
'T is your courteous self who can show naught but kindness." 1266

"By Mary," said she, "to me it seems other!
Were I worth all the host of women now living,
And had I the wealth of the world in my hands,
Should I chaffer and choose to get me a champion,
Sir, from the signs I've seen in you here 1271
Of courtesy, merry demeanor, and beauty,
From what I have heard, and hold to be true,
Before you no lord now alive would be chosen."
"A better choice, madam, you truly have made;
Yet I'm proud of the value you put now upon
me. 1276

Your servant as seemly, I hold you my sovereign, Become your knight, and Christ give you quittance."

Thus of much they talked till mid-morning was past.

The lady behaved as if greatly she loved him, 1280
But Gawain, on guard, right gracefully acted.
"Though I were the most lovely of ladies," she thought,

"The less would he take with him love." He was seeking,

With speed,
Grief that must be: the stroke 1285
That him should stun indeed.
She then of leaving spoke,
And promptly he agreed.

Then she gave him good-day, and glanced at him, laughing,
And startled him, speaking sharp words as she stood: 1290

"He who blesses all words reward this reception!
I doubt if indeed I may dub you Gawain."

"Wherefore?" he queried, quickly enquiring,
Afraid that he'd failed in his fashion of speech.
But the fair lady blesses him, speaking as follows: 1295

"One as good as is Gawain the gracious considered,
(And courtly behavior's found wholly in him)
Not lightly so long could remain with a lady
Without, in courtesy, craving a kiss 1299

At some slight subtle hint at the end of a story.
"Let it be as you like, lovely lady," said Gawain;
"As a knight is so bound, I'll kiss at your bidding,
And lest he displease you, so plead no longer."
Then closer she comes, and catches the knight
In her arms, and salutes him, leaning down af-fably. 1305

Kindly each other to Christ they commend.
She goes forth at the door without further ado,
And he quickly makes ready to rise, and hastens,
Calls to his chamberlain, chooses his clothes,
And merrily marches, when ready, to mass. 1310
Then he fared to his meat, and fitly he feasted,
Made merry all day with amusements till moonrise.

None knew
A knight to better fare
With dames so worthy, two: 1315
One old, one younger. There
Much mirth did then ensue.

Still was absent the lord of that land on his pleasure,

To hunt barren hinds in wood and in heath. 1319
By the set of the sun he had slain such a number
Of does and different deer that 't was wondrous.
Eagerly flocked in the folk at the finish,
And quickly made of the killed deer a quarry;
To this went the nobles with numerous men;
The game whose flesh was the fattest they gathered; 1325

With care, as the case required, cut them open.
And some the deer searched at the spot of assay,
And two fingers of fat they found in the poorest.
They slit at the base of the throat, seized the stomach, 1329

Scraped it away with a sharp knife and sewed it;
Next slit the four limbs and stripped off the hide;
Then opened the belly and took out the bowels
And flesh of the knot, quickly flinging them out.
They laid hold of the throat, made haste to divide,
then, 1334

The windpipe and gullet, and tossed out the guts;
With their sharp knives carved out the shoulders and carried them
Held through a small hole to have the sides perfect.

The breast they sliced, and split it in two;
And then they began once again at the throat,
And quickly as far as its fork they cut it; 1340
Puled out the pluck, and promptly thereafter
Beside the ribs swiftly severed the fillets,

Cleared them off readily right by the backbone,
Straight down to the haunch, all hanging together.
They heaved it up whole, and hewed it off there,
And the rest by the name of the numbles—and rightly—

1346

They knew.
Then where divide the thighs,
The folds behind they hew,
Hasten to cut the prize
Along the spine in two.

1350

And next both the head and the neck off they hewed;
The sides from the backbone swiftly they sun-
dered;

The fee of the ravens they flung in the branches.
They ran through each thick side a hole by the ribs,

1355

And hung up both by the hocks of the haunches,
Each fellow to have the fee that was fitting.

On the fair beast's hide, they fed their hounds
With the liver and lights and the paunch's lining, Among which bread steeped in blood was mingled.

1360

They blew boldly the blast for the prize; the hounds barked.

Then the venison took they and turned toward home,

And stoutly many a shrill note they sounded.
Ere close of the daylight, the company came
To the comely castle where Gawain in comfort

Sojourned. 1366

And when he met the knight
As thither he returned,
Joy had they and delight,
Where the fire brightly burned.

1370

In the hall the lord bade all his household to gather,
And both of the dames to come down with their damsels.

In the room there before all the folk he ordered
His followers, truly, to fetch him his venison.
Gawain he called with courteous gaiety,
Asked him to notice the number of nimble beasts,
Showed him the fairness of flesh on the ribs.

1375

"Are you pleased with this play? Have I won your praise?"

Have I thoroughly earned your thanks through my cunning?"

"In faith," said Sir Gawain, "this game is the fairest

1380

I've seen in the season of winter these seven years."
"The whole of it, Gawain, I give you," the host
said;

"Because of our compact, as yours you may claim
it."

"That is true," the knight said, "and I tell you the same:

That this I have worthily won within doors, 1385
And surely to you with as good will I yield it."

With both of his arms his fair neck he embraced,
And the hero as courteously kissed as he could.

"I give you my gains. I got nothing further;
I freely would grant it, although it were greater."

"It is good," said the good man; "I give you my thanks.

1391

Yet things so may be that you'd think it better
To tell where you won this same wealth by your wit."

"'T was no part of our pact," said he; "press me
no more;

For trust entirely in this, that you've taken 1395
Your due."

With laughing merriment
And knightly speech and true
To supper soon they went
With store of dainties new.

1400

In a chamber they sat, by the side of the chimney,

Where men right frequently fetched them mulled wine.

In their jesting, again they agreed on the morrow
To keep the same compact they came to before:
That whatever should chance, they'd exchange at evening,

1405

When greeting again, the new things they had gotten.

Before all the court they agreed to the covenant;
Then was the beverage brought forth in jest.

At last they politely took leave of each other,
And quickly each hero made haste to his couch.

When the cock but three times had crowed and cackled,

1411

The lord and his men had leaped from their beds.
So that duly their meal was dealt with, and mass,
And ere daylight they'd fared toward the forest, on hunting

Intent. 1415

The huntsmen with loud horns
Through level fields soon went,
Uncoupling 'mid the thorns
The hounds swift on the scent.

Soon they cry for a search by the side of a swamp. 1420

The huntsmen encourage the hounds that first catch there

The scent, and sharp words they shout at them loudly;

And thither the hounds that heard them hastened,
And fast to the trail fell, forty at once.

Then such clamor and din from the dogs that had come there 1425

Arose that the rocks all around them rang.

With horn and with mouth the hunters heartened
them;

They gathered together then, all in a group,
'Twixt a pool in that copse and a crag most forbidding.

At a stone heap, beside the swamp, by a cliff, 1430
Where the rough rock had fallen in rugged confusion,

They fared to the finding, the folk coming after.
Around both the crag and the rubble-heap searched
The hunters, sure that within them was hidden
The beast whose presence was bayed by the blood-hounds. 1435

Then they beat on the bushes, and bade him rise up,

And wildly he made for the men in his way,
Rushing suddenly forth, of swine the most splendid.

Apart from the herd he'd grown hoary with age,
For fierce was the beast, the biggest of boars. 1440
Then many men grieved, full grim when he grunted,

For three at his first thrust he threw to the earth,
And then hurtled forth swiftly, no harm doing further.

They shrilly cried hi! and shouted hey! hey!
Put bugles to mouth, loudly blew the recall. 1445
The men and dogs merry in voice were and many;
With outcry they all hurry after this boar

To slay.

He maims the pack when, fell,
He often stands at bay. 1450
Loudly they howl and yell,
Sore wounded in the fray.

Then to shoot at him came up the company quickly.

Arrows that hit him right often they aimed,
But their sharp points failed that fell on his shoulders' 1455

Tough skin, and the barbs would not bite in his flesh;

But the smooth-shaven shafts were shivered in pieces,

The heads wherever they hit him rebounding.
But when hurt by the strength of the strokes they struck,

Then mad for the fray he falls on the men, 1460
And deeply he wounds them as forward he dashes.
Then many were frightened, and drew back in fear;

But the lord galloped off on a light horse after
him,

Blew like a huntsman right bold the recall
On his bugle, and rode through the thick of the bushes, 1465

Pursuing this swine till the sun shone clearly.
Thus the day they passed in doing these deeds,
While bides our gracious knight Gawain in bed,
With bed-clothes in color right rich, at the castle
Behind. 1470

The dame did not forget
'To give him greetings kind.
She soon upon him set,
To make him change his mind.

Approaching the curtain, she peeps at the prince,
And at once Sir Gawain welcomes her worthily.
Promptly the lady makes her reply. 1477

By his side she seats herself softly, heartily
Laughs, and with lovely look these words delivers:
"If you, sir, are Gawain, greatly I wonder 1480
That one so given at all times to goodness
Should be not well versed in social conventions,
Or, made once to know, should dismiss them from
mind.

You have promptly forgotten what I in the plainest

Of talk that I knew of yesterday taught you." 1485
"What is that?" said the knight. "For truly I know
not;

If it be as you say, I am surely to blame."
"Yet I taught you," quoth the fair lady, "of kiss-
ing;

When clearly he's favored, quickly to claim one Becomes each knight who practices courtesy." 1490
"Cease, dear lady, such speech," said the strong
man;

"I dare not for fear of refusal do that.
'T would be wrong to proffer and then be repulsed."

"In faith, you may not be refused," said the fair
one;

"Sir, if you pleased, you have strength to compel
it, 1495

Should one be so rude as to wish to deny you."
 "By God, yes," said Gawain, "good is your speech;
 But unlucky is force in the land I live in,
 And every gift that with good will's not given.
 Your word I await to embrace when you wish;
 You may start when you please, and stop at your pleasure." 1501

With grace,
 The lady, bending low,
 Most sweetly kissed his face.
 Of joy in love and woe 1505
 They talked for a long space.

"I should like," said the lady, "from you, sir, to learn,

If I roused not your anger by asking, the reason
 Why you, who are now so young and valiant,
 So known far and wide as knightly and courteous (And principally, picked from all knighthood, is praised 1511

The sport of true love and the science of arms;
 For to tell of these true knights' toil, it is surely
 The title inscribed and the text of their deeds,
 How men their lives for their leal love adventured,
 Endured for their passion doleful days, 1516
 Then themselves with valor avenged, and their sorrow

Cast off, and brought bliss into bowers by their virtues),

Why you, thought the noblest knight of your time,
 Whose renown and honor are everywhere noted,
 Have so let me sit on two separate occasions 1521
 Beside you, and hear proceed from your head
 Not one word relating to love, less or more.

You so goodly in vowing your service and gracious Ought gladly to give to a young thing your guidance, 1525

And show me some sign of the sleights of true love.

What! know you nothing, and have all renown?
 Or else do you deem me too dull, for your talking Unfit?

For shame! Alone I come; 1530
 To learn some sport I sit;
 My lord is far from home;
 Now, teach me by your wit."

"In good faith," said Gawain, "God you reward;
 For great is the happiness, huge the gladness 1535
 That one so worthy should want to come hither,
 And pains for so poor a man take, as in play
 With your knight with looks of regard; it delights
 me.

But to take up the task of telling of true love,
 To touch on those themes, and on tales of arms
 To you who've more skill in that art, I am certain,
 By half than a hundred men have such as I, 1542
 Or ever shall have while here upon earth,
 By my faith, 't would be, madam, a manifold folly.
 Your bidding I'll do, as in duty bound, 1545
 To the height of my power, and will hold myself ever

Your ladyship's servant, so save me the Lord."
 Thus the fair lady tempted and tested him often
 To make the man sin—whate'er more she'd in
 mind;

But so fair his defense was, no fault was apparent, 1550

Nor evil on either side; each knew but joy
 On that day.

At last she kissed him lightly,
 After long mirth and play,
 And took her leave politely, 1555
 And went upon her way.

The man bestirs himself, springs up for mass.
 Then made ready and splendidly served was their dinner;

In sport with the ladies he spent all the day.
 But the lord through fields oft dashed as he followed 1560

The savage swine, that sped o'er the slopes,
 And in two bit the backs of the best of his hounds
 Where he stood at bay; till 't was broken by bow-men,

Who made him, despite himself, move to the open,
 The shafts flew so thick when the throng had assembled. 1565

Yet sometimes he forced the stoutest to flinch,
 Till at last too weary he was to run longer,
 But came with such haste as he could to a hole
 In a mound, by a rock whence the rivulet runs out. 1569

He started to scrape the soil, backed by the slope,
 While froth from his mouth's ugly corners came foaming.

White were the tushes he whetted. The bold men
 Who stood round grew tired of trying from far
 To annoy him, but dared not for danger draw nearer.

Before, 1575

So many he did pierce
 That all were loth a boar
 So frenzied and so fierce
 Should tear with tusks once more, 1579

Till the hero himself came, spurring his horse,
Saw him standing at bay, the hunters beside him.
He leaped down right lordly, leaving his courser,
Unsheathed a bright sword and strode forth
stoutly,

Made haste through the ford where that fierce one was waiting.

Aware of the hero with weapon in hand, 1585
So savagely, bristling his back up, he snorted
All feared for the wight lest the worst befall him.
Then rushed out the boar directly upon him,
And man was mingled with beast in the midst
Of the wildest water. The boar had the worse,
For the man aimed a blow at the beast as he met
him, 1591

And surely with sharp blade struck o'er his breast bone,
That smote to the hilt, and his heart cleft asunder.
He squealing gave way, and swift through the water

Went back. 1595

By a hundred hounds he's caught,
Who fiercely him attack;
To open ground he's brought,
And killed there by the pack.

The blast for the beast's death was blown on sharp horns, 1600

And the lords there loudly and clearly hallooed.
At the beast bayed the brachets, as bid by their masters,

The chief, in that hard, long chase, of the hunters.
Then one who was wise in woodcraft began

To slice up this swine in the seemliest manner. 1605

First he hews off his head, and sets it on high;
Then along the back roughly rends him apart.

He hales out the bowels, and broils them on hot coals.

With these mixed with bread, rewarding his brachets.

Then slices the flesh in fine, broad slabs, 1610
And pulls out the edible entrails properly.

Whole, though, he gathers the halves together,
And proudly upon a stout pole he places them.

Homeward they now with this very swine hasten,
Bearing in front of the hero the boar's head, 1615

Since him at the ford by the force of his strong hand

He slew.

It seemed long till he met
In hall Sir Gawain, who Hastened, when called, to get 1620
The payment that was due.

The lord called out loudly, merrily laughed
When Gawain he saw, and gladsomely spoke.
The good ladies were sent for, the household assembled; 1624

He shows them the slices of flesh, and the story
He tells of his largeness and length, and how fierce
Was the war in the woods where the wild swine had fled.

Sir Gawain commended his deeds right graciously,
Praised them as giving a proof of great prowess.
Such brawn on a beast, the bold man declared,
And such sides on a swine he had ne'er before seen. 1631

Then they handled the huge head; the courteous
hero

Praised it, horror-struck, honoring his host.
Quoth the goodman, "Now, Gawain, yours is this game

By our covenant, fast and firm, you know truly."
"It is so," said the knight; "and as certain and sure 1636

All I get I'll give you again as I pledged you."
He about the neck caught, with courtesy kissed
him,

And soon a second time served him the same way.
Said Gawain, "We've fairly fulfilled the agreement 1640

This evening we entered on, each to the other
Most true."

"I, by Saint Giles, have met
None," said the lord, "like you.
Riches you soon will get, 1645
If you such business do."

And then the tables they raised upon trestles,
And laid on them cloths; the light leaped up clearly

Along by the walls, where the waxen torches 1649
Were set by the henchmen who served in the hall.

A great sound of sport and merriment sprang up
Close by the fire, and on frequent occasions

At supper and afterward, many a splendid song,
Conduits of Christmas, new carols, all kinds

Of mannerly mirth that a man may tell of. 1655
Our seemly knight ever sat at the side

Of the lady, who made so agreeable her manner,
With sly, secret glances to glad him, so stalwart,

That greatly astonished was Gawain, and wroth
With himself; he in courtesy could not refuse her,

But acted becomingly, courtly, whatever 1661
The end, good or bad, of his action might be.

When quite

Done was their play at last,

The host called to the knight, 1665
And to his room they passed
To where the fire burned bright.

The men there make merry and drink, and once
more

The same pact for New Year's Eve is proposed;
But the knight craved permission to mount on the morrow: 1670

The appointment approached where he had to appear.

But the lord him persuaded to stay and linger,
And said, "On my word as a knight I assure you You'll get to the Green Chapel, Gawain, on New Year's,

And far before prime, to finish your business. 1675
Remain in your room then, and take your rest.
I shall hunt in the wood and exchange with you winnings,

As bound by our bargain, when back I return,
For twice I've found you were faithful when tried:
In the morning 'best be the third time,' remember.
Let's be mindful of mirth while we may, and make merry, 1681

For care when one wants it is quickly encountered."

At once this was granted, and Gawain is stayed;
Drink blithely was brought him; to bed they were lighted.

The guest 1685

In quiet and comfort spent
The night, and took his rest.
On his affairs intent,
The host was early dressed.

After mass a morsel he took with his men. 1690
The morning was merry; his mount he demanded.
The knights who'd ride in his train were in readiness,

Dressed and horsed at the door of the hall.
Wondrous fair were the fields, for the frost was clinging;

Bright red in the cloud-rack rises the sun, 1695
And full clear sails close past the clouds in the sky.
The hunters unleashed all the hounds by a woodside:

The rocks with the blast of their bugles were ring-
ing.

Some dogs there fall on the scent where the fox is,
And trail oft a traitoress using her tricks. 1700
A hound gives tongue at it; huntsmen call to him;
Hastens the pack to the hound sniffing hard,
And right on his track run off in a rabble,

He scampering before them. They started the fox
soon; 1704

When finally they saw him, they followed fast,
Denouncing him clearly with clamorous anger.
Through many a dense grove he dodges and twists,

Doubling back and harkening at hedges right often;

At last by a little ditch leaps o'er a thorn-hedge,
Steals out stealthily, skirting a thicket 1710

In thought from the wood to escape by his wiles
From the hounds; then, unknowing, drew near to a hunting-stand.

There hurled themselves, three at once, on him strong hounds,

All gray.

With quick swerve he doth start 1715
Afresh without dismay.

With great grief in his heart
To the wood he goes away.

Huge was the joy then to hark to the hounds.
When the pack all met him, mingled together,
Such curses they heaped on his head at the sight
That the clustering cliffs seemed to clatter down round them 1722

In heaps. The men, when they met him, hailed
him,

And loudly with chiding speeches hallooed him;
Threats were oft thrown at him, thief he was called; 1725

At his tail were the greyhounds, that tarry he might not.

They rushed at him oft when he raced for the open,

And ran to the wood again, reynard the wily.
Thus he led them, all muddied, the lord and his men,

In this manner along through the hills until mid-
day. 1730

At home, the noble knight wholesomely slept
In the cold of the morn within comely curtains.

But the lady, for love, did not let herself sleep,
Or fail in the purpose fixed in her heart; 1734

But quickly she roused herself, came there quickly,
Arrayed in a gay robe that reached to the ground,
The skins of the splendid fur skillfully trimmed close.

On her head no colors save jewels, well-cut,
That were twined in her hair-fret in clusters of twenty.

Her fair face was completely exposed, and her throat; 1740

In front her breast too was bare, and her back.
 She comes through the chamber-door, closes it after her,
 Swings wide a window, speaks to the wight,
 And rallies him soon in speech full of sport
 And good cheer. 1745
 "Ah! man, how can you sleep?
 The morning is so clear."
 He was in sorrow deep,
 Yet her he then did hear.

In a dream muttered Gawain, deep in its gloom,
 Like a man by a throng of sad thoughts sorely moved 1751
 Of how fate was to deal out his destiny to him
 That morn, when he met the man at the Green
 Chapel,
 Bound to abide his blow, unresisting.
 But as soon as that comely one came to his senses,
 Started from slumber and speedily answered, 1756
 The lovely lady came near, sweetly laughing,
 Bent down o'er his fair face and daintily kissed
 him.
 And well, in a worthy manner, he welcomed her.
 Seeing her glorious, gaily attired, 1760
 Without fault in her features, most fine in her color,
 Deep joy came welling up, warming his heart.
 With sweet, gentle smiling they straightway grew
 merry;
 So passed naught between them but pleasure, joy,
 And delight. 1765
 Goodly was their debate,
 Nor was their gladness slight.
 Their peril had been great
 Had Mary quit her knight.

For that noble princess pressed him so closely,
 Brought him so near the last bound, that her love
 He was forced to accept, or, offending, refuse her: 1772
 Concerned for his courtesy not to prove caitiff,
 And more for his ruin if wrong he committed,
 Betraying the hero, the head of that house. 1775
 "God forbid," said the knight; "that never shall be";
 And lovingly laughing a little, he parried
 The words of fondness that fell from her mouth.
 She said to him, "Sir, you are surely to blame
 If you love not the lady beside whom you're lying, 1780
 Of all the world's women most wounded in heart,
 Unless you've one dearer, a lover you like more,

Your faith to her plighted, so firmly made fast
 You desire not to loosen it—so I believe.
 Now tell me truly I pray you; the truth. 1785
 By all of the loves that in life are, conceal not Through guile."
 The knight said, "By Saint John,"
 And pleasantly to smile
 Began, "In faith I've none, 1790 Nor will have for a while."

"Such words," said the lady, "the worst are of all;
 But in sooth I am answered, and sad it seems to
 me.
 Kiss me now kindly, and quickly I'll go;
 I on earth may but mourn, as a much loving mortal." 1795
 Sighing she stoops down, and kisses him seemly;
 Then starting away from him, says as she stands,
 "Now, my dear, at parting, do me this pleasure:
 Give me some gift, thy glove if it might be, 1799
 To bring you to mind, sir, my mourning to lessen."
 "On my word," quoth the hero, "I would that I had here,
 For thy sake, the thing that I think the dearest
 I own, for in sooth you've deserved very often
 A greater reward than one I could give.
 But a pledge of love would profit but little; 1805
 'T would help not your honor to have at this time
 For a keepsake a glove, as a gift of Gawain.
 I've come on a mission to countries most strange;
 I've no servants with splendid things filling their sacks:
 That displeases me, lady, for love's sake, at present; 1810
 Yet each man without murmur must do what he may

Nor repine."
 "Nay, lord of honors high,
 Though I have naught of thine," Quoth the lovely lady, "I 1815
 Shall give you gift of mine."

She offered a rich ring, wrought in red gold,
 With a blazing stone that stood out above it,
 And shot forth brilliant rays bright as the sun;
 Wit you well that wealth right huge it was worth.
 But promptly the hero replied, refusing it, 1821
 "Madam, I care not for gifts now to keep;
 I have none to tender and naught will I take."
 Thus he ever declined her offer right earnest,
 And swore on his word that he would not accept
 it; 1825

And, sad he declined, she thereupon said,
 "If my ring you refuse, since it seems too rich,
 If you would not so highly to me be beholden,
 My girdle, that profits you less, I'll give you."
 She swiftly removed the belt circling her sides, Round her tunic knotted, beneath her bright mantle; 1831

'T was fashioned of green silk, and fair made with
 gold,
 With gold, too, the borders embellished and beautiful.

To Gawain she gave it, and gaily besought him
 To take it, although he thought it but trifling.
 He swore by no manner of means he'd accept 1836
 Either gold or treasure ere God gave him grace
 To attain the adventure he'd there undertaken.
 "And, therefore, I pray, let it prove not displeasing,
 But give up your suit, for to grant it I'll never Agree. 1841

I'm deeply in your debt
 For your kind ways to me.
 In hot and cold I yet
 Will your true servant be." 1845

"Refuse ye this silk," the lady then said,
 "As slight in itself? Truly it seems so.
 Lo! it is little, and less is its worth;
 But one knowing the nature knit up within it,
 Would give it a value more great, peradventure;
 For no man girt with this girdle of green, 1851
 And bearing it fairly made fast about him,
 Might ever be cut down by any on earth,
 For his life in no way in the world could be taken." 1854

Then mused the man, and it came to his mind
 In the peril appointed him precious 't would prove
 When he'd found the chapel, to face there his fortune.

The device, might he slaying evade, would be splendid.

Her suit then he suffered, and let her speak;
 And the belt she offered him, earnestly urging it (And Gawain consented), and gave it with good will, 1861

And prayed him for her sake ne'er to display it,
 But, true, from her husband to hide it. The hero
 Agreed that no one should know of it ever.

Then he 1865
 Thanked her with all his might
 Of heart and thought; and she
 By then to this stout knight
 Had given kisses three.

Then the lady departs, there leaving the lord,
 For more pleasure she could not procure from that prince. 1871

When she's gone, then quickly Sir Gawain clothes himself,

Rises and dresses in noble array,
 Lays by the love-lace the lady had left him,
 Faithfully hides it where later he'd find it. 1875
 At once then went on his way to the chapel,
 Approached in private a priest, and prayed him
 To make his life purer, more plainly him teach How his soul, when he had to go hence, should be saved.

He declared his faults, confessing them fully, 1880
 The more and the less, and mercy besought,
 And then of the priest implored absolution.
 He surely absolved him, and made him as spotless,
 Indeed, as if doomsday were due on the morrow.
 Then among the fair ladies he made more merry
 With lovely caroles, all kinds of delights, 1886
 That day than before, until darkness fell.

All there

Were treated courteously,
 "And never," they declare, 1890
 "Has Gawain shown such glee Since hither he did fare."

In that nook where his lot may be love let him linger!

The lord's in the meadow still, leading his men.
 He has slain this fox that he followed so long; 1895
 As he vaulted a hedge to get view of the villain,
 Hearing the hounds that hastened hard after him,
 Reynard from out a rough thicket came running,
 And right at his heels in a rush all the rabble.

He, seeing that wild thing, wary, awaits him, 1900 Unsheaths his bright brand and strikes at the beast.

And he swerved from its sharpness and back would have started;

A hound, ere he could, came hurrying up to him;
 All of them fell on him fast by the horse's feet,
 Worried that sly one with wrathful sound. 1905
 And quickly the lord alights, and catches him,
 Takes him in haste from the teeth of the hounds,
 And over his head holds him high, loudly shout-
 ing,

Where brachets, many and fierce, at him barked.
 Thither huntsmen made haste with many a horn,
 The recall, till they saw him, sounding right
 clearly. 1911

As soon as his splendid troop had assembled,
 All bearing a bugle blew them together,

The others having no horns all hallooed.
 'T was the merriest baying that man ever heard
 That was raised for the soul of reynard with sounding 1916

Din.

They fondle each dog's head
 Who his reward did win.
 Then take they reynard dead 1920
 And strip him of his skin.

And now, since near was the night, they turned homeward,
 Strongly and sturdily sounding their horns.
 At last at his loved home the lord alighted,
 A fire on the hearth found, the hero beside it,
 Sir Gawain the good, who glad was withal, 1926
 For he had 'mong the ladies in love much delight.
 A blue robe that fell to the floor he was wearing;
 His surcoat, that softly was furred, well beseeemed
 him;

A hood of the same hue hung on his shoulders,
 And both were bordered with white all about. 1931
 He, mid-most, met the good man in the hall,
 And greeted him gladly, graciously saying:
 "Now shall I first fulfill our agreement
 We struck to good purpose, when drink was not spared." 1935
 Then Gawain embraced him, gave him three kisses,

The sweetest and soundest a man could bestow.
 "By Christ, you'd great happiness," quoth then the host,
 "In getting these wares, if good were your bargains." 1939
 "Take no care for the cost," the other said quickly,
 "Since plainly the debt that is due I have paid."
 Said the other, "By Mary, mine's of less worth.
 The whole of the day I have hunted, and gotten
 The skin of this fox—the fiend take its foulness!—
 Right poor to pay for things of such price 1945
 As you've pressed on me here so heartily, kisses
 So good."

"Say no more," Gawain saith;
 "I thank you, by the rood!"
 How the fox met his death 1950
 He told him as they stood.

With mirth and minstrelsy, meat at their pleasure
 They made as merry as any men might (With ladies' laughter, and launching of jests Right glad were they both, the good man and Gawain) 1955

Unless they had doted or else had been drunken.
 Both the man and the company make many jokes,
 Till the time is come when the two must be parted,

When finally the knights are forced to go bedward.
 And first of the lord his respectful leave 1960
 This goodly man took, and graciously thanked
 him:

"May God you reward for the welcome you gave
 me

This high feast, the splendid sojourn I've had here.
 I give you myself, if you'd like it, to serve you.
 I must, as you know, on the morrow move on;
 Give me someone to show me the path, as you
 said, 1966

To the Green Chapel, there, as God will allow me,
 On New Year the fate that is fixed to perform."
 "With a good will, indeed," said the good man;
 "whatever

I promised to do I deem myself ready." 1970
 He a servant assigns on his way to set him,
 To take him by hills that no trouble he'd have,
 And through grove and wood by the way most direct

Might repair.

The lord he thanked again 1975
 For the honor done him there.
 The knight his farewell then Took of those ladies fair.

To them with sorrow and kissing he spoke,
 And besought them his thanks most sincere to accept; 1980
 And they, replying, promptly returned them,
 With sighings full sore to the Savior commended
 him.

Then he with courtesy quitted the company,
 Giving each man that he met his thanks
 For kindness, for trouble he'd taken, for care 1985 Whereby each had sought to serve him right eagerly.

Pained was each person to part with him then,
 As if long they in honor had lived with that noble.

With people and lights he was led to his chamber,
 To bed gaily brought there to be at his rest; 1990
 Yet I dare not say whether soundly he slept,
 For much, if he would, on the morn to remember
 Had he.

Let him lie stilly there
 Near what he sought to see. 1995
 What happened I'll declare,
 If you will silent be.

IV

The New Year draws near, and the nighttime now passes;

The day, as the Lord bids, drives on to darkness.
Outside, there sprang up wild storms in the world; 2000

The clouds cast keenly the cold to the earth
With enough of the north sting to trouble the naked;

Down shivered the snow, nipping sharply the wild beasts;

The wind from the heights, shrilly howling, came rushing, 2004

And heaped up each dale full of drifts right huge.
Full well the man listened who lay in his bed.

Though he shut tight his lids, he slept but a little;
He knew by each cock that crowed 't was the tryst time,

And swiftly ere dawn of the day he arose,
For there shone then the light of a lamp in his room; 2010

To his chamberlain called, who answered him
quickly,

And bade him his saddle to bring and his mail-shirt.

The other man roused up and fetched him his rai-
ment,

Arrayed then that knight in a fashion right noble.
First he clad him in clothes to ward off the cold,

Then his other equipment, carefully kept: 2016
His pieces of plate armor, polished right cleanly,

The rings of his rich mail burnished from rust.
All was fresh as at first; he was fain to give thanks

To the men. 2020

He had on every piece

Full brightly burnished then.

He, gayest from here to Greece,

Ordered his steed again.

He garbed himself there in the loveliest garments 2025

(His coat had its blazon of beautiful needlework
Stitched upon velvet for show, its rich stones

Set about it and studded, its seams all embroidered,

Its lovely fur in the fairest of linings),
Yet he left not the lace, the gift of the lady: 2030

That, Gawain did not, for his own sake, forget.
When the brand on his rounded thighs he had belted,

He twisted the love-token two times about him.

That lord round his waist with delight quickly wound

The girdle of green silk, that seemed very gay
Upon royal red cloth that was rich to behold. 2036
But Gawain the girdle wore not for its great price,
Or pride in its pendants although they were polished,

Though glittering gold there gleamed on the ends,
But himself to save when he needs must suffer

The death, nor could stroke then of sword or of knife 2041

Him defend.

Then was the bold man dressed;

Quickly his way did wend;

To all the court expressed 2045

His great thanks without end.

Then was Gringolet ready that great was and huge,

Who had safely, as seemed to him pleasant, been stabled;

That proud horse pranced, in the pink of condition.

The lord then comes to him, looks at his coat,
And soberly says, and swears on his word, 2051

"In this castle's a company mindful of courtesy,
Led by this hero. Delight may they have;

And may love the dear lady betide all her lifetime.
If they for charity cherish a guest, 2055

And give so great welcome, may God reward
them,

Who rules the heaven on high, and the rest of you.
Might I for long live my life on the earth,

Some repayment with pleasure I'd make, if 't were possible."

He steps in the stirrup, strides into the saddle, Receives on his shoulder the shield his man brings

him, 2061
And spurs into Gringolet strikes with his gilt heels;

Who leaps on the stones and lingers no longer
To prance.

The knight on his horse sits, 2065
Who bears his spear and lance,

The house to Christ commits,
And wishes it good chance.

Then down the drawbridge they dropped, the broad gates

Unbarred, and on both sides bore them wide open.
He blessed them quickly, and crossed o'er the planks there 2071

(He praises the porter, who knelt by the prince

Begging God to save Gawain, and gave him good-
day),

And went on his way with but one man attended
To show him the turns to that sorrowful spot 2075
Where he must to that onerous onset submit.

By hillsides where branches were bare they both journeyed;

They climbed over cliffs where the cold was clinging.

The clouds hung aloft, but 't was lowering beneath
them.

On the moor dripped the mist, on the mountains melted; 2080

Each hill had a hat, a mist-cloak right huge.

The brooks foamed and bubbled on hillsides about
them,

And brightly broke on their banks as they rushed down.

Full wandering the way was they went through the wood,

Until soon it was time for the sun to be springing.

Then they 2086

Were on a hill full high;

White snow beside them lay.

The servant who rode nigh

Then bade his master stay. 2090

"I have led you hither, my lord, at this time,
And not far are you now from that famous place
You have sought for, and asked so especially after.
Yet, sir, to you surely I'll say, since I know you,
A man in this world whom I love right well, 2095
If you'd follow my judgment, the better you'd fare.
You make haste to a place that is held full of peril;
One dwells, the worst in the world, in that waste,
For he's strong and stern, and takes pleasure in striking.

No man on the earth can equal his might; 2100

He is bigger in body than four of the best men

In Arthur's own household, Hestor or others.

And thus he brings it about at the chapel:

That place no one passes so proud in his arms

That he smites him not dead with a stroke of his hand. 2105

He's a man most immoderate, showing no mercy;

Be it chaplain or churl that rides by the chapel,

Monk or priest, any manner of man,

Him to slay seems as sweet as to still live himself.

So I say, as sure as you sit in your saddle 2110

You're killed, should the knight so choose, if you come here;

That take as the truth, though you twenty lives had

To spend.

He's lived in this place long

In battles without end. 2115

Against his strokes right strong

You cannot you defend.

"So let him alone, good Sir Gawain, and leave
By a different road, for God's sake, and ride
To some other country where Christ may reward
you. 2120

And homeward again I will hie me, and promise
To swear by the Lord and all his good saints

(So help me the oaths on God's halidom sworn)

That I'll guard well your secret, and give out no story

You hastened to flee any hero I've heard of." 2125

"Thank you," said Gawain, and grudgingly added,

"Good fortune go with you for wishing me well.

And truly I think you'd not tell; yet though never

So surely you hid it, if hence I should hasten,

Fearful, to fly in the fashion you tell of, 2130

A coward I'd prove, and could not be pardoned.

The chapel I'll find whatsoever befalls,

And talk with that wight the way that I want to,

Let weal or woe follow as fate may wish.

Though the knave, 2135

Hard to subdue and fell,

Should stand there with a stave,

Yet still the Lord knows well

His servants how to save."

Quoth the man, "By Mary, you've said now this much: 2140

That you wish to bring down your own doom on your head.

Since you'd lose your life, I will stay you no longer.
Put your helm on your head, take your spear in your hand,

And ride down this road by the side of that rock
Till it brings you down to the dale's rugged bottom; 2145

Then look at the glade on the left hand a little:

You'll see in the valley that self-same chapel,

And near it the great-limbed knight who is guarding it.

Gawain the noble, farewell now, in God's name!

I would not go with thee for all the world's wealth,

Nor in fellowship ride one more foot through the forest." 2151

The man in the trees there then turns his bridle,

As hard as he can hits his horse with his heels,

And across the fields gallops, there leaving Sir
Gawain

Alone. 2155

"By God," the knight said, "now

I'll neither weep nor groan.
Unto God's will I bow,
And make myself his own."

He strikes spurs into Gringolet, starts on the path; 2160
By a bank at the side of a small wood he pushes in,
Rides down the rugged slope right to the dale.
Then about him he looks, and the land seems wild,
And nowhere he sees any sign of a shelter,
But slopes on each side of him, high and steep,
And rocks, gnarled and rough, and stones right rugged. 2166
The clouds there seemed to him scraped by the crags.
Then he halted and held back his horse at that time,
And spied on all sides in search of the chapel;
Such nowhere he saw, but soon, what seemed strange, 2170
In the midst of a glade a mound, as it might be,
A smooth, swelling knoll by the side of the water,
The falls of a rivulet running close by;
In its banks the brook bubbled as though it were boiling. 2174
The knight urged on Gringolet, came to the glade,
There leaped down lightly and tied to the limb
Of a tree, right rugged, the reins of his noble steed,
Went to the mound, and walked all about it,
Debating what manner of thing it might be:
On the end and on each side an opening; everywhere 2180
Over it grass was growing in patches,
All hollow inside, it seemed an old cave
Or a crag's old cleft: which, he could not decide.
Said the knight,
"Is this the chapel here? 2185
Alas, dear Lord! here might
The fiend, when midnight's near,
His matin prayers recite.

"Of a truth," said Gawain, "the glade here is gloomy; 2189
The Green Chapel's ugly, with herbs overgrown.
It greatly becomes here that hero, green-clad,
To perform in the devil's own fashion his worship.
I feel in my five senses this is the fiend
Who has made me come to this meeting to kill me.
Destruction fall on this church of ill-fortune! 2195
The cursedest chapel that ever I came to!"
With helm on his head and lance in his hand

He went right to the rock of that rugged abode.
From that high hill he heard, from a hard rock over

The stream, on the hillside, a sound wondrous loud. 2200

Lo! it clattered on cliffs fit to cleave them, as though

A scythe on a grindstone someone were grinding.
It whirred, lo! and whizzed like a water-mill's wheel;

Lo! it ground and it grated, grievous to hear. 2204

"By God, this thing, as I think," then said Gawain,
"Is done now for me, since my due turn to meet it Is near.

God's will be done! 'Ah woe!'

No whit doth aid me here.

Though I my life forego 2210

No sound shall make me fear."

And then the man there commenced to call loudly,

"Who here is the master, with me to hold tryst?

For Gawain the good now is going right near.

He who craves aught of me let him come hither quickly; 2215

"T is now or never; he needs to make haste."

Said somebody, "Stop," from the slope up above him,

"And promptly you'll get what I promised to give you."

Yet he kept up the whirring noise quickly a while,
Turned to finish his sharpening before he'd descend. 2220

Then he came by a crag, from a cavern emerging,
Whirled out of a den with a dreadful weapon,

A new Danish ax to answer the blow with;

Its blade right heavy, curved back to the handle,

Sharp filed with the filing tool, four feet in length,

"T was no less, by the reach of that lace gleaming brightly. 2226

The fellow in green was garbed as at first,
Both his face and his legs, his locks and his beard,
Save that fast o'er the earth on his feet he went fairly,

The shaft on the stone set, and stalked on beside it. 2230

On reaching the water, he would not wade it;

On his ax he hopped over, and hastily strode,

Very fierce, through the broad field filled all about him

With snow.

Sir Gawain met the man, 2235

And bowed by no means low,

Who said, "Good sir, men can Trust you to tryst to go."

Said the green man, "Gawain, may God you guard!
You are welcome indeed, sir knight, at my dwell-
ing. 2240

Your travel you've timed as a true man should,
And you know the compact we came to between us;

A twelvemonth ago you took what chance gave,
And I promptly at New Year was pledged to repay
you.

In truth, we are down in this dale all alone; 2245
Though we fight as we please, here there's no one to part us.

Put your helm from your head, and have here
your payment;

Debate no further than I did before,
When you slashed off my head with a single stroke."

"Nay," quoth Gawain, "by God who gave me my spirit, 2250

I'll harbor no grudge whatever harm happens.
Exceed not one stroke and still I shall stand;
You may do as you please, I'll in no way oppose
The blow."

He left the flesh all bare, 2255
Bending his neck down low
As if he feared naught there,
For fear he would not show.

Then the man in green raiment quickly made ready,

Uplifted his grim tool Sir Gawain to smite; 2260
With the whole of his strength he heaved it on high,

As threateningly swung it as though he would slay
him.

Had it fallen again with the force he intended That lord, ever-brave, from the blow had been lifeless.

But Gawain a side glance gave at the weapon 2265
As down it came gliding to do him to death;
With his shoulders shrank from the sharp iron a little.

The other with sudden jerk stayed the bright ax,
And reproved then that prince with proud words in plenty:

"Not Gawain thou art who so good is considered,
Ne'er daunted by host in hill or in dale; 2271
Now in fear, ere thou feelest a hurt, thou art
flinching;

Such cowardice never I knew of that knight.
When you swung at me, sir, I fled not nor started;
No cavil I offered in King Arthur's castle. 2275
My head at my feet fell, yet never I flinched,
And thy heart is afraid ere a hurt thou feelest,
And therefore thy better I'm bound to be thought
On that score."

"I shrank once," Gawain said, 2280
"And I will shrink no more;
Yet cannot I my head,
If it fall down, restore.

"But make ready, sir, quickly, and come to the point;

My destiny deal me, and do it forthwith; 2285
For a stroke I will suffer, and start no further Till hit with thy weapon; have here my pledged word."

Quoth the other, heaving it high, "Have at thee!"
As fierce in his manner as if he were mad,
He mightily swung but struck not the man. 2290
Withheld on a sudden his hand ere it hurt him.

And firmly he waited and flinched in no member,
But stood there as still as a stone or a stump
In rocky ground held by a hundred roots.
Then the Green Knight again began to speak gaily: 2295

"It behooves me to hit, now that whole is thy heart.

Thy high hood that Arthur once gave you now hold back,

Take care that your neck at this cut may recover."
And Gawain full fiercely said in a fury,
"Come! lay on, thou dread man; too long thou art threatening. 2300

I think that afraid of your own self you feel."
"In sooth," said the other, "thy speech is so savage
No more will I hinder thy mission nor have it Delayed."

With puckered lips and brow 2305
He stands with ready blade.
Not strange 't is hateful now
To him past hope of aid.

He lifts his ax lightly, and lets it down deftly,
The blade's edge next to the naked neck. 2310
Though he mightily hammered he hurt him no
more

Than to give him a slight nick that severed the skin there.

Through fair skin the keen ax so cut to the flesh
That shining blood shot to the earth o'er his shoulders.

As soon as he saw his blood gleam on the snow
 He sprang forth in one leap, for more than a spear
 length; 2316
 His helm fiercely caught up and clapped on his head;
 With his shoulders his fair shield shot round in front of him,
 Pulled out his bright sword, and said in a passion
 (And since he was mortal man born of his mother
 The hero was never so happy by half), 2321
 "Cease thy violence, man; no more to me offer,
 For here I've received, unresisting, a stroke.
 If a second thou strikest I soon will requite thee,
 And swiftly and fiercely, be certain of that, 2325
 Will repay.

One stroke on me might fall
 By bargain struck that way,
 Arranged in Arthur's hall;
 Therefore, sir knight, now stay!" 2330

The man turned away, on his weapon rested,
 The shaft on the ground set, leaned on the sharp edge,
 And gazed at Sir Gawain there in the glade;
 Saw that bold man, unblenching, standing right bravely,
 Full-harnessed and gallant; at heart he was glad.
 Then gaily the Green Knight spoke in a great voice, 2336
 And said to the man in speech that resounded,
 "Now be not so savage, bold sir, for towards you
 None here has acted unhandsomely, save
 In accord with the compact arranged in the King's court. 2340
 I promised the stroke you've received, so hold you
 Well paid. I free you from all duties further.
 If brisk I had been, peradventure a buffet
 I'd harshly have dealt that harm would have done
 you.
 In mirth, with a feint I menaced you first, 2345
 With no direful wound rent you; right was my deed,
 By the bargain that bound us both on the first
 night,
 When, faithful and true, you fulfilled our agreement,
 And gave me your gain as a good man ought to.
 The second I struck at you, sir, for the morning
 You kissed my fair wife and the kisses accorded
 me. 2351
 Two mere feints for both times I made at you,
 man,

Without woe.

True men restore by right,
 One fears no danger so; 2355
 You failed the third time, knight,
 And therefore took that blow.

"'T is my garment you're wearing, that woven girdle,
 Bestowed by my wife, as in truth I know well.
 I know also your kisses and all of your acts 2360
 And my wife's advances; myself, I devised them.
 I sent her to try you, and truly you seem
 The most faultless of men that e'er fared on his feet.

As a pearl compared to white peas is more precious,

So next to the other gay knights is Sir Gawain.
 But a little you lacked, and loyalty wanted, 2366
 Yet truly 't was not for intrigue or for wooing,
 But love of your life; the less do I blame you."

Sir Gawain stood in a study a great while, 2369
 So sunk in disgrace that in spirit he groaned;
 To his face all the blood in his body was flowing;
 For shame, as the other was talking, he shrank.
 And these were the first words that fell from his lips:

"Be cowardice cursed, and coveting! In you
 Are vice and villainy, virtue destroying." 2375
 The lace he then seized, and loosened the strands,
 And fiercely the girdle flung at the Green Knight.
 "Lo! there is faith-breaking! evil befall it.

To coveting came I, for cowardice caused me
 From fear of your stroke to forsake in myself 2380
 What belongs to a knight: munificence, loyalty.
 I'm faulty and false, who've been ever afraid
 Of untruth and treachery; sorrow betide both

And care!

Here I confess my sin; 2385
 All faulty did I fare.
 Your good will let me win,
 And then I will beware."

Then the Green Knight laughed, and right graciously said, 2389

"I am sure that the harm is healed that I suffered.
 So clean you're confessed, so cleared of your faults,
 Having had the point of my weapon's plain penance,

I hold you now purged of offense, and as perfectly
 Spotless as though you'd ne'er sinned in your life.
 And I give to you, sir, the golden-hemmed girdle,
 As green as my gown. Sir Gawain, when going
 Forth on your way among famous princes, 2397

Think still of our strife and this token right splendid,
 'Mid chivalrous knights, of the chapel's adventure.
 This New Year you'll come to my castle again,
 And the rest of this feast in revel most pleasant
 Will go." 2402

Then pressed him hard the lord:
 "My wife and you, I know
 We surely will accord, 2405
 Who was your bitter foe."

"No indeed," quoth the hero, his helm seized and doffed it Graciously, thanking the Green Knight; "I've stayed
 Long enough. May good fortune befall you; may
 He

Who all fame doth confer give it fully to you, sir.
 To your lady, gracious and lovely, commend me,
 To her and that other, my honored ladies, 2412
 That so with their sleights deceived their knight subtly.

But no marvel it is for a fool to act madly,
 Through woman's wiles to be brought to woe.
 So for certain was Adam deceived by some woman, 2416

By several Solomon, Samson besides;
 Delilah dealt him his doom; and David
 Was duped by Bath-sheba, enduring much sorrow.
 Since these were grieved by their guile, 't would be great gain 2420

To love them yet never believe them, if knights could.
 For formerly these were most noble and fortunate,
 More than all others who lived on the earth;

And these few
 By women's wiles were caught 2425
 With whom they had to do.
 Though I'm beguiled, I ought To be excused now too.

"But your girdle," said Gawain, "may God you reward! 2429
 With a good will I'll use it, yet not for the gold,
 The sash or the silk, or the sweeping pendants,
 Or fame, or its workmanship wondrous, or cost,
 But in sign of my sin I shall see it oft.
 When in glory I move, with remorse I'll remember

The frailty and fault of the stubborn flesh, 2435
 How soon 't is infected with stains of defilement;
 And thus when I'm proud of my prowess in arms,
 The sight of this sash shall humble my spirit.

But one thing I pray, if it prove not displeasing;
 Because you are lord of the land where I stayed In your house with great worship (may He now
 reward you 2441
 Who sitteth on high and upholdeth the heavens), What name do you bear? No more would I know."

And then "That truly I'll tell," said the other;
 "Bercilak de Hautdesert here am I called. 2445
 Through her might who lives with me, Morgan le Fay,

Well-versed in the crafts and cunning of magic (Many of Merlin's arts she has mastered,
 For long since she dealt in the dalliance of love
 With him whom your heroes at home know, that sage 2450

Without blame.

'Morgan the goddess,' so
 She's rightly known by name.
 No one so proud doth go
 That him she cannot tame). 2455

"I was sent in this way to your splendid hall
 To make trial of your pride, and to see if the people's

Tales were true of the Table's great glory.
 This wonder she sent to unsettle your wits, 2459
 And to daunt so the Queen as to cause her to die
 From fear at the sight of that phantom speaker
 Holding his head in his hand at the high table.
 Lives she at home there, that ancient lady;
 She's even thine aunt, King Arthur's half-sister,
 Tyntagel's duchess's daughter, whom Uther 2465
 Made later the mother of mighty Lord Arthur.
 I beg thee, sir, therefore, come back to thine aunt;
 In my castle make merry. My company love thee,
 And I, sir, wish thee as well, on my word,
 As any on earth for thy high sense of honor." 2470
 He said to him, nay, this he'd never consent to.
 The men kiss, embrace, and each other commend
 To the Prince of Paradise; there they part

In the cold.

Gawain on his fair horse 2475
 To Arthur hastens bold;
 The bright Green Knight his course
 Doth at his pleasure hold.

Through the wood now goes Sir Gawain by wild ways
 On Gringolet, given by God's grace his life. 2480
 Oft in houses, and oft in the open he lodged,
 Met many adventures, won many a victory:
 These I intend not to tell in this tale.

Now whole was the hurt he had in his neck,
 And about it the glimmering belt he was bearing,
 Bound to his side like a baldric obliquely, 2486
 Tied under his left arm, that lace, with a knot
 As a sign that with stain of sin he'd been found.
 And thus to the court he comes all securely.
 Delight in that dwelling arose when its lord knew That Gawain had come; a good thing he thought
 it. 2491

The King kissed the lord, and the Queen-did likewise,

And next many knights drew near him to greet him

And ask how he'd fared; and he wondrously answered,

Confessed all the hardships that him had befallen,
 The happenings at chapel, the hero's behavior,
 The lady's love, and lastly the lace. 2497

He showed them the nick in his neck all naked
 The blow that the Green Knight gave for deceit
 Him to blame. 2500

In torment this he owned;
 Blood in his face did flame;
 With wrath and grief he groaned,
 When showing it with shame.

Laying hold of the lace, quoth the hero, "Lo!
 lord! 2505

The band of this fault I bear on my neck;
 And this is the scathe and damage I've suffered,

For cowardice caught there, and coveting also,
 The badge of untruth in which I was taken.
 And this for as long as I live I must wear, 2510
 For his fault none may hide without meeting misfortune,

For once it is fixed, it can ne'er be unfastened."
 To the knight then the King gave comfort; the court too

Laughed greatly, and made this gracious agreement:

That ladies and lords to the Table belonging, 2515
 All of the brotherhood, baldrics should bear
 Obliquely about them, bands of bright green,
 Thus following suit for the sake of the hero.

For the Round Table's glory was granted that lace,
 And he held himself honored who had it thereafter, 2520

As told in the book, the best of romances.

In the days of King Arthur this deed was done

Whereof witness is borne by Brutus's book.

Since Brutus, that bold man, first came here to Britain,

When ceased, indeed, had the siege and assault
 At Troy's wall, 2526

Full many feats ere now

Like this one did befall.

May He with thorn-crowned brow

To His bliss bring us all. Amen. 2530

HONY SOYT QUI MAL PENCE.²

THOMAS MALORY

Le Morte d'Arthur

BOOK XVIII

CHAPTER I

Of the joy King Arthur and the queen had of the achievement of the Sangreal; and how Launcelot fell to his old love again.

So after the quest of the Sangreal¹ was fulfilled, and all knights that were left on live were come again unto the Table Round, as the book of the 10 that he made in the quest. For, as the book saith, ² The motto of the Knights of the Garter ("Evil be to him who evil thinks of it").

Malory, Le Morte d'Arthur. English modernized in spelling. The language is of about 1470. Practically nothing is known of the life of Sir Thomas Malory. He has been identified as a knight and it is believed that he wrote the Morte d'Arthur in prison.

¹ The Holy Grail, the cup used by Christ at the Last Supper.

had not Sir Launcelot been in his privy thoughts and in his mind so set inwardly to the queen as he was in seeming outward to God, there had no knight passed him in the quest of the Sangreal; but ever his thoughts were privily on the queen, and so they loved together more hotter than they did toforehand, and had such privy draughts together, that many in the court spake of it, and in especial Sir Agravaire, Sir Gawaine's brother, for he was ever open-mouthed. So befel that Sir Launcelot had many resorts of ladies and damosels that daily resorted unto him, that besought him to be their champion, and in all such matters of right Sir Launcelot applied him daily to do for the pleasure of Our Lord, Jesu Christ. And ever as much as he might he withdrew him from the company and fellowship of Queen Guenever, for to eschew the slander and noise; wherefore the queen waxed wroth with Sir Launcelot. And upon a day she called Sir Launcelot unto her chamber, and said thus: Sir Launcelot, I see and feel daily that thy love beginneth to slake, for thou hast no joy to be in my presence, but ever thou art out of this court, and quarrels and matters thou hast nowadays for ladies and gentlewomen more than ever thou were wont to have aforehand. Ah, madam, said Launcelot, in this ye must hold me excused for divers causes; one is, I was but late in the quest of the Sangreal; and I thank God of His great mercy, and never of my desert, that I saw in that my quest as much as ever saw any sinful man, and so was it told me. And if I had not had my privy thoughts to return to your love again as I do, I had seen as great mysteries as ever saw my son Galahad, outh² Percivale, or Sir Bors; and therefore, madam, I was but late in that quest. Wit ye well, madam, it may not be yet lightly forgotten the high service in whom I did my diligent labour. Also, madam, wit ye well that there be many men speak of our love in this court, and have you and me greatly in a wait, as Sir Agravaire and Sir Mordred; and, madam, wit ye well I dread them more for your sake than for any fear I have of them myself, for I may happen to escape and rid myself in a great need, where ye must abide all that will be said unto you. And then if that ye fall in any distress through wilful folly, then is there none other remedy or help but by me and my blood. And wit ye well, madam, the boldness of you and me will bring us to great shame and slander; and that were me loth to see you dishonoured. And that is the cause I take upon me more for to do for damosels and maidens than ever I did tofore, that men should understand my joy and my delight is my pleasure to have ado for damosels and maidens.

CHAPTER II

How the queen commanded Sir Launcelot to avoid the court, and of the sorrow that Launcelot made.

All this while the queen stood still and let Sir Launcelot say what he would. And when he had all said she brast³ out on weeping, and so she sobbed and wept a great while. And when she might speak she said: Launcelot, now I well understand that thou art a false recreant knight and a common lecher, and lovest and holdest other ladies, and by me thou hast disdain and scorn. For wit thou well, she said, now I understand thy falsehood, and therefore shall I never love thee no more. And never be thou so hardy to come in my sight; and right here I discharge thee this court, that thou never come within it; and I forfend thee my fellowship, and upon pain of thy head that thou see me no more. Right so Sir Launcelot departed with great heaviness, that unneth⁴ he might sustain himself for great dole-making.⁵ Then he called Sir Bors, Sir Ector de Maris, and Sir Lionel, and told them how the queen had forfended⁶ him the court, and so he was in will to depart into his own country. Fair sir, said Sir Bors de Ganis, ye shall not depart out of this land by mine advice. Ye must remember in what honour ye are renowned, and called the noblest knight of the world; and many great matters ye have in hand. And women in their hastiness will do oft-times that sore repenteth them; and therefore by mine advice ye shall take your horse, and ride to the good hermitage here beside Windsor, that sometime was a good knight, his name is Sir Brasias, and there shall ye abide till I send you word of better tidings. Brother, said Sir Launcelot, wit ye well I am full loth to depart out of this realm, but the queen hath defended me so highly, that meseemeth she will never be my good lady as she hath been. Say ye never so, said Sir Bors, for many times or this time she hath been wroth with you, and after it she was the first that repented it. Ye say well, said Launcelot, for now will ² Or.³ Broke.⁴ Hardly.⁵ Grief-making.⁶ Forbidden.

I do by your counsel, and take mine horse and my harness, and ride to the hermit Sir Brasias, and there will I repose me until I hear some manner of tidings from you; but, fair brother, I pray you get me the love of my lady, Queen Guenever, an⁷ ye may. Sir, said Sir Bors, ye need not to move me of such matters, for well ye wot⁸ I will do what I may to please you. And then the noble knight, Sir Launcelot, departed with right heavy cheer suddenly, that none earthly creature wist of¹⁰ him, nor where he was become, but Sir Bors. So when Sir Launcelot was departed, the queen outward made no manner of sorrow in showing to none of his blood nor to none other. But wit ye well, inwardly, as the book saith, she took great thought, but she bare it out with a proud countenance as though she felt nothing nor danger.

[Chapters III-VII tell of a false accusation of murder made against the queen. Launcelot comes in disguise as her champion and is taken back into her good graces.]

CHAPTER VIII

How the truth was known by the maiden of the lake, and of divers other matters.

Thus it passed on till Our Lady Day, Assumption. Within a fifteen days of that feast the king let cry³⁰ a great jousts and a tournament that should be at that day at Camelot, that is Winchester; and the king let cry that he and the king of Scots would joust against all that would come against them. And when this cry was made, thither came many knights. So there came thither the king of Northgalis, and King Anguish of Ireland, and the King with the Hundred Knights, and Galahad, the haut⁹ prince, and the king of Northumberland, and many other noble dukes and earls of divers countries.⁴⁰ So King Arthur made him ready to depart to these jousts, and would have had the queen with him, but at that time she would not, she said, for she was sick and might not ride at that time. That me repenteth, said the king, for this seven year ye saw not such a noble fellowship together except at Whitsuntide when Galahad departed from the court. Truly, said the queen to the king, ye must hold me excused, I may not be there, and that me repenteth. And many deemed the queen would⁵⁰ not be there by cause of Sir Launcelot du Lake, for Sir Launcelot would not ride with the king, for he said that he was not whole of the wound the which Sir Mador had given him; wherefore the king was heavy and passing wroth. And so he departed toward Winchester with his fellowship; and so by the way the king lodged in a town called Astolat, that is now in English called Gilford, and there the king lay in the castle. So when the king was departed the queen called Sir Launcelot to her, and said thus: Sir Launcelot, ye are greatly to blame thus to hold you behind my lord; what trow ye what will your enemies and mine say and deem? nought else but, See how Sir Launcelot holdeth him ever behind the king, and so doth the queen, for that they would have their pleasure together. And thus will they say, said the queen to Sir Launcelot, have ye no doubt thereof.

CHAPTER IX

How Sir Launcelot rode to Astolat, and received a sleeve to wear upon his helm at the request of a maid.

Madam, said Sir Launcelot, I allow your wit, it is of late come syne¹⁰ ye were wise. And therefore, madam, at this time I will be ruled by your counsel, and this night I will take my rest, and tomorrow by time I will take my way toward Winchester. But wit you well, said Sir Launcelot to the queen, that at that jousts I will be against the king, and against all his fellowship. Ye may there do as ye list, said the queen, but by my counsel ye shall not be against your king and your fellowship. For therein be full many hard knights of your blood, as ye wot well enough, it needeth not to rehearse them. Madam, said Sir Launcelot, I pray you that ye be not displeased with me, for I will take the adventure that God will send me. And so upon the morn early Sir Launcelot heard mass and brake his fast, and so took his leave of the queen and departed. And then he rode so much until he came to Astolat, that is Gilford; and there it happened him in the eventide he came to an old baron's place that hight¹¹ Sir Bernard of Astolat. And as Sir Launcelot entered into his lodging, King Arthur espied him as he did walk in a garden beside the castle, how he took his lodging, and knew him full well. It is well, said King Arthur unto the knights that were with him in that garden beside the castle, I

⁷ If.

⁸ Know.

⁹ High.

¹⁰ Since (it is only lately that you have been wise).

¹¹ Was called.

have now espied one knight that will play his play at the jousts to the which we be gone toward; I undertake he will do marvels. Who is that, we pray you tell us? said many knights that were there at that time. Ye shall not wit for me, said the king, as at this time. And so the king smiled, and went to his lodging. So when Sir Launcelot was in his lodging, and unarmed him in his chamber, the old baron and hermit came to him making his reverence, and welcomed him in the best manner; but the old knight knew not Sir Launcelot. Fair sir, said Sir Launcelot to his host, I would pray you to lend me a shield that were not openly known, for mine is well known. Sir, said his host, ye shall have your desire, for meseemeth ye be one of the likeliest knights of the world, and therefore I shall shew you friendship. Sir, wit you well I have two sons that were but late made knights, and the eldest hight Sir Tirre, and he was hurt that same day he was made knight, that he may not ride, and his shield ye shall have; for that is not known I dare say but here, and in no place else. And my youngest son hight Lavaine, and if it please you, he shall ride with you unto that jousts; and he is of his age strong and wight,¹² for much my heart giveth unto you that ye should be a noble knight, therefore I pray you, tell me your name, said Sir Bernard. As for that, said Sir Launcelot, ye must hold me excused as at this time, and if God give me grace to speed well at the jousts I shall come again and tell you. But I pray you, said Sir Launcelot, in any wise let me have your son, Sir Lavaine, with me, and that I may have his brother's shield. All this shall be done, said Sir Bernard. This old baron had a daughter that was called that time the fair maiden of Astolat. And ever she beheld Sir Launcelot wonderfully; and as the book saith, she cast such a love unto Sir Launcelot that she could never withdraw her love, wherefore she died, and her name was Elaine le Blank.⁴⁰ So thus as she came to and fro she was so hot in her love that she besought Sir Launcelot to wear upon him at the jousts a token of hers. Fair damosel, said Sir Launcelot, an if I grant you that, ye may say I do more for your love than ever I did for lady or damosel. Then he remembered him he would go to the jousts disguised. And by cause he had never fore that time borne no manner of token of no damosel, then he bethought him that he would bear one of her, that none of his blood⁵⁰ thereby might know him, and then he said: Fair maiden, I will grant you to wear a token of yours upon mine helmet, and therefore what it is, shew it me. Sir, she said, it is a red sleeve of mine of scarlet, well embroidered with great pearls: and so she brought it him. So Sir Launcelot received it, and said: Never did I erst so much for no damosel. And then Sir Launcelot betook the fair maiden his shield in keeping, and prayed her to keep that until that he came again; and so that night he had merry rest and great cheer, for ever the damosel Elaine was about Sir Launcelot all the while she might be suffered.

[Launcelot goes in disguise to the tournament with Elaine's brother. He performs great deeds there but is sorely wounded. He leaves the field still unrecognized except by King Arthur, and takes refuge with a hermit.]

CHAPTER XIII

How Launcelot was brought to an hermit to be healed of his wound, and of other matters.

And when the hermit beheld him, as he sat leaning upon his saddle bow ever bleeding piteously, and ever the knight-hermit thought that he should know him, but he could not bring him to knowledge by cause he was so pale for bleeding. What knight are ye, said the hermit, and where were ye born? My fair lord, said Sir Launcelot, I am a stranger and a knight adventurous, that laboureth throughout many realms for to win worship. Then the hermit advised him better, and saw by a wound on his cheek that he was Sir Launcelot. Alas, said the hermit, mine own lord why layne¹³ you your name from me? Forsooth I ought to know you of right, for ye are the most noblest knight of the world, for well I know you for Sir Launcelot. Sir, said he, sith¹⁴ ye know me help me an¹⁵ ye may, for God's sake, for I would be out of this pain at once, either to death or to life. Have ye no doubt, said the hermit, ye shall live and fare right well. And so the hermit called to him two of his servants, and so he and his servants bare him into the hermitage, and lightly unarmed him, and laid him in his bed. And then anon the hermit staunched his blood, and made him to drink good wine, so that Sir Launcelot was well refreshed and knew himself; for in these days it was not the guise of hermits as is nowadays, for there were none hermits in those days but that they had been men of worship and of prowess; and those hermits held ¹² Courageous.

¹³ Conceal.

¹⁴ Since.
¹⁵ If.

great household, and refreshed people that were in distress.

Now turn we unto King Arthur, and leave we Sir Launcelot in the hermitage. So when the kings were come together on both parties, and the great feast should be holden, King Arthur asked the King of Northgalis and their fellowship, where was that knight that bare the red sleeve: Bring him afore me that he may have his laud, and honour, and the prize, as it is right. Then spake Sir Galahad, the haut prince, and the King with the Hundred Knights: We suppose that knight is mischieved, and that he is never like to see you nor none of us all, and that is the greatest pity that ever we wist of any knight. Alas, said Arthur, how may this be, is he so hurt? What is his name? said King Arthur. Truly, said they all, we know not his name, nor from whence he came, nor whither he would. Alas, said the king, this be to me the worst tidings that came to me this seven year, for I would not for all the lands I welde to know and wit it were so that that noble knight were slain. Know ye him? said they all. As for that, said Arthur, whether I know him or know him not, ye shall not know for me what man he is, but Almighty Jesu send me good tidings of him. And so said they all. By my head, said Sir Gawaine, if it so be that the good knight be so sore hurt, it is great damage and pity to all this land, for he is one of the noblest knights that ever I saw in a field handle a spear or a sword; and if he may be found I shall find him, for I am sure he nys not far from this town. Bear you well, said King Arthur, an ye may find him, unless that he be in such a plight that he may not welde himself. Jesu defend,¹⁶ said Sir Gawaine, but wit I shall what he is, an I may find him. Right so Sir Gawaine took a squire with him upon hackneys,¹⁷ and rode all about Camelot within six or seven mile, but so he came again and could hear no word of him. Then within two days King Arthur and all the fellowship returned unto London again. And so as they rode by the way it happed Sir Gawaine at Astolat to lodge with Sir Bernard there as was Sir Launcelot lodged. And so as Sir Gawaine was in his chamber to repose him Sir Bernard, the old baron, came unto him, and his daughter Elaine, to cheer him and to ask him what tidings, and who did best at that tournament of Winchester. So God help, said Sir Gawaine, there were two knights that bare two white shields,⁵⁰ but the one of them bare a red sleeve upon his head, and certainly he was one of the best knights that ever I saw joust in field. For I dare say, said Sir Gawaine, that one knight with the red sleeve smote down forty knights of the Table Round, and his fellow did right well and worshipfully. Now blessed be God, said the fair maiden of Astolat, that that knight sped so well, for he is the man in the world that I first loved, and truly he shall be last that ever I shall love. Now, fair maid, said Sir Gawaine, is that good knight your love? Certainly, sir, said she, wit ye well he is my love. Then know ye his name? said Sir Gawaine. Nay truly, said the damosel, I know not his name nor from whence he cometh, but to say that I love him, I promise you and God that I love him. How had ye knowledge of him first? said Sir Gawaine.

CHAPTER XIV

How Sir Gawaine was lodged with the Lord of Astolat, and there had knowledge that it was Sir Launcelot that bare the red sleeve.

Then she told him as ye have heard tofore, and how her father betook him her brother to do him service, and how her father lent him her brother's, Sir Tirre's, shield: And here with me he left his own shield. For what cause did he so? said Sir Gawaine. For this cause, said the damosel, for his shield was too well known among many noble knights. Ah, fair damosel, said Sir Gawaine, please it you let me have a sight of that shield. Sir, said she, it is in my chamber, covered with a case, and if ye will come with me ye shall see it. Not so, said Sir Bernard till his daughter, let send for it. So when the shield was come, Sir Gawaine took off the case, and when he beheld that shield he knew anon that it was Sir Launcelot's shield, and his own arms. Ah, Jesu mercy, said Sir Gawaine, now is my heart more heavier than ever it was tofore. Why? said Elaine. For I have great cause, said Sir Gawaine. Is that knight that oweth¹⁸ this shield your love? Yea, truly, said she, my love he is, God would I were his love. So God me speed, said Sir Gawaine, fair damosel ye have right, for an he be your love ye love the most honourable knight of the world, and the man of most worship. So me thought ever, said the damosel, for never or¹⁹ that time, for no knight that ever I saw, loved never none erst.²⁰ God grant, said Sir Gawaine, that ¹⁶ Forbid.

¹⁷ Riding horses.

¹⁸ Owns.

¹⁹ Before.

²⁰ Before.

CHAPTER XV

either of you may rejoice other, but that is in a great adventure. But truly, said Sir Gawaine unto the damosel, ye may say ye have a fair grace, for why I have known that noble knight this four and twenty year, and never or that day, I nor none other knight, I dare made good, saw or heard say that ever he bare token or sign of no lady, gentlewoman, ne maiden, at no jousts nor tournament. And therefore, fair maiden, said Sir Gawaine, ye are much beholden to him to give him thanks. But I dread me, said Sir Gawaine, that ye shall never see him in this world, and that is great pity that ever was of earthly knight. Alas, said she, how may this be, is he slain? I say not so, said Sir Gawaine, but wit ye well he is grievously wounded, by all manner of signs, and by men's sight more likelier to be dead than to be on live; and wit ye well he is the noble knight, Sir Launcelot, for by this shield I know him. Alas, said the fair maiden of Astolat, how may this be, and what was his hurt? Truly, said Sir Gawaine, the man in the world that loved him best hurt him so; and I dare say, said Sir Gawaine, an that knight that hurt him knew the very certainty that he had hurt Sir Launcelot, it would be the most sorrow that ever came to his heart. Now, fair father, said then Elaine, I require you give me leave to ride and seek him, or else I wot well I shall go out of my mind, for I shall never stint till that I find him and my brother, Sir Lavaine. Do as it liketh you, said her father, for me sore repenteth of the hurt of that noble knight. Right so they made her ready, and before Sir Gawaine, making great dole.

Then on the morn Sir Gawaine came to King Arthur, and told him how he had found Sir Launcelot's shield in the keeping of the fair maiden of Astolat. All that knew I aforehand, said King Arthur, and that caused me I would not suffer you to have ado at the great jousts, for I espied, said King Arthur, when he came in till his lodging full late in the evening in Astolat. But marvel have I, said Arthur, that ever he would bear any sign of any damosel, for or now I never heard say nor knew that ever he bare any token of none earthly woman. By my head, said Sir Gawaine, the fair maiden of Astolat loveth him marvellously well; what it meaneth I cannot say, and she is ridden after to seek him. So the king and all came to London, and there Sir Gawaine openly disclosed to all the court that it was Sir Launcelot that jousted best.

Of the sorrow that Sir Bors had for the hurt of Launcelot; and of the anger that the queen had because Launcelot bare the sleeve.

And when Sir Bors heard that, wit ye well he was an heavy man, and so were all his kinsmen. But when Queen Guenever wist that Sir Launcelot bare the red sleeve of the fair maiden of Astolat she was nigh out of her mind for wrath. And then she sent for Sir Bors de Ganis in all the haste that might be. So when Sir Bors was come tofore the queen, then she said: Ah, Sir Bors, have ye heard say how falsely Sir Launcelot hath betrayed me? Alas, madam, said Sir Bors, I am afear'd he hath betrayed himself and us all. No force, said the queen, though he be destroyed, for he is a false traitor knight. Madam, said Sir Bors, I pray you say ye not so, for wit you well I may not hear such language of him. Why, Sir Bors, said she, should I not call him traitor when he bare the red sleeve upon his head at Winchester, at the great jousts? Madam, said Sir Bors, that sleeve bearing repenteth me sore, but I dare say he did it to none evil intent, but for this cause he bare the red sleeve that none of his blood should know him. For or then we nor none of us all never knew that ever he bare token or sign of maid, lady, ne gentlewoman. Fie on him, said the queen, yet for all his pride and bobaunce²¹ there ye proved yourself his better. Nay, madam, say ye never more so, for he beat me and my fellows, and might have slain us an he had would. Fie on him, said the queen, for I heard Sir Gawaine say before my lord Arthur that it were marvel to tell the great love that is between the fair maiden of Astolat and him. Madam, said Sir Bors, I may not warn Sir Gawaine to say what it pleased him; but I dare say, as for my lord, Sir Launcelot, that he loveth no lady, gentlewoman, nor maid, but all he loveth in like much. And therefore, madam, said Sir Bors, ye may say what ye will, but wit ye well I will haste me to seek him, and find him wheresomever he be, and God send me good tidings of him.

And so leave we them there, and speak we of Sir Launcelot that lay in great peril. So as fair Elaine came to Winchester she sought there all about, and by fortune Sir Lavaine was ridden to play him, to enchafe²² his horse. And anon as Elaine saw him she knew him, and then she cried on loud until him. And when he heard her anon he came to her, and then she asked her brother ²¹ Pomp.²² Warm up.

how did my lord, Sir Launcelot. Who told you, sister, that my lord's name was Sir Launcelot? Then she told him how Sir Gawaine by his shield knew him. So they rode together till that they came to the hermitage, and anon she alit. So Sir Lavaine brought her in to Sir Launcelot; and when she saw him lie so sick and pale in his bed she might not speak, but suddenly she fell to the earth down suddenly in a swoon, and there she lay a great while. And when she was relieved, she shrieked and said: My lord, Sir Launcelot, alas why be ye in this plight? and then she swooned again. And then Sir Launcelot prayed Sir Lavaine to take her up: And bring her to me. And when she came to herself Sir Launcelot kissed her, and said: Fair maiden, why fare ye thus? ye put me to pain; wherefore make ye no more such cheer, for an ye be come to comfort me ye be right welcome; and of this little hurt that I have I shall be right hastily whole by the grace of God. But I marvel, said Sir Launcelot, who told you my name? Then the fair maiden told him all how Sir Gawaine was lodged with her father: And there by your shield he discovered your name. Alas, said Sir Launcelot, that me repenteth that my name is known, for I am sure it will turn unto anger. And then Sir Launcelot compassed in his mind that Sir Gawaine would tell Queen Guenever how he bare the red sleeve, and for whom; that he wist well would turn into great anger. So this maiden Elaine never went from Sir Launcelot, but watched him day and night, and did such attendance to him, that the French book saith there was never woman did more kindlier for man than she.

[They remain with the hermit until Launcelot's wound permits him to travel.]

CHAPTER XVIII

How Sir Bors returned and told tidings of Sir Launcelot; and of the tourney, and to whom the prize was given.

And so upon a morn they took their horses and Elaine le Blank with them; and when they came to Astolat there were they well lodged, and had great cheer of Sir Bernard, the old baron, and of Sir Tirre, his son. And so upon this morn when Sir Launcelot should depart, fair Elaine brought her father with her, and Sir Lavaine, and Sir Tirre, and thus she said:

CHAPTER XIX

Of the great lamentation of the fair maid of Astolat when Launcelot should depart, and how she died for his love.

My lord, Sir Launcelot, now I see ye will depart; now fair knight and courteous knight, have mercy upon me, and suffer me not to die for thy love. What would ye that I did? said Sir Launcelot. I would have you to my husband, said Elaine. Fair damosel, I thank you, said Sir Launcelot, but truly, said he, I cast²³ me never to be wedded man. Then, fair knight, said she, will ye be my paramour? Jesu defend me, said Sir Launcelot, for then I rewarded your father and your brother full evil for their great goodness. Alas, said she, then must I die for your love. Ye shall not so, said Sir Launcelot, for wit ye well, fair maiden, I might have been married an I had would, but I never applied me to be married yet; but by cause, fair damosel, that ye love me as ye say ye do, I will for your good will and kindness show you some goodness, and that is this, that wheresomever ye will beset your heart upon some good knight that will wed you, I shall give you together a thousand pound yearly to you and to your heirs; thus much will I give you, fair madam, for your kindness, and always while I live to be your own knight. Of all this, said the maiden, I will none, for but if ye will wed me, or else be my paramour at the least, wit you well, Sir Launcelot, my good days are done. Fair damosel, said Sir Launcelot, of these two things ye must pardon me. Then she shrieked shrilly, and fell down in a swoon; and then women bare her into her chamber, and there she made over much sorrow; and then Sir Launcelot would depart, and there he asked Sir Lavaine what he would do. What should I do, said Sir Lavaine, but follow you, but if ye drive me from you, or command me to go from you. Then came Sir Bernard to Sir Launcelot and said to him: I cannot see but that my daughter Elaine will die for your sake. I may not do withal, said Sir Launcelot, for that me sore repenteth, for I report me to yourself, that my proffer is fair; and me repenteth, said Sir Launcelot, that she loveth me as she doth; I was never the causer of it, for I report me to your son I early ne late proffered her bounte²⁴ nor fair behests; and as for me, said Sir Launcelot, I dare do all that a knight should do that she is a clene maiden for me,²⁵ both for deed and for will. And I am right ²³ Plan.

²⁴ Reward.

²⁵ As far as concerns me.

heavy of her distress, for she is a full fair maiden, good and gentle, and well taught. Father, said Sir Lavaine, I dare make good she is a clene maiden as for my lord Sir Launcelot; but she doth as I do, for sithen I first saw my lord Sir Launcelot, I could never depart from him, nor nought I will an I may follow him.

Then Sir Launcelot took his leave, and so they departed, and came unto Winchester. And when Arthur wist that Sir Launcelot was come whole and sound the king made great joy of him, and so did Sir Gawaine and all the knights of the Round Table except Sir Agravaine and Sir Mordred. Also Queen Guenever was wood²⁶ wroth with Sir Launcelot, and would by no means speak with him but estranged herself from him; and Sir Launcelot made all the means that he might for to speak with the queen, but it would not be.

Now speak we of the fair maiden of Astolat that made such sorrow day and night that she never slept, ate, nor drank, and ever she made her complaint unto Sir Launcelot. So when she had thus endured a ten days, that she feebled so that she must needs pass out of this world, then she shrived her clene, and received her Creator. And ever she complained still upon Sir Launcelot. Then her ghostly father²⁷ had her leave such thoughts. Then she said, why should I leave such thoughts? Am I not an earthly woman? And all the while the breath is in my body I may complain me, for my belief is I do none offence though I love an earthly man; and I take God to my record I loved never none but Sir Launcelot du Lake, nor never shall, and a clene maiden I am for him and for all other; and sithen it is the sufferance of God that I shall die for the love of so noble a knight, I beseech the High Father of Heaven to have mercy upon my soul, and upon mine innumerable pains that I suffered may be allegiance of part of my sins. For sweet Lord Jesu, said the fair maiden, I take Thee to record, on Thee I was never great offencer against thy laws; but that I loved this noble knight, Sir Launcelot, out of measure, and of myself, good Lord, I might not withstand the fervent love wherefore I have my death.

And then she called her father, Sir Bernard, and her brother, Sir Tirre, and heartily she prayed her father that her brother might write a letter like as she did indite it: and so her father granted her. And when the letter was written word by word like as she devised, then she prayed her father that she might be watched until she were dead. And while my body is hot let this letter be put in right hand, and my hand bound fast with the letter until that I be cold; and let me be put in a fair bed with all the richest clothes that I have about me, and so let my bed and all my richest clothes be laid with me in a chariot unto the next place where Thames is; and there let me be put within a barget, and but one man with me, such as ye trust to steer me thither, and that my barget be covered with black samite over and over: thus, father, I beseech you let it be done. So her father granted it her faithfully, all things should be done like as she had devised. Then her father and her brother made great dole, for when this was done anon she died. And so when she was dead the corpse and the bed all was led the next way unto Thames, and there a man, and the corpse, and all, were put into Thames; and so the man steered the barget unto Westminster, and there he rowed a great while to and fro or any espied it.

CHAPTER XX

How the corpse of the maid of Astolat arrived tofore King Arthur, and of the burying, and how Sir Launcelot offered the mass-penny.

So by fortune King Arthur and the Queen Guenever were speaking together at a window, and so as they looked into Thames they espied this black barget, and had marvel what it meant. Then the king called Sir Kay, and showed it him. Sir, said Sir Kay, wit you well there is some new tidings. Go thither, said the king to Sir Kay, and take with you Sir Brandiles and Agravaine, and bring me ready word what is there. Then these four knights departed and came to the barget and went in; and there they found the fairest corpse lying in a rich bed, and a poor man sitting in the barget's end, and no word would he speak. So these four knights returned unto the king again, and told him what they found. That fair corpse will I see, said the king. And so then the king took the queen by the hand, and went thither. Then the king made the barget to be holden fast, and then the king and the queen entered with certain knights with them; and there he saw the fairest woman lie in a rich bed, covered unto her middle with many rich clothes, and all was of cloth of gold, and she lay as though she had smiled. Then the queen espied a letter in her right hand, and told it to the king. Then the king took it and said: Now am I sure this letter will tell what she was, and why she is come hither. So then the king and the queen went out of the barget, and so commanded a certain man to wait upon the barget. And so when the king was come within his chamber, he called many knights about him, and said that he would wit openly what was written within that letter. Then the king brake it, and made a clerk to read it, and this was the intent of the letter. Most noble knight, Sir Launcelot, now hath death made us two at debate for your love. I was your lover, that men called the fair maiden of Astolat; therefore unto all ladies I make my moan, yet pray for my soul and bury me at least, and offer ye my mass-penny: this is my last request. And a clene maiden I died, I take God to witness: pray for my soul, Sir Launcelot, as thou art peerless. This was all the substance in the letter. And when it was read, the king, the queen, and all the knights wept for pity of the doleful complaints. Then was Sir Launcelot sent for; and when he was come King Arthur made the letter to be read to him. And when Sir Launcelot heard it word by word, he said: My lord Arthur, wit ye well I am right heavy of the death of this fair damosel: God knoweth I was never causer of her death by my willing, and that will I report me to her own brother: here he is, Sir Lavaine. I will not say nay, said Sir Launcelot, but that she was both fair and good, and much I was beholden unto her, but she loved me out of measure. Ye might have shewed her, said the queen, some bounty and gentleness that might have preserved her life. Madam, said Sir Launcelot, she would none other ways be answered but that she would be my wife, outhere else my paramour; and of these two I would not grant her, but I proffered her, for her good love that she showed me, a thousand pound yearly to her, and to her heirs, and to wed any manner knight that she could find best to love in her heart. For, madam, said Sir Launcelot, I love not to be constrained to love; for love must arise of the heart, and not by no constraint. That is truth, said the king, and many knight's love is free in himself, and never will be bounden, for where he is bounden he looseth himself. Then said the king unto Sir Launcelot: It will be your worship that ye oversee that she be interred worshipfully. Sir, said Sir Launcelot, that shall be done as I can best devise. And so many knights yede²⁸ thither to behold that fair maiden. And so upon the morn she was interred richly, and Sir Launcelot offered her mass-penny; and all the knights of the Table Round that were there at that time offered with Sir Launcelot. And then the poor man went again with the barget. Then the queen sent for Sir Launcelot, and prayed him of mercy, for why that she had been wroth with him causeless. This is not the first time, said Sir Launcelot, that ye had been displeased with me causeless, but, madam, ever I must suffer you, but what sorrow I endure I take no force. So this passed on all that winter, with all manner of hunting and hawking, and jousts and tourneys were many betwixt many great lords, and ever in all places Sir Lavaine gat great worship, so that he was nobly renowned among many knights of the Table Round. . . .

²⁶ Mad.

²⁷ Father confessor.

CHAPTER XXV

How true love is likened to summer.

And thus it passed on from Candlemass until after Easter, that the month of May was come, when every lusty heart beginneth to blossom, and to bring forth fruit; for like as herbs and trees bring forth fruit and flourish in May, in likewise every lusty heart that is in any manner a lover, springeth and flourisheth in lusty deeds. For it giveth unto all lovers courage, that lusty month of May, in something to constrain him to some manner of thing more in that month than in any other month, for diverse causes. For then all herbs and trees renew a man and woman, and in likewise lovers call again to their mind old gentleness and old service, and many kind deeds that were forgotten by negligence. For like as winter rasure²⁹ doth alway arase and deface green summer, so fareth it by unstable love in man and woman. For in many persons there is no stability; for we may see all day, for a little blast of winter's rasure, anon we shall deface and lay apart true love for little or nought, that cost much thing; this is no wisdom nor stability, but it is feebleness of nature and great disworship, whomsoever useth this. Therefore, like as May month flowereth and flourisheth in many gardens, so in likewise let every man of worship flourish his heart in this world, first unto God, and next unto the joy of them that he promised his faith unto; for there was never worshipful man nor worshipful woman, but they loved one better than another; and worship in arms may never be foiled, but first reserve the honour to God, and secondly the quarrel must come of thy lady; and such love I call virtuous love. But nowadays men can not love seven night but they must have all their desires: that love may not endure by reason; for where they be soon accorded, and hasty heat, soon it cooleth. Right so fareth love nowadays, soon hot soon cold: this is no stability. But the old love was not so; men and women could love together seven years, and no lycours⁸⁰ lusts were between them, and then was love, truth, and faithfulness: and lo, in likewise was used love in King Arthur's days. Wherefore I liken love nowadays unto summer and winter; for like as the one is hot and the other cold, so fareth love nowadays; therefore all ye that be lovers call unto your remembrance the month of May, like as did Queen Guenever, for whom I make here a little mention, that while she lived she was a true lover, and therefore she had a good end.

²⁸ Went.

²⁹ Cutting.

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH BALLADS

Edward

"Why dois your brand sae drap wi bluid,
Edward, Edward?"

Why dois your brand sae drap wi bluid,
And why sae sad gang yee O?"

"O I hae killed my hauke sae guid, 5
Mither, mither,

O I hae killed my hauke sae guid,
And I had nae mair bot hee O."

"Your haukis bluid was nevir sae reid,
Edward, Edward,

Your haukis bluid was never sae reid, 11
My deir son I tell thee O."

"O I hae killed my reid-roan steid,
Mither, mither,

O I hae killed my reid-roan steid, 15
That erst was sae fair and frie O."

"Your steid was auld, and ye hae gat mair,
Edward, Edward,

Your steid was auld, and ye hae gat mair;
Sum other dule ye drie O." 20

"O I hae killed my fadir deir,
Mither, mither,

O I hae killed my fadir deir,
Alas, and wae is mee O!"

"And whatten penance wul ye drie for that, 25
Edward, Edward?"

And whatten penance wul ye drie, for that?
My deir son, now tell me O."

"Ile set my feit in yonder boat,
Mither, mither, 31
Ile set my feit in yonder boat,
And Ile fare ovir the sea O."

"And what wul ye doe wi your towirs and your ha,
Edward, Edward?"

And what wul ye doe wi your towirs and your ha,
That were sae fair to see O?" 36

"Ile let thame stand tul they doun fa,
Mither, mither,
Ile let thame stand tul they doun fa,
For here nevir mair maun I bee O." 40

"And what wul ye leive to your bairns and your wife,
Edward, Edward?"

And what wul ye leive to your bairns and your wife,
Whan ye gang ovir the sea O?"

"The warldis room, late them beg thrae life, 45
Mither, mither,

The warldis room, late them beg thrae life,
For thame nevir mair wul I see O."

"And what wul ye leive to your ain mither deir, Edward, Edward?"

⁸⁰ Lecherous.

Edward achieves its effect of great dramatic intensity by means of repetition and refrain. The device at the end, of bequeathing various things to father, mother, etc., is frequent in ballads. The dialect is not difficult, though the spelling may cause some confusion to the inexperienced reader. Note the following words: dois (does), brand (sword), bluid (blood), gang (go), hauke (hawk), guid (good), mair (more), bot (but), reid (red), steid (steed), auld (old), dule (grief), drie (suffer), fadir (father), flit (felt), ha (hall), maun (must), bairns (children), warldis (world's), late (let), thrae (through), ain (own).

And what wul ye leive to your ain mither deir?

My deir son, now tell me O." 52

"The curse of hell frae me sall ye beir,
Mither, mither,

The curse of hell frae me sall ye beir, 55
Sic counsels ye gave to me O."

Lord Randal

"O where hae ye been, Lord Randal, my son?

O where hae ye been, my handsome young man?"

"I hae been to the wild wood; mother, make my bed soon,

For I'm weary wi hunting, and fain wald lie
down."

"Where gat ye your dinner, Lord Randal, my son? 5

Where gat ye your dinner, my handsome young
man?"

"I dined wi my true-love; mother, make my bed
soon,

For I'm weary wi hunting, and fain wald lie
down."

"What gat ye to your dinner, Lord Randal, my son?

What gat ye to your dinner, my handsome young
man?" 10

"I gat eels¹ boiled in broo; mother, make my bed
soon,

For I'm weary wi hunting, and fain wald lie
down."

"What became of your bloodhounds, Lord Randal,
my son?

What became of your bloodhounds, my handsome young man?"

"O they swelld and they died; mother, make my bed soon, 15

For I'm weary wi hunting, and fain wald lie
down."

"O I fear ye are poisond, Lord Randal, my son!

O I fear ye are poisond, my handsome young
man!"

"O yes! I am poisond; mother, make my bed soon,
For I'm sick at the heart, and I fain wald lie
down." 20

Bonny Barbara Allan

It was in and about the Martinmas² time,
When the green leaves were a falling,
That Sir John Graeme, in the West Country,
Fell in love with Barbara Allan.

He sent his man down through the town 5
To the place where she was dwelling:
"O haste and come to my master dear,
Gin³ ye be Barbara Allan."

O hooly, hooly rose she up, 10
To the place where he was lying,
And when she drew the curtain by,
"Young man, I think you're dying."

"O it's I'm sick, and very, very sick,
And 'tis a' for Barbara Allan"; 15
"O the better for me ye's never be,
Tho your heart's blood were a spilling."

"O dinna ye mind, young man," said she,
"When ye was in the tavern a drinking,
That ye made the healths gae round and round,
And slighted Barbara Allan?" 20

He turned his face unto the wall,
And death was with him dealing;
"Adieu, adieu, my dear friends all,
And be kind to Barbara Allan."

And slowly, slowly raise she up, 25
And slowly, slowly left him,
And sighing said she could not stay,
Since death of life had reft him.

She had not gane a mile but twa,
When she heard the dead-bell ringing, 30
And every jow that the dead-bell geid,
It cry'd, Woe to Barbara Allan!

"Oh mother, mother, make my bed!
O make it saft and narrow!
Since my love died for me today, 35
I'll die for him tomorrow."

The Twa Sisters

There was twa sisters in a bowr,
Edinburgh, Edinburgh,⁴

¹ His sweetheart has served him poisonous snakes instead of eels.

² Feast of St. Martin, November 11.

³ Gin (if), hooly (slowly), dinna (do not).

⁴ This meaningless refrain was repeated with each stanza as it was sung. The tune is one of the best of all the ballads.

There was twa sisters in a bowr,
 Stirling for ay;
 There was twa sisters in a bowr,
 There came a knight to be their wooer.
 Bonny Saint Johnston stands upon Tay.

5

He courted the eldest wi glove an ring,
 But he lovd the youngest above a' thing.

He courted the eldest wi brotch¹ an knife,
 But he lovd the youngest as his life.

10

The eldest she was vexéd sair,
 An much envied her sister fair.

Into her bowr she could not rest;
 Wi grief an spite she almos brast.

15

Upon a morning fair an clear,
 She cried upon her sister dear:

"O sister, come to yon sea stran,
 An see our father's ships come to lan."

She's taen her by the milk-white han,
 An led her down to yon sea stran.

20

The youngest stood upon a stane;
 The eldest came an threw her in.

She tooke her by the middle sma,
 And dashed her bonny back to the jaw.

25

"O sister, sister, tak my han,
 An Ise mack you heir to a' my lan.

"O sister, sister, tak my middle,
 An yes get my goud and my gouden girdle.

"O sister, sister, save my life,
 An I swear Ise never be nae man's wife."

30

"Foul fa the han that I should tacke;
 It twin'd me an my wardles make.

"Your cherry cheeks an yallow hair Gars me gae maiden for evermair."

35

Sometimes she sank, an sometimes she swam,
 Till she came down yon bonny mill-dam.

O out it came the miller's son,
 An saw the fair maid swimmin in.

"O father, father, draw your dam;
 Here's either a mermaid or a swan."

40

The miller quickly drew the dam,
 An there he found a drownd woman.

You coudna see her yallow hair
 For gold and pearle that were so rare.

45

You coudna see her middle sma
 For gouden girdle that was sae braw.

You coudna see her fingers white,
 For gouden rings that were sae gryte.

An by there came a harper fine,
 That harpéd to the king at dine.

50

When he did look that lady upon,
 He sighd and made a heavy moan.

He's taen three locks o her yallow hair,
 And wi them strung his harp sae fair.

55

The first tune he did play and sing,
 Was, "Farewell to my father the king."

The nextin tune that he playd syne,
 Was, "Farewell to my mother the queen."

The lasten tune that he playd then,
 Was, "Wae to my sister, fair Ellen."

60

The Wife of Usher's Well

There lived a wife² at Usher's Well,
 And a wealthy wife was she;
 She had three stout and stalwart sons,
 And sent them oer the sea.

They hadna been a week from her,
 A week but barely ane,
 Whan word came to the carline wife
 That her three sons were gane.

5

¹ Brotch (brooch), brast (burst), upon (unto), stane (stone), sma (small), jaw (wave), Ise mack (I shall make), yes get (you shall get), goud (gold), twined (separated), wardles (world's), make (mate), gars (makes), gouden (golden), braw (fine), gryte (great), dine (dinner), taen (taken).

² Wife (woman), hadna (had not), ane (one), gane (gone), fashes in the flood (storms on the sea), mirk (dark), birk (birch), syke (trench), sheugh (furrow), gin (if), sair (sore), maun bide (must endure), byre (stable).

They hadna been a week from her,
A week but barely three, 10
Whan word came to the carline wife
That her sons she'd never see.

"I wish the wind may never cease,
Nor fashes in the flood,
Till my three sons come hame to me, 15
In earthly flesh and blood."

It fell about the Martinmass,
When nights are lang and mirk,
The carline wife's three sons came hame,
And their hats were o the birk. 20

It neither grew in syke nor ditch,
Nor yet in ony sheugh;
But at the gates o Paradise,
That birk grew fair enugh.

"Blow up the fire, my maidens, 25
Bring water from the well;
For a' my house shall feast this night,
Since my three sons are well."

And she has made to them a bed,
She's made it large and wide, 30
And she's taen her mantle her about,
Sat down at the bed-side.

Up then crew the red, red cock,
And up and crew the gray;
The eldest to the youngest said, 35
" 'Tis time we were away."

The cock he hadna crawd but once,
And clappd his wings at a',
When the youngest to the eldest said, 40
"Brother, we must awa."

"The cock doth crawl, the day doth daw,
The channerin worm doth chide;
Gin we be mist out o our place,
A sair pain we maun bide.

"Fare ye weel, my mother dear! 45
Fareweel to barn and byre!
And fare ye weel, the bonny lass
That kindles my mother's fire!"

Sir Patrick Spens

The king sits in Dumferling toun,
Drinking the blude-reid wine:

"O whar will I get guid sailor,
To sail this schip of mine?"

Up and spak an eldern knicht, 5
Sat at the kings richt kne:
"Sir Patrick Spens is the best sailor,
That sails upon the se."

The king has written a braid letter,
And signd it wi his hand, 10
And sent it to Sir Patrick Spens,
Was walking on the sand.

The first line that Sir Patrick red,
A loud lauch lauched he;
The next line that Sir Patrick red, 15
The teir blinded his ee.

"O wha is this has don this deid,
This ill deid don to me,
To send me out this time o' the yeir, 20
To sail upon the se!"

"Mak hast, mak haste, my mirry men all,
Our guid schip sails the morne."
"O say na sae, my master deir,
For I feir a deadlie storme.

"Late, late yestreen I saw the new moone, 25
Wi the auld moone in hir arme,
And I feir, I feir, my deir master,
That we will cum to harme."

O our Scots nobles wer richt laith
To weet their cork-heild schoone; 30
Bot lang owre a' the play wer playd,
Thair hats they swam aboone.

O lang, lang may their ladies sit,
Wi thair fans into their hand,
Or eir they se Sir Patrick Spens 35
Cum sailing to the land.

O lang, lang may the ladies stand,
Wi thair gold kems in their hair,
Waiting for thair ain deir lords,
For they'll se thame na mair. 40

Haf owre, haf owre to Aberdour,
It's fiftie fadom deip,
And thair lies guid Sir Patrick Spens,
Wi the Scots lords at his feit.

The Three Ravens

1. There were three ravens sat on a tree,
Downe a downe, hay down, hay downe,
There were three ravens sat on a tree,
With a downe,
There were three ravens sat on a tree, 5
They were as blacke as they might be.
With a downe derrie, derrie, derrie, downe,
downe.
2. The one of them said to his mate,
"Where shall we our breakefast take?"
3. "Downe in yonder greene field, 10
There lies a knight slain under his shield.
4. "His hounds they lie downe at his feete,
So well they can their master keepe.
5. "His haukes they flie so eagerly,
There's no fowle dare him come nie." 15
6. Downe there comes a fallow doe,
As great with yong as she might goe.
7. She lift up his bloody hed,
And kist his wounds that were so red.
8. She got him up upon her backe, 20
And carried him to earthen lake.
9. She buried him before the prime,
She was dead herselfe ere even-song time.
10. God send every gentleman,
Such haukes, such hounds, and such a leman.¹

Mary Hamilton

Word's gane ² to the kitchen,
And word's gane to the ha,
That Marie Hamilton gangs wi bairn
To the highest Stewart of a'.

He's courted her in the kitchen, 5
He's courted her in the ha,
He's courted her in the laigh cellar,
And that was warst of a'.

She's tyed it in her apron
And she's thrown it in the sea; 10
Says, Sink ye, swim ye, bonny wee babe!
You'l neer get mair o me.

Down then cam the auld queen,
Goud tassels tying her hair:
"O Marie, where's the bonny wee babe 15
That I heard greet sae sair?"

"There was never a babe intill my room,
As little designs to be;
It was but a touch o my sair side,
Come oer my fair bodie." 20

"O Marie, put on your robes o black,
Or else your robes o brown,
For ye maun gang wi me the night,
To see fair Edinbro town."

"I winna put on my robes o black, 25
Nor yet my robes o brown;
But I'll put on my robes o white,
To shine through Edinbro town."

When she gaed up the Cannogate,
She laughd loud laughs three; 30
But when she cam down the Cannogate
The tear blinded her ee.

When she gaed up the Parliament stair,
The heel cam aff her shее;
And lang or she cam down again 35
She was condemned to dee.

When she cam down the Cannogate,
The Cannogate sae free,
Many a ladie lookd oer her window,
Weeping for this ladie. 40

"Ye need nae weep for me," she says,
"Ye need nae weep for me;
For had I not slain mine own sweet babe,
This death I wadna dee.

"Bring me a bottle of wine," she says, 45
"The best that eer ye hae,
That I may drink to my weil-wishers,
And they may drink to me.

¹ Leman (sweetheart).

² Gane (gone), gangs wi bairn (is with child), highest (highest), laigh (low), warst (worst), greet (cry), maun gang wi me the night (must go with me tonight), gaed (went), shее (shoe).

"Here's a health to the jolly sailors,
That sail upon the main; 50
Let them never let on to my father and mother
But what I'm coming hame.

"Here's a health to the jolly sailors,
That sail upon the sea;
Let them never let on to my father and mother
That I cam here to dee. 56

"Oh little did my mother think,
The day she cradled me,
What lands I was to travel through,
What death I was to dee. 60

"Oh little did my father think,
The day he held up me,
What lands I was to travel through,
What death I was to dee.

'Last night I washd the queen's feet, 65
And gently laid her down;
And a' the thanks I've gotten the nicht
To be hangd in Edinbro town!

"Last nicht there was four Maries,
The nicht there'l be but three; 70
There was Marie Seton, and Marie Beton,
And Marie Carmichael, and me."

CHAUCER

Geoffrey Chaucer was born about 1340 in London and died in 1400. His sixty years were nearly all spent in the city, usually in some sort of connection with the royal court. He was a court page; he fought in the war in France, where he was captured and ransomed; later, in his twenties, he was associated with the king's sons, the Dukes of Clarence and Lancaster; in his thirties he went twice on official visits to Italy; and for the rest of his life he underwent the shifting fortunes of political office. He somehow escaped three epidemics of the Black Death, which carried off so many of his contemporaries. When we consider how much he was doing in the practical world we wonder that he should have found time to write.

And yet his literary production from his late twenties until his last years was large and constant. He began writing poems that are primarily based on French models of his day, filled with allegories and dreams. But not all the work of this period of French influence is merely imitative. He soon showed his mastery of the newly-evolved English language and his knowledge of human life. In his late thirties and early forties he was greatly affected by his two Italian journeys, and we observe a growing power. Indeed, it is during this period that he wrote what many consider his best work, Troilus and Creseyde. Here he shows not only great dramatic ability and understanding of emotions but extraordinary technical skill in handling a difficult stanza form. The English language has come into the hands of the first man who could make use of its range and beauty.

The last fifteen to twenty years of his life were devoted to work on The Canterbury Tales. These were written from time to time, and some of them never finished. Eventually they were brought together in a framework which is explained in the Prologue. This task permitted Chaucer to use all his talents, for the tales are of the greatest variety. From the portrait painting of the Prologue and its incidental humor and satire, he could move to the pure romance of the Knight's tale, the piety of the tale of Saint Cecelia, or the ribald humor of the Miller or the Reeve. Perhaps the best single tale, considered as a short story, is the Pardoner's account of the three treasure-finders who kill each other, but for most readers the favorite is the Nun's Priest's Tale of the Cock and the Fox. The student who is for the first time reading Chaucer can make no mistake in choosing this tale and the Prologue. This experience may well lead him to a further acquaintance with the old poet who was so full of the joy of living and the wisdom of life.

GEOFFREY CHAUCER

The Canterbury Tales

THE PROLOGUE

Here begins the Book of the Tales of Canterbury

When April with his showers sweet with fruit
The drought of March has pierced unto the root
And bathed each vein with liquor that has power
To generate therein and sire the flower;
When Zephyr also has, with his sweet breath, 5
Quickened again, in every holt and heath,
The tender shoots and buds, and the young sun
Into the Ram one half his course has run,
And many little birds make melody
That sleep through all the night with open eye 10
(So Nature pricks them on to ramp and rage)—
Then do folk long to go on pilgrimage,
And palmers to go seeking out strange strands,
To distant shrines well known in sundry lands.
And specially from every shire's end 15
Of England they to Canterbury wend,
The holy blessed martyr¹ there to seek
Who helped them when they lay so ill and weak.

Befell that, in that season, on a day
In Southwark, at the Tabard,² as I lay 20
Ready to start upon my pilgrimage
To Canterbury, full of devout homage,
There came at nightfall to that hostelry
Some nine and twenty in a company
Of sundry persons who had chanced to fall 25
In fellowship, and pilgrims were they all
That toward Canterbury town would ride.
The rooms and stables spacious were and wide,
And well we there were eased, and of the best.
And briefly, when the sun had gone to rest, 30
So had I spoken with them, every one,
That I was of their fellowship anon,
And made agreement that we'd early rise
To take the road, as you I will apprise.

But none the less, whilst I have time and space,
Before yet farther in this tale I pace, 36

It seems to me accordant with reason
To inform you of the state of every one
Of all of these, as it appeared to me,
And who they were, and what was their degree,
And even how arrayed there at the inn; 41
And with a knight thus will I first begin.

THE KNIGHT

A knight there was, and he a worthy man,
Who, from the moment that he first began
To ride about the world, loved chivalry, 45
Truth, honor, freedom and all courtesy.
Full worthy was he in his liege-lord's war,
And therein had he ridden (none more far)
As well in Christendom as heathenesse,
And honored everywhere for worthiness. 50

At Alexandria, he, when it was won;
Full oft the table's roster he'd begun
Above all nations' knights in Prussia.
In Latvia raided he, and Russia,
No christened man so oft of his degree. 55
In far Granada at the siege was he
Of Algeciras, and in Belmarie.

At Ayas was he and at Satalye
When they were won; and on the Middle Sea
At many a noble meeting chanced to be. 60
Of mortal battles he had fought fifteen,
And he'd fought for our faith at Tramissene
Three times in lists, and each time slain his foe.

This self-same worthy knight had been also
At one time with the lord of Palatye 65
Against another heathen in Turkey:

And always won he sovereign fame for prize.
Though so illustrious, he was very wise
And bore himself as meekly as a maid.
He never yet had any vileness said, 70
In all his life, to whatsoever wight.

He was a truly perfect, gentle knight.
But now, to tell you all of his array,
His steeds were good, but yet he was not gay.

The Prologue and Nun's Priest's Tale are translated by J. U. Nicolson. Reprinted by permission of Covici, Friede, Inc. Geoffrey Chaucer (c. 1340-1400) was born in London. He spent most of his life in public service. He lived for a period in Italy.

¹ Saint Thomas à Becket, who had been murdered in a dispute with the English King. His shrine was visited by sick people in order to be cured.

² An inn in Southwark, just across the river from central London.

Of simple fustian wore he a jupon
 Sadly discolored by his habergeon;
 For he had lately come from his voyage
 And now was going on this pilgrimage.

THE SQUIRE

With him there was his son, a youthful squire,
 A lover and a lusty bachelor,
 With locks well curled, as if they'd laid in press.
 Some twenty years of age he was, I guess.
 In stature he was of an average length,
 Wondrously active, aye, and great of strength.
 He'd ridden sometime with the cavalry
 In Flanders, in Artois, and Picardy,
 And borne him well within that little space
 In hope to win thereby his lady's grace.
 Prinked out he was, as if he were a mead,
 All full of fresh-cut flowers white and red.
 Singing he was, or fluting, all the day;
 He was as fresh as is the month of May.
 Short was his gown, with sleeves both long and wide.
 Well could he sit on horse, and fairly ride.
 He could make songs and words thereto indite,
 Joust, and dance too, as well as sketch and write.
 So hot he loved that, while night told her tale,
 He slept no more than does a nightingale.
 Courteous he, and humble, willing and able,
 And carved before his father at the table.

THE YEOMAN

A yeoman had he, nor more servants, no,
 At that time, for he chose to travel so;
 And he was clad in coat and hood of green.
 A sheaf of peacock arrows bright and keen
 Under his belt he bore right carefully
 (Well could he keep his tackle yeomanly:
 His arrows had no draggled feathers low),
 And in his hand he bore a mighty bow.
 A cropped head had he and a sun-browned face.
 Of woodcraft knew he all the useful ways.
 Upon his arm he bore a bracer gay,
 And at one side a sword and buckler, yea,
 And at the other side a dagger bright,
 Well sheathed and sharp as spear point in the light;
 On breast a Christopher of silver sheen.
 He bore a horn in baldric all of green;
 A forester he truly was, I guess.

THE PRIORESS

There was also a nun, a prioress,
 Who, in her smiling, modest was and coy;
 Her greatest oath was but "By Saint Eloy!"

75 And she was known as Madam Eglantine.
 Full well she sang the services divine,
 Intoning through her nose, becomingly;
 And fair she spoke her French, and fluently,
 After the school of Stratford-at-the-Bow,
 For French of Paris was not hers to know.
 At table she had been well taught withal,
 And never from her lips let morsels fall,
 Nor dipped her fingers deep in sauce, but ate
 With so much care the food upon her plate
 That never dribble fell upon her breast.
 In courtesy she had delight and zest.
 Her upper lip was always wiped so clean
 That in her cup was no iota seen
 Of grease, when she had drunk her draught of wine.
 Becomingly she reached for meat to dine.
 And certainly delighting in good sport,
 She was right pleasant, amiable—in short.
 She was at pains to counterfeit the look
 Of courtliness, and stately manners took,
 And would be held worthy of reverence.
 But, to say something of her moral sense,
 She was so charitable and piteous
 That she would weep if she but saw a mouse
 Caught in a trap, though it were dead or bled.
 She had some little dogs, too, that she fed
 On roasted flesh, or milk and fine white bread.
 But sore she'd weep if one of them were dead,
 Or if men smote it with a rod to smart:
 For pity ruled her, and her tender heart.
 Right decorous her pleated wimple was;
 Her nose was fine; her eyes were blue as glass;
 Her mouth was small and therewith soft and red;
 But certainly she had a fair forehead;
 It was almost a full span broad, I own,
 For, truth to tell, she was not undergrown.
 Neat was her cloak, as I was well aware.
 Of coral small about her arm she'd bear
 A string of beads and gauded all with green;
 And therefrom hung a brooch of golden sheen
 Whereon there was first written a crowned "A,"
 And under, Amor vincit omnia.

THE NUN

Another little nun with her had she,

THE THREE PRIESTS

Who was her chaplain; and of priests she'd three.

THE MONK

A monk there was, one made for mastery,
 An outrider, who loved his venery;

A manly man, to be an abbot able.
 Full many a blooded horse had he in stable:
 And when he rode men might his bridle hear
 A-jingling in the whistling wind as clear, 170
 Aye, and as loud as does the chapel bell
 Where this brave monk was master of the cell.
 The rule of Maurus or Saint Benedict,
 By reason it was old and somewhat strict, 174
 This said monk let such old things slowly pace
 And followed new-world manners in their place.
 He cared not for that text a clean-plucked hen
 Which holds that hunters are not holy men;
 Nor that a monk, when he is cloisterless,
 Is like unto a fish that's waterless; 180
 That is to say, a monk out of his cloister.
 But this same text he held not worth an oyster;
 And I said his opinion was right good.
 What? Should he study as a madman would Upon a book in cloister cell? Or yet 185
 Go labor with his hands and swink and sweat,
 As Austin bids? How shall the world be served?
 Let Austin have his toil to him reserved.
 Therefore he was a rider day and night;
 Greyhounds he had, as swift as bird in flight. 190
 Since riding and the hunting of the hare
 Were all his love, for no cost would he spare.
 I saw his sleeves were purfled at the hand
 With fur of gray, the finest in the land;
 Also, to fasten hood beneath his chin, 195
 He had of good wrought gold a curious pin:
 A love-knot in the larger end there was.
 His head was bald and shone like any glass,
 And smooth as one anointed was his face.
 Fat was this lord, he stood in goodly case. 200
 His bulging eyes he rolled about, and hot
 They gleamed and red, like fire beneath a pot;
 His boots were soft; his horse of great estate.
 Now certainly he was a fine prelate:
 He was not pale as some poor wasted ghost. 205
 A fat swan loved he best of any roast.
 His palfrey was as brown as is a berry.

THE FRIAR

A friar there was, a wanton and a merry,
 A limiter, a very festive man.
 In all the Orders Four is none that can 210
 Equal his gossip and his fair language.
 He had arranged full many a marriage
 Of women young, and this at his own cost.
 Unto his order he was a noble post.
 Well liked by all and intimate was he 215
 With franklins everywhere in his country,

And with the worthy women of the town:
 For at confessing he'd more power in gown
 (As he himself said) than a good curate, 220
 For of his order he was licentiate.
 He heard confession gently, it was said,
 Gently absolved too, leaving naught of dread.
 He was an easy man to give penance
 When knowing he should gain a good pittance;
 For to a begging friar, money given 225
 Is sign that any man has been well shriven.
 For if one gave (he dared to boast of this),
 He took the man's repentance not amiss.
 For many a man there is so hard of heart 230
 He cannot weep however pains may smart.
 Therefore, instead of weeping and of prayer,
 Men should give silver to poor friars all bare.
 His tippet was stuck always full of knives
 And pins, to give to young and pleasing wives.
 And certainly he kept a merry note: 235
 Well could he sing and play upon the rote.
 At balladry he bore the prize away.
 His throat was white as lily of the May;
 Yet strong he was as ever champion.
 In towns he knew the taverns, every one, 240
 And every good host and each barmaid too—
 Better than begging lepers, these he knew.
 For unto no such solid man as he Accorded it, as far as he could see,
 To have sick lepers for acquaintances. 245
 There is no honest advantageousness
 In dealing with such poverty-stricken curs;
 It's with the rich and with big victualers.
 And so, wherever profit might arise
 Courteous he was and humble in men's eyes. 250
 There was no other man so virtuous.
 He was the finest beggar of his house;
 A certain district being farmed to him,
 None of his brethren dared approach its rim;
 For though a widow had no shoes to show, 255
 So pleasant was his In principio,
 He always got a farthing ere he went.
 He lived by pickings, it is evident.
 And he could romp as well as any whelp.
 On love days could he be of mickle help. 260
 For there he was not like a cloisterer,
 With threadbare cope as is the poor scholar,
 But he was like a lord or like a pope.
 Of double worsted was his semi-cope,
 That rounded like a bell, as you may guess. 265
 He lisped a little, out of wantonness,
 To make his English soft upon his tongue;
 And in his harping, after he had sung,

His two eyes twinkled in his head as bright
 As do the stars within the frosty night. 270
 This worthy limiter was named Hubert.

THE MERCHANT

There was a merchant with forked beard, and girt
 In motley gown, and high on horse he sat,
 Upon his head a Flemish beaver hat;
 His boots were fastened rather elegantly. 275
 He spoke his notions out right pompously,
 Stressing the times when he had won, not lost.
 He would the sea were held at any cost
 Across from Middleburgh to Orwell town.
 At money-changing he could make a crown. 280
 This worthy man kept all his wits well set;
 There was no one could say he was in debt,
 So well he governed all his trade affairs
 With bargains and with borrowings and with shares.
 Indeed, he was a worthy man withal, 285
 But, sooth to say, his name I can't recall.

THE CLERK

A clerk from Oxford was with us also,
 Who'd turned to getting knowledge, long ago.
 As meager was his horse as is a rake,
 Nor he himself too fat, I'll undertake, 290
 But he looked hollow and went soberly.
 Right threadbare was his overcoat; for he
 Had got him yet no churchly benefice,
 Nor was so worldly as to gain office.
 For he would rather have at his bed's head 295
 Some twenty books, all bound in black and red,
 Of Aristotle and his philosophy
 Than rich robes, fiddle, or gay psaltery.
 Yet, and for all he was philosopher,
 He had but little gold within his coffer; 300
 But all that he might borrow from a friend
 On books and learning he would swiftly spend,
 And then he'd pray right busily for the souls
 Of those who gave him wherewithal for schools.
 Of study took he utmost care and heed. 305
 Not one word spoke he more than was his need;
 And that was said in fullest reverence
 And short and quick and full of high good sense.
 Pregnant of moral virtue was his speech;
 And gladly would he learn and gladly teach. 310

THE LAWYER

A sergeant of the law, wary and wise,
 Who'd often gone to Paul's walk to advise,
 There was also, compact of excellence.
 Discreet he was, and of great reverence;

At least he seemed so, his words were so wise.
 Often he sat as justice in assize, 316
 By patent or commission from the crown;
 Because of learning and his high renown,
 He took large fees and many robes could own.
 So great a purchaser was never known. 320
 All was fee simple to him, in effect,
 Wherefore his claims could never be suspect.
 Nowhere a man so busy of his class,
 And yet he seemed much busier than he was.
 All cases and all judgments could he cite 325
 That from King William's time were apposite.
 And he could draw a contract so explicit
 Not any man could fault therefrom elicit;
 And every statute he'd verbatim quote.
 He rode but badly in a medley coat, 330
 Belted in a silken sash, with little bars,
 But of his dress no more particulars.

THE FRANKLIN

There was a franklin in his company;
 White was his beard as is the white daisy.
 Of sanguine temperament by every sign, 335
 He loved right well his morning sop in wine.
 Delightful living was the goal he'd won,
 For he was Epicurus' very son,
 That held opinion that a full delight
 Was true felicity, perfect and right. 340
 A householder, and that a great, was he;
 Saint Julian he was in his own country.
 His bread and ale were always right well done;
 A man with better cellars there was none.
 Baked meat was never wanting in his house, 345
 Of fish and flesh, and that so plenteous
 It seemed to snow therein both food and drink
 Of every dainty that a man could think.
 According to the season of the year
 He changed his diet and his means of cheer. 350
 Full many a fattened partridge did he mew,
 And many a bream and pike in fish-pond too.
 Woe to his cook, except the sauces were Poignant and sharp, and ready all his gear.
 His table, waiting in his hall alway, 355
 Stood ready covered through the livelong day.
 At county sessions was he lord and sire,
 And often acted as a knight of shire.
 A dagger and a trinket-bag of silk
 Hung from his girdle, white as morning milk.
 He had been sheriff and been auditor; 361
 And nowhere was a worthier vavasor.

THE HABERDASHER AND THE CARPENTER

A haberdasher and a carpenter,

THE WEAVER, THE DYER,
AND THE ARRAS-MAKER

An arras-ma'ker, dyer, and weaver
Were with us, clothed in similar livery, 365
All of one sober, great fraternity.
Their gear was new and well adorned it was;
Their weapons were not cheaply trimmed with brass,
But all with silver; chastely made and well
Their girdles and their pouches too, I tell. 370
Each man of them appeared a proper burgess
To sit in guildhall on a high dais.
And each of them, for wisdom he could span,
Was fitted to have been an alderman;
For chattels they'd enough, and, too, of rent; 375
To which their goodwives gave a free assent,
Or else for certain they had been to blame.
It's good to hear "Madam" before one's name,
And go to church when all the world may see,
Having one's mantle borne right royally. 380

THE COOK

A cook they had with them, just for the nonce,
To boil the chickens with the marrow-bones,
And flavor tartly and with galingale.
Well could he tell a draught of London ale.
And he could roast and seethe and broil and fry,
And make a good thick soup, and bake a pie. 386
But very ill it was, it seemed to me,
That on his shin a deadly sore had he;
For sweet blanc-mange, he made it with the best.

THE SAILOR

There was a sailor, living far out west; 390
For aught I know, he was of Dartmouth town.
He sadly rode a hackney, in a gown,
Of thick rough cloth falling to the knee.
A dagger hanging on a cord had he
About his neck, and under arm, and down. 395
The summer's heat had burned his visage brown;
And certainly he was a good fellow.
Full many a draught of wine he'd drawn, I trow,
Of Bordeaux vintage, while the trader slept.
Nice conscience was a thing he never kept. 400
If that he fought and got the upper hand,
By water he sent them home to every land.
But as for craft, to reckon well his tides,
His currents and the dangerous watersides,
His harbors, and his moon, his pilotage, 405
There was none such from Hull to far Carthage.
Hardy, and wise in all things undertaken,
By many a tempest had his beard been shaken.

He knew well all the havens, as they were,
From Gottland to the Cape of Finisterre, 410
And every creek in Brittany and Spain;
His vessel had been christened Madelcine.

THE PHYSICIAN

With us there was a doctor of physic;
In all this world was none like him to pick
For talk of medicine and surgery; 415
For he was grounded in astronomy.
He often kept a patient from the pall
By horoscopes and magic natural.
Well could he tell the fortune ascendent
Within the houses for his sick patient. 420
He knew the cause of every malady,
Were it of hot or cold, of moist or dry,
And where engendered, and of what humor;
He was a very good practitioner.
The cause being known, down to the deepest root,
Anon he gave to the sick man his boot. 426
Ready he was, with his apothecaries,
To send him drugs and all electuaries;
By mutual aid much gold they'd always won—
Their friendship was a thing not new begun. 430
Well read was he in Esculapius,
And Deiscorides, and in Rufus,
Hippocrates, and Hali, and Galen,
Serapion, Rhazes, and Avicen, 435
Averrhoes, Gilbert, and Constantine,
Bernard, and Gatisden, and John Damascene.
In diet he was measured as could be,
Including naught of superfluity,
But nourishing and easy. It's no libel
To say he read but little in the Bible. 440
In blue and scarlet he went clad, withal,
Lined with a taffeta and with sendal;
And yet he was right chary of expense;
He kept the gold he gained from pestilence.
For gold in physic is a fine cordial, 445
And therefore loved he gold exceeding all.

THE WIFE OF BATH

There was a housewife come from Bath, or near,
Who—sad to say—was deaf in either ear.
At making cloth she had so great a bent
She bettered those of Ypres and even of Ghent.
In all the parish there was no goodwife 451
Should offering make before her, on my life;
And if one did, indeed, so wroth was she
It put her out of all her charity. 454
Her kerchiefs were of finest weave and ground;
I dare swear that they weighed a full ten pound

Which, of a Sunday, she wore on her head.
 Her hose were of the choicest scarlet red,
 Close gartered, and her shoes were soft and new.
 Bold was her face, and fair, and red of hue. 460
 She'd been respectable throughout her life,
 With five church'd husbands bringing joy and strife,
 Not counting other company in youth;
 But thereof there's no need to speak, in truth.
 Three times she'd journeyed to Jerusalem; 465
 And many a foreign stream she'd had to stem;
 At Rome she'd been, and she'd been in Boulogne,
 In Spain at Santiago, and at Cologne.
 She could tell much of wandering by the way:
 Gap-toothed was she, it is no lie to say. 470
 Upon an ambler easily she sat,
 Well wimpled, aye, and over all a hat
 As broad as is a buckler or a targe;
 A rug was tucked around her buttocks large,
 And on her feet a pair of sharpened spurs. 475
 In company well could she laugh her slurs.
 The remedies of love she knew, perchance,
 For of that art she'd learned the old, old dance.

THE PARSON

There was a good man of religion, too,
 A country parson, poor, I warrant you; 480
 But rich he was in holy thought and work.
 He was a learned man also, a clerk,
 Who Christ's own gospel truly sought to preach;
 Devoutly his parishioners would he teach.
 Benign he was and wondrous diligent, 485
 Patient in adverse times and well content,
 As he was oftentimes proven; always blithe,
 He was right loath to curse to get a tithe,
 But rather would he give, in case of doubt,
 Unto those poor parishioners about, 490
 Part of his income, even of his goods.
 Enough with little, colored all his moods.
 Wide was his parish, houses far asunder,
 But never did he fail, for rain or thunder,
 In sickness, or in sin, or any state, 495
 To visit to the farthest, small and great,
 Going afoot, and in his hand a stave.
 This fine example to his flock he gave,
 That first he wrought and afterwards he taught;
 Out of the gospel then that text he caught, 500
 And this figure he added thereunto—
 That, if gold rust, what shall poor iron do?
 For if the priest be foul, in whom we trust,
 What wonder if a layman yield to lust?
 And shame it is, if priest take thought for keep,
 A shitty shepherd, shepherding clean sheep. 506

Well ought a priest example good to give,
 By his own cleanness, how his flock should live.
 He never let his benefice for hire,
 Leaving his flock to flounder in the mire, 510
 And ran to London, up to old Saint Paul's
 To get himself a chantry there for souls,
 Nor in some brotherhood did he withhold;
 But dwelt at home and kept so well the fold
 That never wolf could make his plans miscarry;
 He was a shepherd and not mercenary. 516
 And holy though he was, and virtuous,
 To sinners he was not impiteous,
 Nor haughty in his speech, nor too divine,
 But in all teaching prudent and benign. 520
 To lead folk into Heaven but by stress
 Of good example was his busyness.
 But if some sinful one proved obstinate,
 Be who it might, of high or low estate,
 Him he reprov'd, and sharply, as I know. 525
 There is nowhere a better priest, I trow.
 He had no thirst for pomp or reverence,
 Nor made himself a special, spiced conscience,
 But Christ's own lore, and His apostles' twelve
 He taught, but first he followed it himself. 530

THE PLOWMAN

With him there was a plowman, was his brother,
 That many a load of dung, and many another
 Had scattered, for a good true toiler, he,
 Living in peace and perfect charity. 534
 He loved God most, and that with his whole heart,
 At all times, though he played or plied his art,
 And next, his neighbor, even as himself.
 He'd thresh and dig, with never thought of pelf,
 For Christ's own sake, for every poor wight,
 All without pay, if it lay in his might. 540
 He paid his taxes, fully, fairly, well,
 Both by his own toil and by stuff he'd sell.
 In a tabard he rode upon a mare.

There were also a reeve and miller there;
 A summoner, manciple and pardoner, 545
 And these, beside myself, made all there were.

THE MILLER

The miller was a stout churl, be it known,
 Hardy and big of brawn and big of bone;
 Which was well proved, for when he went on lam
 At wrestling, never failed he of the ram. 550
 He was a chunky fellow, broad of build;
 He'd heave a door from hinges if he willed,
 Or break it through, by running, with his head.
 His beard, as any sow or fox, was red,

And broad it was as if it were a spade.
 Upon the coping of his nose he had
 A wart, and thereon stood a tuft of hairs,
 Red as the bristles in an old sow's ears;
 His nostrils they were black and very wide.
 A sword and buckler bore he by his side.
 His mouth was like a furnace door for size.
 He was a jester and could poetize,
 But mostly all of sin and ribaldries.
 He could steal corn and full thrice charge his fees;
 And yet he had a thumb of gold, begad.
 A white coat and blue hood he wore, this lad.
 A bagpipe he could blow well, be it known,
 And with that same he brought us out of town.

THE MANCIPLE

There was a manciple from an inn of court,
 To whom all buyers might quite well resort
 To learn the art of buying food and drink;
 For whether he paid cash or not, I think
 That he so knew the markets, when to buy,
 He never found himself left high and dry.
 Now is it not of God a full fair grace
 That such a vulgar man has wit to pace
 The wisdom of a crowd of learned men?
 Of masters had he more than three times ten,
 Who were in law expert and curious;
 Whereof there were a dozen in that house
 Fit to be stewards of both rent and land
 Of any lord in England who would stand
 Upon his own and live in manner good,
 In honor, debtless (save his head were wood),
 Or live as frugally as he might desire;
 These men were able to have helped a shire
 In any case that ever might befall;
 And yet this manciple outguessed them all.

THE REEVE

The reeve he was a slender, choleric man,
 Who shaved his beard as close as razor can.
 His hair was cut round even with his ears;
 His top was tonsured like a pulpiter's.
 Long were his legs, and they were very lean,
 And like a staff, with no calf to be seen.
 Well could he manage granary and bin;
 No auditor could ever on him win.
 He could foretell, by drought and by the rain,
 The yielding of his seed and of his grain.
 His lord's sheep and his oxen and his dairy,
 His swine and horses, all his stores, his poultry,
 Were wholly in this steward's managing;
 And, by agreement, he'd made reckoning

555 Since his young lord of age was twenty years;
 Yet no man ever found him in arrears.
 There was no agent, hind, or herd who'd cheat
 But he knew well his cunning and deceit;
 They were afraid of him as of the death.
 560 His cottage was a good one, on a heath;
 By green trees shaded was this dwelling-place.
 Much better than his lord could he purchase.
 Right rich he was in his own private right,
 Seeing he'd pleased his lord, by day or night,
 By giving him, or lending, of his goods,
 And so got thanked—but yet got coats and hoods.
 In youth he'd learned a good trade, and had been
 A carpenter, as fine as could be seen.
 This steward sat a horse that well could trot,
 And was all dapple-gray, and was named Scot.
 A long surcoat of blue did he parade,
 And at his side he bore a rusty blade.
 Of Norfolk was this reeve of whom I tell,
 From near a town that men call Badeswell.
 Bundled he was like friar from chin to croup,
 And ever he rode hindmost of our troop.

THE SUMMONER

A summoner was with us in that place,
 Who had a fiery-red, cherubic face,
 For eczema he had; his eyes were narrow.
 As hot he was, and lecherous, as a sparrow;
 With black and scabby brows and scanty beard;
 He had a face that little children feared.
 There was no mercury, sulphur, or litharge,
 No borax, ceruse, tartar, could discharge,
 Nor ointment that could cleanse enough, or bite,
 To free him of his boils and pimples white,
 Nor of the bosses resting on his cheeks.
 Well loved he garlic, onions, aye and leeks,
 And drinking of strong wine as red as blood.
 Then would he talk and shout as madman would.
 And when a deal of wine he'd poured within,
 Then would he utter no word save Latin.
 Some phrases had he learned, say two or three,
 Which he had garnered out of some decree;
 No wonder, for he'd heard it all the day;
 And all you know right well that even a jay
 Can call out "Wat" as well as can the pope.
 But when, for aught else, into him you'd grope,
 'Twas found he'd spent his whole philosophy;
 Just "Questio quid juris" would he cry.
 He was a noble rascal, and a kind;
 A better comrade 'twould be hard to find.
 Why, he would suffer, for a quart of wine,
 Some good fellow to have his concubine

A twelve-month, and excuse him to the full.
(Between ourselves, though, he could pluck a gull).

And if he chanced upon a good fellow, 655
He would instruct him never to have awe,
In such a case, of the archdeacon's curse,
Except a man's soul lie within his purse;
For in his purse the man should punished be.
"The purse is the archdeacon's Hell," said he. 660
But well I know he lied in what he said;
A curse ought every guilty man to dread
(For curse can kill, as absolution save),
And 'ware significavit to the grave.
In his own power had he, and at ease, 665
The boys and girls of all the diocese,
And knew their secrets, and by counsel led.
A garland had he set upon his head,
Large as a tavern's wine-bush on a stake;
A buckler had he made of bread they bake. 670

THE PARDONER

With him there rode a gentle pardoner
Of Rouncival, his friend and his compeer;
Straight from the court of Rome had journeyed he.
Loudly he sang "Come hither, love, to me,"
The summoner joining with a burden round; 675
Was never horn of half so great a sound.
This pardoner had hair as yellow as wax,
But lank it hung as does a strike of flax;
In wisps hung down such locks as he'd on head,
And with them he his shoulders overspread; 680
But thin they dropped, and stringy, one by one.
But as to hood, for sport of it, he'd none,
Though it was packed in wallet all the while.
It seemed to him he went in latest style,
Disheveled, save for cap, his head all bare. 685
As shiny eyes he had as has a hare.
He had a fine veronica sewed to cap.
His wallet lay before him in his lap,
Stuffed full of pardons brought from Rome all hot.
A voice he had that bleated like a goat. 690
No beard had he, nor ever should he have,
For smooth his face as he'd just had a shave;
I think he was a gelding or a mare.
But in his craft, from Berwick unto Ware,
Was no such pardoner in any place. 695
For in his bag he had a pillowcase
The which, he said, was Our True Lady's veil:
He said he had a piece of the very sail
That good Saint Peter had, what time he went
Upon the sea, till Jesus changed his bent. 700
He had a latten cross set full of stones,
And in a bottle had he some pig's bones.

But with these relics, when he came upon
Some simple parson, then this paragon
In that one day more money stood to gain 705
Than the poor dupe in two months could attain.
And thus, with flattery and suchlike japes,
He made the parson and the rest his apes.
But yet, to tell the whole truth at the last,
He was, in church, a fine ecclesiast. 710
Well could he read a lesson or a story,
But best of all he sang an offertory;
For well he knew that when that song was sung,
Then might he preach, and all with polished
tongue,
To win some silver, as he right well could; 715
Therefore he sang so merrily and so loud.

Now have I told you briefly, in a clause,
The state, the array, the number, and the cause
Of the assembling of this company
In Southwark, at this noble hostelry 720
Known as the Tabard Inn, hard by the Bell.
But now the time is come wherein to tell
How all we bore ourselves that very night
When at the hostelry we did alight.
And afterward the story I engage 725
To tell you of our common pilgrimage.
But first, I pray you, of your courtesy,
You'll not ascribe it to vulgarity
Though I speak plainly of this matter here,
Retailing you their words and means of cheer;
Nor though I use their very terms, nor lie. 731
For this thing do you know as well as I:
When one repeats a tale told by a man,
He must report, as nearly as he can,
Every least word, if he remember it, 735
However rude it be, or how unfit;
Or else he may be telling what's untrue,
Embellishing and fictionizing too.
He may not spare, although it were his brother;
He must as well say one word as another. 740
Christ spoke right broadly out, in holy writ,
And, you know well, there's nothing low in it.
And Plato says, to those able to read:
"The word should be the cousin to the deed."
Also, I pray that you'll forgive it me 745
If I have not set folk, in their degree
Here in this tale, by rank as they should stand.
My wits are not the best, you'll understand.

Great cheer our host gave to us, every one,
And to the supper set us all anon; 750
And served us then with victuals of the best.
Strong was the wine and pleasant to each guest.

A seemly man our good host was, withal,
 Fit to have been a marshal in some hall;
 He was a large man, with protruding eyes, 755
 As fine a burgher as in Cheapside lies;
 Bold in his speech, and wise, and right well taught,
 And as to manhood, lacking there in naught.
 Also, he was a very merry man,
 And after meat, at playing he began, 760
 Speaking of mirth among some other things,
 When all of us had paid our reckonings;
 And saying thus: "Now, masters, verily
 You are all welcome here, and heartily:
 For by my truth, and telling you no lie, 765
 I have not seen, this year, a company
 Here in this inn, fitter for sport than now.
 Fain would I make you happy, knew I how.
 And of a game have I this moment thought
 To give you joy, and it shall cost you naught. 770

"You go to Canterbury; may God speed
 And the blest martyr soon requite your meed.
 And well I know, as you go on your way,
 You'll tell good tales and shape yourselves to play;
 For truly there's no mirth nor comfort, none, 775
 Riding the roads as dumb as is a stone;
 And therefore will I furnish you a sport,
 As I just said, to give you some comfort.
 And if you like it, all, by one assent,
 And will be ruled by me, of my judgment, 780
 And will so do as I'll proceed to say,
 Tomorrow, when you ride upon your way,
 Then, by my father's spirit, who is dead,
 If you're not gay, I'll give you up my head.
 Hold up your hands, nor more about it speak."

Our full assenting was not far to seek; 786
 We thought there was no reason to think twice,
 And granted him his way without advice,
 And bade him tell his verdict just and wise.

"Masters," quoth he, "here now is my advice;
 But take it not, I pray you, in disdain; 791
 This is the point, to put it short and plain,
 That each of you, beguiling the long day,
 Shall tell two stories as you wend your way
 To Canterbury town; and each of you 795
 On coming home, shall tell another two,
 All of adventures he has known befall.
 And he who plays his part the best of all,
 That is to say, who tells upon the road
 Tales of best sense, in most amusing mode, 800
 Shall have a supper at the others' cost
 Here in this room and sitting by this post,
 When we come back again from Canterbury.
 And now, the more to warrant you'll be merry,

I will myself, and gladly, with you ride 805
 At my own cost, and I will be your guide.
 But whosoever shall my rule gainsay
 Shall pay for all that's bought along the way.
 And if you are agreed that it be so,
 Tell me at once, or if not, tell me no, 810
 And I will act accordingly. No more."

This thing was granted, and our oaths we swore,
 With right glad hearts, and prayed of him, also,
 That he would take the office, nor forgo
 The place of governor of all of us, 815
 Judging our tales; and by his wisdom thus Arrange that supper at a certain price,
 We to be ruled, each one, by his advice
 In things both great and small; by one assent,
 We stood committed to his government. 820
 And thereupon, the wine was fetched anon;
 We drank, and then to rest went everyone,
 And that without a longer tarrying.

Next morning, when the day began to spring,
 Up rose our host, and acting as our cock, 825
 He gathered us together in a flock,
 And forth we rode, a jog-trot being the pace,
 Until we reached Saint Thomas' watering-place.
 And there our host pulled horse up to a walk,
 And said: "Now, masters, listen while I talk. 830
 You know what you agreed at set of sun.
 If even-song and morning-song are one,
 Let's here decide who first shall tell a tale.
 And as I hope to drink more wine and ale,
 Whoso proves rebel to my government 835
 Shall pay for all that by the way is spent.
 Come now, draw cuts, before we farther win,
 And he that draws the shortest shall begin.
 Sir knight," said he, "my master and my lord,
 You shall draw first as you have pledged your word. 840

Come near," quoth he, "my lady prioress:
 And you, sir clerk, put by your bashfulness,
 Nor ponder more; out hands, now, every man!"
 At once to draw a cut each one began,
 And, to make short the matter, as it was, 845
 Whether by chance or whatsoever cause,
 The truth is, that the cut fell to the knight,
 At which right happy then was every wight.
 Thus that his story first of all he'd tell,
 According to the compact, it befell, 850
 As you have heard. Why argue to and fro?
 And when this good man saw that it was so,
 Being a wise man and obedient
 To plighted word, given by free assent,
 He said: "Since I must then begin the game, 855
 Why, welcome be the cut, and in God's name!

Now let us ride, and hearken what I say."

And at that word we rode forth on our way;
And he began to speak, with right good cheer,
His tale anon, as it is written here. 860

HERE ENDS THE PROLOGUE OF THIS BOOK AND HERE BEGINS THE FIRST TALE, WHICH IS THE KNIGHT'S TALE

THE NUN'S PRIEST'S TALE

Of the Cock and Hen, Chanticleer and Pertelote

A widow poor, somewhat advanced in age,
Lived, on a time, within a small cottage
Beside a grove and standing down a dale.
This widow, now, of whom I tell my tale,
Since that same day when she'd been last a wife 5
Had led, with patience, her strait simple life,
For she'd small goods and little income-rent;
By husbanding of such as God had sent
She kept herself and her young daughters twain.
Three large sows had she, and no more, 'tis plain,
Three cows and a lone sheep that she called Moll.
Righty sooty was her bedroom and her hall, 12
Wherein she'd eaten many a slender meal.
Of sharp sauce, why she needed no great deal,
For dainty morsel never passed her throat; 15
Her diet well accorded with her coat.
Repletion never made this woman sick;
A temperate diet was her whole physic,
And exercise, and her heart's sustenance.
The gout, it hindered her nowise to dance, 20
Nor apoplexy spun within her head;
And no wine drank she, either white or red;
Her board was mostly garnished, white and black,
With milk and brown bread, whereof she'd no lack,
Broiled bacon and sometimes an egg or two, 25
For a small dairy business did she do.

A yard she had, enclosed all roundabout
With pales, and there was a dry ditch without,
And in the yard a cock called Chanticleer.
In all the land, for crowing, he'd no peer. 30
His voice was merrier than the organ gay
On Mass days, which in church begins to play;
More regular was his crowing in his lodge
Than is a clock or abbey horologe.
By instinct he'd marked each ascension down 35
Of equinoctial value in that town;
For when fifteen degrees had been ascended,
Then crew he so it might not be amended.
His comb was redder than a fine coral,

And battlement 40
His bill was -----, -----, -----;
Like azure were his legs and toes, each one;
His spurs were whiter than the lily flower;
And plumage of the burnished gold his dower.
This noble cock had in his governance 45
Seven hens to give him pride and all pleasance,
Which were his sisters and his paramours
And wondrously like him as to colors,
Whereof the fairest hued upon her throat
Was called the winsome Mistress Pertelote. 50
Courteous she was, discreet and debonnaire,
Companionable, and she had been so fair
Since that same day when she was seven nights old,

That truly she had taken the heart to hold
Of Chanticleer, locked in her every limb; 55
He loved her so that all was well with him.
But such a joy it was to hear them sing,
Whenever the bright sun began to spring,
In sweet accord, "My love walks through the land."

For at that time, and as I understand, 60
The beasts and all the birds could speak and sing.

So it befell that, in a bright dawning,
As Chanticleer 'midst wives and sisters all
Sat on his perch, the which was in the hall,
And next him sat the winsome Pertelote, 65
This Chanticleer he groaned within his throat
Like man that in his dreams is troubled sore.
And when fair Pertelote thus heard him roar,
She was aghast and said: "O sweetheart dear,
What ails you that you groan so? Do you hear?
You are a sleepy herald. Fie, for shame!" 71

And he replied to her thus: "Ah, madame,
I pray you that you take it not in grief:
By God, I dreamed I'd come to such mischief,
Just now, my heart yet jumps with sore affright.
Now, God," cried he, "my vision read aright 76
And keep my body out of foul prison!
I dreamed, that while I wandered up and down
Within our yard, I saw there a strange beast
Was like a dog, and he'd have made a feast 80
Upon my body, and have had me dead.
His color yellow was and somewhat red;
And tipped his tail was, as were both his ears,
With black, unlike the rest, as it appears;
His snout was small and gleaming was each eye.
Remembering how he looked, almost I die; 86
And all this caused my groaning, I confess."

"Aha," said she, "fie on you, spiritless!
Alas!" cried she, "for by that God above,
Now have you lost my heart and all my love; 90

I cannot love a coward, by my faith.
 For truly, whatsoever woman saith,
 We all desire, if only it may be,
 To have a husband hardy, wise, and free,
 And trustworthy, no niggard, and no fool, 95
 Nor one that is afraid of every tool,
 Nor yet a braggart, by that God above!
 How dare you say, for shame, unto your love
 That there is anything that you have feared?
 Have you not man's heart, and yet have a beard?
 Alas! And are you frightened by a vision? 101
 Dreams are, God knows, a matter for derision.
 Visions are generated by repletions
 And vapors and the body's bad secretions
 Of humors overabundant in a wight. 105
 Surely this dream, which you have had tonight
 Comes only of the superfluity
 Of your bilious irascibility,
 Which causes folk to shiver in their dreams
 For arrows and for flames with long red gleams,
 For great beasts in the fear that they will bite, 111
 For quarrels and for wolf whelps great and slight;
 Just as the humor of melancholy
 Causes full many a man, in sleep, to cry,
 For fear of black bears or of bulls all black, 115
 Or lest black devils put them in a sack.
 Of other humors could I tell also,
 That bring, to many a sleeping man, great woe;
 But I'll pass on as lightly as I can.
 "Lo, Cato, and he was a full wise man, 120
 Said he not, we should trouble not for dreams?
 Now, sir," said she, "when we fly from the beams,
 For God's love go and take some laxative;
 On peril of my soul, and as I live,
 I counsel you the best, I will not lie, 125
 That both for choler and for melancholy
 You purge yourself; and since you shouldn't tarry,
 And on this farm there's no apothecary,
 I will myself go find some herbs for you
 That will be good for health and pecker too; 130
 And in our own yard all these herbs I'll find,
 The which have properties of proper kind
 To purge you underneath and up above.
 Forget this not, now, for God's very love!
 You are so very choleric of complexion. 135
 Beware the mounting sun and all dejection,
 Nor get yourself with sudden humors hot;
 For if you do, I dare well lay a groat
 That you shall have the tertian fever's pain,
 Or some ague that may well be your bane. 140
 A day or two you shall have digestives
 Of worms before you take your laxatives

Of laurel, centuary, and fumitory,
 Or else of hellebore purificatory,
 Or caper spurge, or else of dogwood berry, 145
 Or herb ivy, all in our yard so merry;
 Peck them just as they grow and gulp them in.
 Be merry, husband, for your father's kin!
 Dread no more dreams. And I can say no more."
 "Madam," said he, "gramercy for your lore. 150
 Nevertheless, not running Cato down,
 Who had for wisdom such a high renown,
 And though he says to hold no dreams in dread,
 By God, men have, in many old books, read
 Of many a man more an authority 155
 Than ever Cato was, pray pardon me,
 Who say just the reverse of his sentence,
 And have found out by long experience
 That dreams, indeed, are good significations,
 As much of joys as of all tribulations 160
 That folk endure here in this life present.
 There is no need to make an argument;
 The very proof of this is shown indeed.
 "One of the greatest authors that men read
 Says thus: That on a time two comrades went 165
 On pilgrimage, and all in good intent;
 And it so chanced they came into a town
 Where there was such a crowding, up and down,
 Of people, and so little harborage,
 That they found not so much as one cottage 170
 Wherein the two of them might sheltered be.
 Wherefore they must, as of necessity,
 For that one night at least, part company;
 And each went to a different hostelry
 And took such lodgment as to him did fall. 175
 Now one of them was lodged within a stall,
 Far in a yard, with oxen of the plow;
 That other man found shelter fair enow,
 As was his luck, or was his good fortune,
 Whatever 'tis that governs us, each one. 180
 "So it befell that, long ere it was day,
 This last man dreamed in bed, as there he lay,
 That his poor fellow did unto him call,
 Saying: 'Alas! For in an ox's stall
 This night shall I be murdered where I lie. 185
 Now help me, brother dear, before I die.
 Come in all haste to me.' 'Twas thus he said.
 This man woke out of sleep, then, all afraid;
 But when he'd wakened fully from his sleep,
 He turned upon his pillow, yawning deep, 190
 Thinking his dream was but a fantasy.
 And then again, while sleeping, thus dreamed he.
 And then a third time came a voice that said
 (Or so he thought): 'Now, comrade, I am dead;

Behold my bloody wounds, so wide and deep! 195
 Early arise tomorrow from your sleep,
 And at the west gate of the town,' said he,
 'A wagon full of dung there shall you see,
 Wherein is hid my body craftily;
 Do you arrest this wagon right boldly. 200
 They killed me for what money they could gain.'
 And told in every point how he'd been slain,
 With a most pitiful face and pale of hue.
 And trust me well, this dream did all come true;
 For on the morrow, soon as it was day, 205
 Unto his comrade's inn he took the way;
 And when he'd come into that ox's stall,
 Upon his fellow he began to call.
 "The keeper of the place replied anon,
 And said he: 'Sir, your friend is up and gone; 210
 As soon as day broke he went out of town.'
 This man, then, felt suspicion in him grown,
 Remembering the dream that he had had,
 And forth he went, no longer tarrying, sad,
 Unto the west gate of the town, and found 215
 A dung-cart on its way to dumping-ground,
 And it was just the same in every wise
 As you have heard the dead man advertise;
 And with a hardy heart he then did cry
 Vengeance and justice on this felony: 220
 'My comrade has been murdered in the night,
 And in this very cart lies, face upright.
 I cry to all the officers,' said he
 'That ought to keep the peace in this city.
 Alas, alas, here lies my comrade slain!' 225
 "Why should I longer with this tale detain?
 The people rose and turned the cart to ground,
 And in the center of the dung they found
 The dead man, lately murdered in his sleep.
 "O Blessed God, Who art so true and deep! 230
 Lo, how Thou dost turn murder out alway!
 Murder will out, we see it every day.
 Murder's so hateful and abominable
 To God, Who is so just and reasonable,
 That He'll not suffer that it hidden be; 235
 Though it may skulk a year, or two, or three,
 Murder will out, and I conclude thereon.
 Immediately the rulers of that town,
 They took the carter and so sore they racked
 Him and the host, until their bones were cracked,
 That they confessed their wickedness anon, 241
 And hanged they both were by the neck, and soon.
 "Here may men see that dreams are things to dread.
 And certainly, in that same book I read,

Right in the very chapter after this 245
 (I spoof not, as I may have joy and bliss),
 Of two men who would voyage oversea,
 For some cause, and unto a far country,
 If but the winds had not been all contrary,
 Causing them both within a town to tarry, 250
 Which town was builded near the haven-side.
 But then, one day, along toward eventide,
 The wind did change and blow as suited best.
 Jolly and glad they went unto their rest.
 And were prepared right early for to sail; 255
 But unto one was told a marvelous tale.
 For one of them, a-sleeping as he lay,
 Did dream a wondrous dream ere it was day.
 He thought a strange man stood by his bedside
 And did command him, he should there abide,
 And said to him: 'If you tomorrow wend, 261
 You shall be drowned; my tale is at an end.'
 He woke and told his fellow what he'd met
 And prayed him quit the voyage and forget;
 For just one day he prayed him there to bide. 265
 His comrade, who was lying there beside,
 Began to laugh and scorned him long and fast.
 'No dream,' said he, 'may make my heart aghast,
 So that I'll quit my business for such things.
 I do not care a straw for your dreamings, 270
 For visions are but fantasies and japes.
 Men dream, why, every day, of owls and apes,
 And many a wild phantasm therewithal;
 Men dream of what has never been, nor shall.
 But since I see that you will here abide, 275
 And thus forgo this fair wind and this tide,
 God knows I'm sorry; nevertheless, good day!
 "And thus he took his leave and went his way.
 But long before the half his course he'd sailed,
 I know not why, nor what it was that failed, 280
 But casually the vessel's bottom rent,
 And ship and men under the water went,
 In sight of other ships were there beside,
 The which had sailed with that same wind and tide.
 "And therefore, pretty Pertelote, my dear, 285
 By such old-time examples may you hear
 And learn that no man should be too reckless
 Of dreams, for I can tell you, fair mistress,
 That many a dream is something well to dread.
 "Why in the 'Life' of Saint Kenelm I read 290
 (Who was Kenelphus' son, the noble king Of Mercia), how Kenelm dreamed a thing;
 A while ere he was murdered, so they say,
 His own death in a vision saw, one day.
 His nurse interpreted, as records tell, 295
 That vision, bidding him to guard him well

From treason; but he was but seven years old,
 And therefore 'twas but little he'd been told
 Of any dream, so holy was his heart.
 By God! I'd rather than retain my shirt 300
 That you had read this legend, as have I.
 Dame Pertelote, I tell you verily,
 Macrobius, who wrote of Scipio
 The African a vision long ago,
 He holds by dreams, saying that they have been Warnings of things that men have later seen. 306
 "And furthermore, I pray you to look well
 In the Old Testament at Daniel,
 Whether he held dreams for mere vanity.
 Read, too, of Joseph, and you there shall see 310
 Where dreams have sometimes been (I say not all)
 Warnings of things that after did befall.
 Consider Egypt's king, Dan Pharaoh,
 His baker and his butler, these also,
 Whether they knew of no effect from dreams. 315
 Whoso will read of sundry realms the themes
 May learn of dreams full many a wondrous thing.
 Lo, Cræsus, who was once of Lydia king,
 Dreamed he not that he sat upon a tree,
 Which signified that hanged high he should be?
 Lo, how Andromache, great Hector's wife, 321
 On that same day when Hector lost his life,
 She dreamed upon the very night before
 That Hector's life should be lost evermore,
 If on that day he battled, without fail. 325
 She warned him, but no warning could avail;
 He went to fight, despite all auspices,
 And so was shortly slain by Achilles.
 But that same tale is all too long to tell,
 And, too, it's nearly day, I must not dwell 330
 Upon this; I but say, concluding here,
 That from this vision I have cause to fear
 Adversity; and I say, furthermore,
 That I do set by laxatives no store,
 For they are poisonous, I know it well. 335
 Them I defy and love not, truth to tell.
 "But let us speak of mirth and stop all this;
 My lady Pertelote, on hope of bliss,
 In one respect God's given me much grace;
 For when I see the beauty of your face, 340
 You are so rosy-red beneath each eye,
 It makes my dreadful terror wholly die.
 For there is truth in In principio
Mulier est hominis confusio (Madam, the meaning of this Latin is,
 Woman is man's delight and all his bliss).
 For when I feel at night your tender side,
 Although I cannot then upon you ride,
 Because our perch so narrow is, alas!

I am so full of joy and all solace 350
 That I defy, then, vision, aye and dream."
 And with that word he flew down from the beam,
 For it was day, and down went his hens all;
 And with a cluck he then began to call,
 For he had found some corn within the yard. 355
 Regal he was, and fears he did discard.
 He feathered Pertelote full many a time
 And twenty times he trod her ere 'twas prime.
 He looked as if he were a grim lion
 As on his toes he strutted up and down; 360
 He deigned not set his foot upon the ground.
 He clucked when any grain of corn he found,
 And all his wives came running at his call.
 Thus regal, as a prince is in his hall,
 I'll now leave busy Chanticleer to feed, 365
 And with events that followed I'll proceed.
 When that same month wherein the world began,
 Which is called March, wherein God first made
 man,
 Was ended, and were passed of days also,
 Since March began, full thirty days and two, 370
 It fell that Chanticleer, in all his pride,
 His seven wives a-walking by his side,
 Cast up his two eyes toward the great bright sun
 (Which through the sign of Taurus now had run Twenty degrees and one, and somewhat more),
 And knew by instinct and no other lore 376
 That it was prime, and joyfully he crew,
 "The sun, my love," he said, "has climbed anew
 Forty degrees and one, and somewhat more.
 My lady Pertelote, whom I adore, 380
 Mark now these happy birds, hear how they sing.
 And see all these fresh flowers, how they spring;
 Full is my heart of revelry and grace."
 But suddenly he fell in grievous case;
 For ever the latter end of joy is woe. 385
 God knows that worldly joys do swiftly go;
 And if a rhetorician could but write,
 He in some chronicle might well indite
 And mark it down as sovereign in degree.
 Now every wise man, let him hark to me: 390
 This tale is just as true, I undertake,
 As is the book of Launcelot of the Lake,
 Which women always hold in such esteem.
 But now I must take up my proper theme.
 A brant-fox, full of sly iniquity, 395
 That in the grove had lived two years, or three,
 Now by a fine premeditated plot
 That same night, breaking through the hedge, had got

Into the yard where Chanticleer the fair
 Was wont, and all his wives too, to repair; 400
 And in a bed of greenery still he lay
 Till it was past the quarter of the day,
 Waiting his chance on Chanticleer to fall,
 As gladly do these killers one and all
 Who lie in ambush for to murder men. 405
 O murderer false, there lurking in your den!
 O new Iscariot, O new Ganelon!
 O false dissimulator, Greek Sinon
 That brought down Troy all utterly to sorrow!
 O Chanticleer, accursed be that morrow 410
 When you into that yard flew from the beams!
 You were well warned, and fully, by your dreams
 That this day should hold peril damnably.
 But that which God foreknows, it needs must be,
 So says the best opinion of the clerks. 415
 Witness some cleric perfect for his works,
 That in the schools there's a great altercation
 In this regard, and much high disputation
 That has involved a hundred thousand men.
 But I can't sift it to the bran with pen, 420
 As can the holy Doctor Augustine,
 Or Boethius, or Bishop Bradwardine,
 Whether the fact of God's great foreknowing
 Makes it right needful that I do a thing
 (By needful, I mean, of necessity); 425
 Or else, if a free choice be granted me,
 To do that same thing, or to do it not,
 Though God foreknew before the thing was wrought;
 Or if His knowing constrains never at all,
 Save by necessity conditional. 430
 I have no part in matters so austere;
 My tale is of a cock, as you shall hear,
 That took the counsel of his wife, with sorrow,
 To walk within the yard upon that morrow
 After he'd had the dream whereof I told. 435
 Now women's counsels oft are ill to hold;
 A woman's counsel brought us first to woe,
 And Adam caused from Paradise to go,
 Wherein he was right merry and at ease,
 But since I know not whom it may displease 440
 If woman's counsel I hold up to blame,
 Pass over, I but said it in my game.
 Read authors where such matters do appear,
 And what they say of women, you may hear.
 These are the cock's words, they are none of mine;
 No harm in women can I e'er divine. 446
 All in the sand, a-bathing merrily,
 Lay Pertelote, with all her sisters by,
 There in the sun; and Chanticleer so free
 Sang merrier than a mermaid in the sea 450

(For Physiologus says certainly
 That they do sing, both well and merrily).
 And so befell that, as he cast his eye
 Among the herbs and on a butterfly,
 He saw this fox that lay there, crouching low. 455
 Nothing of urge was in him, then, to crow;
 But he cried "Cock-cock-cock" and did so start
 As man who has a sudden fear at heart.
 For naturally a beast desires to flee
 From any enemy that he may see, 460
 Though never yet he's clapped on such his eye.
 When Chanticleer the fox did then espy,
 He would have fled but that the fox anon
 Said: "Gentle sir, alas! Why be thus gone?
 Are you afraid of me, who am your friend? 465
 Now, surely, I were worse than any fiend
 If I should do you harm or villainy.
 I came not here upon your deeds to spy;
 But, certainly, the cause of my coming
 Was only just to listen to you sing. 470
 For truly, you have quite as fine a voice
 As angels have that Heaven's choirs rejoice;
 Boethius to music could not bring
 Such feeling, nor do others who can sing.
 My lord your father (God his soul pray bless!)
 And too your mother, of her gentleness, 476
 Have been in my abode, to my great ease;
 And truly, sir, right fain am I to please.
 But since men speak of singing, I will say
 (As I still have my eyesight day by day), 480
 Save you, I never heard a man so sing
 As did your father in the gray dawning;
 Truly 'twas from the heart, his every song.
 And that his voice might ever be more strong,
 He took such pains that, with his either eye, 485
 He had to blink, so loudly would he cry,
 A-standing on his tiptoes therewithal,
 Stretching his neck till it grew long and small.
 And such discretion, too, by him was shown,
 There was no man in any region known 490
 That him in song or wisdom could surpass.
 I have well read, in Dan Burnell the Ass,
 Among his verses, how there was a cock,
 Because a priest's son gave to him a knock
 Upon the leg, while young and not yet wise, 495
 He caused the boy to lose his benefice.
 But, truly, there is no comparison
 With the great wisdom and the discretion
 Your father had, or with his subtlety.
 Now sing, dear sir, for holy charity, 500
 See if you can your father counterfeit."
 This Chanticleer his wings began to beat,

As one that could no treason there espy,
 So was he ravished by this flattery.
 Alas, you lords! Full many a flatterer 505
 Is in your courts, and many a cozener,
 That please your honors much more, by my fay,
 Than he that truth and justice dares to say.
 Go read the Ecclesiast on flattery;
 Beware, my lords, of all their treachery! 510
 'This Chanticleer stood high upon his toes,
 Stretching his neck, and both his eyes did close,
 And so did crow right loudly, for the nonce;
 And Russel Fox, he started up at once,
 And by the gorget grabbed our Chanticleer, 515
 Flung him on back, and toward the wood did steer,
 For there was no man who as yet pursued.
 O destiny, you cannot be eschewed!
 Alas, that Chanticleer flew from the beams!
 Alas, his wife recked nothing of his dreams! 520
 And on a Friday fell all this mischance.
 O Venus, who art goddess of pleasance,
 Since he did serve thee well, this Chanticleer,
 And to the utmost of his power here,
 More for delight than cocks to multiply, 525
 Why would'st thou suffer him that day to die?
 O Gaufred, my dear master sovereign,
 Who, when King Richard Lionheart was slain
 By arrow, sang his death with sorrow sore,
 Why have I not your faculty and lore 530
 To chide Friday, as you did worthily?
 (For truly, on a Friday slain was he).
 Then would I prove how well I could complain
 For Chanticleer's great fear and all his pain.
 Certainly no such cry and lamentation 535
 Were made by ladies at Troy's desolation,
 When Pyrrhus with his terrible bared sword
 Had taken old King Priam by the beard
 And slain him (as the Æneid tells to us),
 As made then all those hens in one chorus 540
 When they had caught a sight of Chanticleer.
 But fair Dame Pertelote assailed the ear
 Far louder than did Hasdrubal's good wife
 When that her husband bold had lost his life,
 And Roman legionaries burned Carthage; 545
 For she so full of torment was, and rage,
 She voluntarily to the fire did start
 And burned herself there with a steadfast heart.
 And you, O woeful hens, just so you cried
 As when base Nero burned the city wide 550
 Of Rome, and wept the senators' stern wives
 Because their husbands all had lost their lives,
 For though not guilty, Nero had them slain.
 Now will I turn back to my tale again.

This simple widow and her daughters two 555
 Heard these hens cry and make so great ado,
 And out of doors they started on the run
 And saw the fox into the grove just gone,
 Bearing upon his back the cock away.
 And then they cried, "Alas, and welladay! 560
 Oh, oh, the fox!" and after him they ran,
 And after them, with staves, went many a man;
 Ran Coll, our dog, ran Talbot and Garland,
 And Malkin with a distaff in her hand;
 Ran cow and calf and even the very hogs, 565
 So were they scared by barking of the dogs
 And shouting men and women all did make,
 They all ran so they thought their hearts would break.
 They yelled as very fiends do down in Hell;
 The ducks they cried as at the butcher fell; 570
 The frightened geese flew up above the trees;
 Out of the hive there came the swarm of bees;
 So terrible was the noise, ah ben'cite!
 Certainly old Jack Straw and his army
 Never raised shouting half so loud and shrill 575
 When they were chasing Flemings for to kill,
 As on that day was raised upon the fox.
 They brought forth trumpets made of brass, of box,
 Of horn, of bone, wherein they blew and pooped,
 And therewithal they screamed and shrieked and 580
 whooped;
 It seemed as if the heaven itself would fall!
 And now, good men, I pray you hearken all.
 Behold how Fortune turns all suddenly
 The hope and pride of even her enemy!
 This cock, which lay across the fox's back, 585
 In all his fear unto the fox did clack
 And say: "Sir, were I you, as I should be,
 Then would I say (as God may now help me!),
 'Turn back again, presumptuous peasants all!
 A very pestilence upon you fall! 590
 Now that I've gained here to this dark wood's side,
 In spite of you this cock shall here abide.
 I'll eat him, by my faith, and that anon!'"
 The fox replied: "In faith, it shall be done!"
 And as he spoke that word, all suddenly 595
 This cock broke from his mouth, full cleverly,
 And high upon a tree he flew anon.
 And when the fox saw well that he was gone,
 "Alas," quoth he, "O Chanticleer, alas!
 I have against you done a base trespass 600
 In that I frightened you, my dear old pard,
 When you I seized and brought from out that yard;

But, sir, I did it with no foul intent;
 Come down, and I will tell you what I meant.
 I'll tell the truth to you, God help me so!" 605

"Nay then," said he, "beshrew us both, you
 know,

But first, beshrew myself, both blood and bones,
 If you beguile me, having done so once,
 You shall no more, with any flattery,
 Cause me to sing and close up either eye. 610
 For he who shuts his eyes when he should see,
 And willfully, God let him ne'er be free!"

"Nay," said the fox, "but God give him mis-chance

Who is so indiscreet in governance 614

He chatters when he ought to hold his peace."

Lo, such it is when watch and ward do cease,

And one grows negligent with flattery.

But you that hold this tale a foolery,

As but about a fox, a cock, a hen,

Yet do not miss the moral, my good men. 620

For Saint Paul says that all that's written well

Is written down some useful truth to tell.

Then take the wheat and let the chaff lie still.

And now, good God, and if it be Thy will,

As says Lord Christ, so make us all good men

And bring us into His high bliss. Amen. 626

HERE ENDS THE NUN'S PRIEST'S TALE

SHAKESPEARE AND HIS DRAMA

The death of Chaucer in 1400 left England without an important writer for almost a century. Indeed, if Malory's Morte d'Arthur be excepted, one must go more than a hundred and fifty years before finding anything that gives evidence of literary power. The political conflicts of the fifteenth century, culminating in the bloody War of the Roses, came to an end in 1485 and England entered upon a fifty year peace. This breathing spell permitted the learned men of the universities to come into contact with the new currents of thought that were abroad. The Renaissance had at last reached England.

This great movement in European life and thought was no sudden outburst. For several centuries the forces had been gathering that were to result in a quickening of the artistic and intellectual life of western Europe. The renewed study of the classics from the time of Petrarch in the early fourteenth century had brought about the rediscovery of the ancient Greek writers who had been known only at second hand for a thousand years. By 1500 Greek was being studied in the great universities, and scholars were traveling abroad carrying the new learning. Such a man was Erasmus of Holland, who came to England at the moment when his great learning and wisdom were an inestimable spur to the sluggish intellectual life of the land so lately emerged from suicidal warfare.

Not only was the new attention to Greek valuable to the theologians who now pored over Erasmus's edition of the Greek New Testament. Less godly men—and even sometimes the godliest—luxuriated in all the old Greek authors. They began to see virtue in the Hellenic attitude toward life—that which Matthew Arnold calls Hellenism—and to feel the desirability of beauty and joy and rich experience. Man and his needs and wishes began to seem as important as the glory of God, and the search for truth as heroic an adventure as was ever any hermit's search for perfect holiness. Not all this movement was good, of course, and "Humanism" sometimes became mere godlessness.¹ But at its best, as with Erasmus and Sir Thomas More in England, the new attention to the capabilities of the human spirit was of the utmost importance as a preparation for the great age soon to come.

Several other events must be mentioned if we are to understand the crescendo of national energy that, in spite of twenty years of religious conflict, arose to its climax in the reign of Elizabeth. In the fifteenth century Constantinople had fallen to the ¹ See pp. 577 ff. for a discussion of this phase of the Renaissance in Italy.

SHAKESPEARE AND HIS DRAMA

Turks and whatever remained there of the old classical culture was scattered over Europe, to the great enrichment of the whole Continent. By the middle of the century printing was perfected and books began to be circulated in undreamed of numbers. This ability to send one's thoughts abroad so easily was an extraordinary stimulus to all thinkers and writers. Moreover, the dreams and imaginations of the men of the Renaissance were stirred by the unprecedented explorations of the earth that began in the late fifteenth century. Not only Columbus with his three ships, and Magellan and, in later days, Drake, but every poet and dreamer in Europe ranged the seven seas and built his castle, no longer in Spain, but in some magic island of the West.

In England the great outburst of creative energy was delayed until the reign of Elizabeth (1558-1603). During this period and extending for some years over into the next century there was an astonishing productivity of literature of many kinds. Of lyric poetry we shall speak in our next chapter. Except for the beautiful language of the successive English translations of the Bible which began in the 1530's and culminated in the King James version of 1611,² much of the prose of the period seems to the modern reader too unnatural to be interesting. It is likely to be either stilted, or pompous, or filled with strange conceits. But in spite of the difficult style of the prose, many interesting things were written. The great foreign authors were now being translated, some of them very adequately. Works on ideals of government and proper conduct and the chivalric virtues were sometimes in prose and sometimes in allegorical poetry. These are of great interest to students of the period but are usually hard reading for others. We will all, however, enjoy some of the realistic novels about rogues and low life in London, as shown in the books of such men as Robert Greene and Thomas Deloney.

Of one great product of the Elizabethan Age it is hard to speak in short space. The Faerie Queene of Edmund Spenser is one of the most influential poems in the language. Succeeding generations of poets have found inspiration in its exquisite poetic technique. Those who like allegory luxuriate in its hundreds of characters made up wholly of the poet's imagination. The discussion of the private virtues—holiness, courtesy, etc.—is so elaborate that, in spite of the beauty of the poem, the average reader finds his attention continually flagging. Few except professional literary scholars have persisted to the end.³

It is not with The Faerie Queene, nor the lyrics, nor the prose that the Age of Elizabeth makes claim to be one of the outstanding periods of world literature. Its great glory is the Elizabethan Drama. Since we must discuss this drama in connection with the plays of Shakespeare a word must be said as to the history of productions for the stage up to his time.

The writing of drama in Greece and Rome came to an end with the works of Seneca in the first century of our era. Thereafter a thousand years passed before anything that could be recognized as a play was written in Europe, and when a revival finally came it was quite independent of the classics. In this second birth it is interesting to see that just as in the first, sixteen hundred years earlier in Greece, drama developed out of religious ceremonial.

By the end of the tenth century we find the Christian Church of Western Europe enriching the service for the celebration of Easter by a short presentation of the scene at the tomb of Christ. Dialogue between the women seeking the body and the angel was performed by the clergy, who apparently made some effort at impersonation. The angel's first speech, "Quem queritis in sepulchro?" (Whom do you seek in the tomb?), has given this first of the church dramas its name, the Quem Queritis. It is not hard to imagine the way in which this successful innovation grew until there were not only longer dialogues on Easter but also similar performances for Christmas and other great feasts of the church year.

² See the selections from the Bible, p. 414.

³ In accordance with the general principle of choice in this volume, we have entirely omitted The Faerie Queene rather than present a mere fragment.

SHAKESPEARE AND HIS DRAMA

In the course of three centuries the germ of the Easter play had developed into a whole cycle of dramas based on biblical stories (mystery plays) or on the lives of saints (miracle plays). From being a part of the religious service, the performances were moved out of the church, and eventually the acting was done by laymen. At the height of the development—during the thirteenth to fifteenth centuries—a cycle might consist of forty or fifty plays covering the whole biblical story from the Creation to the Day of Judgment. These entertainments were usually produced in late spring. Each number was sponsored by one of the trade guilds, which prepared the moving wagon on which it was played and furnished the actors. These wagons, divided into three stories—heaven, earth, and hell—moved through the city, one after another taking their stands at various stations.

These cycle plays were important in paving the way for later drama. In a few instances the authors exercised some creative ability by making the action truly dramatic. Some really tragic scenes occur and occasionally an author has been able to give the predominantly somber material a comic twist. But these dramatic achievements may easily be exaggerated, and it must be admitted that most of these plays make dull reading. Their real importance is their training of the people to like drama and to go to see it. These cycles were still performed long after English literary drama began, and they doubtless did much to provide appreciative audiences.

Two other early forms of drama appeared somewhat later than the mystery cycles. A number of plays written mainly during the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries are known as Moralities. Such a work is Everyman, in which Everyman is summoned by God to Death. He visits his various friends, Good Fellowship, Cousin, and others, asking for someone to go with him. Only Good Deeds stands by him in the fatal hour. If all the Moralities had been as good as the Everyman, their vogue might have lasted longer. As it was, both they and the shorter humorous Interludes, which were sometimes played with them, had outlived their usefulness by 1540. It was time to prepare drama for larger things.

We now know that before 1500 a play that we would now call a drama, Fulgens and Lucrece, had been written, but another half century passed before the new movement in playmaking began. It is natural that the Renaissance in England should have aroused an interest in the plays of Greece and Rome. It was the comedies of Plautus and Terence that first secured attention. Actual production of these plays at boys' schools was followed by plays in English in imitation, first close and later very loose.⁴ Of this kind were the early comedies, Ralph Roister Doister and Gammer Gurton's Needle, both of which were written before the beginning of Elizabeth's reign in 1558. They are crude but have real dramatic interest.

It was Seneca who served as inspiration for tragedy in the early days of Elizabeth. The dramatists of the time admired his bombastic style, his sensationalism, with murder and bloodshed and ghosts crying for revenge. The most popular of these dramas based on Seneca was Kyd's Spanish Tragedy, one of the cruellest and bloodiest of plays, which held the stage for many decades. Though Shakespeare tended to get away from the Senecan influence, it is seen clearly in the main action of Hamlet.

⁴ See The Captives of Plautus, p. 234.

SHAKESPEARE AND HIS DRAMA

A careful student of Elizabethan drama will be able to trace accurately the various gains made by writers of plays in the period 1560-1590, so that when Shakespeare came on the scene about the latter year he had his vehicle ready for him. Kyd, Lyly, Peele, Greene, and Marlowe each contributed his genius to the development of a form worthy of the craftsmanship of our greatest dramatist.

That Shakespeare was born at Stratford on Avon, a village of Warwickshire, in 1564 is not so important for us to know as that by 1591 or 1592 he had already written poetry and was trying his hand with the production of plays. His career as a writer covers about twenty years, for he did little after 1610.

The rapid development of Shakespeare as a dramatist during the dozen years from 1590 until the time of his supreme achievement in his great tragedies cannot be traced here. Much of his early work appears to have been the improving of old plays and some of it was doubtless done in collaboration with other dramatists. There is no doubt that he learned much from Marlowe and Greene at this stage of his career. He rapidly surpassed his contemporaries. Almost every play shows improvement in his handling of plot, or exposition, or character. A considerable number of plays written during his first ten years were based on English history. In these he progressed far beyond the bare chronicle of a king's reign, and we have such creations as Sir John Falstaff, one of the supreme comedy characters of all literature. A group of comedies, A Midsummer Night's Dream, The Merchant of Venice, Much Ado about Nothing, As You Like It, Twelfth Night, and a tragedy, Romeo and Juliet, serve to perfect his discipline so that by 1600 or thereabouts he is a master of plot, of dialogue, and of characterization. From this point on we see him writing his incomparable tragedies, the greatest of them being Hamlet, Macbeth, Othello, and King Lear. The final work of the great dramatist was The Tempest and A Winter's Tale, delightful comedies both, and filled with romantic situations.

In our selection of plays we have represented Shakespeare by what many persons regard as his greatest drama. Hamlet is, of course, perfectly adequate in its plot, its suspense, and its adaptability to Shakespeare's theater. But it is in the presentation of character that the play is most distinguished. Hamlet has been discussed by generations of readers as if he were a real historical character. One reading of the play may be somewhat confusing. The twentieth reading will still find something new and interesting.

Shakespeare had many active contemporary dramatists, some of whom would probably be better known if he did not so completely overshadow them. Most readers would find enjoyment not only in some of the very beautifully poetic plays of Marlowe, such as Doctor Faustus, but in such realistic studies of London life as Dekker's The Shoemaker's Holiday. Readers of somewhat sophisticated taste may enjoy some of Ben Jonson's Comedies of Humors, such as Every Man in His Humor.

After Shakespeare's work closed, the drama became in general more and more romantic, especially in the hands of Beaumont and Fletcher. Though some worthy tragedy was written by John Webster (The Duchess of Malfi), some good comedy by Massinger and Middleton, the course of drama from 1610 onward for thirty years was toward sensationalism. The audience that had followed Hamlet in 1603 was no more. A new generation fed on romanticism or broad comedy were given plays to their taste. Few of us who have read plays written in the 1630's have the heart to blame the Puritans much when in 1642 they closed the theaters. When playgoing was revived in 1660 it was something new. Elizabethan Drama had spent its force and lay far in the past.

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

Hamlet

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ

HAMLET, only son of the murdered King Hamlet
CLAUDIUS, brother of the murdered king; usurper of the throne

GERTRUDE, widow of the murdered king; now wife of Claudius

GHOST of the murdered king

POLONIUS, Lord High Chamberlain

LAERTES, son to Polonius

OPHELIA, daughter to Polonius; beloved by Prince Hamlet

HORATIO, loyal friend to Prince Hamlet

ROSENCRANTZ }
GUILDENSTERN } false friends to Prince Hamlet

OSRIC, a foolish courtier

FORTINBRAS, Prince of Norway

VOLTIMAND }
CORNELIUS } Ambassadors to Norway

MARCELLUS }
BERNARDO } sentinels

FRANCISCO }
REYNALDO, servant to Polonius

TWO GRAVE-DIGGERS

TROUPE OF CITY PLAYERS, on tour

Lords, Ladies, Ambassadors, Priests, Captain, Soldiers, Sailors, a Mob of Danes, Messengers, and Attendants

THE SCENE:—EL SINORE.

ACT I

SCENE I:—Midnight. The sentinel's platform before the royal castle.

FRANCISCO, a sentinel, with lantern in hand and partisan on shoulder, pacing back and forth. The clock in the castle slowly beats the hour of twelve. Upon the last stroke, BERNARDO, the relief-sentinel, enters, with lantern and partisan.

BERN. Who's there?

FRAN. Nay, answer me. Stand, and unfold yourself!

BERN. "Long live the king."

FRAN. [lifting his lantern]. Bernardo?

BERN. He.

FRAN. You come most carefully upon your hour.

BERN. 'Tis now struck twelve. Get thee to bed, Francisco.

FRAN. For this relief much thanks. 'Tis bitter cold;

And I am sick at heart.

BERN. Have you had quiet guard?

FRAN. Not a mouse stirring.

BERN. Well, good-night.

As FRANCISCO reaches the door, BERNARDO calls after him.

If you do meet Horatio and Marcellus,

The rivals of my watch, bid them make haste.

FRAN. I think I hear them.

Enter MARCELLUS, a soldier, accompanied by HORATIO, a young gentleman in civilian garb. FRANCISCO halts them with the sentinel's challenge.

Stand, ho! [Lifts his lantern.] Who's there?

HORAT. Friends to this ground.

MARC. And liegemen to the Dane.

FRAN. Give you good-night.

MARC. [recognizing him]. O!—Farewell, honest soldier.

Who hath reliev'd you?

FRAN. Bernardo hath my place.
Give you good-night. [Exit.]

MARC. [advancing]. Holla?—Bernardo?

BERN. [lifting his lantern]. Say,
What! is Horatio there?

HORAT. A piece of him.

BERN. Welcome, Horatio. Welcome, good Marcellus. 20

MARC. What! has this thing appear'd again to-night?

BERN. I have seen nothing.

MARC. Horatio says 'tis but our fantasy,
And will not let belief take hold of him
Touching this dreaded sight, twice seen of us: 25
Therefore I have entreated him along
With us to watch the minutes of this night,
That if again this apparition come
He may approve our eyes, and speak to it.

HORAT. Tush, tush! 'Twill not appear!

BERN. Sit down awhile, 30
And let us once again assail your ears,
That are so fortified against our story,
What we, two nights, have seen.

HORAT. Well, sit we down,
And let us hear Bernardo speak of this.

They seat themselves.

BERN. Last night of all, 35
When yond same star, that's westward from the pole,

Had made his course to illume that part of heaven
Where now it burns, Marcellus and myself,
The bell then beating one,—

MARC. [grasping his arm]. Peace! Break thee off!
Look, where it comes again! 40

Enter GHOST.

BERN. [whispering]. In the same figure, like the king that's dead.

MARC. [whispering]. Thou art a scholar; speak to it, Horatio.

BERN. Looks it not like the king—mark it!—
Horatio?

HORAT. Most like. It harrows me with fear and wonder.

BERN. It would be spoke to.

MARC. Question it, Horatio. 45

HORAT. [rising]. What art thou that usurp'st this time of night,
Together with that fair and warlike form
In which the majesty of buried Denmark
Did sometimes march? By heaven I charge thee, speak!

MARC. It is offended.

BERN. See, it stalks away. 50

HORAT. Stay! Speak! Speak! I charge thee, speak! [Exit GHOST.]

MARC. 'Tis gone, and will not answer.

BERN. How now, Horatio! You tremble and look pale!

Is not this something more than fantasy?

What think you on't? 55

HORAT. Before my God! I might not this believe Without the sensible and true avouch
Of mine own eyes!

MARC. Is it not like the king?

HORAT. As thou art to thyself!
Such was the very armor he had on 60
When he the ambitious Norway combated.
So frown'd he once, when in an angry parle
He smote the sledded Polack on the ice.
'Tis strange!

MARC. Thus twice before, and jump at this dead hour, 65

With martial stalk hath he gone by our watch.

HORAT. In what particular thought to work I know not;

But in the gross and scope of my opinion,
This bodes some strange eruption to our state.

MARC. Good now, sit down; and tell me, he that knows, 70

Why this same strict and most observant watch
So nightly toils the subject of the land;
And why such daily cast of brazen cannon,
And foreign mart for implements of war;
Why such impress of shipwrights, whose sore task
Does not divide the Sunday from the week. 75
What might be toward that this sweaty haste
Doth make the night joint-laborer with the day?
Who is't that can inform me?

HORAT. That can I;
At least, the whisper goes so. Our last king— 80
Whose image even but now appear'd to us—
Was, as you know, by Fortinbras of Norway,
Thereto prick'd on by a most emulate pride,
Dar'd to the combat; in which our valiant Hamlet—

For so this side of our known world esteem'd
him— 85

Did slay this Fortinbras; who, by a seal'd compact,
Well ratified by law and heraldry,
Did forfeit, with his life, all those his lands
Which he stood seiz'd of to the conqueror;
Against the which a moiety competent 90
Was gaged by our king, which had return'd
To the inheritance of Fortinbras,

Had he been vanquisher, as, by the same covenant
 And carriage of the article design'd,
 His fell to Hamlet. Now, sir, young Fortinbras,
 Of unimproved mettle hot and full, 96
 Hath in the skirts of Norway here and there
 Shark'd up a list of lawless resolute,
 For food and diet, to some enterprise
 That hath a stomach in't; which is no other, 100
 As it doth well appear unto our state,
 But to recover of us, by strong hand
 And terms compulsative, those foresaid lands
 So by his father lost. And this, I take it,
 Is the main motive of our preparations, 105
 The source of this our watch, and the chief head
 Of this post-haste and romage in the land.

BERN. I think it be no other but e'en so.
 Well may it sort that this portentous figure
 Comes armed through our watch, so like the king
 That was, and is, the question of these wars. 111

HORAT. A mote it is to trouble the mind's eye.
 In the most high and palmy state of Rome,
 A little ere the mightiest Julius fell,
 The graves stood tenantless, and the sheeted dead
 Did squeak and gibber in the Roman streets; 116
 As stars with trains of fire, and dews of blood,
 Disasters in the sun; and the moist star
 Upon whose influence Neptune's empire stands
 Was sick almost to doomsday with eclipse. 120
 And even the like precursor of fierce events—
 As harbingers preceding still the fates
 And prologue to the omen coming on—
 Have heaven and earth together demonstrated Unto our climates and countrymen. 125

Re-enter the GHOST.

But, soft! Behold! Lo, where it comes again!
 I'll cross it, though it blast me.

HORATIO steps into the path of the GHOST and bars its way.

Stay, illusion!

If thou hast any sound, or use of voice,
 Speak to me!
 If there be any good thing to be done, 130
 That may to thee do ease and grace to me,
 Speak to me!
 If thou art privy to thy country's fate,
 Which happily foreknowing may avoid,
 O, speak!
 Or if thou hast uphoarded in thy life
 Extorted treasure in the womb of earth—
 For which, they say, you spirits oft walk in death—
 Speak of it!

The GHOST raises its arms and starts to speak; but instantly the cock crows, and the GHOST, frightened, drops its arms, and hurries away.

Stay, and speak!—Stop it, Marcellus.

MARC. Shall I strike at it with my partisan? 140

HORAT. Do, if it will not stand.

BERN. [striking]. 'Tis here!

HORAT. [striking]. 'Tis here! [Exit GHOST.

MARC. 'Tis gone!

We do it wrong, being so majestic,
 To offer it the show of violence;
 For it is, as the air, invulnerable, 145
 And our vain blows malicious mockery.

BERN. It was about to speak when the cock crew.

HORAT. And then it started, like a guilty thing
 Upon a fearful summons. I have heard,
 The cock, that is the trumpet to the morn, 150
 Doth with his lofty and shrill-sounding throat
 Awake the god of day; and at his warning,
 Whether in sea or fire, in earth or air,
 The extravagant and erring spirit hies
 To his confine; and of the truth herein 155
 This present object made probation.

MARC. It faded on the crowing of the cock.
 Some say that ever 'gainst that season comes Wherein our Saviour's birth is celebrated,
 The bird of dawning singeth all night long; 160
 And then, they say, no spirit dare walk abroad,
 The nights are wholesome, then no planets strike,
 No fairy takes, nor witch hath power to charm,
 So hallow'd and so gracious is the time. "

HORAT. So have I heard, and do in part believe it.
 But, look! the morn in russet mantle clad 166
 Walks o'er the dew of yon high eastern hill.
 Break we our watch up. And by my advice
 Let us impart what we have seen tonight
 Unto young Hamlet; for, upon my life, 170
 This spirit, dumb to us, will speak to him.
 Do you consent we shall acquaint him with it,
 As needful in our loves, fitting our duty?

MARC. Let's do't, I pray. And I this morning
 know

Where we shall find him most conveniently. 175
 [Exeunt.

SCENE II:—The following morning. A room of state in the castle.

A flourish of trumpets. Enter KING CLAUDIUS, QUEEN GERTRUDE, PRINCE HAMLET, POLONIUS, LAERTES, CORNELIUS, VOLTIMAND, Lords, Ladies, Attendants. The KING and QUEEN take their places on the throne.

KING. Though yet of Hamlet our dear brother's death

The memory be green, and that it us befitted
To bear our hearts in grief, and our whole kingdom

To be contracted in one brow of woe,
Yet so far hath discretion fought with nature 180
That we with wisest sorrow think on him,
Together with remembrance of ourselves.

Therefore, our sometime sister, now our queen,
The imperial jointress of this warlike state,
Have we, as 'twere with a defeated joy, 185
With one auspicious and one dropping eye,
With mirth in funeral and with dirge in marriage,
In equal scale weighing delight and dole,
Taken to wife. [Turning to the assembled Lords.]

Nor have we herein barr'd
Your better wisdoms, which have freely gone 190
With this affair along. For all, our thanks.
Now follows that you know: young Fortinbras,
Holding a weak supposal of our worth,
Or thinking by our late dear brother's death
Our state to be disjoint and out of frame, 195
Colleguéd with this dream of his advantage,
He hath not fail'd to pester us with message
Importing the surrender of those lands
Lost by his father, with all bands of law,
To our most valiant brother. So much for him.
Now for ourself, and for this time of meeting; 201
Thus much the business is: we have here writ
To Norway, uncle of young Fortinbras—
Who, impotent and bed-rid, scarcely hears
Of this his nephew's purpose—to suppress 205
His further gait herein, in that the levies,
The lists, and full proportions, are all made
Out of his subject. And we here dispatch
You, good Cornelius, and you, Voltimand,
For bearers of this greeting to old Norway, 210
Giving to you no further personal power
To business with the king more than the scope
Of these delated articles allow.

Hands them papers.

Farewell, and let your haste commend your duty.

CORN. } In that, and all things, will we show our VOLT. } duty. 215

KING. We doubt it nothing. Heartily farewell.

[Exeunt CORNELIUS and VOLTIMAND.]

And now, Laertes, what's the news with you?

You told us of some suit; what is't, Laertes?

You cannot speak of reason to the Dane,

And lose your voice. What wouldst thou beg,

Laertes, 220

That shall not be my offer, not thy asking?
The head is not more native to the heart,
The hand more instrumental to the mouth,
Than is the throne of Denmark to thy father.
What wouldst thou have, Laertes?

LAERT. Dread my lord,
Your leave and favor to return to France; 226
From whence though willingly I came to Denmark

To show my duty in your coronation,
Yet now, I must confess, that duty done,
My thoughts and wishes bend again toward France, 230

And bow them to your gracious leave and pardon.

KING. Have you your father's leave? What says Polonius?

OLON. He hath, my lord, wrung from me my slow leave

By laborsome petition; and at last
Upon his will I seal'd my hard consent. 235
I do beseech you, give him leave to go.

KING. Take thy fair hour, Laertes. Time be thine,

And thy best graces spend it at thy will.

[*LAERTES withdraws. The KING turns to
HAMLET.*]

But now, my cousin Hamlet, and my son,—

HAML. [aside]. A little more than kin, and less than kind. 240

KING. How is it that the clouds still hang on
you?

HAML. Not so, my lord; I am too much i' the sun.

QUEEN. Good Hamlet, cast thy nighted color off,

And let thine eye look like a friend on Denmark.
Do not for ever with thy vailed lids 245

Seek for thy noble father in the dust.

Thou know'st 'tis common; all that live must die,
Passing through nature to eternity.

HAML. Aye, madam, it is—"common."

QUEEN. If it be,
Why seems it so particular with thee? 250

HAML. "Seems," madam! Nay, it is. I know not "seems."

'Tis not alone my inky cloak, good mother,

Nor customary suits of solemn black,

Nor windy suspiration of forc'd breath,

No, nor the fruitful river in the eye, 255

Nor the dejected havior of the visage,

Together with all forms, modes, shows of grief,

That can denote me truly; these indeed "seem,"

For they are actions that a man might play;

But I have that within which passeth show; 260
These but the trappings and the suits of woe.

KING. 'Tis sweet and commendable in your nature, Hamlet,

To give these mourning duties to your father.
But, you must know, your father lost a father;
That father lost, lost his; and the survivor bound
In filial obligation for some term 266

To do obsequious sorrow: but to persevere
In obstinate condolement is a course
Of impious stubbornness. 'Tis unmanly grief.
It shows a will most incorrect to heaven, 270

A heart unfortified, a mind impatient,
An understanding simple and unschool'd:
For, what we know must be, and is as common
As any the most vulgar thing to sense,

Why should we, in our peevish opposition, 275
Take it to heart? Fie! 'Tis a fault to heaven,
A fault against the dead, a fault to nature,
To reason most absurd, whose common theme

Is "death of fathers," and who still hath cried,
From the first corse till he that died today, 280
"This must be so." We pray you, throw to earth
This unprevailing woe; and think of us

As of a father. For—let the world take note!—
You are the most immediate to our throne;
And with no less nobility of love 285

Than that which dearest father bears his son
Do I impart toward you. For your intent
In going back to school in Wittenberg,
It is most retrograde to our desire!
And, we beseech you, bend you to remain 290

Here, in the cheer and comfort of our eye,
Our chiefest courtier, cousin, and—our son.

QUEEN. Let not thy mother lose her prayers,
Hamlet:

I pray thee, stay with us. Go not to Wittenberg.

HAML. I shall in all my best obey you, madam.

KING. Why, 'tis a loving and a fair reply! 296

Be as ourself in Denmark. Madam, come;
This gentle and unforc'd accord of Hamlet
Sits smiling to my heart; in grace whereof,
No jocund health that Denmark drinks today,

But the great cannon to the clouds shall tell, 301
And the king's rouse the heavens shall bruit again,
Re-speaking earthly thunder. Come; away.

[Exeunt all except HAMLET.]

HAML. O, that this too too solid flesh would melt,

Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew! 305
Or that the Everlasting had not fix'd
His canon 'gainst self-slaughter! O God! O God!
How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable

Seem to me all the uses of this world!
Fie on't! O fie! 'Tis an unweeded garden, 310
That grows to seed; things rank and gross in nature

Possess it merely.—That it should come to this!
But two months dead! nay, not so much, not two!
So excellent a king; that was, to this,
Hyperion to a satyr! so loving to my mother 315

That he might not betem the winds of heaven
Visit her face too roughly.—Heaven and earth!
Must I remember?—Why, she would hang on him
As if increase of appetite had grown

By what it fed on; and yet, within a month—
Let me not think on't!—Frailty, thy name is
"woman." 321

A little month! or ere those shoes were old
With which she follow'd my poor father's body,
Like Niobe, all tears; why she, even she!—
O God! a beast, that wants discourse of reason,

Would have mourn'd longer—married with mine
uncle, 326

My father's brother!—but no more like my father
Than I to Hercules.—Within a month!

Ere yet the salt of most unrighteous tears
Had left the flushing in her galled eyes, 330

She married. O, most wicked speed, to post
With such dexterity to incestuous sheets!
It is not nor it cannot come to good!

But break my heart, for I must hold my tongue.

Enter HORATIO with the two sentinels MARCELLUS and BERNARDO.

HORAT. Hail to your lordship!

HAML. I am glad to see you well—
Horatio! or I do forget myself. 336

HORAT. The same, my lord, and your poor servant
ever.

HAML. Sir, my good friend. I'll change that name with you.

And what make you from Wittenberg, Horatio?—
Marcellus? 340

MARC. My good lord.

HAML. I am very glad to see you. [To BERNARDO.]
Good even, sir.—

But what, in faith, make you from Wittenberg?

HORAT. A truant disposition, good my lord.

HAML. I would not hear your enemy say so;
Nor shall you do mine ear that violence 346

To make it truster of your own report
Against yourself; I know you are no truant.

But what is your affair in Elsinore?
We'll teach you to drink deep ere you depart! 350

HORAT. My lord, I came to see your father's funeral.

HAML. I pray thee, do not mock me, fellow-student;

I think it was to see—my mother's wedding.

HORAT. Indeed, my lord, it follow'd hard upon.

HAML. Thrift, thrift, Horatio! the funeral bak'd meats

355

Did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables.

Would I had met my dearest foe in heaven

Ere I had ever seen that day, Horatio!

My father, methinks I see my father—

HORAT. O, where, my lord?

HAML. In my mind's eye, Horatio. 360

HORAT. I saw him—once. He was a goodly king.

HAML. He was a man! Take him for all in all,

I shall not look upon his like again.

HORAT. My lord, I think I saw him yesternight.

HAML. Saw? Who? 365

HORAT. My lord, the king your father.

HAML. The king my father!

HORAT. Season your admiration for a while

With an attent ear, till I may deliver,

Upon the witness of these gentlemen,

This marvel to you.

HAML. For God's love, let me hear!

HORAT. Two nights together had these gentlemen,

371

Marcellus and Bernardo, on their watch,

In the dead waste and middle of the night,

Been thus encounter'd: a figure, like your father,

Armed at points exactly, cap-a-pie, 375

Appears before them, and with solemn march

Goes slow and stately by them; thrice he walk'd

By their oppress'd and fear-surprised eyes,

Within his truncheon's length, whilst they, distill'd

Almost to jelly with the act of fear, 380

Stand dumb and speak not to him. This to me

In dreadful secrecy impart they did;

And I with them the third night kept the watch;

Where, as they had deliver'd, both in time,

Form of the thing, each word made true and good,

The apparition comes. I knew your father; 386

These hands are not more like.

HAML. But where was this?

MARC. My lord, upon the platform where we watch'd.

HAML. Did you not speak to it?

HORAT. My lord, I did;

But answer made it none. Yet once methought

It lifted up its head and did address 391

Itself to motion like as it would speak;

But even then the morning cock crew loud,

And at the sound it shrunk in haste away
And vanish'd from our sight.

HAML. 'Tis very strange! 395

HORAT. As I do live, my honor'd lord, 'tis true.

And we did think it writ down in our duty

To let you know of it.

HAML. Indeed, indeed, sirs, but this troubles me!
Hold you the watch tonight?

MARC. } We do, my lord. 400
BERN. }

HAML. Arm'd, say you?

MARC. } Arm'd, my lord.
BERN. }

HAML. From top to toe?

MARC. } My lord, from head to foot.
BERN. }

HAML. Then saw you not his face.

HORAT. O yes, my lord; he wore his beaver up.

HAML. What, look'd he frowningly? 405

HORAT. A countenance more in sorrow than in anger.

HAML. Pale, or red?

HORAT. Nay, very pale.

HAML. And fix'd his eyes upon you?

HORAT. Most constantly.

HAML. I would I had been there!

HORAT. It would have much amaz'd you. 410

HAML. Very like; very like. Stay'd it long?

HORAT. While one with moderate haste might tell a hundred.

MARC. } Longer, longer.
BERN. }

HORAT. Not when I saw it.

HAML. His beard was grizzled, no?

HORAT. It was, as I have seen it in his life, 415
A sable silver'd.

HAML. I will watch tonight;
Perchance 'twill walk again.

HORAT. I warrant it will.

HAML. If it assume my noble father's person,
I'll speak to it though hell itself should gape

And bid me hold my peace! I pray you all, 420

If you have hitherto conceal'd this sight,

Let it be tenable in your silence still;

And whatsoever else shall hap tonight,

Give it an understanding, but no tongue:

I will requite your loves. So, fare you well. 425

Upon the platform, 'twixt eleven and twelve,
I'll visit you.

ALL. Our duty to your honor.

HAML. Your love, as mine to you. Farewell.

[Excunt HORATIO, MARCELLUS, and BERNARDO.]

My father's spirit—in arms! All is not well.
 I doubt some foul play. Would the night were come! 430
 Till then sit still, my soul. Foul deeds will rise, Though all the earth o'erwhelm them, to men's eyes. [Exit.]

SCENE III:—Later the same day. A room in Polonius' house. Enter LAERTES and OPHELIA.

LAERT. My necessities are embark'd. Farewell.
 And, sister, as the winds give benefit,
 And convoy is assistant, do not sleep, 435
 But let me hear from you.

OPHEL. Do you doubt that?
 LAERT. For Hamlet, and the trifling of his favor,
 Hold it a fashion and a toy in blood,
 A violet in the youth of primy nature,
 Forward, not permanent; sweet, not lasting, 440
 The perfume and suppliance of a minute,
 No more.

OPHEL. No more but so?
 LAERT. Think it no more:
 For nature, crescent, does not grow alone
 In thews and bulk, but, as this temple waxes,
 The inward service of the mind and soul 445
 Grows wide withal. Perhaps he loves you now,
 And now no soil nor cautel doth besmirch
 The virtue of his will; but you must fear,
 His greatness weigh'd, his will is not his own,
 For he himself is subject to his birth; 450
 He may not, as unvalu'd persons do,
 Carve for himself; for on his choice depends
 The safety and the health of the whole state,
 And therefore must his choice be circumscrib'd
 Unto the voice and yielding of that body 455
 Whereof he is the head. Then, if he says he loves
 you,

It fits your wisdom so far to believe it
 As he in his peculiar act and force
 May give his saying deed; which is no further
 Than the main voice of Denmark goes withal. 460
 Then weigh what loss your honor may sustain
 If with too credent ear you list his songs,
 Or lose your heart, or your chaste treasure open
 To his unmaster'd importunity.
 Fear it, Ophelia! fear it, my dear sister! 465
 And keep you in the rear of your affection,
 Out of the shot and danger of desire.
 The chariest maid is prodigal enough
 If she unmask her beauty to the moon;
 Virtue itself 'scapes not calumnious strokes; 470
 The canker galls the infants of the spring
 Too oft before their buttons be disclos'd;

And in the morn and liquid dew of youth
 Contagious blastments are most imminent.
 Be wary then. Best safety lies in fear: 475
 Youth to itself rebels, though none else near.

OPHEL. I shall the effect of this good lesson keep
 As watchman to my heart. But, good my brother,
 Do not, as some ungracious pastors do,
 Show me the steep and thorny way to heaven, 480
 Whilst, like a puff'd and reckless libertine,
 Himself the primrose path of dalliance treads,
 And recks not his own rede.

LAERT. O, fear me not.
 I stay too long. But here my father comes.

Enter POLONIUS. LAERTES kneels for a blessing.

A double blessing is a double grace; 485
 Occasion smiles upon a second leave.

POLON. Yet here, Laertes! Aboard, aboard, for shame!
 The wind sits in the shoulder of your sail,
 And you are stay'd for! There—my blessing with thee.

Places his hand upon Laertes' head.

And these few precepts in thy memory 490
 See thou character. Give thy thoughts no tongue,
 Nor any unproportion'd thought his act.
 Be thou familiar, but by no means vulgar.
 The friends thou hast, and their adoption tried,
 Grapple them to thy soul with hoops of steel; 495
 But do not dull thy palm with entertainment
 Of each new-hatch'd, unfledg'd comrade. Beware
 Of entrance to a quarrel; but, being in,
 Bear't that th' opposed may beware of thee,
 Give every man thine ear, but few thy voice; 500
 Take each man's censure, but reserve thy judgment.
 Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy—
 But not express'd in fancy; rich, not gaudy;
 For the apparel oft proclaims the man,
 And they in France of the best rank and station 506
 Are most select and generous chief in that.
 Neither a borrower nor a lender be;
 For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
 And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry.
 This above all: To thine own self be true; 510
 And it must follow, as the night the day,
 Thou canst not then be false to any man.
 Farewell! My blessing season this in thee!

LAERT. Most humbly do I take my leave, my lord.

POLON. The time invites you; go. Your servants tend. 515

LAERT. Farewell, Ophelia; and remember well
 What I have said to you.

OPHEL. 'Tis in my memory lock'd, and you yourself shall keep the key of it.

LAERT. Farewell! [Exit.

POLON. What is't, Ophelia, he hath said to you?

OPHEL. So please you, something touching the Lord Hamlet. 521

POLON. Marry, well bethought!
'Tis told me he hath very oft of late
Given private time to you, and you yourself
Have of your audience been most free and bounte-
ous. 525

If it be so—as so 'tis put on me,
And that in way of caution—I must tell you,
You do not understand yourself so clearly
As it behoves my daughter and your honor.
What is between you? Give me up the truth! 530

OPHEL. He hath, my lord, of late made many tenders
Of his affection to me.

POLON. Affection! Pooh! You speak like a green girl,
Unsuited in such perilous circumstance.
Do you believe his "tenders," as you call them? 535

OPHEL. I do not know, my lord, what I should think.

POLON. Marry, I'll teach you! think yourself a baby,
That you have ta'en his "tenders" for true pay,
Which are not sterling. "Tender" yourself more dearly;

Or—not to crack the wind of the poor phrase 540
Running it thus—you'll "tender" me a fool.

OPHEL. My lord, he hath importun'd me with love
In honorable fashion—

POLON. Aye, "fashion" you may call it. Go to!
Go to!

OPHEL. And hath given countenance to his speech, my lord, 545
With almost all the holy vows of heaven.

POLON. Aye, springes to catch woodcocks! I do know,

When the blood burns, how prodigal the soul
Lends the tongue vows. These blazes, daughter,
Giving more light than heat—extinct in both, 550
Even in their promise as it is a-making—

You must not take for fire. From this time
Be somewhat scanter of your maiden presence;
Set your entreatments at a higher rate
Than a command to parley. For Lord Hamlet, 555
Believe so much in him, that he is young,
And with a larger tether may he walk
Than may be given you. In few, Ophelia,

Do not believe his vows; for they are brokers,
Not of that dye which their investments show, 560
But mere implorators of unholy suits,
Breathing like sanctified and pious bawds
The better to beguile. This is for all:

I would not, in plain terms, from this time forth
Have you so slander any moment's leisure 565
As to give words or talk with the Lord Hamlet.
Look to't, I charge you! Come your ways.

OPHEL. I shall obey, my lord. [Exit.

SCENE IV:—Midnight of the same day. Before the castle.

HAMLET, HORATIO, and MARCELLUS on the sentinel's platform waiting for the visitation of the Ghost.

HAML. The air bites shrewdly; it is very cold.
HORAT. It is a nipping and an eager air. 570

HAML. What hour now?
HORAT. I think it lacks of twelve.

MARC. No, it is struck.
HORAT. Indeed? I heard it not. Then it draws near the season

Wherein the spirit held his wont to walk.

The roll of kettle-drums, a flourish of trumpets, and two cannon shot off within.

What does this mean, my lord? 575

HAML. The king doth wake tonight, and takes his rouse,

Keeps wassail, and the swaggering up-spring reels;
And, as he drains his draughts of Rhenish down,
The kettle-drum and trumpet thus bray out
The triumph of his pledge.

HORAT. Is it a custom? 580

HAML. Aye, marry, is't:
But to my mind—though I am native here
And to the manner born—it is a custom
More honor'd in the breach than the observance.

This heavy-headed revel east and west 585
Makes us traduc'd and tax'd of other nations;
They clepe us drunkards, and with swinish phrase
Soil our addition; and, indeed, it takes

From our achievements, though perform'd at height,

The pith and marrow of our attribute: 590
So, oft it chances in particular men,

That for some vicious mole of nature in them,
As in their birth—wherein they are not guilty,
Since nature cannot choose his origin—

By the o'ergrowth of some complexion, 595
Oft breaking down the pales and forts of reason,
Or by some habit that too much o'er-leavens

The form of plausible manners, that these men,
 Carrying, I say, the stamp of one defect—
 Being nature's livery, or fortune's star— 600
 Their virtues else, be they as pure as grace,
 As infinite as man may undergo,
 Shall, in the general censure, take corruption
 From that particular fault: the dram of eale
 Doth all the noble substance of a doubt 605
 To his own scandal—

Enter GHOST.

HORAT. Look, my lord! It comes!

HAML. Angels and ministers of grace defend us!—

Be thou a spirit of health, or goblin damn'd,
 Bring with thee airs from heaven, or blasts from hell,

Be thy intents wicked, or charitable, 610

Thou comest in such a questionable shape
 That I will speak to thee. I'll call thee "Hamlet,"

"King," "Father."—Royal Dane, O, answer me!

Let me not burst in ignorance; but tell

Why thy canonized bones, hearsed in death, 615

Have burst their cerements; why the sepulcher,

Wherein we saw thee quietly inurn'd,

Hath op'd his ponderous and marble jaws

To cast thee up again. What may this mean, 620

That thou, dead corse, again in complete steel

Revisit'st thus the glimpses of the moon,

Making night hideous, and we fools of nature

So horribly to shake our disposition

With thoughts beyond the reaches of our souls?

Say, why is this? Wherefore? What should we 625

do?

The GHOST beckons HAMLET.

HORAT. It beckons you to go away with it,

As if it some impartment did desire

To you alone.

The GHOST beckons again.

MARC. Look, with what courteous action

It waves you to a more removed ground.

But do not go with it!

HORAT. No! by no means! 630

HAML. It will not speak? then will I follow it.

HORAT. Do not, my lord!

HAML. Why, what should be the fear?

I do not set my life at a pin's fee;

And for my soul, what can it do to that,

Being a thing immortal as itself? 635

The GHOST beckons a third time.

It waves me forth again. I'll follow it.

HORAT. What if it tempt you toward the flood,
 my lord?

Or to the dreadful summit of the cliff

That beetles o'er his base into the sea,

And there assume some other horrible form 640

Which might deprive your sovereignty of reason

And draw you into madness? Think of it.

The very place puts toys of desperation,

Without more motive, into every brain

That looks so many fathoms to the sea 645

And hears it roar beneath.

The GHOST beckons again.

HAML. It waves me still.—Go on; I'll follow thee.

MARC. You shall not go, my lord!

They seize him.

HAML. Hold off your hands!

HORAT. Be rul'd. You shall not go!

HAML. My fate cries out,

And makes each petty artery in this body 650

As hardy as the Nemean lion's nerve.

The GHOST beckons again.

Still am I call'd.—Unhand me, gentlemen!

Draws his sword.

By heaven, I'll make a ghost of him that lets me!

I say, away!

He breaks from them.

Go on; I'll follow thee.

[Exit the GHOST, followed by HAMLET with sword drawn.]

HORAT. He waxes desperate with imagination.

MARC. Let's follow; 'tis not fit thus to obey 656

him.

HORAT. Have after. To what issue will this come?

MARC. Something is rotten in the state of Denmark.

HORAT. Heaven will direct it.

MARC. Nay, let's follow him.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE V:—A few moments later. Another part of the platform.

Enter GHOST and HAMLET.

HAML. Whither wilt thou lead me? Speak. I'll go no further. 660

GHOST. Mark me!

HAML. I will.

GHOST. My hour is almost come
When I to sulphurous and tormenting flames
Must render up myself.

HAML. Alas! poor ghost!

GHOST. Pity me not, but lend thy serious hearing
To what I shall unfold.

HAML. Speak; I am bound to hear.

GHOST. So art thou to revenge, when thou shalt hear! 666

HAML. What?

GHOST. I am thy father's spirit,
Doom'd for a certain term to walk the night,
And for the day confin'd to fast in fires, 670
Till the foul crimes done in my days of nature
Are burnt and purg'd away. But that I am forbid
To tell the secrets of my prison-house,
I could a tale unfold whose lightest word 674
Would harrow up thy soul, freeze thy young blood, Make thy two eyes, like stars, start from their spheres,

Thy knotted and combined locks to part
And each particular hair to stand an end
Like quills upon the fretful porpentine.
But this eternal blazon must not be 680
To ears of flesh and blood. List, Hamlet! O, list!
If thou didst ever thy dear father love—

HAML. O God!

GHOST. Revenge his foul and most unnatural murder!

HAML. Murder! 685

GHOST. Murder—most foul, as in the best it is,
But this most foul, strange, and unnatural.

HAML. Haste me to know't, that I with wings as swift

As meditation or the thoughts of love
May sweep to my revenge!

GHOST. I find thee apt. 690
And duller shouldst thou be than the fat weed
That roots itself in ease on Lethe wharf
Wouldst thou not stir in this! Now, Hamlet, hear:
'Tis given out that, sleeping in mine orchard,
A serpent stung me; so the whole ear of Denmark
Is by a forged process of my death 696

Rankly abus'd. But know, thou noble youth,
The serpent that did sting thy father's life
Now wears his crown.

HAML. O my prophetic soul!
My uncle? 700

GHOST. Ay. That incestuous, that adulterate
beast,
With witchcraft of his wit, with traitorous gifts—
O wicked wit and gifts, that have the power
So to seduce!—won to his shameful lust

The will of my most seeming-virtuous queen. 705
O, Hamlet! What a falling-off was there,
From me, whose love was of that dignity
That it went hand in hand even with the vow
I made to her in marriage; and to decline
Upon a wretch, whose natural gifts were poor 710
To those of mine!

But virtue, as it never will be mov'd,
Though lewdness court it in a shape of heaven,
So lust, though to a radiant angel link'd,
Will sate itself in a celestial bed, 715
And prey on garbage.—

But, soft! methinks I scent the morning air.
Brief let me be. Sleeping within mine orchard—
My custom always in the afternoon—
Upon my secure hour thy uncle stole, 720
With juice of cursed hebona in a vial,
And in the porches of mine ears did pour
The leperous distillment; whose effect
Holds such an enmity with blood of man
That swift as quicksilver it courses through 725
The natural gates and alleys of the body,
And with a sudden vigor it doth posset
And curd, like eager droppings into milk,
The thin and wholesome blood: so did it mine;
And a most instant tetter bark'd about, 730
Most lazarus-like, with vile and loathsome crust,
All my smooth body.

Thus was I, sleeping, by a brother's hand,
Of life, of crown, of queen, at once dispatch'd;
Cut off even in the blossoms of my sin, 735
Unhousel'd, disappointed, unanel'd,

No reckoning made, but sent to my account
With all my imperfections on my head.
O, horrible! O, horrible! most horrible!
If thou hast nature in thee, bear it not! 740
Let not the royal bed of Denmark be
A couch for luxury and damned incest!—
But, howsoever thou pursuest this act,
Taint not thy mind, nor let thy soul contrive
Against thy mother aught; leave her to heaven,
And to those thorns that in her bosom lodge, 746
To prick and sting her.—Fare thee well at once!
The glow-worm shows the matin to be near,
And 'gins to pale his uneffectual fire.
Adieu!—Adieu!—Hamlet, remember me! 750

The GHOST sinks beneath the stage. HAMLET for a time stands dazed, then tremblingly sags to his knees.

HAML. O all you host of heaven!—O earth!—
What else?

And shall I couple hell? O fie!—Hold, hold, my heart!

And you, my sinews, grow not instant old,
But bear me stiffly up! [Rises.] Remember thee?

Aye, thou poor ghost, while memory holds a seat
In this distracted globe. Remember thee? 756

Yea, from the table of my memory
I'll wipe away all trivial fond records,

All saws of books, all forms, all pressures past
That youth and observation copied there, 760

And thy commandment, all alone, shall live
Within the book and volume of my brain

Unmix'd with baser matter: yes, by heaven!—
O most pernicious woman!—

O villain! villain! smiling, damned villain! 765
My tables.

He takes out his memorandum-book.

Meet it is I set it down,
That one may smile, and smile, and be a villain—
At least I'm sure it may be so in Denmark.

[Writing.]

So, uncle, there you are! Now to my word;
It is [Writing.] "Adieu, adieu! Remember me!"—
I have sworn't! 771

HORAT. [within]. My lord! My lord!

MARC. [within]. Lord Hamlet!

HORAT. [within]. Heaven secure him.

MARC. [within]. So be it!

HORAT. [within]. Hillo! ho ho! My lord!

HAML. Hillo, ho, ho, boy! come, bird, come!

Enter HORATIO and MARCELLUS.

MARC. How is't, my noble lord?

HORAT. What news, my lord?

HAML. O, wonderful!

HORAT. Good, my lord, tell it. 776

HAML. No; you'll reveal it.

HORAT. Not I, my lord, by heaven!

MARC. Nor I, my lord.

HAML. How say you, then! Would heart of man once think it!

But, you'll be secret?

HORAT. } Aye, by heaven, my lord. 780

MARC. }
HAML. There's ne'er a villain dwelling in all Denmark—

But he's an arrant knave.

HORAT. There needs no ghost, my lord, come from the grave

To tell us this.

HAML. Why, right! you are i' the right!
And so, without more circumstance at all, 786
I hold it fit that we shake hands and part.

Shakes hands with them.

You, as your business and desire shall point you—
For every man hath business and desire,
Such as it is—and, for mine own poor part, 790
Look you, I'll go pray.

HORAT. These are but wild and whirling words,
my lord.

HAML. I am sorry they offend you; heartily;
Yes, faith, heartily.

HORAT. There's no offense, my lord.

HAML. Yes, by Saint Patrick, but there is, Horatio! 795

And much offense, too. Touching this vision here,
It is an honest ghost, that let me tell you.

For your desire to know what is between us,
O'ermaster't as you may. And now, good friends,
As you are friends, scholars, and soldiers, 800
Give me one poor request.

HORAT. What is't, my lord? we will.

HAML. Never make known what you have seen tonight.

HORAT. } My lord, we will not.

MARC. }

HAML. Nay, but swear't.

HORAT. In faith,

My lord, not I.

MARC. Nor I, my lord, in faith. 805

HAML. [holding up his sword]. Upon my sword.

MARC. We have sworn, my lord, already.

HAML. Indeed, upon my sword; indeed!

GHOST [beneath]. Swear!

HAML. Ah, ha, boy! say'st thou so? Art thou there, true-penny?—

Come on; you hear this fellow in the cellarage. 810

He leads them to another place, and holds up his sword.

Consent to swear.

HORAT. Propose the oath, my lord.

HAML. Never to speak of this that you have seen.
Swear by my sword.

GHOST [beneath]. Swear!

HAML. Hic et ubique? then we'll shift our ground.— 815

Come hither, gentlemen;

He leads them to another place.

And lay your hands again upon my sword.

Never to speak of this that you have heard;

Swear by my sword.

GHOST [beneath]. Swear! 820
 HAML. Well said, old mole! Canst work i' the earth so fast?
 A worthy pioneer!—Once more remove, good friends.

He leads them to another place.

HORAT. O day and night, but this is wondrous strange!
 HAML. And therefore as a stranger give it welcome.
 There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, 825
 Than are dreamt of in your philosophy.
 But come.

He holds up his sword.

Here, as before, never, so help you mercy,
 How strange or odd soe'er I bear myself—
 As I perchance hereafter shall think meet 830
 To put an antic disposition on—
 That you, at such times seeing me, never shall,
 With arms encumber'd thus, or this head-shake,
 Or by pronouncing of some doubtful phrase
 As "Well, well, we know," or, "We could, an if we would," 835
 Or, "If we list to speak," or, "There be, an if they might,"
 Or such ambiguous giving-out, to note
 That you know aught of me. This not to do,
 So grace and mercy at your most need help you.
 Swear! 840

GHOST [beneath]. Swear!
 HAML. Rest, rest, perturbed spirit!

They swear, touching their lips to the sword.

So, gentlemen,
 With all my love I do commend me to you:
 And what so poor a man as Hamlet is 844
 May do to express his love and friending to you,
 God willing, shall not lack. Let us go in together.
 And still your fingers on your lips, I pray.
 [Aside.] The time is out of joint; O cursed spite
 That ever I was born to set it right! 849
 [Aloud.] Nay, come; let's go together. [Exeunt.]

ACT II

SCENE I:—Two months later. A room in Polonius' house.

Enter POLONIUS and his servant REYNALDO.

POLON. Give him this money, and these notes,
 Reynaldo.

REYN. I will, my lord.
 POLON. You shall do marvelous wisely, good
 Reynaldo,
 Before you visit him, to make inquiry
 Of his behavior.

REYN. My lord, I did intend it. 855
 POLON. Marry, well said! very well said! Look you, sir,
 Inquire me first what Danskers are in Paris;
 And how, and who; what means, and where they keep;
 What company, at what expense: and, finding
 By this encompassment and drift of question 860
 That they do know my son, come you more nearer
 Than your particular demands will touch it;
 Take you, as 'twere, some distant knowledge of
 him,

As thus: "I know his father, and his friends;
 And, in part, him."—Do you mark this, Reynaldo?

REYN. Aye, very well, my lord. 866

POLON. "And, in part, him; but," you may say,
 "not well:

But if't be he I mean, he's very wild,
 Addicted"—so and so. And there put on him
 What forgeries you please; marry, none so rank
 As may dishonor him; take heed of that! 871
 But, sir, such wanton, wild, and usual slips
 As are companions noted and most known
 To youth and liberty.

REYN. As gaming, my lord?

POLON. Aye; or drinking, fencing, swearing, quarreling,— 875

Drabbing; you may go so far.

REYN. My lord! that would dishonor him.

POLON. Faith, no; as you may season it in the charge.

You must not put another scandal on him,
 That he is open to incontinency; 880
 That's not my meaning; but breathe his faults so quaintly

That they may seem the taints of liberty,
 The flash and outbreak of a fiery mind,
 A savageness in unreclaimed blood,
 Of general assault.

REYN. But, my good lord,— 885

POLON. Wherefore should you do this?

REYN. Aye, my lord;

I would know that.

POLON. Marry, sir, here's my drift,
 And, I believe, it is a fetch of warrant:
 You laying these slight sullies on my son,
 As 'twere a thing a little soil'd i' the working— 890
 Mark you?

Your party in converse—him you would sound—
 Having ever seen in the prenominate crimes
 The youth you breathe of guilty, be assur'd
 He closes with you in this consequence: 895
 "Good sir," or so; or "Friend," or "Gentleman,"
 According to the phrase or the addition.
 Of man and country—

REYN. Very good, my lord.

POLON. And then, sir—does he this—he does—
 What was I about to say? By the mass I was about to say something. Where did I leave? 901

REYN. At "closes in the consequence,"
 At "friend or so," and "gentleman."

POLON. At "closes in the consequence"? aye, marry!

He closes with you thus: "I know the gentleman;
 I saw him yesterday, or t'other day, 906
 Or then, or then, with such, or such; and, as you say,

There was he gaming; there, o'ertook in's rouse;
 There, falling out at tennis";
 See you now? 910

Your bait of falsehood takes this carp of truth.

And thus do we of wisdom and of reach,

With windlasses, and with assays of bias,

By indirections find directions out:

So, by my former lecture and advice, 915

Shall you my son. You have me, have you not?

REYN. My lord, I have.

POLON. God be wi' you; fare you well!

REYN. Good my lord. [Leaving.]

POLON. Observe his inclination in yourself.

REYN. I shall, my lord. 920

POLON. And let him ply his music.

REYN. Well, my lord.

POLON. Farewell! [Exit REYNALDO.]

Enter OPHELIA running in fright.

How now, Ophelia! What's the matter?

OPHEL. Oh, my lord! my lord! I have been so affrighted!

POLON. With what, in the name of God?

OPHEL. My lord, as I was sewing in my closet,
 Lord Hamlet, with his doublet all unbrac'd, 926

No hat upon his head, his stockings foul'd,

Ungarter'd, and down-gyved to his ankle,

Pale as his shirt, his knees knocking each other,

And with a look so piteous in purport 930

As if he had been loosed out of hell

To speak of horrors, he comes before me.

POLON. Mad for thy love?

OPHEL. My lord, I do not know;
 But, truly, I do fear it.

POLON. What said he?

OPHEL. He took me by the wrist, and held me
 hard. 935

Then goes he to the length of all his arm;

And, with his other hand thus o'er his brow,

He falls to such perusal of my face

As he would draw it. Long stay'd he so.

At last, a little shaking of mine arm, 940

And thrice his head thus waving up and down,

He rais'd a sigh so piteous and profound

That it did seem to shatter all his bulk

And end his being. That done, he lets me go.

And, with his head over his shoulder turn'd, 945

He seem'd to find his way without his eyes;

For out o'doors he went without their help,

And to the last bended their light on me.

POLON. Come! Go with me! I will go seek the king.

This is the very ecstasy of love, 950

Whose violent property fordoes itself

And leads the will to desperate undertakings

As oft as any passion under heaven

That does afflict our natures. I am sorry—

What! have you given him any hard words of late? 955

OPHEL. No, my good lord; but—as you did command—

I did repel his letters, and denied

His access to me.

POLON. That hath made him mad!

I am sorry that with better heed and judgment

I had not quoted him. I fear'd he did but trifle,

And meant to wrack thee. But, beshrew my jealousy! 961

It seems it is as proper to our age

To cast beyond ourselves in our opinions

As it is common for the younger sort

To lack discretion. Come, go we to the king. 965

This must be known; which, being kept close,
 might move

More grief to hide than hate to utter love.

Come! [Excunt.]

SCENE II:—Later the same day. A room in the castle.

Enter KING, QUEEN, ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and Attendants.

KING Welcome, dear Rosencrantz and Guilden-
 stern!

Moreover that we much did long to see you, 970

The need we have to use you did provoke

Our hasty sending. Something have you heard

Of Hamlet's transformation—so I call it,
 Since nor the exterior nor the inward man
 Resembles that it was. What it should be, 975
 More than his father's death, that thus hath put
 him

So much from the understanding of himself,
 I cannot dream of. I entreat you both,
 That, being of so young days brought up with
 him, 979

And since so neighbor'd to his youth and humor,
 That you vouchsafe your rest here in our court
 Some little time; so by your companies
 To draw him on to pleasures, and to gather,
 So much as from occasion you may glean,
 Whe'r aught to us unknown afflicts him thus,
 That, open'd, lies within our remedy. 986

QUEEN. Good gentlemen, he hath much talk'd of
 you;

And sure I am two men there are not living
 To whom he more adheres. If it will please you
 To show us so much gentry and good will 990
 As to expend your time with us awhile
 For the supply and profit of our hope,
 Your visitation shall receive such thanks
 As fits a king's remembrance.

ROSENC. Both your majesties
 Might, by the sovereign power you have of us,
 Put your dread pleasures more into command
 Than to entreaty.

GUILDEN. But we both obey, 997
 And here give up ourselves in the full bent,
 To lay our service freely at your feet
 To be commanded. 1000

KING. Thanks, Rosencrantz and gentle Guilden-
 stern.

QUEEN. Thanks, Guildenstern and gentle Rosencrantz.

And I beseech you instantly to visit
 My too much changed son.—Go, some of you,
 And bring these gentlemen where Hamlet is.

GUILDEN. Heavens make our presence and our practices 1006
 Pleasant and helpful to him!

QUEEN. Aye, amen!

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and Attendants.]

Enter POLONIUS.

POLON. The ambassadors from Norway, my good
 lord,
 Are joyfully return'd.

KING. Thou still hast been the father of good news. 1010

POLON. Have I, my lord? Assure you, my good liege,

I hold my duty, as I hold my soul,
 Both to my God and to my gracious king.
 And I do think—or else this brain of mine
 Hunts not the trail of policy so sure 1015
 As it hath us'd to do—that I have found
 The very cause of Hamlet's lunacy.

KING. O, speak of that! that do I long to hear.

POLON. Give first admittance to the ambassadors;
 My news shall be the fruit to that great feast. 1020

KING. Thyself do grace to them and bring them in. [Exit POLONIUS.]

He tells me, my sweet queen, that he hath found
 The head and source of all your son's distemper.

QUEEN. I doubt it is no other but the main—
 His father's death, and our o'erhasty marriage.

KING. Well, we shall sift him.

Re-enter POLONIUS, with VOLTIMAND and CORNELIUS.

Welcome, my good friends!

Say, Voltimand, what from our brother Norway?.

VOLTI. Most fair return of greetings and desires.
 Upon our first, he sent out to suppress 1029
 His nephew's levies, which to him appear'd
 To be a preparation 'gainst the Polack,
 But, better look'd into, he truly found
 It was against your highness; whereat griev'd
 That so his sickness, age, and impotence
 Was falsely borne in hand, sends out arrests 1035
 On Fortinbras; which he, in brief, obeys,
 Receives rebuke from Norway, and, in fine,
 Makes vow before his uncle never more
 To give the assay of arms against your majesty.
 Whereon old Norway, overcome with joy, 1040
 Gives him three thousand crowns in annual fee,
 And his commission to employ those soldiers,
 So levied as before, against the Polack;
 With an entreaty, herein further shown, [Giving a paper.]

That it might please you to give quiet pass 1045
 Through your dominions for this enterprise,
 On such regards of safety and allowance
 As therein are set down.

KING. It likes us well;
 And at our more consider'd time we'll read,
 Answer, and think upon this business: 1050
 Meantime we thank you for your well-took labor.
 Go to your rest; at night we'll feast together.
 Most welcome home.

- [Exeunt VOLTIMAND and CORNELIUS.]

POLON. This business is well ended.
My liege, and madam, to expostulate
What majesty should be, what duty is, 1055
Why day is day, night night, and time is time,
Were nothing but to waste night, day, and time.
Therefore, since brevity is the soul of wit,
And tediousness the limbs and outward flourishes,
I will be brief. Your noble son is mad. 1060
Mad call I it; for, to define true madness,
What is't but to be nothing else but mad?
But let that go.

QUEEN. More matter, with less art.

POLON. Madam, I swear I use no art at all.
That he is mad, 'tis true; 'tis true 'tis pity; 1065
And, pity 'tis 'tis true. A foolish figure;
But farewell it, for I will use no art.
Mad let us grant him, then. And now remains
That we find out the cause of this effect—
Or rather say, the cause of this defect; 1070
For this effect-defective comes by cause.
Thus it remains, and the remainder thus.
Perpend!
I have a daughter—have while she is mine—
Who, in her duty and obedience,—mark!— 1075
Hath given me this.

Holds up a letter.

Now, gather, and surmise!

Reads the address on the outside.

To the celestial, and my soul's idol, the most beautified Ophelia,—

That's an ill phrasel! a vile phrasel! "beautified" is a vile phrase. But you shall hear. Thus:

in her excellent white bosom, these, &c.

QUEEN [reaching out for the letter]. Came this from Hamlet to her? 1081

POLON. Good madam, stay awhile. I will be faithful.

Unfolds the letter and reads.

Doubt thou the stars are fire;

Doubt that the sun doth move;

Doubt truth to be a liar; 1085

But never doubt I love.

O dear Ophelia! I am ill at these numbers: I have not art to reckon my groans; but that I love thee, Best, O most Best! believe it. Adieu.

Thine evermore, most dear lady, whilst this machine is to him,

Hamlet.

This, in obedience, hath my daughter shown me;
And, more above, hath his solicitings, 1094

As they fell out by time, by means, and place,
All given to mine ear.

KING. But how hath she Receiv'd his love?

POLON. [in an injured tone]. What do you think of me?

KING. As of a man faithful and honorable.

POLON. I would fain prove so. But what might you think,

When I had seen this hot love on the wing—
As I perceiv'd it, I must tell you that, 1101

Before my daughter told me—what might you,
Or my dear majesty your queen here, think,
If I had play'd the desk or table-book,
Or given my heart a winking mute and dumb,
Or look'd upon this love with idle sight? 1106
What might you think? No! I went round to work,

And my young mistress thus I did bespeak:
"Lord Hamlet is a prince, out of thy star;

This must not be!" And then I precepts gave her,
That she should lock herself from his resort, 1111

Admit no messengers, receive no tokens.
Which done, she took the fruits of my advice;

And he, repulsed—a short tale to make—
Fell into a sadness; then into a fast; 1115

Thence to a watch; thence into a weakness;
Thence to a lightness; and, by this declension,

Into the madness wherein now he raves

And all we wait for!

KING [to GERTRUDE]. Do you think 'tis this?

QUEEN. It may be; very likely. 1120

POLON. Hath there been such a time—I'd fain know that—

That I have positively said, "'Tis so,"

When it prov'd otherwise?

KING. Not that I know.

POLON. Take this from this, if this be otherwise.

[Pointing to his head and shoulder.]

If circumstances lead me, I will find 1125

Where truth is hid, though it were hid indeed
Within the center!

KING. How may we try it further?

POLON. You know sometimes he walks four hours together
Here in the lobby.

QUEEN. So he does indeed.

POLON. At such a time I'll loose my daughter to him; 1130

Be you and I behind an arras then;
Mark the encounter. If he love her not,
And be not from his reason fallen thereon,

Let me be no assistant for a state,
But keep a farm and carters.

KING. We will try it. 1135

QUEEN. But look, where sadly the poor wretch comes reading.

POLON. Away, I do beseech you! both away!
I'll board him presently.

[Exeunt KING and QUEEN.]

Enter HAMLET, reading on a book.

POLONIUS steps before him.

O, give me leave.

How does my good Lord Hamlet?

HAML. Well, God a-mercy. 1140

POLON. Do you know me, my lord?

HAML. Excellent well; you are a fishmonger.

POLON. Not I, my lord!

HAML. Then I would you were so honest a man.

POLON. "Honest," my lord? 1145

HAML. Aye, sir; to be honest, as this world goes, is to be one man picked out of ten thousand.

POLON. That's very true, my lord.

HAML. For, if the sun breed maggots in a dead dog, being a good kissing carrion—Have you a daughter?

POLON. I have, my lord. 1152

HAML. Let her not walk i' the sun! Friend, look to't!

POLON. [aside]. How say you by that? Still harping on my daughter! Yet he knew me not at first; he said I was a fishmonger. He is far gone! far gone! And, truly, in my youth I suffered much extremity for love; very near this. I'll speak to him again.—What do you read, my lord? 1160

HAML. Words, words, words.

POLON. What is the matter, my lord?

HAML. Between who?

POLON. I mean the matter that you read, my
lord. 1165

HAML. Slanders, sir: for the satirical rogue says here that old men have gray beards, that their faces are wrinkled, their eyes purging thick amber or plum-tree gum, and that they have a plentiful lack of wit, together with most weak hams. All which, sir, though I most powerfully and potently believe,
yet I hold it not honesty to have it thus set down;
for you yourself, sir, should be old, as I am—if, like a crab, you could go backward. 1174

POLON. [aside]. Though this be madness, yet there is method in't!—Will you walk out of the air, my lord?

HAML. Into my grave?

POLON. Indeed, that is out o' the air. [Aside.]

How pregnant sometimes his replies are! a happiness that often madness hits on, which reason and sanity could not so prosperously be delivered of. I will leave him, and suddenly contrive the means of meeting between him and my daughter.—My honorable lord, I will most humbly take my leave of you. 1186

HAML. You cannot, sir, take from me anything that I will more willingly part withal—except my life, except my life, except my life.

POLON. Fare you well, my lord. [Leaving.]

HAML. These tedious old fools! 1191

Enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN. POLONIUS meets them at the door.

POLON. You go to seek the Lord Hamlet? there he is.

ROSENC. [to POLONIUS]. God save you, sir!

[*Exit POLONIUS. GUILDENSTERN and ROSEN-
CRANTZ rush forward to greet HAMLET.*]

GUILDEN. Mine honored lord! 1195

ROSENC. My most dear lord!

HAML. My excellent good friends! How dost thou, Guildenstern? Ah, Rosencrantz! Good lads, how do ye both?

ROSENC. As the indifferent children of the earth.

GUILDEN. Happy in that we are not over happy;
on Fortune's cap we are not the very button.

HAML. Nor the soles of her shoe?

ROSENC. Neither, my lord.

HAML. What news? 1205

ROSENC. None, my lord, but that the world's grown honest.

HAML. Then is doomsday near. But your news is not true. Let me question more in particular.
What have you, my good friends, deserved at the hands of Fortune, that she sends you to prison hither?

GUILDEN. Prison, my lord!

HAML. Denmark's a prison.

ROSENC. Then is the world one. 1215

HAML. A goodly one; in which there are many confines, wards, and dungeons, Denmark being one o' the worst.

ROSENC. We think not so, my lord.

HAML. Why, then 'tis none to you; for there is nothing either good or bad but thinking makes it so. To me it is a prison.

ROSENC. Why, then your ambition makes it one.
'Tis too narrow for your mind. 1222

HAML. O God! I could be bounded in a nutshell and count myself a king of infinite space, were it not that I have bad dreams.

GUILDEN. Which dreams, indeed, are ambition; for the very substance of the ambitious is merely the shadow of a dream. 1230

HAML. A dream itself is but a shadow.

ROSENC. Truly; and I hold ambition of so airy and light a quality that it is but a shadow's shadow.

HAML. Then are our beggars bodies, and our monarchs and outstretched heroes the beggars' shadows. Shall we to the court? for, by my fay, I cannot reason. 1238

ROSENC. } We'll wait upon you.

GUILDEN. }

HAML. No such matter; I will not sort you with the rest of my servants; for, to speak to you like an honest man, I am most dreadfully attended.—But, in the beaten way of friendship, what make you at Elsinore? 1244

ROSENC. To visit you, my lord; no other occasion.

HAML. Beggar that I am, I am even poor in thanks! But, I thank you; and sure, dear friends, my thanks are too dear a halfpenny.—Were you not sent for? Is it your own inclining? Is it a free visitation? Come; come; deal justly with me. [They hesitate.] Come, come. Nay, speak. 1252

GUILDEN. What should we say, my lord?

HAML. Why anything, but to the purpose. You were sent for; and there is a kind of confession in your looks which your modesties have not craft enough to color. I know the good king and queen have sent for you. 1258

ROSENC. To what end, my lord?

HAML. That you must teach me.—But let me conjure you: By the rights of our fellowship, by the consonancy of our youth, by the obligation of our ever-preserved love, and by what more dear a better proposer could charge you withal, be even and direct with me, whether you were sent for or no! 1266

ROSENC. [aside to GUILDENSTERN]. What say you?

HAML. [aside]. Nay, then, I have an eye of you.—If you love me, hold not off.

GUILDEN. My lord, we were sent for. 1270

HAML. I will tell you why; so shall my anticipation prevent your discovery, and your secrecy to the king and queen molt no feather. I have of late—but wherefore I know not—lost all my mirth, forgone all custom of exercise; and indeed it goes so heavily with my disposition that this goodly frame, the earth, seems to me a sterile promontory; this most excellent canopy, the air—look you!—this brave o'erhanging firmament, this majestical roof fretted with golden fire,—why, it appears no other thing to me but a foul and pestilent congregation of vapors. What a piece of work is a man! How noble in reason! how infinite in faculty! in form, in moving, how express and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god! the beauty of the world! the paragon of animals! And yet to me, what is this quintessence of dust? man delights not me.—No, nor woman neither, though by your smiling you seem to say so. 1290

ROSENC. My lord, there was no such stuff in my thoughts.

HAML. Why did you laugh, then, when I said, "man delights not me"?

ROSENC. To think, my lord, if you delight not in man, what lenten entertainment the players shall receive from you. We coted them on the way, and hither are they coming to offer you service. 1298

HAML. He that plays the king shall be welcome, his majesty shall have tribute of me; the adventurous knight shall use his foil and target; the lover shall not sigh gratis; the humorous man shall end his part in peace; the clown shall make those laugh whose lungs are tickle o' the sere; and the lady shall say her mind freely, or the blank verse shall halt for't. What players are they? 1306

ROSENC. Even those you were wont to take such delight in, the tragedians of the city.

HAML. How chances it they travel? Their residence, both in reputation and profit, was better both ways.

ROSENC. I think their inhibition comes by the means of the late innovation. 1313

HAML. Do they hold the same estimation they did when I was in the city? Are they so followed?

ROSENC. No, indeed, are they not.

HAML. How comes it? Do they grow rusty?

ROSENC. Nay, their endeavor keeps in the wonted pace: but there is, sir, an aery of children, little eyases, that cry out on the top of question, and are most tyrannically clapped for't. These are now the fashion, and so berattle the "common stages"—so they call them—that many wearing rapiers are afraid of goose-quills, and dare scarce come thither. 1325

HAML. What! are they children? Who maintains 'em? How are they escoted? Will they pursue the quality no longer than they can sing? Will they not say afterwards, if they should grow themselves to "common" players—as it is most like if their means are no better—their writers do them wrong to make them exclaim against their own succession? 1333

ROSENC. Faith, there has been much to-do on both sides; and the nation holds it no sin to tarre them to controversy. There was, for a while, no money bid for argument unless the poet and the player went to cuffs in the question.

HAML. Is it possible!

GUILDEN. O! there has been much throwing about of brains.

HAML. Do the boys carry it away? 1341

ROSENC. Aye, that they do, my lord—Hercules and his load, too.

HAML. It is not very strange; for my uncle is King of Denmark, and those that would make mows at him while my father lived, give twenty, forty, fifty, an hundred ducats a-piece for his picture in little. 'Sblood, there is something in this more than natural, if philosophy could find it out.

A flourish within, announcing the arrival of the players at the outer castle gates.

GUILDEN. There are the players. 1351

HAML. Gentlemen, you are welcome to Elsinore. Your hands; come. The appurtenance of welcome is fashion and ceremony; let me comply with you in this garb, lest my extent to the players, which, I tell you, must show fairly outward, should more appear like entertainment than yours. You are welcome.—But my uncle-father and aunt-mother are deceived.

GUILDEN. In what, my dear lord? 1360

HAML. I am but mad north-north-west: when the wind is southerly I know a hawk from a handsaw.

Enter POLONIUS.

POLON. Well be with you, gentlemen!

HAML. Hark you, Guildenstern; and you, too: at each ear a hearer. [They gather about him. He whispers.] That great baby you see there is not yet out of his swaddling-clouts.

ROSENC. Happily he's the second time come to them; for, they say, an old man is twice a child.

HAML. I will prophesy he comes to tell me of the players; mark it. [Aloud.] You say right, sir; o' Monday morning; 'twas so, indeed. 1372

POLON. My lord, I have news to tell you.

HAML. My lord, I have news to tell you. When Roscius was an actor in Rome—

POLON. The actors are come hither, my lord!

HAML. Buzz, buzz!

POLON. Upon my honor!

HAML. Then came each actor on his ass. 1379

POLON. The best actors in the world, either for tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, tragical-comical-historical-pastoral, scene individable, or poem unlimited. Seneca cannot be too heavy, nor Plautus too light, for the law of writ and the liberty; these are the only men— 1386

HAML. O Jephthah, judge of Israel, what a treasure hadst thou!

POLON. What a treasure had he, my lord?

HAML. Why—

*One fair daughter and no more,
The which he loved passing well.*

POLON. [aside]. Still on my daughter!

HAML. Am I not i' the right, old Jephthah?

POLON. If you call me Jephthah, my lord, I have a daughter, that I love passing well. 1396

HAML. Nay, that follows not.

POLON. What follows, then, my lord?

HAML. Why—

As by lot, God wot. 1400

And then, you know—

It came to pass, as most like it was.

The first row of the pious chanson will show you more; for look where my abridgment comes.

Enter the Players.

You are welcome, masters! Welcome, all! I am glad to see thee well. Welcome, good friends! O, my old friend! [Taking one by the hand.] Why, thy face is valanced since I saw thee last: comest thou to beard me in Denmark? [To the boy-actor.] What! my young lady and mistress? By'r lady, your ladyship is nearer heaven than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine. Pray God, your voice, like a piece of uncurrent gold, be not cracked within the ring.—Masters, you are all welcome! We'll e'en to't like French falconers, fly at any thing we see: we'll have a speech straight. [To the First Player.] Come, give us a taste of your quality. Come, a passionate speech. 1418

FIRST PLAY. What speech, my good lord?

HAML. I heard thee speak me a speech once, but it was never acted; or, if it was, not above once, for the play, I remember, pleased not the million; 'twas caviare to the general: but it was—as I received it, and others whose judgments in such matters cried in the top of mine—an excellent play, well digested in the scenes, set down with as much modesty as cunning. I remember one said there were no sallets in the lines to make the matter savory, nor no matter in the phrase that might indict the author of affectation, but called it an honest method, as wholesome as sweet, and by very much more handsome than fine. One speech in it I chiefly loved; 'twas Æneas' tale to Dido; and thereabout of it especially where he speaks of Priam's slaughter. If it live in your memory, begin at this line—let me see—let me see— 1436

The rugged Pyrrhus, like the Hyrcanian beast,—

'Tis not so.—It begins with Pyrrhus.—

*The rugged Pyrrhus, he, whose sable arms,
Black as his purpose, did the night resemble
When he lay couched in the ominous horse,
Hath now this dread and black complexion smear'd
With heraldry more dismal; head to foot 1443
Now is he total gules, horribly trick'd
With blood of fathers, mothers, daughters, sons,
Bak'd and impasted with the parching streets
That lend a tyrannous and damned light
To their vile murders. Roasted in wrath and fire,
And thus o'er-sized with coagulate gore,
With eyes like carbuncles; the hellish Pyrrhus
Old grandsire Priam seeks. 1451*

So proceed you.

POLON. 'Fore God, my lord, well spoken! with good accent, and good discretion!

FIRST PLAY. *Anon he finds him
Striking too short at Greeks; his antique sword,
Rebellious to his arm, lies where it falls,
Repugnant to command. Unequal match'd,
Pyrrhus at Priam drives; in rage strikes wide;
But with the whiff and wind of his fell sword
The unnerved father falls. Then senseless Ilium,
Seeming to feel this blow, with flaming top 1461
Stoops to his base, and with a hideous crash
Takes prisoner Pyrrhus' ear: for lo! his sword,
Which was declining on the milky head
Of reverend Priam, seem'd i' the air to stick.
So, as a painted tyrant, Pyrrhus stood,
And, like a neutral to his will and matter,
Did nothing. 1468*

*But, as we often see, against some storm,
A silence in the heavens, the rack stand still,
The bold winds speechless, and the orb below
As hush as death, anon the dreadful thunder
Doth rend the region; so, after Pyrrhus' pause,
A roused vengeance sets him new a-work.
And never did the Cyclops' hammers fall
On Mars' armor, forg'd for proof eterne,
With less remorse than Pyrrhus' bleeding sword
Now falls on Priam.*

*Out, out, thou strumpet, Fortune! All you gods,
Break all the spokes and fellys from her wheel,
In general synod take away her power, 1481
And bowl the round nave down the hill of heaven
As low as to the fiends!*

POLON. This is too long.

HAML. It shall to the barber's, with your beard.—
Prithee, say on: he's for a jig, or a tale of bawdry, or he sleeps. Say on. Come to Hecuba. 1487

FIRST PLAY. But who, O! who had seen the mobled queen—

HAML. The "mobled queen"?

POLON. That's good! "mobled queen" is good!

FIRST PLAY. Run barefoot up and down, threatening the flames

*With bisson rheum, a clout upon that head
Where late the diadem stood, and, for a robe,
About her lank and all o'er-teemed loins
A blanket, in the alarm of fear caught up— 1495
Who this had seen, with tongue in venom steep'd,
'Gainst Fortune's state would treason have pronounc'd!*

*But if the Gods themselves did see her then,
When she saw Pyrrhus make malicious sport
In mincing with his sword her husband's limbs,
The instant burst of clamor that she made— 1501
Unless things mortal move them not at all—
Would have made milch the burning eyes of
heaven,*

And passion in the gods.

POLON. Look! wh'er he has not turned his color and has tears in's eyes! Prithee, no more. 1506

HAML. 'Tis well. I'll have thee speak out the rest soon. [To POLONIUS.] Good my lord, will you see the players well bestowed? Do you hear, let them be well used, for they are the abstracts and brief chronicles of the time: after your death you were better have a bad epitaph than their ill report while you live. 1513

POLON. My lord, I will use them according to their desert.

HAML. God's bodikins, man, much better! Use every man after his desert, and who should 'scape whipping? Use them after your own honor and dignity: the less they deserve, the more merit is in your bounty. Take them in. 1520

POLON. Come, sirs.

HAML. Follow him, friends. We'll hear a play tomorrow. [Exit POLONIUS, followed by the players; HAMLET holds back the First Player.] Dost thou hear me, old friend? can you play The Murder of Gonzago? 1526

FIRST PLAY. Aye, my lord.

HAML. We'll ha't tomorrow night. You could, for a need, study a speech of some dozen or sixteen lines which I would set down and insert in't, could you not? 1531

FIRST PLAY. Aye, my lord.

HAML. Very well. Follow that lord; and look you mock him not. [Exit First Player.] [To ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.] My good friends, I'll leave you till night. You are welcome to Elsinore.

ROSENC. Good my lord— 1537

HAMLET waves them away.

HAML. Aye, so; God be wi' yel

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

Now I am alone.

O, what a rogue and peasant slave am I!
Is it not monstrous that this player here, 1540
But in a fiction, in a dream of passion,
Could force his soul so to his own conceit
That from her working all his visage wann'd,
Tears in his eyes, distraction in's aspect, 1544
A broken voice, and his whole function suiting
With forms to his conceit? And all for nothing!
For Hecuba!

What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba,
That he should weep for her? What would he do
Had he the motive and the cue for passion 1550
That I have! He would drown the stage with tears,
And cleave the general ear with horrid speech,
Make mad the guilty and appall the free,
Confound the ignorant, and amaze indeed
The very faculties of eyes and ears. 1555
Yet I—

A dull and muddy-mettled rascal, peak,
Like John-a-dreams, unpregnant of my cause,
And can say nothing! no, not for a king,
Upon whose property and most dear life 1560
A damn'd defeat was made! Am I a coward?
Who calls me villain? breaks my pate across?
Plucks off my beard and blows it in my face?
Tweaks me by the nose? gives me the lie i' the throat

As deep as to the lungs? Who does me this? 1565
Ha!—

Swounds, I should take it; for it cannot be
But I am pigeon-liver'd, and lack gall
To make oppression bitter—or ere this
I should have fatted all the region kites 1570
With this slave's offal! Bloody, bawdy villain!
Remorseless, treacherous, lecherous, kindless villain!
O, vengeance!—

Why, what an ass am I! This is most brave
That I, the son of a dear father murder'd, 1575

Prompted to my revenge by heaven and hell,
Must, like a whore, unpack my heart with words,
And fall a-cursing like a very drab,
A scullion!—Fie upon't! Foh!

About, my brain!—H'm—I have heard 1580

That guilty creatures sitting at a play
Have by the very cunning of the scene
Been struck so to the soul that presently
They have proclaim'd their malefactions; 1584

For murder, though it have no tongue, will speak
With most miraculous organ. I'll have these players
Play something like the murder of my father
Before mine uncle. I'll observe his looks.

I'll tent him to the quick. If he but blench 1589

I know my course! The spirit that I have seen
May be the devil: and the devil hath power
To assume a pleasing shape; yea, and perhaps
Out of my weakness, and my melancholy—

As he is very potent with such spirits—

Abuses me to damn me. I'll have grounds 1595

More relative than this. The play's the thing
Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the king.

[Exit.]

ACT III

SCENE I:—The following day. A room in the castle.

Enter KING, QUEEN, POLONIUS, OPHELIA, ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

KING. And can you by no drift of circumstance
Get from him why he puts on this confusion,
Grating so harshly all his days of quiet 1600
With turbulent and dangerous lunacy?

ROSENC. He does confess he feels himself distracted;

But from what cause he will by no means speak.

GUILDEN. Nor do we find him forward to be sounded;

But, with a crafty madness, keeps aloof 1605
When we would bring him on to some confession
Of his true state.

QUEEN. Did he receive you well?

ROSENC. Most like a gentleman.

GUILDEN. But with much forcing of his disposition. 1609

ROSENC. Niggard of question, but of our demands
Most free in his reply.

QUEEN. Did you assay him
To any pastime?

ROSENC. Madam, it so fell out that certain players
We o'er-raught on the way; of these we told him,

And there did seem in him a kind of joy 1615
To hear of it. They are about the court,
And, as I think, they have already order
This night to play before him.

POLON. 'Tis most true;
And he beseech'd me to entreat your majesties
To hear and see the matter. 1620

KING. With all my heart; and it doth much content me

To hear him so inclin'd.
Good gentlemen, give him a further edge,
And drive his purpose on to these delights. 1624

ROSENC. We shall, my lord.

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

KING. Sweet Gertrude, leave us too;
For we have closely sent for Hamlet hither,
That he, as 'twere by accident, may here
Affront Ophelia.

Her father and myself, lawful espials,
Will so bestow ourselves that, seeing, unseen, 1630
We may of their encounter frankly judge,
And gather by him, as he is behav'd,
If't be the affliction of his love or no
That thus he suffers for.

QUEEN. I shall obey you.—
And for your part, Ophelia, I do wish 1635
That your good beauties be the happy cause
Of Hamlet's wildness; so shall I hope your virtues
Will bring him to his wonted way again,
To both your honors.

OPHEL. Madam, I wish it may.

[Exit QUEEN.]

POLON. Ophelia, walk you here.—Gracious, so please you, 1640

We will bestow ourselves. [Hands OPHELIA a prayer-book.] Read on this book,

That show of such an exercise may color
Your loneliness.—We are oft to blame in this,
'Tis too much prov'd, that with devotion's visage
And pious action we do sugar o'er 1645
The devil himself.

KING [aside]. O, 'tis too true!
How smart a lash that speech doth give my conscience!

The harlot's cheek, beautied with plastering art,
Is not more ugly to the thing that helps it
Than is my deed to my most painted word. 1650
O heavy burden!

POLON. I hear him coming; let's withdraw, my
lord.

[Exeunt KING and POLONIUS to the gallery above.]

Enter HAMLET.

HAML. To be, or not to be; that is the question:
Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
The slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,
Or to take arms against a sea of troubles, 1656
And, by opposing, end them.—To die, to sleep;
No more: and, by a sleep, to say we end
The heart-ache and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to—'tis a consummation 1660
Devoutly to be wish'd!—To die, to sleep.
To sleep? perchance to dream! Aye, there's the rub!
For in that sleep of death what dreams may come,
When we have shuffled off this mortal coil,
Must give us pause. There's the respect 1665
That makes calamity of so long life!
For who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's con-
tumely,

The pangs of dispriz'd love, the law's delay,
The insolence of office, and the spurns 1670
That patient merit of the unworthy takes,
When he himself might his quietus make
With a bare bodkin? Who would fardels bear,
To grunt and sweat under a weary life,
But that the dread of something after death, 1675
The undiscover'd country, from whose bourn
No traveler returns, puzzles the will,
And makes us rather bear those ills we have Than fly to others that we know not of?
Thus conscience does make cowards of us all.
And thus the native hue of resolution 1681
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought,
And enterprises of great pith and moment,
With this regard, their currents turn awry,
And lose the name of action.—Soft you now!
The fair Ophelia? Nymph, in thy orisons 1686
Be all my sins remember'd.

OPHEL. [in wounded voice]. Good my lord,
How does your honor for this many a day?

HAML. I humbly thank you, well, well, well.

OPHEL. My lord, I have remembrances of yours
That I have longed long to re-deliver;
I pray you, now receive them. 1691

She holds out the jewels.

HAML. No, not I!

I never gave you aught.

OPHEL. My honor'd lord, you know right well you did;

And, with them, words of so sweet breath compos'd
As made the things more rich. Their perfume lost,
Take these again; for to the noble mind 1697

Rich gifts wax poor when givers prove unkind.—
There, my lord.

Holding the jewels at arm's length, she looks at him reproachfully. POLONIUS, in his eagerness to see, stirs the curtain of the gallery, and HAMLET, out of the corner of his eye, spies the eavesdroppers.

HAML. [aside]. Hal Hal!—Are you honest?

OPHEL. My lord! 1701

HAML. Are you fair?

OPHEL. What means your lordship?

HAML. That if you be honest and fair, your honesty should admit no discourse to your beauty.

OPHEL. Could beauty, my lord, have better commerce than with honesty? 1707

HAML. Aye, truly; for the power of beauty will sooner transform honesty from what it is to a bawd than the force of honesty can translate beauty into his likeness. This was sometime a paradox, but now the time gives it proof.—I did love you once. 1713

OPHEL. Indeed, my lord, you made me believe so.

HAML. You should not have believed me! for virtue cannot so inoculate our old stock but we shall relish of it. I loved you not.

OPHEL. I was the more deceived! 1718

HAML. Get thee to a nunnery. Why wouldst thou be a breeder of sinners? I am myself indifferent honest, but yet I could accuse me of such things that it were better my mother had not borne me. I am very proud, revengeful, ambitious; with more offenses at my beck than I have thoughts to put them in, imagination to give them shape, or time to act them in. What should such fellows as I do crawling between heaven and earth? We are arrant knaves, all. Believe none of us. Go thy ways to a nunnery.—Where's your father? 1729

OPHEL. At home, my lord.

HAML. Let the doors be shut upon him, that he may play the fool no where but in's own house. Farewell. [Starts away.]

OPHEL. O! help him, you sweet heavens!

HAML. [returning]. If thou dost marry, I'll give thee this plague for thy dowry: Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny. Get thee to a nunnery, go! Farewell. [Starts away. Returning.] Or, if thou wilt needs marry, marry a fool; for wise men know well enough what monsters you make of them. To a nunnery, go; and quickly too! Farewell. [Starts away.] 1743

OPHEL. O heavenly powers, restore him!

HAML. [returning]. I have heard of your paintings, too. Well enough; God hath given you one face, and you make yourselves another. You jig, you amble, and you lisp, and nickname God's creatures, and make your wantonness your ignorance. Go to! I'll no more on't! it hath made me mad! I say, we will have no more marriages. Those that are married already [Draws his sword half out]—all but one—shall live [Drives his sword back into the scabbard]; the rest shall keep as they are. To a nunnery, go! [Exit.]

OPHEL. O, what a noble mind is here o'erthrown! The courtier's, soldier's, scholar's, eye, tongue, sword; 1757

The expectancy and rose of the fair state,
The glass of fashion, and the mold of form,
The observ'd of all observers, quite, quite down!
And I, of ladies most deject and wretched,
That suck'd the honey of his music vows,
Now see that noble and most sovereign reason,
Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh;
That unmatch'd form and feature of blown youth
Blasted with ecstasy. O! woe is me
To have seen what I have seen, see what I see!

Re-enter below KING and POLONIUS.

KING. Love! his affections do not that way tend!
Nor what he spake, though it lack'd form a little,
Was not like madness. There's something in his soul 1770

O'er which his melancholy sits on brood;
And I do doubt the hatch and the disclose
Will be some danger. Which for to prevent,
I have in quick determination
Thus set it down: he shall with speed to England,
For the demand of our neglected tribute.
Haply the seas, and countries different,
With variable objects, shall expel 1778
This something-settled matter in his heart,
Whereon his brains still beating puts him thus
From fashion of himself. What think you on't?

POLON. It shall do well; but yet do I believe
The origin and commencement of his grief
Sprung from neglected love.—How now, Ophelia!
You need not tell us what Lord Hamlet said;
We heard it all.—My lord, do as you please;
But, if you hold it fit, after the play 1787
Let his queen-mother all alone entreat him
To show his griefs: let her be round with him;
And I'll be plac'd, so please you, in the ear
Of all their conference. If she find him not, 1791
To England send him, or confine him where Your wisdom best shall think.

KING. It shall be so.
Madness in great ones must not unwatch'd go.
[Exeunt.]

SCENE II:—The night of the same day. A hall in the castle.

Enter HAMLET, and three of the players (dressed as PLAYER-KING, PLAYER-QUEEN, and LUCIANUS). HAMLET holds in his hand the manuscript of the scene he had written.

HAML. Speak the speech, I pray you, as I pronounced it to you, trippingly on the tongue; but if you mouth it, as many of your players do, I had as lief the town-crier spoke my lines. Nor do not saw the air too much with your hand, thus; but use all gently: for in the very torrent, tempest, and, as I may say, whirlwind of passion, you must acquire and beget a temperance that may give it smoothness. O! it offends me to the soul to hear a robustious periwig-pated fellow tear a passion to tatters, to very rags, to split the ears of the groundlings, who for the most part are capable of nothing but inexplicable dumb shows and noise. I would have such a fellow whipped for o'er-doing Termagant. It out-herods Herod. Pray you, avoid it.

FIRST PLAY. I warrant your honor. 1810

HAML. Be not too tame neither; but let your own discretion be your tutor. Suit the action to the word, the word to the action; with this special observance, that you o'erstep not the modesty of nature; for anything so overdone is from the purpose of playing, whose end, both at the first and now, was and is, to hold, as 'twere, the mirror up to nature, to show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form and pressure. Now, this overdone, or come tardy off, though it make the unskillful laugh, cannot but make the judicious grieve; the censure of which one must in your allowance o'erweigh a whole theater of others. O! there be players that I have seen play—and heard others praise, and that highly—not to speak it profanely, that, neither having the accent of Christians, nor the gait of Christian, pagan, nor man, have so strutted, and bellowed, that I have thought some of nature's journeymen had made men, and not made them well, they imitated humanity so abominably.

FIRST PLAY. I hope we have reformed that indifferently with us. 1833

HAML. O, reform it altogether! And let those that play your clowns speak no more than is set down for them; for there be of them that will themselves laugh to set on some quantity of barren spectators to laugh too, though in the mean time some necessary question of the play be then to be considered. That's villainous, and shows a most pitiful ambition in the fool that uses it. Go, make you ready.

[Exeunt Players.]

Enter POLONIUS, ROSENCRANTZ, and GUILDENSTERN.

How now, my lord? will the king hear this piece of work? 1843

POLON. And the queen too, and that presently.

HAML. Bid the players make haste.

[Exit POLONIUS.]

Will you two help to hasten them? 1846

ROSENC. } We will, my lord.
GUILDEN. }

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

HAML. What, ho! Horatio!

Enter HORATIO.

HORAT. Here, sweet lord, at your service.

HAML. Horatio, thou art e'en as just a man
As e'er my conversation cop'd withal. 1851

HORAT. O! my dear lord.

HAML. Nay, do not think I flatter;
For what advancement may I hope from thee,
That no revenue hast but thy good spirits
To feed and clothe thee? Why should the poor be flatter'd? 1855

No; let the candied tongue lick absurd pomp,
And crook the pregnant hinges of the knee
Where thrift may follow fawning. Dost thou hear?
Since my dear soul was mistress of her choice
And could of men distinguish, her election 1860
Hath seal'd thee for herself; for thou hast been
As one, in suffering all, that suffers nothing;
A man that fortune's buffets and rewards
Hath ta'en with equal thanks; and bless'd are those Whose blood and judgment are so well co-mingled
That they are not a pipe for Fortune's finger 1866
To sound what stop she please. Give me that man
That is not passion's slave, and I will wear him
In my heart's core, ay, in my heart of heart,
As I do thee.—Something too much of this.

There is a play tonight before the king. 1871

One scene of it comes near the circumstance
Which I have told thee of my father's death.
I prithee, when thou seest that act afoot,
Even with the very comment of thy soul 1875
Observe mine uncle! If his occulted guilt
Do not itself unkennel in one speech,
It is a damned ghost that we have seen,
And my imaginations are as foul

As Vulcan's stithy. Give him heedful note! 1880
 For I mine eyes will rivet to his face;
 And after we will both our judgments join
 In censure of his seeming.

HORAT. Well, my lord,
 If he steal aught the whilst this play is playing,
 And 'scape detecting, I will pay the theft. 1885

HAML. They are coming to the play; I must be idle.

Get you a place.

Danish march playing. Enter attendants carrying torches. To a flourish of trumpets, enter KING, QUEEN, POLONIUS, OPHELIA, ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, LORDS and LADIES of the Court. The KING and QUEEN take their places in state on an elevated dais; the others group themselves on either side of the dais, the ladies seated on low stools, the gentlemen reclining at the feet of the ladies.

KING. How fares our cousin Hamlet?

HAML. Excellent, i' faith, of the chameleon's dish: I eat the air, promise-crammed. You cannot feed capons so! 1891

KING. I have nothing with this answer, Hamlet; these words are not mine.

HAML. No, nor mine now. [Turning to POLONIUS.] My lord, you played once i' the university, you say? 1896

POLON. That did I, my lord, and was accounted a good actor.

HAML. And what did you enact?

POLON. I did enact Julius Cæsar. I was killed i' the Capitol. Brutus killed me. 1901

HAML. It was a brute part of him to kill so capital a calf there. [To ROSENCRANTZ.] Be the players ready?

ROSENC. Aye, my lord; they stay upon your patience.

QUEEN. Come hither, my dear Hamlet, sit by me.

HAML. No, good mother, here's metal more attractive. 1909

Walks over to where OPHELIA is seated.

POLON. [to the KING]. O ho! do you mark that?

HAML. Lady, shall I lie in your lap?

OPHEL. No, my lord!

HAML. I mean, my head upon your lap?

Sits at her feet, and rests his head upon her lap in such a way that he can look directly at the royal pair.

OPHEL. Aye, my lord. You are merry, my lord.

HAML. Who, I? 1915

OPHEL. Aye, my lord.

HAML. O God, your only jig-maker! What should a man do but be merry? for, look you [Points with his finger at the QUEEN] how cheerfully my mother looks, and my father died within 's two hours! 1921

OPHEL. Nay, 'tis twice two months, my lord.

HAML. So long! Nay, then, let the Devil wear black, for I'll have a suit of—sables. O heavens! die two months ago, and not forgotten yet! Then there's hope a great man's memory may outlive his life half a year—but, by 'r lady, he must build churches then, or else shall he suffer not thinking on, with the hobby-horse, whose epitaph is [sings]

For, O! for, O! the hobby-horse is forgot. 1930

Trumpets sound for the Dumb Show. Hautboys play softly while the Dumb Show is being presented.

Enter a KING and a QUEEN, very lovingly; the QUEEN embracing him. She kneels, and makes show of protestation unto him. He takes her up, and declines his head upon her neck; lays him down upon a bank of flowers. She, seeing him asleep, leaves him. Anon comes in a fellow, takes off his crown, kisses it, and pours poison in the KING's ears, and exit. The QUEEN returns, finds the KING dead, and makes passionate action. The Poisoner, with some two or three Mutes, comes in again, seeming to lament with her. The dead body is carried away. The Poisoner woos the QUEEN with gifts. She seems loath and unwilling awhile, but in the end accepts his love.

[Exeunt; the music ceases.]

OPHEL. What means this, my lord?

HAML. Marry, this is miching mallecho; it means mischief.

OPHEL. Belike this show imports the argument of the play? 1935

Enter a PLAYER as PROLOGUE.

HAML. We shall know by this fellow. The players cannot keep counsel; they'll tell all.

OPHEL. Will he tell us what this show meant?

HAML. Aye, or any show that you'll show him.

PRO. For us and for our tragedy, 1940

Here stooping to your clemency,

We beg your hearing patiently.

[Bows, and goes out.]

HAML. Is this a prologue, or the posy of a ring?

OPHEL. 'Tis brief, my lord.

HAML. As woman's love! 1945

Enter two PLAYERS, KING and QUEEN, very lovingly, the QUEEN embracing him.

P. KING. Full thirty times hath Phœbus' cart gone round

Neptune's salt wash and Tellus' orb'd ground,
And thirty dozen moons with borrow'd sheen
About the world have times twelve thirties been,
Since love our hearts and Hymen did our hands
Unite commutual in most sacred bands. 1951

P. QUEEN. So many journeys may the sun and moon

Make us again count o'er ere love be done!
But, woe is me! you are so sick of late,
So far from cheer and from your former state,
That I distrust you. Yet, though I distrust, 1956
Discomfort you, my lord, it nothing must;
For women's fear and love holds quantity—
In neither aught, or in extremity.

Now, what my love is, proof hath made you know;
And as my love is siz'd, my fear is so. 1961

Where love is great, the littlest doubts are fear;
Where little fears grow great, great love grows there.

P. KING. Faith, I must leave thee, love, and shortly too;

My operant powers their functions leave to do:
And thou shalt live in this fair world behind,
Honor'd, belov'd; and, happy, one as kind 1967
For husband shalt thou—

P. QUEEN. O, confound the rest!
Such love must needs be treason in my breast.
In second husband let me be accus'd! 1970
None wed the second but who kill'd the first.

HAML. [aside]. Wormwood, wormwood!

P. QUEEN. The instances that second marriage move

Are base respects of thrift but none of love.
A second time I kill my husband dead, 1975
When second husband kisses me in bed!

P. KING. I do believe you think what now you speak;

But what we do determine oft we break.
Purpose is but the slave to memory,
Of violent birth, but poor validity; 1980
Which now, like fruit unripe, sticks on the tree,
But fall unshaken when they mellow be.

Most necessary 'tis that we forget
To pay ourselves what to ourselves is debt:
What to ourselves in passion we propose, 1985
The passion ending, doth the purpose lose.

*The violence of either grief or joy
Their own enactures with themselves destroy;
Where joy most revels grief doth most lament;
Grief joys, joy grieves, on slender accident. 1990
This world is not for aye, nor 'tis not strange
That even our loves should with our fortunes change;*

For 'tis a question left us yet to prove
Wher love lead fortune or else fortune love.
The great man down, you mark his favorites flies;
The poor advanc'd makes friends of enemies. 1996
And hitherto doth love on fortune tend,
For who not needs shall never lack a friend;
And who in want a hollow friend doth try
Directly seasons him his enemy. 2000

But—orderly to end where I begun—
Our wills and fates do so contrary run
That our devices still are overthrown;
Our thoughts are ours, their ends none of our own.
So think thou wilt no second husband wed; 2005
But die thy thoughts when thy first lord is dead.

P. QUEEN. Nor earth to me give food, nor heaven light!

Sport and repose lock from me day and night!
To desperation turn my trust and hope!
An anchor's cheer in prison be my scope! 2010
Each opposite that blanks the face of joy
Meet what I would have well and it destroy!
Both here and hence pursue me lasting strife!
If, once a widow, ever I be wife.

HAML. If she should break it now! 2015

P. KING. 'Tis deeply sworn! Sweet, leave me here awhile;

My spirits grow dull, and fain I would beguile
The tedious day with sleep. [Lies down.]

P. QUEEN. Sleep rock thy brain;
And never come mischance between us twain!

[Exit.]

HAML. Madam, how like you this play? 2020

QUEEN. The lady doth protest too much, methinks.

HAML. O, but she'll keep her word!

KING. Have you heard the argument? Is there no offense in't? 2025

HAML. No, no! They do but jest!—poison in jest.
No offense i' the world!

KING. What do you call the play?

HAML. "The Mouse-trap." Marry, how? Tropically. [The KING shows alarm.] This play is the image of a murder done in Vienna: Gonzago is the duke's name, his wife, Baptista. You shall see anon 'tis a knavish piece of work; but what of that? Your majesty, and we, that have free souls, it touches us not. Let the galled jade wince! our withers are unwrung. 2036

Enter PLAYER as LUCIANUS.

This is one Lucianus, nephew to the king.

OPHEL. You are as good as a chorus, my lord.

HAML. I could interpret between you and your love, if I could see the puppets dallying. 2040

OPHEL. You are keen, my lord, you are keen.

HAML. Begin, murderer! Pox, leave thy damnable faces, and begin! Come; the croaking raven doth bellow for revenge!

LUC. Thoughts black, hands apt, drugs fit, and time agreeing; 2045

*Confederate season, else no creature seeing.
Thou mixture rank, of midnight weeds collected,
With Hecate's ban thrice blasted, thrice infected,
Thy natural magic and dire property
On wholesome life usurp immediately.* 2050

Pours the poison into the Sleeper's ears.

HAML. He poisons him—i' the garden—for's estate. [The KING shows alarm.] His name's Gonzago!
The story is extant, and writ in very choice Italian. You shall see anon how the murderer gets the love of—Gonzago's wife. 2055

OPHEL. The king rises!

HAML. What! frightened with false fire?

QUEEN. How fares my lord?

POLON. Give o'er the play!

KING. Give me some light. Away! 2060

ALL. Lights! lights! lights!

[Exeunt all except HAMLET and HORATIO.]

HAML. [sings].

Why, let the stricken deer go weep,

The hart ungalld play;

For some must watch, while some must sleep:

So runs the world away. 2065

Would not this, sir [Waves the manuscript of the scene he had written], and a forest of feathers, if the rest of my fortunes turn Turk with me, with two Provincial roses on my razed shoes, get me a fellowship in a cry of players, sir? 2070

HORAT. Half a share.

HAML. A whole one, I. [Sings].

For thou dost know, O Damon dear,

This realm dismantled was

Of Jove himself; and now reigns here

A very, very—pajock. 2076

HORAT. You might have rimed.

HAML. O good Horatio! I'll take the ghost's word for a thousand pound! Didst perceive?

HORAT. Very well, my lord. 2080

HAML. Upon the talk of the poisoning?

HORAT. I did very well note him.

HAML. Ah, ha!—Come, some music! come, the recorders! [Sings].

For if the king like not the comedy,

Why then, belike—he likes it not, perdy.

Come, some music! 2087

Re-enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

GUILDEN. Good my lord, vouchsafe me a word with you.

HAML. Sir, a whole history! 2090

GUILDEN. The king, sir,—

HAML. Aye, sir, what of him?

GUILDEN. Is in his retirement marvelous distempered.

HAML. With drink, sir? 2095

GUILDEN. No, my lord, rather with choler.

HAML. Your wisdom should show itself more richer to signify this to his doctor; for, for me to put him to his purgation would perhaps plunge him into far more choler. 2100

GUILDEN. Good my lord, put your discourse into some frame, and start not so wildly from my affair.

HAML. I am tame, sir; pronounce.

GUILDEN. The queen your mother, in most great affliction of spirit, hath sent me to you— 2105

HAML. [shaking him by the hand]. You are welcome!

GUILDEN. Nay, good my lord, this courtesy is not of the right breed. If it shall please you to make me a wholesome answer, I will do your mother's commandment; if not, your pardon and my return shall be the end of my business. 2112

HAML. Sir, I cannot.

GUILDEN. What, my lord?

HAML. Make you a wholesome answer; my wit's diseased. But, sir, such answer as I can make, you shall command—or, rather, as you say, my mother.
Therefore no more, but to the matter. My mother,
you say,— 2119

ROSENC. Then, thus she says: your behavior hath struck her into amazement and admiration.

HAML. O wonderful son, that can so astonish a mother! But is there no sequel at the heels of this mother's admiration? Impart.

ROSENC. She desires to speak with you in her closet ere you go to bed. 2126

HAML. We shall obey, were she ten times our mother. Have you any further trade with us?

ROSENC. My lord, you once did love me.

HAML. So I do still, by these pickers and stealers.

ROSENC. Good my lord, what is your cause of distemper? You do surely bar the door upon your own liberty, if you deny your griefs to your friend.

HAML. Sir, I lack advancement. 2134

ROSENC. How can that be when you have the voice of the king himself for your succession in Denmark?

HAML. Aye, sir, but "While the grass grows"—the proverb is something musty.

Enter one with recorders.

O! the recorders: let me see one. [To ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.] To withdraw with you. [Takes them aside.] Why did you go about to recover the wind of me, as if you would drive me into a toil? 2144

GUILDEN. O! my lord, if my duty be too bold, my love is too unmannerly.

HAML. I do not well understand that. Will you play upon this pipe?

GUILDEN. My lord, I cannot.

HAML. I pray you! 2150

GUILDEN. Believe me, I cannot.

HAML. I do beseech you!

GUILDEN. I know no touch of it, my lord.

HAML. 'Tis as easy as lying. Govern these vanities with your finger and thumb, give it breath with your mouth, and it will discourse most eloquent music. Look you, these are the stops. 2157

GUILDEN. But these cannot I command to any utterance of harmony; I have not the skill.

HAML. Why, look you now, how unworthy a thing you make of me! You would play upon me; you would seem to know my stops; you would pluck out the heart of my mystery; you would sound me from my lowest note to the top of my compass. And there is much music, excellent voice, in this little organ, yet cannot you make it speak. 'Sblood! do you think I am easier to be played on than a pipe? Call me what instrument you will, though you can fret me, you cannot play upon me.— 2170

Enter POLONIUS.

God bless you, sir!

POLON. My lord, the queen would speak with you, and presently.

HAML. Do you see yonder cloud that's almost in shape of a camel? 2175

POLON. By the mass! and 'tis like a camel, indeed.

HAML. Methinks it is like a weasel.

POLON. It is backed like a weasel.

HAML. Or like a whale?

POLON. Very like a whale! 2180

HAML. Then I will come to my mother by and by. [Aside.] They fool me to the top of my bent. [Aloud.] I will come by and by.

POLON. I will say so.

HAML. "By and by" is easily said.—Leave me, friends. [Exeunt all but HAMLET.]

'Tis now the very witching time of night, 2187
When churchyards yawn, and hell itself breathes out

Contagion to this world. Now could I drink hot blood!

And do such bitter business as the day 2190
Would quake to look on!—Soft; now to my mother.

O heart, lose not thy nature! let not ever
The soul of Nero enter this firm bosom!
Let me be cruel, not unnatural;
I will speak daggers to her, but use none. 2195
My tongue and soul in this be hypocrites:
How in my words soever she be shent,
To give them seals never, my soul, consent! [Exit.]

SCENE III:—Later the same night. A room in the castle.

Enter KING, ROSENCRANTZ, and GUILDENSTERN.

KING. I like him not; nor stands it safe with us
To let his madness range. Therefore prepare you;
I your commission will forthwith dispatch, 2201
And he to England shall along with you.
The terms of our estate may not endure
Hazard so dangerous as doth hourly grow
Out of his lunacies.

GUILDEN. We will ourselves provide.
Most holy and religious fear it is 2206
To keep those many many bodies safe
That live and feed upon your majesty.

ROSENC. The single and peculiar life is bound
With all the strength and armor of the mind
To keep itself from noyance; but much more
That spirit upon whose weal depend and rest
The lives of many. The cease of majesty 2213
Dies not alone, but like a gulf doth draw
What's near it with it; it is a massy wheel,
Fix'd on the summit of the highest mount,
To whose huge spokes ten thousand lesser things
Are mortis'd and adjoined; which, when it falls,
Each small annexment, petty consequence,
Attends the boisterous ruin. Never alone 2220
Did the king sigh, but with a general groan.

KING. Arm you, I pray you, to this speedy voyage;

For we will fetters put upon this fear,
Which now goes too free-footed.

ROSENC. }

GUILDEN. }

We will haste us.

[Exit ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

Enter POLONIUS.

POLON. My lord, he's going to his mother's closet:
Behind the arras I'll convey myself 2226
To hear the process. I'll warrant she'll tax him home!

And, as you said—and wisely was it said—
'Tis meet that some more audience than a mother—
Since nature makes them partial—should o'erhear
The speech, of vantage. Fare you well, my liege.
I'll call upon you ere you go to bed 2232
And tell you what I know.

KING. Thanks, dear my lord.

[Exit POLONIUS.]

O, my offense is rank! it smells to heaven!
It hath the primal eldest curse upon't, 2235
A brother's murder!—Pray can I not:
Though inclination be as sharp as will,
My stronger guilt defeats my strong intent;
And, like a man to double business bound,
I stand in pause where I shall first begin, 2240
And both neglect.—What if this cursed hand
Were thicker than itself with brother's blood,
Is there not rain enough in the sweet heavens
To wash it white as snow? Whereto serves mercy
But to confront the visage of offense? 2245
And what's in prayer but this two-fold force,
To be forestalled ere we come to fall,
Or pardon'd, being down? Then, I'll look up;
My fault is past.—But, O! what form of prayer
Can serve my turn? "Forgive me my foul murder"? 2250

That cannot be, since I am still possess'd
Of those effects for which I did the murder,
My crown, mine own ambition, and my queen.
May one be pardon'd and retain the offense?
In the corrupted currents of this world 2255
Offense's gilded hand may shove by justice;
And oft 'tis seen the wicked prize itself
Buys out the law: but 'tis not so above;
There, is no shuffling; there, the action lies
In his true nature, and we ourselves compell'd 2260
Even to the teeth and forehead of our faults
To give in evidence.—What then? What rests?
Try what repentance can? What can it not?
Yet what can it, when one can not repent!—
O wretched state! O bosom black as death! 2265
O limed soul, that, struggling to be free,

Art more engaged! Help, angels!—Make assay;
Bow, stubborn knees! and heart with strings of steel

Be soft as sinews of the new-born babe!

All may be well. [Kneels.] 2270

Enter HAMLET, behind.

HAML. Now might I do it pat, now he is pray-
ing—

And now I'll do't. [Slowly draws his sword.] And so he goes to heaven;

And so am I reveng'd.—That would be scann'd:
A villain kills my father; and, for that,
I, his sole son, do this same villain send 2275
To heaven.—

Oh, this is hire and salary, not revenge!
He took my father grossly, full of bread, 2278

With all his crimes broad blown, as flush as May;
And how his audit stands, who knows save heaven?

But in our circumstance and course of thought
'Tis heavy with him. And am I, then, reveng'd,

To take him in the purging of his soul,
When he is fit and season'd for his passage?

No!— [Sheathes his sword.] 2285
Up, sword; and know thou a more horrid hent!

When he is drunk asleep, or in his rage,
Or in the incestuous pleasure of his bed,

At game a-swearing, or about some act
That has no relish of salvation in't, 2290

Then trip him, that his heels may kick at heaven,
And that his soul may be as damn'd and black

As hell, whereto it goes!—My mother stays.—
This physic but prolongs thy sickly days! [Exit.

KING. [rising]. My words fly up, my thoughts remain below: 2295

Words without thoughts never to heaven go.
[Exit.

SCENE IV:—A few moments later. The Queen's private apartment.

Enter QUEEN and POLONIUS.

POLON. He will come straight. Look you lay home to him.

Tell him his pranks have been too broad to bear
with;

And that your Grace hath screen'd and stood between 2299

Much heat and him. I'll silence me e'en here.

Pray you, be round with him!

HAML. [within]. Mother, mother, mother!

QUEEN. I'll warrant you;

Fear me not. Withdraw; I hear him coming.

POLONIUS hides behind the arras.

Enter HAMLET.

HAML. Now, mother, what's the matter?

QUEEN. Hamlet, thou hast thy father much offended. 2305

HAML. Mother, you have my father much offended.

QUEEN. Come, come! you answer with an idle tongue.

HAML. Go, go! you question with a wicked tongue.

QUEEN. Why, how now—Hamlet!

HAML. What's the matter now?

QUEEN. Have you forgot me?

HAML. No, by the rood, not so.
You are "the Queen," your husband's brother's wife, 2311

And—would it were not so!—you are my mother!

QUEEN. Nay then, I'll set those to you that can speak.

Starts toward the door. HAMLET seizes her, and forces her into a chair.

HAML. Come, come; and sit you down. You shall not budge!

She struggles.

You go not, till I set you up a glass 2315
Where you may see the inmost part of you.

QUEEN. What wilt thou do? Thou wilt not murder me? Help, help, ho!

POLON. [behind]. What, ho! Help! Help! Help!

HAML. [draws]. How now, a rat? Dead, for a ducat! dead!

Makes a pass through the arras.

POLON. [behind]. O, I am slain! 2320

QUEEN. O me! what hast thou done?

HAML. Nay, I know not.—Is it the king?

QUEEN. O! what a rash and bloody deed is this!

HAML. A bloody deed! almost as bad, good mother,

As kill a king and marry with his brother. 2325

QUEEN. As kill a king!

HAML. Aye, lady, 'twas my word.

Lifts up the arras and discovers POLONIUS.

Thou wretched, rash, intruding fool! Farewell!

I took thee for thy better. Take thy fortune;

Thou find'st to be too busy is some danger.—

Leave wringing of your hands! Peace! Sit you
down! 2330

He forces her again into the chair.

And let me wring your heart; for so I shall,
If it be made of penetrable stuff,
If damned custom have not brass'd it so
That it is proof and bulwark against sense.

QUEEN. What have I done, that thou dar'st wag thy tongue 2335

In noise so rude against me?

HAML. Such an act
That blurs the grace and blush of modesty!
Calls virtue hypocrite! takes off the rose
From the fair forehead of an innocent love
And sets a blister there! makes marriage vows
As false as dicers' oaths! O, such a deed 2341
As from the body of contraction plucks
The very soul, and sweet religion makes
A rhapsody of words! Heaven's face doth glow;
Yea, this solidity and compound mass, 2345
With tristful visage, as against the doom,
Is thought-sick at the act!

QUEEN. Ay me, what act,
That roars so loud and thunders in the index?

HAML. Look here, upon this picture, and on this,
He points to two portraits hanging on the wall.

The counterfeit presentment of two brothers.
See, what a grace was seated on this brow! 2351
Hyperion's curls, the front of Jove himself,
An eye like Mars, to threaten and command,
A station like the herald Mercury
New-lighted on a heaven-kissing hill: 2355
A combination and a form, indeed,
Where every god did seem to set his seal
To give the world assurance of a man.
This was your husband. Look you now, what follows.

Here is your husband, like a mildew'd ear 2360
Blasting his wholesome brother! Have you eyes?
Could you on this fair mountain leave to feed,
And batten on this moor? Ha! have you eyes?
You cannot call it love; for at your age
The hey-day in the blood is tame, it's humble,
And waits upon the judgment; and what judgment 2366

Would step from this to this? Sense, sure, you have,
Else could you not have motion; but, sure, that sense

Is apoplex'd: for madness would not err,
Nor sense to ecstasy was ne'er so thrall'd 2370
But it reserv'd some quantity of choice
To serve in such a difference! What devil was't
That thus hath cozen'd you at hoodman-blind?
Eyes without feeling, feeling without sight,
Ears without hands or eyes, smelling sans all, 2375

Or but a sickly part of one true sense
 Could not so mope.
 O shame! Where is thy blush? Rebellious hell,
 If thou canst mutine in a matron's bones,
 To flaming youth let virtue be as wax 2380
 And melt in her own fire!

QUEEN. O Hamlet, speak no more!
 Thou turn'st mine eyes into my very soul;
 And there I see such black and grained spots
 As will not leave their tinct.

O, speak to me no more!
 These words like daggers enter in mine ears.
 No more, sweet Hamlet!

HAML. A murderer! and a villain!
 A slave, that is not twentieth part the tithe 2387
 Of your precedent lord! A vice of kings!
 A cutpurse of the empire and the rule,
 That from a shelf the precious diadem stole,
 And put it in his pocket!—

QUEEN. No more! 2391

HAML. A king of shreds and patches!—

Enter GHOST.

Save me, and hover o'er me with your wings,
 You heavenly guards!—What would your gracious figure?

QUEEN. Alas, he's mad! 2395

HAML. Do you not come your tardy son to chide,
 That, laps'd in time and passion, lets go by
 The important acting of your dread command?
 O, say!

GHOST. Do not forget! This visitation 2399
 Is but to whet thy almost blunted purpose.—
 But, look; amazement on thy mother sits.
 O, step between her and her fighting soul.
 Conceit in weakest bodies strongest works.
 Speak to her, Hamlet.

HAML. How is it with you, lady?

QUEEN. Alas, how is't with you, 2405
 That you do bend your eye on vacancy,
 And with the incorporal air do hold discourse?
 Forth at your eyes your spirits wildly peep;
 And, as the sleeping soldiers in the alarm,
 Your bedded hair, like life in excrements, 2410
 Starts up and stands an end. O, gentle son,
 Upon the heat and flame of thy distemper
 Sprinkle cool patience.—Whereon do you look?

HAML. On him! on him! Look you, how pale he glares! 2414
 His form and cause conjoin'd, preaching to stones,
 Would make them capable. [To the GHOST.] Do not look upon me;
 Lest with this piteous action you convert

My stern effects; then what I have to do 2418
 Will want true color; tears perchance for blood.

QUEEN. To whom do you speak this?

HAML. Do you see nothing there?

QUEEN. Nothing at all; yet all that is I see.

HAML. Nor did you nothing hear?

QUEEN. No; nothing but ourselves.

HAML. Why, look you! there! Look, how it steals away!

My father, in his habit as he liv'd! 2424
 Look! where he goes, even now, out at the portal.

[Exit GHOST.]

QUEEN. This is the very coinage of your brain.
 This bodiless creation ecstasy
 Is very cunning in.

HAML. Ecstasy! 2429

My pulse, as yours, doth temperately keep time,
 And makes as healthful music. It is not madness
 That I have utter'd. Bring me to the test,
 And I the matter will re-word which madness
 Would gambol from. Mother, for love of grace
 Lay not that flattering unction to your soul, 2435
 That not your trespass but my madness speaks;
 It will but skin and film the ulcerous place,
 Whiles rank corruption, mining all within,
 Infects unseen. Confess yourself to heaven;
 Repent what's past, avoid what is to come; 2440
 And do not spread the compost on the weeds
 To make them ranker. Forgive me this my virtue;
 For in the fatness of these pursy times
 Virtue itself of vice must pardon beg, 2444
 Yea, curb and woo for leave to do him good.

QUEEN [burying her face in her hands]. O Hamlet! thou has cleft my heart in twain!

HAML. O, throw away the worse part of it,
 And live the purer with the other half.

He stands looking down at her as she sits weeping.

Good-night. But go not to mine uncle's bed;
 Assume a virtue, if you have it not. 2450
 That monster, custom, who all sense doth eat,
 Of habits devil, is angel yet in this,
 That to the use of actions fair and good
 He likewise gives a frock or livery
 That aptly is put on. Refrain tonight; 2455
 And that shall lend a kind of easiness
 To the next abstinence; the next more easy:
 For use almost can change the stamp of nature,
 And either [master] the devil or throw him out
 With wondrous potency.—Once more, good-night.
 And when you are desirous to be bless'd, 2461
 I'll blessing beg of you. For this same lord,
 I do repent: but heaven hath pleas'd it so,

To punish me with this, and this with me,
That I must be their scourge and minister. 2465
I will bestow him, and will answer well
The death I gave him.—So, again, good-night.
[Aside.] I must be cruel only to be kind;
Thus bad begins, and worse remains behind.
[Aloud.] One word more, good lady.

QUEEN [looking up]. What shall I do?

HAML. Not this, by no means, that I bid you do:
Let the bloat king tempt you again to bed:
Make you to ravel all this matter out,
That I essentially am not in madness, 2474
But mad in craft. 'Twere good you let him know.
For who that's but a queen, fair, sober, wise,
Would from a paddock, from a bat, a gib,
Such dear concernings hide? who would do so?
No; in despite of sense and secrecy,
Unpeg the basket on the house's top, 2480
Let the birds fly; and, like the famous ape,
To try conclusions, in the basket creep,
And break your own neck down!

QUEEN. Be thou assur'd, if words be made of breath,
And breath of life, I have no life to breathe 2485
What thou hast said to me!

HAML. I must to England; you know that?

QUEEN. Alack!
I had forgot: 'tis so concluded on.

HAML. There's letters seal'd; and my two school-fellows—
Whom I will trust as I will adders fang'd— 2490
They bear the mandate. They must sweep my way,

And marshal me to knavery. Let it work!
For 'tis the sport to have the enginer
Hoist with his own petar: and it shall go hard
But I will delve one yard below their mines,
And blow them at the moon. O! 'tis most sweet,
When in one line two crafts directly meet. 2497

Looking at POLONIUS.

This man shall set me packing.
I'll lug the guts into the neighbor room.—
Mother, good-night.—Indeed this counselor
Is now most still, most secret, and most grave,
Who was in life a foolish prating knave. 2502

Seizing the body.

Come, sir, to draw toward an end with you.—
Good-night, mother!

[Exeunt severally; HAMLET dragging in the body of POLONIUS.

SCENE V:—A few moments later. A room in the castle.

Enter QUEEN to KING, ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

KING [to the QUEEN]. There's matter in these sighs, these profound heaves. 2505
You must translate; 'tis fit we understand them.
Where is your son?

QUEEN [to ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN]. Bestow this place on us a little while.

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.
Ah, my good lord, what have I seen tonight!

KING. What, Gertrude? How does Hamlet?

QUEEN. Mad as the sea and wind when both contend 2511

Which is the mightier! In his lawless fit,
Behind the arras hearing something stir,
Whips out his rapier, cries, "A rat! a rat!"
And, in this brainish apprehension, kills 2515
The unseen good old man.

KING. O heavy deed!—
It had been so with us had we been there!
His liberty is full of threats to all,
To you yourself, to us, to everyone. 2519
Alas! how shall this bloody deed be answered?
It will be laid to us, whose providence
Should have kept short, restrain'd, and out of haunt,

This mad young man. But so much was our love,
We would not understand what was most fit,
But, like the owner of a foul disease, 2525
To keep it from divulging, let it feed
Even on the pith of life. Where is he gone?

QUEEN. To draw apart the body he hath kill'd;
O'er whom his very madness, like some ore
Among a mineral of metals base, 2530
Shows itself pure: he weeps for what is done.

KING. O Gertrude, come away!
The sun no sooner shall the mountains touch
But we will ship him hence; and this vile deed
We must, with all our majesty and skill, 2535
Both countenance and excuse.—Ho! Guildenstern!

Re-enter ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.

Friends both, go join you with some further aid:
Hamlet in madness hath Polonius slain,
And from his mother's closet hath he dragg'd him.
Go seek him out; speak fair, and bring the body
Into the chapel. I pray you, haste in this. 2541

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.
Come, Gertrude; we'll call up our wisest friends,
And let them know both what we mean to do,

And what's untimely done: [so, haply, slander,]
 Whose whisper o'er the world's diameter, 2545
 As level as the cannon to his blank
 Transports his poison'd shot, may miss our name
 And hit the woundless air. O, come away!
 My soul is full of discord and dismay. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VI:—A few moments later. A hall in the castle.

Enter HAMLET.

HAML. Safely stowed. 2550

ROSENC. } [within]. Hamlet! Lord Hamlet!
 GUILDEN. }

HAML. What noise? Who calls on Hamlet?
 O, here they come.

Enter ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and Attendants.

ROSENC. What have you done, my lord, with the dead body? 2555

HAML. Compounded it with dust, whereto 'tis kin.

ROSENC. Tell us where 'tis, that we may take it thence
 And bear it to the chapel.

HAML. Do not believe it.

ROSENC. Believe what? 2560

HAML. That I can keep your counsel and not mine own. Besides, to be demanded of a sponge!
 what replication should be made by the son of a
 king? 2564

ROSENC. Take you me for a sponge, my lord?

HAML. Aye, sir, that soaks up the king's countenance, his rewards, his authorities. But such officers do the king best service in the end: he keeps them, like an ape, in the corner of his jaw; first mouthed, to be, last, swallowed: when he needs what you have gleaned, it is but squeezing you—and, sponge, you shall be dry again. 2572

ROSENC. I understand you not, my lord.

HAML. I am glad of it: "a knavish speech sleeps in a foolish ear." 2575

ROSENC. My lord, you must tell us where the body is, and go with us to the king.

HAML. The body is with the king, but the king is not with the body. The king is a thing—

GUILDEN. A thing, my lord! 2580

HAML. Of nothing. Bring me to him. Hide fox, and all after!

[Exit HAMLET running, ROSENCRANTZ, GUILD-
 ENSTERN and Attendants following.]

SCENE VII:—A few moments later. A room in the castle.

Enter KING, attended.

KING. I have sent to seek him, and to find the body.

How dangerous is it that this man goes loose!
 Yet must not we put the strong law on him: 2585
 He's lov'd of the distracted multitude,
 Who like not in their judgment, but their eyes;
 And where 'tis so, the offender's scourge is weigh'd,

But never the offense. To bear all smooth and even,

This sudden sending him away must seem 2590
 Deliberate pause. Diseases desperate grown
 By desperate appliance are reliev'd,
 Or not at all.

Enter ROSENCRANTZ.

How now! what hath befall'n?

ROSENC. Where the dead body is bestow'd, my
 lord, 2594

We cannot get from him.

KING. But where is he?

ROSENC. Without, my lord, guarded, to know your pleasure.

KING. Bring him before us.

ROSENC. Ho, Guildenstern! bring in my lord.

Enter GUILDENSTERN with HAMLET guarded.

KING. Now, Hamlet, where's Polonius?

HAML. At supper. 2600

KING. At supper! Where?

HAML. Not where he eats, but where he is eaten:
 a certain convocation of politic worms are e'en at him. Your worm is your only emperor for diet:
 we fat all creatures else to fat us, and we fat ourselves for maggots. Your fat king and your lean beggar is but variable service; two dishes, but to one table: that's the end. 2608

KING. Alas, alas!

HAML. A man may fish with the worm that hath eat of a king, and eat of the fish that hath fed of that worm.

KING. What dost thou mean by this?

HAML. Nothing, but to show you how a king may go a progress through the guts of a beggar.

KING. Where is Polonius? 2616

HAML. In heaven. Send thither to see; if your messenger find him not there, seek him i' the other place yourself. But, indeed, if you find him not within this month, you shall nose him as you go up the stairs into the lobby. 2621

KING [to some Attendants]. Go seek him there.

HAML. He will stay till you come!

[Exeunt Attendants.]

KING. Hamlet, this deed, for thine especial safety—

Which we do tender, as we dearly grieve 2625
For that which thou hast done—must send thee
hence

With fiery quickness. Therefore prepare thyself;
The bark is ready, and the wind at help,
The associates tend, and everything is bent 2629
For England.

HAML. For England?

KING. Aye, Hamlet.

HAML. Good!

KING. So is it, if thou knew'st our purposes.

HAML. I see a cherub that sees them! [To ROSEN-CRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.] But, come; for England! [To the KING.] Farewell, dear mother.

KING. Thy loving father, Hamlet. 2635

HAML. My mother: father and mother is man and wife, man and wife is one flesh, and so, my mother. [To ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]
Come; for England! [Exit.]

KING. Follow him at foot. Tempt him with speed aboard. 2640

Delay it not; I'll have him hence tonight.
Away; for everything is seal'd and done
That else leans on the affair. Pray you, make haste.

[Exeunt ROSENCRANTZ and GUILDENSTERN.]

And, England, if my love thou hold'st at aught—
As my great power thereof may give thee sense,
Since yet thy cicatric looks raw and red 2646

After the Danish sword, and thy free awe
Pays homage to us—thou mayst not coldly set
Our sovereign process; which imports at full,
By letters conjuring to that effect, 2650

The present death of Hamlet. Do it, England!
For like the hectic in my blood he rages,
And thou must cure me. Till I know 'tis done,
Howe'er my haps, my joys were ne'er begun.

[Exit.]

SCENE VIII:—Early the following morning. The highway leading from the port.

Enter FORTINBRAS, a Captain, and a troop of soldiers, with drums, marching.

FORTIN. Go, captain; from me greet the Danish
king; 2655
Tell him that, by his license, Fortinbras

Claims the conveyance of a promis'd march
Over his kingdom. You know the rendezvous.
If that his majesty would aught with us,
We shall express our duty in his eye; 2660
And let him know so.

CAP. I will do't, my lord.

FORTIN. [to the soldiers]. Go softly on.

As FORTINBRAS and his troop of soldiers march out, enter HAMLET, ROSENCRANTZ, GUILDENSTERN, and Attendants bearing luggage, on their way to the port. HAMLET stops the Captain.

HAML. Good sir, whose powers are these?

CAP. They are of Norway, sir.

HAML. How purpos'd, sir, I pray you? 2665

CAP. Against some part of Poland.

HAML. Who commands them, sir?

CAP. The nephew to old Norway, Fortinbras.

HAML. Goes it against the main of Poland, sir,
Or for some frontier? 2670

CAP. Truly to speak, and with no addition,
We go to gain a little patch of ground
That hath in it no profit but the name.
To pay five ducats, five, I would not farm it;
Nor will it yield to Norway or the Pole 2675
A ranker rate should it be sold in fee.

HAML. Why, then the Polack never will defend
it.

CAP. Yes, 'tis already garrison'd.

HAML. Two thousand souls and twenty thousand ducats

Will not debate the question of this straw! 2680
This is the imposthume of much wealth and peace,
That inward breaks, and shows no cause without
Why the man dies.—I humbly thank you, sir.

CAP. God be wi' you, sir. [Exit.]

ROSENC. Will't please you go, my lord?

HAML. I'll be with you straight. Go a little before. [Exeunt all except HAMLET.]

How all occasions do inform against me, 2686
And spur my dull revenge! What is a man,
If his chief good and market of his time
Be but to sleep and feed? a beast, no more.
Sure He that made us with such large discourse,
Looking before and after, gave us not 2691
That capability and god-like reason

To fust in us unus'd. Now, whe'r it be Bestial oblivion, or some craven scruple
Of thinking too precisely on the event— 2695
A thought which, quarter'd, hath but one part wisdom

And ever three parts coward—I do not know
Why yet I live to say "This thing's to do,"

Sith I have cause, and will, and strength, and means

To do't. Examples gross as earth exhort me. 2700
 Witness this army of such mass and charge
 Led by a delicate and tender prince,
 Whose spirit, with divine ambition puff'd,
 Makes mouths at the invisible event,
 Exposing what is mortal and unsure 2705
 To all that fortune, death, and danger dare—
 Even for an egg-shell! Rightly to be great
 Is not to stir without great argument,
 But greatly to find quarrel in a straw 2709
 When honor's at the stake. How stand I, then,
 That have a father kill'd, a mother stain'd,
 Excitements of my reason and my blood,
 And let all sleep? while, to my shame, I see
 The imminent death of twenty thousand men,
 That, for a fantasy and trick of fame, 2715
 Go to their graves like beds, fight for a plot
 Whereon the numbers cannot try to cause,
 Which is not tomb enough and continent
 To hide the slain! O, from this time forth,
 My thoughts be bloody, or be nothing worth!

[Exit.

ACT IV

SCENE I:—Several weeks later. A room in the castle.

Enter QUEEN, HORATIO, and a Gentleman.

QUEEN. I will not speak with her. 2721

GENT. She is importunate; indeed, distract.
 Her mood will needs be pitied.

QUEEN. What would she have?

GENT. She speaks much of her father; says she hears

There's tricks i' the world; and hems, and beats her heart; 2725

Spurns enviously at straws; speaks things in doubt,
 That carry but half sense. Her speech is nothing,
 Yet the unshaped use of it doth move

The hearers to collection; they aim at it, 2729
 And botch the words up fit to their own thoughts;
 Which, as her winks and nods and gestures yield
 them,

Indeed would make one think there might be thought,

Though nothing sure, yet much unhappily.

HORAT. 'Twere good she were spoken with, for she may strew

Dangerous conjectures in ill-breeding minds. 2735

QUEEN. Let her come in.

[Exeunt HORATIO and Gentleman.

To my sick soul—as sin's true nature is—
 Each toy seems prologue to some great amiss.
 So full of artless jealousy is guilt,
 It spills itself in fearing to be spilt. 2740

Re-enter HORATIO and Gentleman with OPHELIA, distracted, holding a lute, her hair down.

OPHEL. Where is the beauteous majesty of Denmark?

QUEEN. How now, Ophelia!

OPHEL. [Sings.]

*How should I your true love know
 From another one?*

*By his cockle hat and staff, 2745
 And his sandal shoon.*

QUEEN. Alas, sweet lady, what imports this song?

OPHEL. Say you? Nay, pray you, mark: [Sings.]

He is dead and gone, lady,

He is dead and gone; 2750

At his head a grass-green turf,

At his heels a stone.

O, hol

QUEEN. Nay, but, Ophelia,—

OPHEL. Pray you, mark: [Sings.] 2755

White his shroud as the mountain snow,

Enter KING.

QUEEN. [Aside to him.] Alas, look here, my lord!

OPHEL. *Larded with sweet flowers;
 Which bewept to the grave did not go
 With true-love showers. 2760*

KING. How do you, pretty lady?

OPHEL. Well, God 'ild you. They say the owl was a baker's daughter. Lord! we know what we are, but know not what we may be. God be at your table! 2765

KING. Conceit upon her father.

OPHEL. Pray you, let's have no words of this;
 but when they ask you what it means, say you this:

[Sings.] *Tomorrow is Saint Valentine's day,
 All in the morning betime,
 And I a maid at your window
 To be your Valentine. 2773*

KING. How long hath she been thus?

OPHEL. I hope all will be well. We must be patient:
 but I cannot choose but weep to think they should lay him i' the cold ground. My brother shall know of it. And so, I thank you for your good counsel.—Come; my coach!—Good-night, ladies.

Good-night, sweet ladies. Good-night! Good-night!
[Exit.

KING. Follow her close; give her good watch, I pray you. 2781

[Exeunt HORATIO and Gentleman.

O! this is the poison of deep grief; it springs
All from her father's death. O Gertrude, Gertrude!
When sorrows come, they come not single spies,
But in battalions. First, her father slain; 2785
Next, your son gone—and he most violent author
Of his own just remove; the people muddied, Thick, and unwholesome in their thoughts and whispers

For good Polonius' death—and we have done but greenly 2789

In hugger-mugger to inter him; poor Ophelia
Divided from herself and her fair judgment,
Without the which we are pictures, or mere beasts;
Last, and as much containing as all these,
Her brother is in secret come from France,
Feeds on his wonder, keeps himself in clouds,
And wants not buzzers to infect his ear 2796
With pestilent speeches of his father's death,
Wherein necessity, of matter beggar'd,
Will nothing stick our person to arraign
In ear and ear. O, my dear Gertrude, this, 2800
Like to a murdering-piece, in many places
Gives me superfluous death.

A noise within of shouts and clashing swords.

QUEEN. Alack! what noise is this?

KING. Where are my Switzers? Let them guard the door!

Enter a Gentleman in haste.

What is the matter?

GENT. Save yourself, my lord!
The ocean, overpeering of his list, 2806
Eats not the flats with more impetuous haste
Than young Laertes, in a riotous head,
O'erbears your officers. The rabble call him lord,
And, as the world were now but to begin, 2810
Antiquity forgot, custom not known,
The ratifiers and props of every word,
They cry, "Choose we; Laertes shall be king!"
Caps, hands, and tongues applaud it to the clouds,
"Laertes shall be king! Laertes king!" 2815

QUEEN. How cheerfully on the false trail they cry!

O, this is counter, you false Danish dogs!

Noise within of crashing doors.

KING. The doors are broke.

Enter LAERTES, with drawn sword, a mob of Danes at his back.

LAERT. Where is the king?—Sirs, stand you all without.

DANES. No, let's come in!

LAERT. I pray you, give me leave.

DANES. We will! we will! 2821

LAERT. I thank you. Keep the door.

The mob retires. LAERTES, brandishing his sword, confronts the KING.

O thou vile king!

Give me my father!

QUEEN. Calmly, good Laertes.

LAERT. That drop of blood that's calm proclaims me bastard!

The QUEEN throws her arms about LAERTES, and tries to hold him.

KING. What is the cause, Laertes,
That thy rebellion looks so giant-like?— 2825
Let him go, Gertrude; do not fear our person:
There's such divinity doth hedge a king,
That treason can but peep to what it would,
Acts little of his will.—Tell me, Laertes,
Why thou art thus incens'd.—Let him go, Gertrude.— 2830

Speak, man.

LAERT. Where's my father?

KING. Dead.

QUEEN. But not by him.

KING. Let him demand his fill.

LAERT. How came he dead? I'll not be juggled
with!

To hell, allegiance! vows, to the blackest devil!
Conscience and grace, to the profoundest pit! 2836
I dare damnation! To this point I stand,
That both the worlds I give to negligence!
Let come what comes, only I'll be reveng'd,
Most thoroughly, for my father!

KING. Who shall stay you?

LAERT. My will, not all the world! 2841

And for my means, I'll husband them so well
They shall go far with little.

KING. Good Laertes,

If you desire to know the certainty
Of your dear father's death, is't writ in your revenge 2845

That, swoopstake, you will draw both friend and foe,

Winner and loser?

LAERT. None but his enemies.

KING. Will you know them then?

LAERT. To his good friends thus wide I'll ope my arms,

And, like the kind life-rendering pelican, 2850
Repast them with my blood.

KING. Why, now you speak
Like a good child and a true gentleman.
That I am guiltless of your father's death,
And am most sensibly in grief for it,
It shall as level to your judgment pierce 2855
As day does to your eye.

DANES [within]. Let her come in.

LAERT. How now! what noise is that?

Re-enter OPHELIA, as before.

O heat, dry up my brains! Tears seven times salt
Burn out the sense and virtue of mine eye! 2859
By heaven, thy madness shall be paid by weight,
Till our scale turn the beam! O rose of May!
Dear maid, kind sister, sweet Ophelia!—
O heavens! is't possible a young maid's wits
Should be as mortal as an old man's life?
Nature is fine in love, and where 'tis fine 2865
It sends some precious instance of itself
After the thing it loves.

OPHEL. [sings].

*They bore him barefac'd on the bier;
Hey non nonny, nonny, hey nonny;
And in his grave rain'd many a tear.*

Fare you well, my dove! 2871

LAERT. Hadst thou thy wits, and didst persuade revenge,
It could not move thus.

OPHEL. You must sing, "A-down a-down!" and you, "Call him a-down-a!" O how the wheel becomes it! It is the false steward that stole his master's daughter. 2877

LAERT. This nothing's more than matter.

OPHEL. [to LAERTES]. There's rosemary; that's for remembrance: pray, love, remember. And there is pansies; that's for thoughts.

LAERT. A document in madness—"thoughts" and "remembrance" fitted. 2883

OPHEL. [to the KING]. There's fennel for you; and columbines. [To the QUEEN]. There's rue for you; and here's some for me; we may call it herb of grace o' Sundays.—O! you must wear your rue with a difference. There's a daisy. I would give you some violets, but they withered all when my father died. They say he made a good end. [Sings].

For bonny sweet Robin is all my joy.

LAERT. Thought and affliction, passion, hell itself,
She turns to favor and to prettiness. 2893

OPHEL. [sings].

And will he not come again?

And will he not come again?

No, no, he is dead!

Go to thy death-bed,

He never will come again!

His beard was as white as snow,

All flaxen was his poll; 2900

He is gone, he is gone,

And we cast away moan:

God ha' mercy on his soul!

And of all Christian souls, I pray God. God be wi-ye! [Exit.]

LAERT. Do you see this, O God? 2905

KING. Laertes, I must commune with your grief,
Or you deny me right. Go but apart,
Make choice of whom your wisest friends you
will,

And they shall hear and judge 'twixt you and me.
If by direct or by collateral hand 2910

They find us touch'd, we will our kingdom give,
Our crown, our life, and all that we call ours,
To you in satisfaction; but if not,
Be you content to lend your patience to us,
And we shall jointly labor with your soul 2915
To give it due content.

LAERT. Let this be so.

His means of death, his obscure burial,
No trophy, sword, nor hatchment o'er his bones,
No noble rite nor formal ostentation, 2919
Cry to be heard, as 'twere from heaven to earth,
That I must call 't in question.

KING. So you shall;

And where the offense is let the great ax fall!
I pray you go with me. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II:—Later the same day. A room in the castle.

Enter HORATIO and a Servant.

HORAT. What are they that would speak with me?

SERV. Sailors, sir. They say they have letters for
you. 2925

HORAT. Let them come in. [Exit Servant.]

I do not know from what part of the world
I should be greeted, if not from Lord Hamlet.

Enter Sailors.

FIRST SAIL. God bless you, sir.

HORAT. Let him bless thee too. 2930

FIRST SAIL. He shall, sir, an't please him. There's a letter for you, sir; it comes from the ambassador that was bound for England—if your name be Horatio, as I am let to know it is.

HORAT. [opens the letter, and reads].

Horatio, 2935

When thou shalt have overlooked this, give these fellows some means to the king; they have letters for him. Ere we were two days old at sea, a pirate of very warlike appointment gave us chase. Finding ourselves too slow of sail, we put on a compelled valor, and in the grapple I boarded them; on the instant they got clear of our ship, so I alone became their prisoner. They have dealt with me like thieves of mercy; but they knew what they did—I am to do a good turn for them. Let the king have the letters I have sent; and repair thou to me with as much haste as thou wouldst fly death. I have words to speak in thine ear will make thee dumb; yet are they much too light for the bore of the matter. These good fellows will bring thee where I am. Rosencrantz and Guildenstern hold their course for England: of them I have much to tell thee. Farewell. 2953

He that thou knowest thine,

Hamlet.

Come; I will give you way for these your letters, And do't the speedier that you may direct me To him from whom you brought them. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III:—Later the same day. A room in the castle.

Enter KING and LAERTES.

KING. Now must your conscience my acquittance seal, 2959

And you must put me in your heart for friend, Sith you have heard, and with a knowing ear, That he which hath your noble father slain Pursu'd my life.

LAERT. It well appears. But tell me Why you proceeded not against these feats So crimeful and so capital in nature, 2965 As by your safety, wisdom, all things else, You mainly were stirr'd up.

KING. O, for two special reasons; Which may to you, perhaps, seem much unsinew'd, And yet to me they are strong. The queen his mother

Lives almost by his looks; and for myself— 2970 My virtue or my plague, be it either which— She's so conjunctive to my life and soul,

That, as the star moves not but in his sphere, I could not but by her. The other motive Why to a public count I might not go 2975 Is the great love the general gender bear him; Who, dipping all his faults in their affection, Would, like the spring that turneth wood to stone, Convert his gyves to graces; so that my arrows, Too slightly timber'd for so loud a wind, 2980 Would have reverted to my bow again, And not where I had aim'd them.

LAERT. And so have I a noble father lost, A sister driven into desperate terms, 2984 Whose worth—if praises may go back again— Stood challenger-on-mount of all the age For her perfections. But my revenge will come.

KING. Break not your sleeps for that! You must not think

That we are made of stuff so flat and dull 2989 That we can let our beard be shook with danger And think it pastime. You shortly shall hear more. I lov'd your father; and we love ourself, And that, I hope, will teach you to imagine—

Enter a Messenger.

How now! what news?

MESS. Letters, my lord, from Hamlet: This to your majesty; this to the queen. 2995

KING. From Hamlet! Who brought them?

MESS. Sailors, my lord, they say; I saw them not: They were given me by Claudio; he receiv'd them Of him that brought them.

KING. Laertes, you shall hear them.— Leave us. [Exit Messenger.]

High and Mighty: 3001

You shall know I am set naked on your kingdom. Tomorrow shall I beg leave to see your kingly eyes; when I shall, first asking your pardon thereunto, recount the occasions of my sudden and more strange return.

Hamlet.

What should this mean? Are all the rest come back? 3008

Or is it some abuse, and no such thing?

LAERT. Know you the hand?

KING. 'Tis Hamlet's character.—“Naked!” And in a postscript here, he says, “alone.” Can you advise me?

LAERT. I'm lost in it, my lord. But, let him come! It warms the very sickness in my heart That I shall live and tell him to his teeth, 3015 “Thus diddest thou!”

KING. If it be so, Laertes—
As how should it be so?—[Glances at the letter.]
How otherwise?—
Will you be rul'd by me?

LAERT. Aye, my lord,
So you will not o'errule me to a peace.

KING. To thine own peace. If he be now re-turn'd, 3020

As checking at his voyage, and that he means
No more to undertake it, I will work him
To an exploit, now ripe in my device,
Under the which he shall not choose but fall;
And for his death no wind of blame shall breathe,
But even his mother shall uncharge the practice
And call it accident.

LAERT. My lord, I will be rul'd;
The rather, if you could devise it so 3028
That I might be the organ.

KING. It falls right.
You have been talk'd of since your travel much,
And that in Hamlet's hearing, for a quality
Wherein, they say, you shine. Your sum of parts
Did not, together, pluck such envy from him
As did that one, and that, in my regard, 3034
Of the unworthiest siege.

LAERT. What part is that, my lord?

KING. A very riband in the cap of youth,
Yet needful, too; for youth no less becomes
The light and careless livery that it wears
Than settled age his sables and his weeds Importing health and graveness. Two months since 3040

Here was a gentleman of Normandy.
I've seen myself, and serv'd against, the French,
And they can well on horseback; but this gallant
Had witchcraft in't! He grew unto his seat,
And to such wondrous doing brought his horse,
As he had been incorp'd and demi-natur'd 3046
With the brave beast. So far he topp'd my thought,
That I, in forgery of shapes and tricks,
Come short of what he did.

LAERT. A Norman was't?

KING. A Norman. 3050

LAERT. Upon my life, Lamord!

KING. The very same.

LAERT. I know him well. He is the brooch indeed
And gem of all the nation.

KING. He made confession of you;
And gave you such a masterly report 3055
For art and exercise in your defense—
And for your rapier most especially—
That he cried out, 'twould be a sight indeed

If one could match you. The scrimers of their nation, 3059

He swore, had neither motion, guard, nor eye,
If you oppos'd them. Sir, this report of his
Did Hamlet so envenom with his envy
That he could nothing do but wish and beg
Your sudden coming o'er to play with him.

Now, out of this—

LAERT. What out of this, my lord?

KING. Laertes, was your father dear to you?
Or are you, like the painting of a sorrow, 3067
A face without a heart?

LAERT. Why ask you this?

KING. Not that I think you did not love your father,

But that I know love is begun by time, 3070
And that I see, in passages of proof,
Time qualifies the spark and fire of it.

There lives within the very flame of love
A kind of wick or snuff that will abate it;
And nothing is at a like goodness still, 3075
For goodness, growing to a plurisy,
Dies in his own too-much. That we would do,
We should do when we would, for this "would"
changes,

And hath abatements and delays as many
As there are tongues, are hands, are accidents;
And then this "should" is like a spendthrift sigh,
That hurts by easing. But, to the quick o' the ulcer: 3082

Hamlet comes back— What would you undertake
To show yourself your father's son in deed
More than in words?

LAERT. To cut his throat i' the church!

KING. No place, indeed, should murder sanctuarize;

Revenge should have no bounds. But, godd
Laertes, 3087

Will you do this? keep close within your chamber;
Hamlet return'd shall know you are come home;
We'll put on those shall praise your excellence,
And set a double varnish on the fame 3091

The Frenchman gave you; bring you, in fine, together

And wager on your heads. He, being remiss,
Most generous, and free from all contriving,
Will not peruse the foils; so that with ease,
Or with a little shuffling, you may choose 3096
A sword unbated, and, in a pass of practice,
Requite him for your father.

LAERT. I will do't!

And for that purpose I'll anoint my sword.
I bought an unction of a mountebank, 3100

So mortal that, but dip a knife in it,
Where it draws blood no cataplasma so rare,
Collected from all simples that have virtue
Under the moon, can save the thing from death
That is but scratch'd withal. I'll touch my point
With this contagion, that, if I gall him slightly,
It may be death.

KING. Let's further think of this;
Weigh what convenience both of time and means
May fit us to our shape. If this should fail,
And that our drift look through our bad performance, 3110

'Twere better not assay'd; therefore this project
Should have a back, or second, that might hold
If this should blast in proof. Soft!—let me see.—
We'll make a solemn wager on your cunning—
I ha't! 3115

When in your motion you are hot and dry—
As make your bouts more violent to that end—
And that he calls for drink, I'll have prepar'd him
A chalice for the nonce, whereon but sipping,
If he by chance escape your venom'd stuck, 3120
Our purpose may hold there.—

Enter QUEEN.

How now, sweet queen!

QUEEN. One woe doth tread upon another's heel,
So fast they follow.—Your sister's drown'd, Laertes.

LAERT. Drown'd! O, where? 3124

QUEEN. There is a willow grows aslant a brook,
That shows his hoar leaves in the glassy stream;
There with fantastic garlands did she come,
Of crow-flowers, nettles, daisies, and long purples,
That liberal shepherds give a grosser name,
But our cold maids do "dead men's fingers" call
them: 3130

There, on the pendent boughs her coronet weeds
Clambering to hang, an envious sliver broke,
When down her weedy trophies and herself Fell in the weeping brook. Her clothes spread wide, 3134

And, mermaid-like, awhile they bore her up;
Which time she chanted snatches of old tunes,
As one incapable of her own distress,
Or like a creature native and indu'd Unto that element. But long it could not be Till that her garments, heavy with their drink,
Pull'd the poor wretch from her melodious lay
To muddy death.

LAERT. Alas! Then, she is drown'd?

QUEEN. Drown'd, drown'd. 3143

LAERT. Too much of water hast thou, poor
Ophelia,
And therefore I forbid my tears.—But yet
It is our trick; nature her custom holds,
Let shame say what it will.—When these are gone
The woman will be out.—Adieu, my lord!
I have a speech of fire that fain would blaze,
But that this folly douts it. [Exit. 3151

KING. Let's follow, Gertrude.
How much I had to do to calm his rage!
Now fear I this will give it start again;
Therefore let's follow. [Exeunt. 3151

ACT V

SCENE I:—A day later. A churchyard.

Enter two Clowns, with spades and mattock.

FIRST CLO. Is she to be buried in Christian burial that willfully seeks her own salvation? 3155

SECOND CLO. I tell thee she is; and therefore make her grave straight: the crowner hath sat on her, and finds it Christian burial.

FIRST CLO. How can that be, unless she drowned herself in her own defense? 3160

SECOND CLO. Why, 'tis found so.

FIRST CLO. It must be se offendendo; it cannot be else. For here lies the point: if I drown myself wittingly, it argues an act; and an act hath three branches; it is—to act, to do, and to perform:
argal, she drowned herself wittingly. 3166

SECOND CLO. Nay, but hear you, goodman delver,—

FIRST CLO. Give me leave.—Here lies the water; good: here stands the man; good: if the man go to this water, and drown himself, it is, will-he-nillhe, he goes—mark you that! but if the water come to him, and drown him, he drowns not himself:
argal, he that is not guilty of his own death
shortens not his own life. 3175

SECOND CLO. But is this law?

FIRST CLO. Aye, marry, is't; crowner's quest law.

SECOND CLO. Will you ha' the truth on't? If this had not been a gentlewoman, she should have been buried out o' Christian burial. 3180

FIRST CLO. Why, there thou sayest! And the more pity that great folk should have countenance in this world to drown or hang themselves more than their even Christian.—Come; my spade.
[Hands him a spade.] There is no ancient gentlemen but gardeners, ditchers, and grave-makers;
they hold up Adam's profession. 3187

SECOND CLO. Was he a gentleman?

FIRST CLO. A' was the first that ever bore arms.

SECOND CLO. Why, he had none.

FIRST CLO. What! art a heathen? How dost thou understand the Scripture? The Scripture says, "Adam digged." Could he dig without arms? I'll put another question to thee; if thou answerest me not to the purpose, confess thyself— 3195

SECOND CLO. Go to!

FIRST CLO. What is he that builds stronger than either the mason, the shipwright, or the carpenter?

SECOND CLO. The gallows-maker; for that frame outlives a thousand tenants. 3200

FIRST CLO. I like thy wit well, in good faith. The gallows does well. But how does it well? it does well to those that do ill; now thou dost ill to say the gallows is built stronger than the church: argal, the gallows may do well to thee. To't again; come! 3206

SECOND CLO. "Who builds stronger than a mason, a shipwright, or a carpenter?"

FIRST CLO. Aye, tell me that, and unyoke.

SECOND CLO. Marry, now I can tell! 3210

FIRST CLO. To't!

SECOND CLO. Mass, I cannot tell.

Enter at a distance HAMLET and HORATIO, coming from the pirates' hiding-place.

FIRST CLO. Cudgel thy brains no more about it, for your dull ass will not mend his pace with beating; and when you are asked this question next, say "a grave-maker"; the houses that he makes last till doomsday.—Go, get thee to Yaughan; fetch me a stoup of liquor. [Exit Second Clown.]

FIRST CLO. [digs and sings].

In youth, when I did love, did love,

Methought it was very sweet, 3220

To contract (uh!) the time for (uh!) my behove,

Ol methought there (uh!) was nothing meet.

HAML. Has this fellow no feeling of his business, that he sings at grave-making?

HORAT. Custom hath made it in him a property of easiness. 3226

HAML. 'Tis e'en so; the hand of little employment hath the daintier sense.

FIRST CLO. [sings].

But age, with his stealing steps,

Hath claw'd me in his clutch, 3230

And hath shipped me intil the land,

As if I had never been such.

Throws up a skull.

HAML. That skull had a tongue in it, and could sing once. How the knave jowls it to the ground, as if it were Cain's jaw-bone, that did the first murder! This might be the pate of a politician, which this ass now o'er-offices, one that would circumvent God, might it not? 3238

HORAT. It might, my lord.

HAML. Or of a courtier, which could say, "Good morrow, sweet lord! how dost thou, good lord?" This might be my Lord Such-a-one, that praised my Lord Such-a-one's horse, when he meant to beg it, might it not?

HORAT. Aye, my lord. 3245

HAML. Why, e'en so; and now my Lady Worm's! chapless, and knocked about the mazzard with a sexton's spade! Here's fine revolution, an we had the trick to see't. Did these bones cost no more the breeding but to play at loggats with 'em? Mine ache to think on't. 3251

FIRST CLO. [sings].

A pick-ax, and a spade, a spade

For and a shrouding sheet;

Ol a pit of clay for to be made

For such a guest is meet.

Throws up another skull.

HAML. There's another. Why might not that be the skull of a lawyer? Where be his quiddities now? his quilllets, his cases, his tenures, and his tricks? Why does he suffer this rude knave now to knock him about the sconce with a dirty shovel, and will not tell him of his action of battery? Hum! This fellow might be in's time a great buyer of land, with his statutes, his recognizances, his fines, his double vouchers, his recoveries. Is this the fine of his fines, and the recovery of his recoveries, to have his fine pate full of fine dirt? Will his vouchers vouch him no more of his purchases, and double ones too, than the length and breadth of a pair of indentures? The very conveyances of his lands will hardly lie in this box; and must the inheritor himself have no more, ha? 3271

HORAT. Not a jot more, my lord.

HAML. Is not parchment made of sheep-skins?

HORAT. Aye, my lord, and of calf-skins too.

HAML. They are sheep and calves which seek out assurance in that.—I will speak to this fellow. [Advancing.] Whose grave's this, sir? 3277

FIRST CLO. Mine, sir. [Sings.]

Ol a pit of clay for to be made

For such a guest is meet.

HAML. I think it be thine, indeed; for thou liest in't.

FIRST CLO. You lie out on't sir, and therefore it is not yours. For my part, I do not lie in't, and yet it is mine. 3285

HAML. Thou dost lie in't, to be in't and say it is thine: 'tis for the dead, not for the quick; therefore thou liest.

FIRST CLO. 'Tis a "quick" lie, sir! 'twill away again, from me to you. 3290

HAML. What man dost thou dig it for?

FIRST CLO. For no man, sir.

HAML. What woman, then?

FIRST CLO. For none, either.

HAML. Who is to be buried in't? 3295

FIRST CLO. One that was a woman, sir; but, rest her soul, she's dead.

HAML. How absolute the knave is! We must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us. By the Lord, Horatio, these three years I have taken note of it; the age is grown so picked that the toe of the peasant comes so near the heel of the courtier he galls his kibe.—How long hast thou been a grave-maker? 3304

FIRST CLO. Of all the days i' the year, I came to't that day that our last King Hamlet overcame Fortinbras.

HAML. How long is that since?

FIRST CLO. Cannot you tell that? Every fool can tell that! It was the very day that young Hamlet was born—he that is mad, and sent into England.

HAML. Aye, marry; why was he sent into England? 3313

FIRST CLO. Why, because a' was mad. A' shall recover his wits there; or, if a' do not, 'tis no great matter there.

HAML. Why?

FIRST CLO. 'Twill not be seen in him there; there the men are as mad as he.

HAML. How came he mad? 3320

FIRST CLO. Very strangely, they say.

HAML. How strangely?

FIRST CLO. Faith, e'en with losing his wits.

HAML. Upon what ground?

FIRST CLO. Why, here in Denmark. I have been sexton here, man and boy, thirty years. 3326

HAML. How long will a man lie i' the earth ere he rot?

FIRST CLO. Faith, if a' be not rotten before a' die—as we have many pocky corses now-a-days—that will scarce hold the laying in—a' will last you some eight year, or nine year; a tanner will last you nine year. 3333

HAML. Why he more than another?

FIRST CLO. Why, sir, his hide is so tanned with his trade that a' will keep out water a great while; and your water is a sore decayer of your whoreson dead body. Here's a skull now; this skull hath lain you i' the earth three-and-twenty years.

HAML. Whose was it?

FIRST CLO. A whoreson mad fellow's it was! Whose do you think it was?

HAML. Nay, I know not.

FIRST CLO. A pestilence on him for a mad rogue! a' poured a flagon of Rhenish on my head once. This same skull, sir, was Yorick's skull, the king's jester. 3346 HAML. This!

FIRST CLO. E'en that.

HAML. Let me see.—[Takes the skull.]—Alas! poor Yorick!—I knew him, Horatio; a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy; he hath borne me on his back a thousand times; and now, how abhorred in my imagination it is! My gorge rises at it! Here hung those lips that I have kissed I know not how oft. Where be your gibes now? your gambols? your songs? your flashes of merriment that were wont to set the table on a roar? Not one now, to mock your own grinning? quite chapfallen? Now get you to my lady's chamber, and tell her, let her paint an inch thick, to this favor she must come. Make her laugh at that!—Prithee, Horatio, tell me one thing. 3362

HORAT. What's that, my lord?

HAML. Dost thou think Alexander looked o' this fashion i' the earth? 3366

HORAT. E'en so.

Throws down the skull.

HAML. And smelt so? pah!

HORAT. E'en so, my lord.

HAML. To what base uses we may return, Horatio! Why may not imagination trace the noble dust of Alexander, till he find it stopping a bung-hole? 3372

HORAT. 'Twere to consider too curiously to consider so.

HAML. No, faith, not a jot! But to follow him thither, with modesty enough, and likelihood to lead it, as thus: Alexander died; Alexander was buried; Alexander returneth into dust; the dust is earth; of earth we make loam; and why of that loam whereto he was converted might they not stop a beer-barrel? 3381

"Imperious Cæsar, dead and turn'd to clay,

Might stop a hole to keep the wind away:

O, that that earth, which kept the world in awe,

Should patch a wall to expel the winter's flaw!"

But soft! but soft! Aside. Here comes the king.

Enter Priests, &c., in procession; bell tolling; the corpse of OPHELIA borne in, LAERTES, KING, QUEEN, Lords, &c., following.

The queen, the courtiers? Who is that they follow?
And with such maimed rites? This doth betoken
The corse they follow did with desperate hand
Fordo its own life. 'Twas of some estate. 3390
Couch we awhile and mark.

[Retiring with HORATIO.

LAERT. What ceremony else?

HAML. That is Laertes—
A very noble youth! Mark.

LAERT. What ceremony else?

FIRST PRIEST. Her obsequies have been as far enlarg'd 3395

As we have warrantise. Her death was doubtful,
And, but that great command o'ersways the order,
She should in ground unsanctified have lodg'd
Till the last trumpet; for charitable prayers,
Shards, flints, and pebbles should be thrown on her.
Yet here she is allow'd her virgin crants, 3401
Her maiden strewments, and the bringing home
Of bell and burial.

LAERT. Must there no more be done?

FIRST PRIEST. No more be done.
We should profane the service of the dead
To sing a requiem and such rest to her 3406
As to peace-parted souls.

LAERT. Lay her i' the earth;
And from her fair and unpolluted flesh
May violets spring!—I tell thee, churlish priest,
A ministering angel shall my sister be, 3410
When thou liest howling.

HAML. What! the fair Ophelia?

QUEEN [scattering flowers]. Sweets to the sweet.
Farewell!

I hop'd thou shouldst have been my Hamlet's wife;
I thought thy bride-bed to have deck'd, sweet maid,
And not t'have strewed thy grave.

LAERT. O! treble woe
Fall ten times treble on that cursed head 3416
Whose wicked deed thy most ingenious sense
Depriv'd thee of!—Hold off the earth awhile,
Till I have caught her once more in mine arms.

Leaps into the grave.

Now pile your dust upon the quick and dead,
Till of this flat a mountain you have made
To o'ertop old Pelion or the skyish head
Of blue Olympus!

HAML. [advancing]. What is he, whose grief
Bears such an emphasis? whose phrase of sorrow

Conjures the wandering stars, and makes them stand 3425
Like wonder-wounded hearers? This is I,
Hamlet, the Dane!

Leaps into the grave.

LAERT. [seizing him by the throat]. The devil take thy soul!

HAML. Thou pray'st not well.
I prithee, take thy fingers from my throat!
For though I am not splenetic and rash, 3430
Yet have I in me something dangerous,
Which let thy wisdom fear. Away thy hand!

They struggle in the grave.

KING. Pluck them asunder.

QUEEN. Hamlet! Hamlet!

ALL. Gentlemen!

The Attendants part them, and they come out of the grave.

HORAT. Good my lord, be quiet.

HAML. Why, I will fight with him upon this theme 3435

Until my eyelids will no longer wag.

QUEEN. O, my son, what theme?

HAML. I lov'd Ophelia. Forty thousand brothers
Could not, with all their quantity of love,
Make up my sum!—What wilt thou do for her?

KING. O, he is mad, Laertes. 3441

QUEEN. For love of God, forbear him.

HAML. 'Swounds, show me what thou'lt do!
Woo't weep? woo't fight? woo't fast? woo't tear thyself?

Woo't drink up Esill? eat a crocodile? 3445

I'll do't! Dost thou come here to whine?

To outface me with leaping in her grave?

Be buried quick with her, and so will I!

And, if thou prate of mountains, let them throw

Millions of acres on us, till our ground, 3450

Singeing his pate against the burning zone,

Make Ossa like a wart! Nay, an thou'lt mouth,

I'll rant as well as thou!

QUEEN. This is mere madness:

And thus a while the fit will work on him;

Anon, as patient as the female dove 3455

When that her golden couplets are disclos'd,

His silence will sit drooping.

HAML. Hear you, sir:

What is the reason that you use me thus?

I lov'd you ever.—But it is no matter;

Let Hercules himself do what he may, 3460
The cat will mew and dog will have his day.

[Exit.

KING. I pray you, good Horatio, wait upon him.

[Exit HORATIO.

[Aside to LAERTES.] Strengthen your patience in our last night's speech;

We'll put the matter to the present push.—

Good Gertrude, set some watch over your son.

This grave shall have a living monument. 3466

[Aside to LAERTES.] An hour of quiet shortly shall we see;

Till then, in patience our proceeding be. [Exeunt.

SCENE II:—Later the same day. A hall in the castle.

Enter HAMLET and HORATIO.

HAML. So much for this, sir: now shall you see the other.

You do remember all the circumstance? 3470

HORAT. Remember it, my lord!

HAML. Sir, in my heart there was a kind of fighting

That would not let me sleep; methought I lay

Worse than the mutines in the bilboes. Rashly—

And prais'd be rashness for it; let us know,

Our indiscretion sometimes serves us well 3476

When our deep plots do pall, and that should teach us

There's a divinity that shapes our ends,

Rough-hew them how we will,—

HORAT. That is most certain.

HAML. Up from my cabin, 3480

My sea-gown scarf'd about me, in the dark

Grop'd I to find out them; had my desire;

Finger'd their packet; and, in fine, withdrew

To mine own room again, making so bold—

My fears forgetting manners—to unseal 3485

Their grand commission. Where I found, Horatio,—

O royal knavery!—an exact command,

Larded with many several sorts of reasons

Importing Denmark's health, and England's too,

With, ho! such bugs and goblins in my life,

That, on the supervise, no leisure bated, 3491

No, not to stay the grinding of the ax,

My head should be struck off!

HORAT. Is't possible!

HAML. Here's the commission: read it at more leisure.

Hands him the letter.

But wilt thou hear me how I did proceed? 3495

HORAT. I beseech you.

HAML. Being thus be-netted round with villainies,

Ere I could make a prologue to my brains

They had begun the play. I sat me down,

Devis'd a new commission, wrote it fair. 3500

I once did hold it, as our statists do,

A baseness to write fair, and labor'd much

How to forget that learning; but, sir, now

It did me yeoman's service. Wilt thou know

The effect of what I wrote?

HORAT.

Aye, good my lord.

HAML. An earnest conjuration from the king,

As England was his faithful tributary,

As love between them like the palm should flourish, 3508

As peace should still her wheaten garland wear,

And stand a comma 'tween their amities,

And many such-like "As"es of great charge,

That, on the view and knowing of these contents,

Without debatement further more or less,

He should the bearers put to sudden death, 3514

Not shriving-time allow'd.

HORAT.

How was this seal'd?

HAML. Why, even in that was heaven ordinant.

I had my father's signet in my purse,

Which was the model of that Danish seal;

Folded the writ up in form of the other, 3519

Subscrib'd it, gave't the impression, plac'd it safely,

The changeling never known. Now, the next day

Was our sea-fight; and what to this was sequent

Thou know'st already.

HORAT. So Guildenstern and Rosencrantz go to't.

HAML. Why, man, they did make love to this employment! 3525

They are not near my conscience; their defeat

Does by their own insinuation grow.

'Tis dangerous when the baser nature comes

Between the pass and fell-incensed points

Of mighty opposites.

HORAT.

Why, what a king is this!

HAML. Does it not, thinks't thee, stand me now upon— 3531

He that hath kill'd my king, and whor'd my mother,

Popp'd in between the election and my hopes,

Thrown out his angle for my proper life,

And with such cozenage—is't not perfect conscience 3535

To quit him with this arm? and is't not to be damn'd

To let this canker of our nature come

In further evil?

HORAT. It must be shortly known to him from England

What is the issue of the business there. 3540

HAML. It will be short; the interim is mine:
And a man's life's no more than to say "One!"—
But I am very sorry, good Horatio,
That to Laertes I forgot myself;
For, by the image of my cause, I see 3545
The portraiture of his. I'll court his favors.
But, sure, the bravery of his grief did put me
Into a towering passion!—

HORAT. Peace! Who comes here?

Enter OSRIC, a dandified gallant.

OSR. Your lordship is right welcome back to Denmark. 3550

HAML. I humbly thank you, sir. [Aside to HORATIO.] Dost know this water-fly?

HORAT. [aside to HAMLET]. No, my good lord.

HAML. [aside to HORATIO]. Thy state is the more gracious; for 'tis a vice to know him. He hath much land, and fertile: let a beast be lord of beasts, and his crib shall stand at the king's mess. 'Tis a chough—but, as I say, spacious in the possession of dirt. 3559

OSR. Sweet lord, if your lordship were at leisure, I should impart a thing to you from his majesty.

HAML. I will receive it, sir, with all diligence of spirit. Put your bonnet to his right use; 'tis for the head. 3564

OSR. I thank your lordship, 'tis very hot.

HAML. No, believe me, 'tis very cold; the wind is northerly.

OSR. It is indifferent cold—my lord—indeed—

HAML. But yet methinks it is very sultry and hot for my complexion. 3570

OSR. Exceedingly, my lord! it is very sultry—as 'twere—I cannot tell how. But, my lord, his majesty bade me signify to you that he has laid a great wager on your head. Sir, this is the matter—

HAML. I beseech you, remember. 3575

HAMLET moves him to put on his hat.

OSR. Nay, good my lord. [HAMLET again moves him to put on his hat.] For mine ease, in good faith. [HAMLET insists, until OSRIC yields and puts on his hat.] Sir, here is newly come to court Laertes. Believe me, an absolute gentleman! full of most excellent differences! of very soft society, and great showing! Indeed, to speak feelingly of him, he is the card or calendar of gentry; for you shall find in him the continent of what part a gentleman would see. 3585

HAML. Sir, his definement suffers no perdition in you, though I know to divide him inventorially would dizzy the arithmetic of memory and yet but yaw neither in respect of his quick sail, but, in the verity of extolment, I take him to be a soul of great article, and his infusion of such dearth and rareness, as, to make true diction of him, his semblable is his mirror, and who else would trace him, his umbrage, nothing more. 3594

OSR. Your lordship speaks most infallibly of him.

HAML. The concernancy, sir? Why do we wrap the gentleman in our more rawer breath?

OSR. Sir?

HORAT. Is't not possible to understand in another tongue? You will too't, sir, really? 3600

HAML. What imports the nomination of this gentleman?

OSR. Of Laertes?

HORAT. [aside to HAMLET]. His purse is empty already; all's golden words are spent. 3605

HAML. Of him, sir.

OSR. I know you are not ignorant—

HAML. I would you did, sir; yet, in faith, if you did, it would not much approve me. Well, sir?

OSR. You are not ignorant of what excellence Laertes is— 3611

HAML. I dare not confess that, lest I should compare with him in excellence; but, to know a man well, were to know himself.

OSR. I mean, sir, for his weapon. But in the imputation laid on him by them, in his meed he's unfollowed. 3617

HAML. What's his weapon?

OSR. Rapier and dagger.

HAML. That's two of his weapons.—But? Well?

OSR. The king, sir, hath wagered with him six Barbary horses; against the which he has imposed, as I take it, six French rapiers and poniards, with their assigns, as girdle, hangers, and so. Three of the carriages, in faith, are very dear to fancy, very responsive to the hilts, most delicate carriages, and of very liberal conceit. 3627

HAML. What call you the "carriages"?

HORAT. [aside to HAMLET]. I knew you must be edified by the margent, ere you had done.

OSR. The "carriages," sir, are the hangers.

HAML. The phrase would be more german to the matter if we could carry cannon by our sides; I would it might be "hangers" till then. But, on: six Barbary horses against six French swords, their assigns, and three liberal-conceited carriages; that's the French bet against the Danish. Why is this "imposed," as you call it? 3638

OSR. The king, sir, hath laid that in a dozen passes between yourself and him, he shall not exceed you three hits; he hath laid on twelve for nine. And it would come to immediate trial, if your lordship would vouchsafe the answer.

HAML. How if I answer "No"? 3644

OSR. I mean, my lord, the opposition of your person in trial.

HAML. Sir, I will walk here in the hall. If it please his majesty, 'tis the breathing time of day with me. Let the foils be brought, the gentleman willing, and the king hold his purpose. I will win for him if I can; if not, I will gain nothing but my shame and the odd hits. 3652

OSR. Shall I re-deliver you so?

HAML. To this effect, sir, after what flourish your nature will.

OSR. I commend my duty to your lordship.

HAML. Yours, yours. [Exit OSRIC.]—He does well to commend it himself; there are no tongues else for's turn.

HORAT. This lapwing runs away with the shell on his head. 3661

HAML. He did comply with his dug before he sucked it. Thus has he—and many more of the same bevy that I know the drossy age dotes on—only got the tune of the time and outward habit of encounter, a kind of yesty collection which carries them through and through the most fond and winnowed opinions; and do but blow them to their trial, the bubbles are out. 3669

Enter a Lord.

LORD. My lord, his majesty commended him to you by young Osric, who brings back to him that you attend him in the hall. He sends to know if your pleasure hold to play with Laertes, or that you will take longer time. 3674

HAML. I am constant to my purposes; they follow the king's pleasure. If his fitness speaks, mine is ready, now, or whensoever, provided I be so able as now.

LORD. The king, and queen, and all are coming down. 3680

HAML. In happy time.

LORD. The queen desires you to use some gentle entertainment to Laertes before you fall to play.

HAML. She well instructs me. [Exit Lord.]

HORAT. You will lose this wager, my lord. 3685

HAML. I do not think so. Since he went into France, I have been in continual practice; I shall win at the odds.—But thou wouldst not think how ill all's here about my heart. But, it is no matter.

HORAT. Nay, good my lord. 3690

HAML. It is but foolery.—But, it is such a kind of gain-giving as would perhaps trouble a woman.

HORAT. If your mind dislike any thing, obey it. I will forestal their repair hither, and say you are not fit. 3695

HAML. Not a whit! We defy augury. There's a special providence in the fall of a sparrow. If it be now, 'tis not to come; if it be not to come, it will be now; if it be not now, yet it will come: the readiness is all. Since no man has aught of what he leaves, what is't to leave betimes? Let be. 3701

Enter KING, QUEEN, LAERTES, OSRIC, Lords, &c.; Attendants with table, foils, flagons of wine.

KING. Come, Hamlet; come, and take this hand from me.

HAMLET seizes the hand of LAERTES.

HAML. Give me your pardon, sir. I've done you wrong;

But pardon't, as you are a gentleman.

This presence knows, 3705
And you must needs have heard, how I am punish'd

With sore distraction. What I have done
That might your nature, honor, and exception
Roughly awake, I here proclaim was madness.
Was't Hamlet wrong'd Laertes? Never Hamlet!
If Hamlet from himself be ta'en away, 3711

And when he's not himself does wrong Laertes,
Then Hamlet does it not. Hamlet denies it.
Who does it then? His madness. If't be so,
Hamlet is of the faction that is wrong'd; 3715
His madness is poor Hamlet's enemy.

Sir, in this audience,
Let my disclaiming from a purpos'd evil
Free me so far in your most generous thoughts,
That I have shot mine arrow o'er the house
And hurt my brother.

LAERT. I am satisfied in nature,
Whose motive in this case should stir me most
To my revenge; but in my terms of honor
I stand aloof, and will no reconciliation 3724
Till by some elder masters, of known honor,
I have a voice and precedent of peace,
To keep my name ungor'd. But till that time
I do receive your offer'd love like love,
And will not wrong it.

HAML. I embrace it freely;
And will this brother's wager frankly play.—
Give us the foils. [To LAERTES.] Come on!

LAERT. Come; one for me.

HAML. I'll be your foil, Laertes. In mine ignorance 3732

Your skill shall, like a star i' the darkest night,
Stick fiery off indeed.

LAERT. You mock me, sir.

HAML. No, by this hand.

KING. Give them the foils, young Osric.

OSRIC spreads the foils upon the table. The KING takes his seat by the QUEEN upon a dais. LAERTES advances to select a foil; whereupon the KING seeks to divert HAMLET's attention.

Cousin Hamlet! 3736

HAMLET turns.

You know the wager?

HAML. Very well, my lord.

Your Grace hath laid the odds o' the weaker side.

KING. I do not fear it; I have seen you both:
But since he is better'd, we have therefore odds.

LAERT. This is too heavy; let me see another.

Selects the unbaited rapier, and stands holding the point concealed. HAMLET picks up a foil.

HAML. This likes me well.—These foils have all a length? 3742

OSR. Aye, my good lord.

KING. Set me the stoups of wine upon that table.
If Hamlet give the first, or second, hit, 3745

Or quit in answer of the third exchange,
Let all the battlements their ordnance fire;

The king shall drink to Hamlet's better breath.

And in the cup an union shall he throw,
Richer than that which four successive kings 3750

In Denmark's crown have worn. Give me the cups;

And let the kettle to the trumpets speak,

The trumpets to the cannoneer without,

The cannons to the heavens, the heavens to earth,

"Now the king drinks to Hamlet!"—Come, begin.

And you, the judges, bear a wary eye. 3756

The Judges, OSRIC and HORATIO, take their stand.

HAMLET and LAERTES assume the dueling posture.

HAML. Come on, sir.

LAERT. Come, my lord.

They begin to play.

HAML. One!

LAERT. No.

HAML. Judgment.

OSR. A hit, a very palpable hit.

LAERT. Well; again,

They resume play. Upon the expiration of the time limit the Judges bring the first bout to an end.

KING. Stay; give me drink.—Hamlet, this pearl is thine.

Holds up what seems to be a pearl of great beauty; drops it into the cup, and crushes it with a pestle.

Here's to thy health! [Pretends to drink.] Give him the cup. 3760

The Attendant offers the cup to HAMLET. The kettle-drums roll, the trumpets sound, and the cannons roar within. When the noise dies away, HAMLET speaks.

HAML. I'll play this bout first; set it by awhile.—Come!

The second bout is begun, and for some time played in tense silence.

Another hit; what say you?

LAERT. A touch, a touch, I do confess. 3764

KING. Our son shall win.

QUEEN. He's fat, and scant of breath.

At last the Judges end the second bout. The QUEEN descends to where HAMLET stands by the table.

Here, Hamlet, take my napkin, rub thy brows.

While he is mopping his brow, she lifts the cup in a health to him.

The queen carouses to thy fortune, Hamlet.

HAML. Good madam!

KING [rushing down]. Gertrude, do not drink!

QUEEN. I will, my lord! I pray you, pardon me. [Drinks.]

KING [aside]. It is the poison'd cup: it is too late! 3770

She offers the cup to HAMLET.

HAML. I dare not drink yet, madam; by and by.

QUEEN. Come, let me wipe thy face.

LAERT. [to the KING]. My lord, I'll hit him now.

KING [to LAERTES]. I do not think't.

LAERT. [aside]. And yet 'tis almost 'gainst my conscience.

HAML. Come, for the third! Laertes, you but dally; 3775

I pray you, pass with your best violence.

I am afeared you make a wanton of me.

LAERT. Say you so? come on.

The third bout is begun. Neither player is able to score a touch.

OSR. [ready to end the bout]. Nothing, neither way. 3779

LAERT. Have at you—now!

LAERTES, abandoning all defense, rushes in upon HAMLET and wounds him. HAMLET seizes Laertes' wrist, LAERTES seizes Hamlet's wrist, and in the scuffle they exchange weapons. HAMLET wounds LAERTES.

KING. Part them! they are incens'd.

The Judges step between them.

HAML. Nay; come, again.

The QUEEN falls.

OSR. Look to the queen there, ho!

HORAT. They bleed on both sides. [To HAMLET.]

How is it, my lord?

OSR. How is it, Laertes?

LAERT. Why, as a woodcock to mine own springe, Osric;

I am justly kill'd with mine own treachery. 3785

HAML. How does the queen?

Kneels by her.

KING. She swoonds to see them bleed.

QUEEN. No, no! the drink! the drink!—O my dear Hamlet!—

The drink! the drink! I am poison'd. [Dies.]

HAML. O villainy! Ho, let the door be lock'd!

HORATIO leaps to the door and locks it.

Treachery! Seek it out! 3790

LAERTES falls.

LAERT. It is here, Hamlet. Hamlet, thou art slain. No medicine in the world can do thee good; In thee there is not half an hour of life.

The treacherous instrument is in thy hand, Unbated and envenom'd. The foul practice 3795 Hath turn'd itself on me. Lo! here I lie, Never to rise again. Thy mother's poison'd. I can no more. The king, the king's to blame!

HAML. The point envenom'd too!— 3800 Then, venom, to thy work!

Stabs the KING.

ALL. Treason! treason!

KING. O, yet defend me, friends! I am but hurt.

HAML. Here, thou incestuous, murderous, damned Dane!

Drink off this potion!

He forces the contents of the poisoned cup down the throat of the KING.

Is thy "union" here? 3804

Follow my mother!

KING dies.

LAERT. He is justly serv'd; It is a poison temper'd by himself. Exchange forgiveness with me, noble Hamlet.

Holds out his hand; HAMLET takes it.

Mine and my father's death come not upon thee, Nor thine on me! [Dies.]

HAML. Heaven make thee free of it! I follow thee. 3810

Seats himself upon the steps of the dais.

I am dead, Horatio.—Wretched queen, adieu!— You that look pale and tremble at this chance, That are but mutes or audience to this act, Had I but time [A paroxysm of pain interrupts him.—as this fell sergeant, death, Is strict in his arrest,—O, I could tell you— But let it be.—Horatio, I am dead; 3816 Thou livest: report me and my cause aright To the unsatisfied.

HORAT. Never believe it! I am more an antique Roman than a Dane. Here's yet some liquor left.

Lifts the poisoned cup.

HAML. [leaping to him]. As thou'rt a man, Give me the cup!—Let go!—By heaven, I'll have't!

He wrests the cup from Horatio's hands, and dashes it to the floor; then sinks again to the dais.

O God, Horatio, what a wounded name, 3822 Things standing thus unknown, shall live behind me!

If thou didst ever hold me in thy heart, Absent thee from felicity awhile, And in this harsh world draw thy breath in pain, To tell my story.

March afar off, and shot within.

What warlike noise is this?

OSR. Young Fortinbras, with conquest come from Poland, 3830

To the ambassadors of England gives This warlike volley.

HAML. O, I die, Horatio! The potent poison quite o'er-crows my spirit.

I cannot live to hear the news from England;
 But I do prophesy the election lights 3835
 On Fortinbras: he has my dying voice;
 So tell him—with the occurrents, more and less,
 Which have solicited— The rest is silence. [Dies.]

HORAT. Now cracks a noble heart! Good-night, sweet prince,
 And flights of angels sing thee to thy rest!— 3840

March within.

Why does the drum come hither?

Enter FORTINBRAS with his army; the English Ambassadors, and others.

FORTIN. Where is this sight?

HORAT. What is it ye would see?
 If aught of woe or wonder, cease your search.

FORTIN. This quarry cries on havoc. O proud
 Death!

What feast is toward in thine eternal cell 3845
 That thou so many princes at a shot
 So bloodily hast struck?

FIRST AMB. The sight is dismal!
 And our affairs from England come too late;
 The ears are senseless that should give us hearing,
 To tell him his commandment is fulfill'd, 3850
 That Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are dead.
 Where should we have our thanks?

HORAT. Not from his mouth,
 Had it the ability of life to thank you:
 He never gave commandment for their death.
 But since, so jump upon this bloody question,
 You from the Polack wars, and you from England,

Are here arriv'd, give order that these bodies
 High on a stage be placed to the view; 3858
 And let me speak to the yet unknowing world
 How these things came about: so shall you hear
 Of carnal, bloody, and unnatural acts,
 Of accidental judgments, casual slaughters,
 Of deaths put on by cunning and forc'd cause,
 And, in this upshot, purposes mistook 3864
 Fall'n on the inventors' heads. All this can I Truly deliver.

FORTIN. Let us haste to hear it;
 And call the noblest to the audience.
 For me, with sorrow I embrace my fortune;
 I have some rights of memory in this kingdom,
 Which now to claim my vantage doth invite me.

HORAT. Of that I shall have also cause to speak,
 And from his mouth whose voice will draw on
 more.

But let this same be presently perform'd
 Even while men's minds are wild, lest more mis-
 chance 3874
 On plots and errors happen.

FORTIN. Let four captains
 Bear Hamlet, like a soldier, to the stage;
 For he was likely, had he been put on,
 To have prov'd most royally: and for his passage,
 The soldiers' music and the rites of war
 Speak loudly for him. 3880

Take up the bodies. Such a sight as this Becomes the field, but here shows much amiss.—
 Go, bid the soldiers shoot.

[A dead march. Exeunt, bearing off the bodies; after which, a peal of ordnance is shot off within.]

RENAISSANCE LYRICS

The Elizabethan Age was ushered in very shortly after the publication of Tottel's Miscellany had introduced a number of new lyric poets. From the appearance of this book in 1557 for about a hundred years there is a remarkable succession of poets writing songs and other lyric forms.

The Shepherd's Calender of Spenser (1579) began a long tradition in England of the old classical pastoral. This form, beginning with Theocritus,¹ had been used by Virgil, some of whose Bucolics have much beauty. Spenser uses the old machinery of shepherds and writes a poem for each month of the shepherd's year. With one or two exceptions they make dull reading, unless one is already interested in the matters—sometimes purely local or temporary—which he discusses in the shepherds' dialogues. On the whole the pastoral form has not been successful in English, though two of our great elegies, Lycidas and Adonais, belong to the pastoral tradition.

Much more significant for the history of literature of that time as well as for later periods is the large outpouring of sonnets that began with Tottel's Miscellany. This lyric form had been perfected by Petrarch² in the early fourteenth century and it was brought to England by two noblemen, Sir Thomas Wyatt and the Earl of Surrey, some twenty years before the appearance of the Miscellany in which their poems were printed. After the introduction of the sonnets the principal use made of them for a long time was the composition of "cycles of sonnets," frequently series of a hundred. These were most often written to the poet's lady and expressed in many varying ways his love for her. Good examples are Sir Philip Sidney's Astrophel and Stella and Spenser's Amoretti. Shakespeare composed a longer cycle, but only a portion of this concerns a lady: the larger and better part are sonnets of friendship addressed to a man. Except in the hands of Milton this fourteen line form fell out of use after the close of the Elizabethan era and was not revived for another century and more. But for the past hundred and fifty years it has been employed by nearly all important poets. Even the love sonnet cycle was revived in the nineteenth century.

The plays written during the Elizabethan period gave occasion for the writing of many beautiful songs. As is true with all songs, the structure of these poems is very simple, with much repetition and occasional refrain. Their purpose is usually to express some emotion, though it may be that only a clever turn of expression is designed by the poet. Full Fathom Five Thy Father Lies is a dirge lamenting simply the supposed death of the hero's father. But the interest in Cupid and Campaspe or "Drink to me only with thine eyes" is in the unusual "conceit," the clever if somewhat far-fetched way of declaring love.

¹ For some remarks on the classical pastoral, see pp. 253 ff.

² See p. 618.

RENAISSANCE LYRICS

As the seventeenth century succeeded the Elizabethan period, the poetry with these "conceits" became more popular. John Donne, in particular, was fond of exercising his playful intellect in composing such poems. In Love's Deity, for example, he tries to imagine what love was like before the perverse God of Love was born. This "metaphysical" poetry, as it is often called, was cultivated by several of the poets who wrote in the period after 1620, such as Herbert, Vaughan, and Marvell. It takes a specially developed taste to appreciate their works, but they have been increasingly enjoyed and discussed within the past few years.

The political troubles of England in the seventeenth century divided authors as well as other citizens into opposing parties. The adherents of the king, the Cavaliers, had among them a group of gay, light-hearted singers, who wrote very graceful lyrics. We speak of them as the Cavalier poets. Suckling and Lovelace are typical of these. Belonging to them in many of his moods was Robert Herrick, the most interesting of the group. The Puritans also had their poet, one of the great authors of all time. John Milton's lyrics will receive attention in a later chapter.

In the lyric more than in other kinds of poetry, the author is concerned with form, or pattern. He is dealing with a small unit. The subject is usually very simple and the interest is not so much in what the poet says but how he says it. He must learn the devices the language has developed to give proper melody to his verses. He must know what the reader finds pleasing to the ear and the eye, and what are the most effective ways of marshaling his impressions, or emotions, or thoughts. That the poet may by long experience have made these patterns subconscious does not change the fact that he employs them and that he is much concerned that they be used with most effect.

The reader of lyrics must, therefore, cultivate an intelligent interest in poetic pattern if he is to make any attempt to appreciate the poetry. The rhyme scheme of a lyric and the way in which the poet retains this scheme in succeeding stanzas, the number of accents in the various lines, and the general movement of the lines—all these make up the poetic form, and all are very easy to recognize if only a little attention is given to them.

The types of poetic feet in English are very simple. The most popular are the iambic, consisting of an unaccented and an accented syllable (˘), and the trochaic with the reverse pattern (ˉ). The two other usual feet are the anapestic (˘˘ˉ) and the dactylic (ˉ˘˘). A poem need not be entirely in any one of these patterns, but it is usually possible to speak of the general movement as being one or the other. It will be good practice with some of the songs to divide the poem into feet and try to see the formal structure as well as the meaning.

A little practice will very soon accustom a reader to recognize the movement of a line of poetry. The greater part of poetry in the English language is iambic. The movement will be recognized in the following lines:

- (1) My mind to me a kingdom is.
- (2) My lady sweet, Arisel
- (3) The man of life upright.

It will be noted that each unit has an unaccented, followed by an accented, syllable. The lines given above have from three to four of these feet.

The opposite of iambic is trochaic, in which the foot begins with the accent and has one unaccented syllable. Illustrations are:

In Memoriam stanza: A quatrain of iambic tetrameter (that is, four-foot iambic) rhyming a b b a. See Tennyson's In Memoriam (p. 1321, below).

Rhyme: The matching of words at the end of lines so that all the sounds, beginning with the last accented syllable, correspond. In modern English, words of identical sound are not considered rhymes.

Masculine rhyme: Masculine rhyme is rhyme involving only the last syllable. Thus: defeat, repeat. Feminine rhyme involves the last two syllables: defeating, repeating.

Assonance: A correspondence like rhyme, except that the final consonants are different. Thus: make, fate.

Alliteration: A correspondence within lines of poetry affecting the initial sounds of accented syllables. Thus: "The furrow followed free." For extended use of alliteration, see the selections from Old English poetry and also Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (pp. 988 and 1021, above).

Onomatopœia: A correspondence between the sound of the word and the thing expressed. For example, the words bang and clang.

Students interested in matters of poetic form will find much to engage their attention in the works of poets of our last generation. Especially important has been an increasing use of free verse. The poet does not confine himself to any one pattern, but attempts to vary the poetic form to suit the thought or feeling. No better free verse can be found than the translations of the Psalms (p. 427, above) and in the poems of Whitman (p. 1362, below).

RENAISSANCE LYRICS

JOHN LYLY

Apelles' Song

Cupid and my Campaspe played
At cards for kisses,—Cupid paid;
He stakes his quiver, bow and arrows,
His mother's doves, and team of sparrows:
Loses them too; then down he throws
The coral of his lip, the rose
Growing on's cheek (but none knows how);
With these the crystal of his brow,
And then the dimple of his chin:
All these did my Campaspe win.
At last he set ¹ her both his eyes;
She won, and Cupid blind did rise.
O Love, has she done this to thee?
What shall, alas! become of me?

ROBERT GREENE

Song

Sweet are the thoughts that savor of content;
The quiet mind is richer than a crown.
Sweet are the nights in careless slumber spent;
The poor estate scorns fortune's angry frown.
5 Such sweet content, such minds, such sleep, such bliss, 5
Beggars enjoy, when princes oft do miss.

The homely house that harbors quiet rest;
10 The cottage that affords no pride nor care;
The mean that 'grees with country music best;
The sweet consort of mirth and music's fare; 10
Obscuréd life sets down a type of bliss—
A mind content both crown and kingdom is.

Lyly, Apelles' Song. John Lyly (c. 1554-1606) was born in Kent and educated at Oxford. He went to London, where he entered politics and wrote prose novels, dramas, and lyrics.

¹ Staked.

Greene, Song. Robert Greene (1560-1592) was born at Norwich and died in London. He was educated at Cambridge. He wrote dramas, tracts, novels, and poems.

CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE

The Passionate Shepherd to His Love

Come live with me and be my Love,
And we will all the pleasures prove
That hills and valleys, dales and fields,
Or woods or steepy mountain yields.

And we will sit upon the rocks,
And see the shepherds feed their flocks
By shallow rivers, to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

And I will make thee beds of roses
And a thousand fragrant posies;
A cap of flowers, and a kirtle
Embroidered all with leaves of myrtle;

A gown made of the finest wool
Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
Fair-lined slippers for the cold,
With buckles of the purest gold;

A belt of straw and ivy buds
With coral clasps and amber studs—
And if these pleasures may thee move,
Come live with me and be my Love.

The shepherd swains shall dance and sing
For thy delight each May morning—
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me and be my Love.

EDWARD DYER

My Mind to Me a Kingdom Is

My mind to me a kingdom is;
Such present joys therein I find
That it excels all other bliss
That earth affords or grows by kind.
Though much I want which most would have,
Yet still my mind forbids to crave.

No princely pomp, no wealthy store,
No force to win the victory,
No wily wit to salve a sore,
No shape to feed a loving eye;
To none of these I yield as thrall—
For why? My mind doth serve for all.

I see how plenty surfeits oft,
And hasty climbers soon do fall;
I see that those which are aloft
Mishap doth threaten most of all;
They get with toil, they keep with fear—
Such cares my mind could never bear.

Content to live, this is my stay;
I seek no more than may suffice;
I press to bear no haughty sway;
Look, what I lack my mind supplies.
Lo, thus I triumph like a king,
Content with that my mind doth bring.

Some have too much, yet still do crave;
I little have, and seek no more.
They are but poor, though much they have,
And I am rich with little store.
They poor, I rich; they beg, I give;
They lack, I leave; they pine, I live.

I laugh not at another's loss;
I grudge not at another's pain;
No worldly waves my mind can toss;
My state at one doth still remain.
I fear no foe, I fawn no friend;
I loathe not life, nor dread my end.

Some weigh their pleasure by their lust,
Their wisdom by their rage of will;
Their treasure is their only trust;
A cloaked craft their store of skill.
But all the pleasure that I find
Is to maintain a quiet mind.

My wealth is health and perfect ease;
My conscience clear my chief defense;
I neither seek by bribes to please,
Nor by deceit to breed offense.
Thus do I live; thus will I die;
Would all did so as well as I!

WALTER RALEIGH

The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd

If all the world and love were young,
And truth in every shepherd's tongue,
These pretty pleasures might me move,
To live with thee and be thy love.

Marlowe, The Passionate Shepherd. Christopher Marlowe was born at Canterbury in 1564 and killed at Deptford in 1593. Educated at Cambridge, he came to London, where he wrote successful plays, among them Dr. Faustus and The Jew of Malta.

Dyer, My Mind to Me a Kingdom Is. Sir Edward Dyer was educated at Oxford. He was a courtier and diplomat and friend of Sidney and Leicester. He died in 1607.

Raleigh, The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd. Sir Walter Raleigh was born in Devonshire in 1552 and was executed in London in 1618. He led an active and romantic life as soldier and explorer.

But time drives flocks from field to fold, 5
 When rivers rage, and rocks grow cold;
 And Philomel becometh dumb;
 The rest complains of cares to come.
 The flowers do fade, and wanton fields
 To wayward Winter reckoning yields; 10
 A honey tongue, a heart of gall,
 Is fancy's spring, but sorrow's fall.
 Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses,
 Thy cap, thy kirtle, and thy posies,
 Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten, 15
 In folly ripe, in reason rotten.
 Thy belt of straw and ivy buds,
 Thy coral clasps and amber studs,
 All these in me no means can move,
 To come to thee and be thy love. 20
 But could youth last, and love still breed,
 Had joys no date, nor age no need,
 Then these delights my mind might move,
 To live with thee and be thy love.

MICHAEL DRAYTON

Sonnet from IDEA

Since there's no help, come, let us kiss and part!
 Nay, I have done; you get no more of me!
 And I am glad, yea, glad, with all my heart,
 That thus so cleanly I myself can free.
 Shake hands forever! Cancel all our vows! 5
 And when we meet at any time again,
 Be it not seen in either of our brows
 That we one jot of former love retain!
 Now at the last gasp of Love's latest breath
 When, his pulse failing, Passion speechless lies,
 When Faith is kneeling by his bed of death, 11
 And Innocence is closing up his eyes—
 Now, if thou wouldst, when all have given him over,
 From death to life thou might'st him yet recover!

EDMUND SPENSER

Prothalamion

Calm was the day, and through the trembling air
 Sweet, breathing Zephyrus did softly play

A gentle spirit, that lightly did delay
 Hot Titan's¹ beams, which then did glisten fair; 5
 When I (whom sullen care,
 Through discontent of my long fruitless stay
 In princes' court, and expectation vain
 Of idle hopes, which still do fly away,
 Like empty shadows, did afflict my brain) 10
 Walked forth to ease my pain
 Along the shore of silver streaming Thames;
 Whose rutty bank, the which his river hems,
 Was painted all with variable flowers,
 And all the meads adorned with dainty gems 15
 Fit to deck maidens' bowers,
 And crown their paramours
 Against the bridal day, which is not long—
 Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.
 There, in a meadow, by the river's side, 20
 A flock of nymphs I chanced to espy,
 All lovely daughters of the flood thereby,
 With goodly greenish locks, all loose untied,
 As each had been a bride.
 And each one had a little wicker basket,
 Made of fine twigs, entrailéd curiously, 25
 In which they gathered flowers to fill their flasket,
 And with fine fingers cropt full feateously
 The tender stalks on high.
 Of every sort, which in that meadow grew,
 They gathered some: the violet, pallid blue, 30
 The little daisy, that at evening closes,
 The virgin lily, and the primrose true,
 With store of vermeil roses,
 To deck their bridegroom's posies
 Against the bridal day, which was not long— 35
 Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.
 With that I saw two swans of goodly hue
 Come softly swimming down along the Lee;²
 Two fairer birds I yet did never see.
 The snow, which doth the top of Pindus strew,
 Did never whiter shew, 41
 Nor Jove himself, when he a swan would be
 For love of Leda, whiter did appear;
 Yet Leda was, they say, as white as he,
 Yet not so white as these, nor nothing near; 45
 So purely white they were,
 That even the gentle stream, the which them bare,

Drayton, Sonnet from Idea. Michael Drayton was born in Warwickshire in 1563 and died in London in 1631. He was a voluminous writer of epic and lyric poems.

Spenser, Prothalamion. Written in 1596 to celebrate the double marriage of two daughters of the Earl of Worcester. "Prothalamion" means an ode preceding the marriage ceremony. Edmund Spenser (1552-1599) was born and died in London. His Shepherd's Calendar showed great promise, which was fulfilled by his long allegorical poem, The Faerie Queene.

¹ Titan's (the sun's), rutty (rooty).

² Lee (Lea) is a river which flows into the Thames.

Seemed foul to them, and bade his billows spare
To wet their silken feathers, lest they might Soil their fair plumes with water not so fair, 50
And mar their beauties bright,
That shone as heaven's light,
Against their bridal day, which was not long—
Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

Eftsoons the nymphs, which now had flowers their fill, 55
Ran all in haste to see that silver brood,
As they came floating on the crystal flood;
Whom when they saw, they stood amazed still,
Their wondering eyes to fill;
Them seemed they never saw a sight so fair 60
Of fowls so lovely, that they sure did deem
Them heavenly born, or to be that same pair
Which through the sky draw Venus' silver team;
For sure they did not seem
To be begot of any earthly seed, 65
But rather angels, or of angel's breed;
Yet were they bred of summer's heat, they say,
In sweetest season, when each flower and weed
The earth did fresh array;
So fresh they seemed as day, 70
Even as their bridal day, which was not long—
Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

Then forth they all out of their baskets drew
Great store of flowers, the honor of the field,
That to the sense did fragrant odors yield, 75
All which upon those goodly birds they threw
And all the waves did strew,
That like old Peneus' waters they did seem,
When down along by pleasant Tempe's shore, Scattered with flowers, through Thessaly they stream, 80

That they appear, through lilies' plenteous store,
Like a bride's chamber floor.
Two of those nymphs meanwhile, two garlands bound
Of freshest flowers which in that mead they found,
The which presenting all in trim array, 85
Their snowy foreheads there withal they crowned,
Whilst one did sing this lay,
Prepared against that day,
Against their bridal day, which was not long—
Sweet Thames! run softly till I end my song. 90

"Ye gentle birds! the world's fair ornament,
And heaven's glory, whom this happy hour

Doth lead unto your lover's blissful bower,
Joy may you have, and gentle hearts' content
Of your love's couplement; 95
And let fair Venus, that is queen of love,
With her heart-quelling son upon you smile,
Whose smile, they say, hath virtue to remove
All love's dislike, and friendship's faulty guile
Forever to assoil; 100
Let endless peace your steadfast hearts accord,
And blessed plenty wait upon your board;
And let your bed with pleasures chaste abound,
That fruitful issue may to you afford,
Which may your foes confound, 105
And make your joys redound
Upon your bridal day, which is not long—"
Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

So ended she; and all the rest around
To her redoubled that her undersong, 110
Which said their bridal day should not be long.
And gentle Echo from the neighbor ground
Their accents did resound.
So forth those joyous birds did pass along,
Adown the Lee, that to them murmured low, 115
As he would speak, but that he lacked a tongue,
Yet did by signs his glad affection show,
Making his stream run slow.
And all the fowl which in his flood did dwell
'Gan flock about these twain, that did excel 120
The rest, so far as Cynthia doth shend³
The lesser stars. So they, enranged well,
Did on those two attend,
And their best service lend 124
Against their wedding day, which was not long—
Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

At length they all to merry London came,
To merry London, my most kindly nurse,
That to me gave this life's first native source,
Though from another place⁴ I take my name, 131
An house of ancient fame.
There when they came, whereas those brick towers
The which on Thames' broad, aged back do ride, Where now the studious lawyers⁵ have their bowers,
There whilom wont the Templar Knights to bide
Till they decayed through pride. 136
Next whereunto there stands a stately place,⁶

³ Shend (to put to shame, surpass).

⁴ Lancashire, in northwestern England.

⁵ The Temple, where law is still studied. It formerly belonged to the Knights Templars.

⁶ The palace of the Earl of Leicester, Spenser's patron. But it was by that time occupied by the Earl of Essex (see line 145).

Where oft I gainéd gifts and goodly grace
 Of that great lord, which therein wont to dwell,
 Whose want too well now feels my friendless case;
 But ah! here fits not well 141
 Old woes, but joys, to tell
 Against the bridal day, which is not long—
 Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

Yet therein now doth lodge a noble peer, 145
 Great England's glory, and the world's wide wonder, Whose dreadful name late through all Spain did thunder,
 And Hercules' two pillars⁷ standing near
 Did make to quake and fear:
 Fair branch of honor, flower of chivalry! 150
 That fillest England with thy triumph's fame,
 Joy have thou of thy noble victory,
 And endless happiness of thine own name,
 That promiseth the same;
 That through thy prowess, and victorious arms, 155
 Thy country may be freed from foreign harms;
 And great Elisa's glorious name may ring
 Through all the world, filled with thy wide alarms,
 Which some brave muse may sing
 To ages following, 160
 Upon the bridal day, which is not long—
 Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

From those high towers this noble lord issuing,
 Like radiant Hesper, when his golden hair
 In th' ocean billows he hath bathéd fair, 165
 Descended to the river's open viewing,
 With a great train ensuing.
 Above the rest were goodly to be seen
 Two gentle knights of lovely face and feature
 Beseeming well the bower of any queen, 170
 With gifts of wit, and ornaments of nature,
 Fit for so goodly stature,
 That like the twins of Jove they seemed in sight,
 Which deck the baldrick of the heavens bright;
 They two, forth pacing to the river's side, 175
 Received those two fair brides, their love's delight;
 Which, at th' appointed tide,
 Each one did make his bride
 Against their bridal day, which is not long—Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my 180
 song.

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

Songs from the Plays

[FROM "LOVE'S LABOR'S LOST"]

When icicles hang by the wall,
 And Dick the shepherd blows his nail,
 And Tom bears logs into the hall,
 And milk comes frozen home in pail, 5
 When blood is nipped and ways be foul,
 Then nightly sings the staring owl,
 Tu-whit, tu-who! a merry note,
 While greasy Joan doth keel¹ the pot.

When all aloud the wind doth blow,
 And coughing drowns the parson's saw, 10
 And birds sit brooding in the snow,
 And Marian's nose looks red and raw,
 When roasted crabs hiss in the bowl,
 Then nightly sings the staring owl,
 Tu-whit, tu-who! a merry note, 15
 While greasy Joan doth keel the pot.

[FROM "TWO GENTLEMEN OF VERONA"]

Who is Silvia? what is she,
 That all our swains commend her?
 Holy, fair, and wise is she;
 The heaven such grace did lend her
 That she might admiréd be. 5

Is she kind as she is fair?
 For beauty lives with kindness.
 Love doth to her eyes repair
 To help him of his blindness,
 And, being helped, inhabits there. 10

Then to Silvia let us sing
 That Silvia is excelling;
 She excels each mortal thing
 Upon the dull earth dwelling—
 To her let us garlands bring. 15

[FROM "AS YOU LIKE IT"]

Under the greenwood tree
 Who loves to lie with me,
 And turn his merry note
 Unto the sweet bird's throat,
 Come hither! come hither! come hither! 5

⁷ The Pillars of Hercules are the cliffs in Spain and Morocco on each side of the western entrance to the Mediterranean.

Shakespeare, Songs from the Plays. William Shakespeare (1564-1616) was born and died at Stratford on Avon. His active life as a dramatist in London extended from about 1590-1610.

¹ Keel (to cool, as by skimming), saw (sermon), crabs (crab-apples).

Here shall he see
No enemy
But winter and rough weather.

Who doth ambition shun
And loves to live i' the sun, 10
Seeking the food he eats
And pleased with what he gets,
Come hither! come hither! come hither!
Here shall he see
No enemy 15
But winter and rough weather.

[FROM "AS YOU LIKE IT"]

Blow, blow, thou winter wind!
Thou art not so unkind
As man's ingratitude;
Thy tooth is not so keen,
Because thou art not seen, 5
Although thy breath be rude.

Heigh ho! sing, heigh ho! unto the green holly;
Most friendship is feigning, most loving mere folly.
Then, heigh ho, the holly!
This life is most jolly. 10

Freeze, freeze, thou bitter skyl!
That dost not bite so nigh
As benefits forgot;
Though thou the waters warp,
Thy sting is not so sharp 15
As friend remembered not.
Heigh ho! sing, heigh ho! etc.

[FROM "TWELFTH NIGHT"]

O Mistress mine, where are you roaming?
Oh, stay and hear; your true love's coming,
That can sing both high and low.
Trip no further, pretty sweeting,
Journeys end in lovers meeting, 5
Every wise man's son doth know.

What is Love? 'tis not hereafter;
Present mirth hath present laughter;
What's to come is still unsure.
In delay there lies no plenty; 10
Then come kiss me, sweet and twenty;
Youth's a stuff will not endure.

[FROM "MEASURE FOR MEASURE"]

Take, O, take those lips away
That so sweetly were forsworn;
And those eyes, the break of day,
Lights that do mislead the morn.

But my kisses bring again,
Bring again;
Seals of love, but sealed in vain,
Sealed in vain!

[FROM "CYMBELINE"]

Hark, hark! the lark at heaven's gate sings
And Phœbus 'gins arise,
His steeds to water at those springs
On chaliced flowers that lies;
And winking Mary-buds begin
To ope their golden eyes.
With every thing that pretty is,
My lady sweet, arise!
Arise, arise!

[FROM "CYMBELINE"]

Fear no more the heat o' the sun,
Nor the furious winter's rages;
Thou thy worldly task hast done,
Home art gone, and ta'en thy wages.
Golden lads and girls all must, 5
As chimney-sweepers, come to dust.

Fear no more the frown o' the great;
Thou art past the tyrant's stroke;
Care no more to clothe and eat;
To thee the reed is as the oak. 10
The scepter, learning, physic must
All follow this, and come to dust.

Fear no more the lightning-flash,
Nor th' all-dreaded thunder-stone;
Fear not slander, censure rash; 15
Thou hast finished joy and moan.
All lovers young, all lovers must Consign to thee, and come to dust.

No exorciser harm thee!
Nor no witchcraft charm thee! 20
Ghost unlaid forbear thee!
Nothing ill come near thee!
Quiet consummation have;
And renownéd be thy grave!

[FROM "THE TEMPEST"]

Full fathom five thy father lies.
Of his bones are coral made;
Those are pearls that were his eyes;
Nothing of him that doth fade
But doth suffer a sea change
Into something rich and strange.
Sea-nymphs hourly ring his knell:
Ding-dong!
Hark! now I hear them—Ding-dong, bell!

Sonnets

xii

When I do count the clock that tells the time,
 And see the brave day sunk in hideous night;
 When I behold the violet past prime,
 And sable curls all silver'd o'er with white;
 When lofty trees I see barren of leaves, 5
 Which erst from heat did canopy the herd,
 And summer's green all girded up in sheaves,
 Borne on the bier with white and bristly beard,
 Then of thy beauty do I question make, 10
 That thou among the wastes of time must go,
 Since sweets and beauties do themselves forsake
 And die as fast as they see others grow;

And nothing 'gainst Time's scythe can make defense

Save breed, to brave him when he takes thee hence.

xv

When I consider every thing that grows
 Holds in perfection but a little moment,
 That this huge stage presenteth nought but shows
 Whereon the stars in secret influence comment;
 When I perceive that men as plants increase, 5
 Cheered and check'd even by the self-same sky,
 Vaunt in their youthful sap, at height decrease,
 And wear their brave state out of memory;
 Then the conceit of this inconstant stay 10
 Sets you most rich in youth before my sight,
 Where wasteful Time debateth with Decay,
 To change your day of youth to sullied night;
 And all in war with Time for love of you,
 As he takes from you, I engraft you new.

xviii

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
 Thou art more lovely and more temperate:
 Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May,
 And summer's lease hath all too short a date;
 Sometime too hot the eye of heaven shines, 5
 And often is his gold complexion dimm'd;
 And every fair from fair sometime declines,
 By chance or nature's changing course untrimm'd;
 But thy eternal summer shall not fade,
 Nor lose possession of that fair thou owest; 10
 Nor shall Death brag thou wander'st in his shade,
 When in eternal lines to time thou grow'st:

So long as men can breathe, or eyes can see,
 So long lives this, and this gives life to thee.

xxix

When, in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes,
 I all alone bewEEP my outcast state

And trouble deaf heaven with my bootless cries
 And look upon myself and curse my fate,
 Wishing me like to one more rich in hope, 5
 Featured like him, like him with friends possessed,
 Desiring this man's art and that man's scope,
 With what I most enjoy contented least;
 Yet in these thoughts myself almost despising,
 Haply I think on thee, and then my state, 10
 Like to the lark at break of day arising
 From sullen earth, sings hymns at heaven's gate;
 For thy sweet love remembered such wealth brings

That then I scorn to change my state with kings.

xxx

When to the sessions of sweet silent thought
 I summon up remembrance of things past,
 I sigh the lack of many a thing I sought,
 And with old woes new wail my dear time's waste.
 Then can I drown an eye, unused to flow, 5
 For precious friends hid in death's dateless night,
 And weep afresh love's long since canceled woe,
 And moan the expense of many a vanished sight—
 Then can I grieve at grievances foregone,
 And heavily from woe to woe tell o'er 10
 The sad account of fore-bemoaned moan,
 Which I new pay as if not paid before.
 But if the while I think on thee, dear friend,
 All losses are restored and sorrows end.

xxxiii

Full many a glorious morning have I seen
 Flatter the mountain-tops with sovereign eye,
 Kissing with golden face the meadows green,
 Gilding pale streams with heavenly alchemy;
 Anon permit the basest clouds to ride 5
 With ugly rack on his celestial face,
 And from the forlorn world his visage hide,
 Stealing unseen to west with this disgrace.
 Even so my sun one early morn did shine
 With all-triumphant splendor on my brow; 10
 But out, alack! he was but one hour mine;
 The region cloud hath masked him from me now.
 Yet him for this my love no whit disdaineth;
 Suns of the world may stain when heaven's sun staineth.

lv

Not marble, nor the gilded monuments
 Of princes, shall outlive this powerful rhyme;
 But you shall shine more bright in these contents
 Than unswept stone, besmeared with sluttish time.
 When wasteful war shall statues overturn, 5
 And broils root out the work of masonry,

Nor Mars his sword nor war's quick fire shall burn
The living record of your memory.
'Gainst death and all-oblivious enmity Shall you pace forth; your praise shall still find room 10

Even in the eyes of all posterity
That wear this world out to the ending doom.
So, till the judgment that yourself arise,
You live in this, and dwell in lovers' eyes.

LXIV

When I have seen by Time's fell hand defaced
The rich-proud cost of outworn buried age;
When sometime lofty towers I see down-razed
And brass eternal slave to mortal rage;
When I have seen the hungry ocean gain 5
Advantage on the kingdom of the shore,
And the firm soil win of the watery main,
Increasing store with loss and loss with store;
When I have seen such interchange of state,
Or state itself confounded to decay; 10
Ruin hath taught me thus to ruminare,
That Time will come and take my love away.
This thought is as a death, which cannot choose
But weep to have that which it fears to lose.

LXV

Since brass, nor stone, nor earth, nor boundless sea,
But sad mortality o'er-sways their power,
How with this rage shall beauty hold a plea,
Whose action is no stronger than a flower?
O, how shall summer's honey breath hold out 5
Against the wreckful siege of battering days,
When rocks impregnable are not so stout,
Nor gates of steel so strong, but Time decays?
O fearful meditation! where, alack, 9
Shall Time's best jewel from Time's chest lie hid?
Or what strong hand can hold his swift foot back?
Or who his spoil of beauty can forbid?
O, none, unless this miracle have might,
That in black ink my love may still shine bright.

LXXI

No longer mourn for me when I am dead
Than you shall hear the surly, sullen bell
Give warning to the world that I am fled
From this vile world, with vilest worms to dwell.
Nay, if you read this line, remember not 5
The hand that writ it; for I love you so
That I in your sweet thoughts would be forgot
If thinking on me then should make you woe.
Oh, if, I say, you look upon this verse

When I perhaps compounded am with clay, 10
Do not so much as my poor name rehearse,
But let your love even with my life decay,
Lest the wise world should look into your moan
And mock you with me after I am gone.

LXXIII

That time of year thou mayst in me behold
When yellow leaves, or none, or few, do hang Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,
Bare ruined choirs, where late the sweet birds sang.
In me thou see'st the twilight of such day 5
As after sunset fadeth in the west,
Which by and by black night doth take away,
Death's second self, that seals up all in rest.
In me thou see'st the glowing of such fire 10
That on the ashes of his youth doth lie,
As the deathbed whereon it must expire,
Consumed with that which it was nourished by.
This thou perceivest, which makes thy love more strong,
To love that well which thou must leave ere long.

CVI

When in the chronicles of wasted time
I see descriptions of the fairest wights,
And beauty making beautiful old rhyme
In praise of ladies dead and lovely knights,
Then, in the blazon of sweet beauty's best, 5
Of hand, of foot, of lip, of eye, of brow,
I see their antique pen would have express'd
Even such a beauty as you master now.
So all their praises are but prophecies
Of this our time, all you prefiguring; 10
And, for they look'd but with divining eyes,
They had not skill enough your worth to sing:
For we, which now behold these present days,
Have eyes to wonder, but lack tongues to praise.

CVII

Not mine own fears, nor the prophetic soul
Of the wide world dreaming on things to come,
Can yet the lease of my true love control,
Supposed as forfeit to a confined doom.
The mortal moon hath her eclipse endured, 5
And the sad augurs mock their own presage;
Incertainties now crown themselves assured,
And peace proclaims olives of endless age.
Now with the drops of this most balmy time 9
My love looks fresh, and Death to me subscribes,
Since, spite of him, I'll live in this poor rhyme,
While he insults o'er dull and speechless tribes:

I will die, ere she shall grieve.
If she slight me when I woo,
I can scorn, and let her go!
For if she be not for me,
What care I for whom she be? 40

EDMUND WALLER

Go, Lovely Rose

Go, lovely Rose—
Tell her that wastes her time and me
That now she knows,
When I resemble her to thee,
How sweet and fair she seems to be. 5

Tell her that's young,
And shuns to have her graces spied,
That hadst thou sprung
In deserts where no men abide,
Thou must have uncommended died. 10

Small is the worth
Of beauty from the light retired;
Bid her come forth,
Suffer herself to be desired,
And not blush so to be admired, 15

Then die—that she
The common fate of all things rare
May read in thee;
How small a part of time they share
That are so wondrous sweet and fair! 20

JOHN DONNE

Song

Go and catch a falling star,
Get with child a mandrake root,
Tell me where all past years are,
Or who cleft the devil's foot;
Teach me to hear mermaids singing,
Or to keep off envy's stinging,
And find
What wind
Serves to advance an honest mind.
If thou be'st born to strange sights,
Things invisible go see,
Ride ten thousand days and nights
Till Age snow white hairs on thee;

Thou, when thou return'st, wilt tell me
All strange wonders that befell thee, 15
And swear
No where
Lives a woman true and fair.

If thou find'st one, let me know;
Such a pilgrimage were sweet. 20
Yet do not; I would not go,
Though at next door we might meet.
Though she were true when you met her,
And last till you write your letter,
Yet she 25
Will be False, ere I come, to two or three.

The Indifferent

I can love both fair and brown;
Her whom abundance melts, and her whom want betrays;
Her who loves loneliness best, and her who masks
and plays;
Her whom the country formed, and whom the town;
Her who believes, and her who tries; 5
Her who still weeps with spongy eyes,
And her who is dry cork and never cries.
I can love her, and her, and you, and you;
I can love any, so she be not true.

Will no other vice content you? 10
Will it not serve your turn to do as did your mothers?
Or have you all old vices spent and now would find out others?

Or doth a fear that men are true torment you?
O we are not, be not you so;
Let me—and do you—twenty know; 15
Rob me, but bind me not, and let me go.
Must I, who came to travel thorough you,
Grow your fixed subject, because you are true?

Venus heard me sigh this song;
And by love's sweetest part, variety, she swore 20
She heard not this till now; it should be so no
more.

She went, examined, and returned ere long,
And said, "Alas! some two or three Poor heretics in love there be,
Which think to stablish dangerous constancy. 25

Waller, Go, Lovely Rose. Edmund Waller (1606-1687) passed an active life as parliamentarian during the Civil Wars. He managed to remain in favor with both sides and wrote poems in praise of both Cromwell and Charles II.

Donne, Song. John Donne (1573-1631) first entered political life, but afterward took holy orders and became Dean of St. Paul's. He wrote many theological works as well as poems.

But I have told them, 'Since you will be true,
You shall be true to them who're false to you.'"

Love's Deity

I long to talk with some old lover's ghost
Who died before the god of love was born.
I cannot think that he who then loved most Sunk so low as to love one which did scorn.
But since this god produced a destiny
And that vice-nature, custom, lets it be,
I must love her that loves not me.

Sure, they which made him god, meant not so much,
Nor he in his young godhead practiced it.
But when an even flame two hearts did touch,
His office was indulgently to fit
Actives to passives. Correspondency
Only his subject was; it cannot be
Love till I love her who loves me.

But every modern god will now extend
His vast prerogative as far as Jove.
To rage, to lust, to write to, to commend,
All is the purlicu of the god of love.
O! were we wakened by this tyranny
To ungod this child again, it could not be
I should love her who loves not me.

Rebel and atheist too, why murmur I,
As though I felt the worst that love could do?
Love may make me leave loving, or might try
A deeper plague, to make her love me too;
Which, since she loves before, I'm loath to see.
Falsehood is worse than hate; and that must be,
If she whom I love, should love me.

ROBERT HERRICK

Corinna's Going a-Maying

Get up, get up for shame! The blooming morn
Upon her wings presents the god¹ unshorn.
See how Aurora throws her fair,
Fresh-quilted colors through the air.
Get up, sweet slug-a-bed, and see
The dew bespangling herb and tree!
Each flower has wept and bowed toward the east
Above an hour since, yet you not drest;

Nay! not so much as out of bed?
When all the birds have matins said
And sung their thankful hymns, 'tis sin,
Nay, profanation, to keep in,
Whereas a thousand virgins on this day
Spring sooner than the lark, to fetch in May.

Rise and put on your foliage, and be seen
To come forth, like the springtime, fresh and green,
And sweet as Flora. Take no care
For jewels for your gown or hair.
Fear not; the leaves will strew
Gems in abundance upon you.
Besides, the childhood of the day has kept
Against you come, some orient pearls unwept.
Come, and receive them while the light
Hangs on the dew-locks of the night;
And Titan on the eastern hill
Retires himself, or else stands still Till you come forth! Wash, dress, be brief in pray-
ing;
Few beads are best when once we go a-Maying.

Come, my Corinna, come; and coming, mark
How each field turns a street, each street a park,
Made green and trimmed with trees! see how Devotion gives each house a bough
Or branch! each porch, each door, ere this,
An ark, a tabernacle is,
Made up of whitethorn neatly interwove,
As if here were those cooler shades of love.
Can such delights be in the street
And open fields, and we not see't?
Come, we'll abroad; and let's obey
The proclamation made for May,
And sin no more, as we have done, by staying;
But, my Corinna, come, let's go a-Maying.

There's not a budding boy or girl this day
But is got up and gone to bring in May.
A deal of youth ere this is come Back, and with whitethorn laden home.
Some have dispatched their cakes and cream,
Before that we have left to dream;
And some have wept and wooed, and plighted
troth,
And chose their priest, ere we can cast off sloth.
Many a green-gown has been given,

Herrick, Corinna's Going a-Maying. A song sung on the morning of the first of May, when the boys and girls go out to gather flowers. Robert Herrick was born in London in 1591 and died at Dean Prior, Devonshire, in 1634. He studied law, but later entered holy orders and wrote his lyrics from his country parish.

¹ The sun in his glory. His locks (rays) are not shorn.

Many a kiss, both odd and even;
 Many a glance, too, has been sent
 From out the eye, love's firmament;
 Many a jest told of the keys betraying 55
 This night, and locks picked; yet we're not a-May-
 ing!

Come, let us go, while we are in our prime,
 And take the harmless folly of the time!
 We shall grow old apace, and die
 Before we know our liberty. 60
 Our life is short, and our days run
 As fast away as does the sun.
 And, as a vapor or a drop of rain,
 Once lost, can ne'er be found again,
 So when or you or I are made 65
 A fable, song, or fleeting shade,
 All love, all liking, all delight
 Lies drowned with us in endless night.
 Then, while time serves, and we are but decaying,
 Come, my Corinna, come, let's go a-Maying. 70

Upon Julia's Clothes

Whenas in silks my Julia goes,
 Then, then, methinks, how sweetly flows
 That liquefaction of her clothes.

Next, when I cast mine eyes and see
 That brave vibration each way free;
 O, how that glittering taketh me!

To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
 Old Time is still a-flying,
 And this same flower that smiles today
 Tomorrow will be dying.

The glorious lamp of heaven, the sun, 5
 The higher he's a-getting,
 The sooner will his race be run,
 And nearer he's to setting.

That age is best which is the first, 10
 When youth and blood are warmer;
 But being spent, the worse, and worst
 Times still succeed the former.

Then be not coy, but use your time,
 And while ye may, go marry;
 For having lost but once your prime, 15
 You may forever tarry.

To Daffodils

Fair daffodils, we weep to see
 You haste away so soon;
 As yet the early-rising sun
 Has not attained his noon. 5
 Stay, stay
 Until the hasting day
 Has run
 But to the evensong;
 And, having prayed together, we
 Will go with you along. 10

We have short time to stay, as you,
 We have as short a spring;
 As quick a growth to meet decay,
 As you, or anything. 15
 We die
 As your hours do, and dry
 Away
 Like to the summer's rain;
 Or as the pearls of morning's dew,
 Ne'er to be found again. 20

RICHARD LOVELACE

To Lucasta, Going to the Wars

Tell me not, Sweet, I am unkind,
 That from the nunnery
 Of thy chaste breast and quiet mind
 To war and arms I fly.

True, a new mistress now I chase, 5
 The first foe in the field;
 And with a stronger faith embrace
 A sword, a horse, a shield.

Yet this inconstancy is such
 As thou too shalt adore; 10
 I could not love thee, Dear, so much,
 Loved I not honor more.

To Althea, from Prison

When Love with unconfined wings
 Hovers within my gates,
 And my divine Althea brings
 To whisper at the grates; 5
 When I lie tangled in her hair
 And fettered to her eye,
 The birds that wanton in the air
 Know no such liberty.

Lovelace, To Lucasta. Richard Lovelace (1618-1658) was a very active royalist in the Civil Wars. He was born in Kent, was educated at Oxford, and died in poverty in London.

When flowing cups run swiftly round
 With no allaying Thames, 10
 Our careless heads with roses bound,
 Our hearts with loyal flames;
 When thirsty grief in wine we steep,
 When healths and drafts go free—
 Fishes that tipple in the deep 15
 Know no such liberty.

When, like committed linnets, I
 With shriller throat shall sing
 The sweetness, mercy, majesty,
 And glories of my King; 20
 When I shall voice aloud how good
 He is, how great should be,
 Enlargéd winds, that curl the flood,
 Know no such liberty.

Stone walls do not a prison make, 25
 Nor iron bars a cage;
 Minds innocent and quiet take
 That for an hermitage;
 If I have freedom in my love
 And in my soul am free, 30
 Angels alone, that soar above,
 Enjoy such liberty.

JOHN SUCKLING

Why So Pale and Wan, Fond Lover?

Why so pale and wan, fond lover?
 Prithee, why so pale?
 Will, when looking well can't move her,
 Looking ill prevail?
 Prithee, why so pale? 5

Why so dull and mute, young sinner?
 Prithee, why so mute?
 Will, when speaking well can't win her,
 Saying nothing do 't?
 Prithee, why so mute? 10

Quit, quit for shame! This will not move;
 This cannot take her.
 If of herself she will not love,
 Nothing can make her.
 The devil take her! 15

The Constant Lover

Out upon it, I have loved
 Three whole days together!

And am like to love three more,
 If it prove fair weather.

Time shall molt away his wings 5
 Ere he shall discover
 In the whole wide world again
 Such a constant lover.

But the spite on't is, no praise
 Is due at all to me; 10
 Love with me had made no stays,
 Had it any been but she.

Had it any been but she,
 And that very face,
 There had been at least ere this 15
 A dozen dozen in her place.

THOMAS CAREW

Disdain Returned

He that loves a rosy cheek,
 Or a coral lip admires,
 Or from star-like eyes doth seek
 Fuel to maintain his fires,
 As old Time makes these decay, 5
 So his flames must waste away.

But a smooth and steadfast mind,
 Gentle thoughts and calm desires,
 Hearts, with equal love combined,
 Kindle never-dying fires; 10
 Where these art not, I despise
 Lovely cheeks or lips or eyes.

No tears, Celia, now shall win,
 My resolved heart to return;
 I have searched thy soul within 15
 And find nought but pride and scorn;
 I have learned thy arts, and now
 Can disdain as much as thou!

The Protestation

No more shall meads be decked with flowers,
 Nor sweetness dwell in rosy bowers,
 Nor greenest buds on branches spring,
 Nor warbling birds delight to sing,
 Nor April violets paint the grove, 5
 If I forsake my Celia's love.

Suckling, Why So Pale. Sir John Suckling (1609-c. 1642) was a man of fashion about the court of Charles I, a soldier of fortune, and a royalist supporter. He wrote masques and lyrics.

Carew, Disdain Returned. Thomas Carew (c. 1598-1639) was educated at Oxford, led an idle and wandering life, part of it about the court of Charles I and as ambassador in Italy. He wrote masques and lyrics.

The fish shall in the ocean burn,
And fountains sweet shall bitter turn,
The humble oak no flood shall know
When floods shall highest hills o'erflow,
Black Lethe shall oblivion leave,
If e'er my Celia I deceive.

Love shall his bow and shaft lay by,
And Venus' doves want wings to fly
The Sun refuse to show his light,
And day shall then be turned to night,
And in that night no star appear,
If once I leave my Celia dear.

Love shall no more inhabit earth,
Nor lovers more shall love for worth,
Nor joy above in heaven dwell,
Nor pain torment poor souls in hell,
Grim death no more shall horrid prove,
If e'er I leave bright Celia's love.

GEORGE HERBERT

The Collar

I struck the board, and cry'd, "No more;
I will abroad!
What shall I ever sigh and pine?
My lines and life are free; free as the road,
Loose as the wind, as large as store.
Shall I be still in suit?
Have I no harvest but a thorn
To let me blood, and not restore
What I have lost with cordial fruit?
Sure there was wine
Before my sighs did dry it; there was corn
Before my tears did drown it;
Is the year only lost to me?
Have I no bays to crown it,
No flowers, no garlands gay? all blasted,
All wasted?
Not so, my heart; but there is fruit,
And thou hast hands.
Recover all thy sigh-blown age
On double pleasures; leave thy cold dispute
Of what is fit and not; forsake thy cage,
Thy rope of sands
Which petty thoughts have made; and made to thee
Good cable, to enforce and draw,
And be thy law,

While thou didst wink and wouldst not see.
Away! take heed;
I will abroad.
10 Call in thy death's-head there, tie up thy fears;
He that forbears 30
To suit and serve his need
Deserves his load."
But as I rav'd, and grew more fierce and wild
At every word,
15 Methought I heard one calling, "Child"; 35
And I reply'd, "My Lord."

The Pulley

When God at first made man,
20 Having a glass of blessing standing by;
Let us (said he) pour on him all we can:
Let the world's riches which dispersed lie
Contract into a span. 5

So strength first made a way;
Then beauty flow'd, then wisdom, honor, pleasure;
When almost all was out, God made a stay,
Perceiving that alone, of all his treasure,
Rest in the bottom lay. 10

For if I should (said he)
Bestow this jewel also on my creature,
He would adore my gifts instead of me,
5 And rest in Nature, not the God of Nature;
So both should losers be. 15

Yet let him keep the rest,
But keep them with repining restlessness:
10 Let him be rich and weary, that at least,
If goodness lead him not, yet weariness
May toss him to my breast. 20

HENRY VAUGHAN

The World

I saw Eternity the other night,
Like a great ring of pure and endless light,
All calm, as it was bright;
And round beneath it, Time, in hours, days, years,
Driven by the spheres 5
Like a vast shadow moved; in which the world
And all her train were hurled.
The doting lover in his quaintest strain
Did there complain;

Herbert, The Collar. George Herbert was born in Wales in 1593, the brother of Lord Herbert of Cherbury. He was educated at Cambridge and enjoyed a brilliant career at court. His last years he spent as a country rector in Wiltshire. He died there in 1633.

Vaughan, The World. Henry Vaughan (1621-1693) was a Welsh poet and mystic. He studied at Oxford and became a physician in Wales.

Near him, his lute, his fancy, and his flights, 10 A way there you might tread the sun, and be 55
 Wit's sour delights,
 More bright than hel
 With gloves, and knots, the silly snares of pleas-
 But, as I did their madness so discuss,
 ure,
 One whispered thus
 Yet his dear treasure,
 "This ring the Bridegroom did for none provide,
 All scattered lay, while he his eyes did pour
 But for his bride." 60
 Upon a flower. 15

ANDREW MARVELL

On a Drop of Dew

The darksome statesman, hung with weights and woe,
 Like a thick midnight-fog moved there so slow,
 He did not stay, nor go;
 Condemning thoughts, like sad eclipses, scowl
 Upon his soul, 20
 And clouds of crying witnesses without Pursued him with one shout.
 Yet digged the mole, and lest his ways be found,
 Worked under ground,
 Where he did clutch his prey; but one did see 25
 That policy;
 Churches and altars fed him; perjuries
 Were gnats and flies;
 It rained about him blood and tears, but he Drank them as free. 30

The fearful miser on a heap of rust
 Sat pining all his life there, did scarce trust
 His own hands with the dust,
 Yet would not place one piece above, but lives
 In fear of thieves. 35
 Thousands there were as frantic as himself,
 And hugged each one his pelf;
 The downright epicure placed heaven in sense,
 And scorned pretense;
 While others, slipped into a wide excess, 40
 Said little less;
 The weaker sort, slight, trivial wares enslave,
 Who think them brave;
 And poor, despised Truth sat counting by
 Their victory. 45

Yet some, who all this while did weep and sing,
 And sing and weep, soared up into the ring;
 But most would use no wing.
 O fools, said I, thus to prefer dark night
 Before true light! 50
 To live in grots and caves, and hate the day
 Because it shows the way,
 The way, which from this dead and dark abode
 Leads up to God;

See, how the orient dew,
 Shed from the bosom of the morn,
 Into the blowing roses,
 (Yet careless of its mansion new,
 For the clear region where 'twas born) 5
 Round in its self incloses:
 And in its little globe's extent,
 Frames as it can its native element.
 How it the purple flow'r does slight,
 Scarce touching where it lies, 10
 But gazing back upon the skies,
 Shines with a mournful light;
 Like its own tear,
 Because so long divided from the sphere.
 Restless it rolls and insecure, 15
 Trembling lest it grow impure:
 Till the warm sun pity its pain,
 And to the skies exhale it back again.
 So the soul, that drop, that ray
 Of the clear fountain of eternal day, 20
 Could it within the human flow'r be seen,
 Rememb'ring still its former height,
 Shuns the sweet leaves and blossoms green;
 And, recollecting its own light,
 Does, in its pure and circling thoughts, express 25
 The greater heaven in an heaven less.
 In how coy a figure wound,
 Every way it turns away:
 So the world excluding round,
 Yet receiving in the day, 30
 Dark beneath, but bright above:
 Here disdaining, there in love.
 How loose and easy hence to go:
 How girt and ready to ascend.
 Moving but on a point below, 35
 It all about does upwards bend,
 Such did the manna's sacred dew distill;
 White, and entire, though congeal'd and chill.
 Congeal'd on earth: but does, dissolving, run
 Into the glories of th' Almighty Sun. 40

Marvell, On a Drop of Dew. Andrew Marvell (1621-1678) was educated at Cambridge. During the Commonwealth he assisted Milton as Latin Secretary. He wrote satires directed against the restored Stuarts.

The Garden

I

How vainly men themselves amaze
To win the palm, the oak, or bays;
And their incessant labors see
Crown'd from some single herb or tree.
Whose short and narrow vergéd shade
Does prudently their toils upbraid;
While all flow'rs and all trees do close
To weave the garlands of repose.

II

Fair quiet, have I found thee here,
And innocence, thy sister dear!
Mistaken long, I sought you then
In busy companies of men.
Your sacred plants, if here below,
Only among the plants will grow.
Society is all but rude,
To this delicious solitude.

III

No white nor red was ever seen
So am'rous as this lovely green.
Fond lovers, cruel as their flame,
Cut in these trees their mistress' name.
Little, alas, they know, or heed,
How far these beauties hers exceed!
Fair trees! where soe'er your barks I wound,
No name shall but your own be found.

IV

When we have run our passion's heat,
Love hither makes his best retreat.
The gods, that mortal beauty chase,
Still in a tree did end their race.
Apollo hunted Daphne so,
Only that she might laurel grow.
And Pan did after Syrinx speed,
Not as a nymph, but for a reed.

V

What wondrous life is this I lead!
Ripe apples drop about my head;
And luscious clusters of the vine

Upon my mouth do crush their wine;
The nectarine, and curious peach,
Into my hands themselves do reach;
Stumbling on melons, as I pass,
Ensnared with flowers, I fall on grass.

VI

Meanwhile the mind, from pleasure less,
Withdraws into its happiness:
The mind, that ocean where each kind
Does straight its own resemblance find;
Yet it creates, transcending these,
Far other worlds, and other seas;
Annihilating all that's made
To a green thought in a green shade.

VII

Here at the fountain's sliding foot,
Or at some fruit tree's mossy root,
Casting the body's vest aside,
My soul into the boughs does glide:
There like a bird it sits, and sings,
Then whets, and combs its silver wings;
And, till prepared for longer flight,
Waves in its plumes the various light.

VIII

Such was that happy garden-state,
While man there walked without a mate:
After a place so pure, and sweet,
What other help could yet be meet!
But 'twas beyond a mortal's share
To wander solitary there:
Two paradises 'twere in one
To live in Paradise alone.

IX

How well the skillful gardener drew
Of flowers and herbs this dial new;
Where from above the milder sun
Does through a fragrant Zodiac run;
And, as it works, the industrious bee
Computes its time as well as we.
How could such sweet and wholesome hours
Be reckoned but with herbs and flowers!

THE POETRY OF MILTON

John Milton was born in London in 1608 of a well-to-do family. When he showed talent for poetry he was given every opportunity to prepare himself properly for a literary career. A careful education at Cambridge was shortly followed by some years of reading and quiet in the country and eventually by extensive travel in Italy. The rising conflict between the King and the Parliament brought Milton to the side of the latter. His poetic career was then interrupted, so that he wrote little except prose from 1640 to 1660. He served the government as Latin Secretary and in the 1650's gradually lost his sight. At the Restoration in 1660 Milton retired to the country and in the next years wrote his great epic poems, Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained, and the drama Samson Agonistes. He died in obscurity in 1674.

In the period of 1630-1640 we find that Milton had already learned to write great poetry. The large harmonies in the verse of Paradise Lost can already be heard in many parts of Lycidas, the pastoral elegy which Milton wrote on the death of Edward King.

In his companion poems, L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, he shows not only a facility with English verse but also an appreciation of a large variety of human experiences. Milton also wrote an important masque, Comus, in which he not only displays his ability with blank verse but writes some beautiful songs.

For the twenty years between 1640 and 1660 Milton was primarily a prose writer, but this poetic silence was occasionally broken by the appearance of a sonnet. Though the number of these sonnets is small, they are among the noblest in the language.

As soon as the duties of political office no longer pressed him, he devoted himself to his life-long ambition, the writing of a great epic poem. The result is Paradise Lost and its sequel, Paradise Regained. The sonorous powers of the English language have never been employed with as great mastery as Milton attains throughout these poems. Paradise Lost is the great expression of Protestant Christianity, just as Dante's Divine Comedy is the expression of Roman Catholicism.

In his last years Milton wrote a drama after the manner of the Greeks. In Samson Agonistes he gives the tragedy of the blind hero in which the sympathetic reader will not fail to see a reflection of the great trials of the blind poet.

JOHN MILTON

Lycidas

In this Monody the Author bewails a learned Friend, unfortunately drowned in his passage from Chester on the Irish Seas, 1637; and by occasion, foretells the ruin of our corrupted Clergy, then in their height.

Yet once more, O ye laurels, and once more,
Ye myrtles brown, with ivy never sear,
I come to pluck your berries harsh and crude,
And with forced fingers rude
Shatter your leaves before the mellowing year. 5
Bitter constraint and sad occasion dear
Compels me to disturb your season due;
For Lycidas is dead, dead ere his prime,
Young Lycidas, and hath not left his peer.
Who would not sing for Lycidas? He knew 10
Himself to sing, and build the lofty rime.
He must not float upon his watery bier
Unwept, and welter to the parching wind,
Without the meed of some melodious tear.

Begin, then, Sisters of the sacred well,¹ 15
That from beneath the seat of Jove doth spring;
Begin, and somewhat loudly sweep the string.
Hence with denial vain and coy excuse;
So may some gentle muse
With lucky words favor my destined urn, 20
And as he passes turn
And bid fair peace be to my sable shroud!

For we were nursed upon the selfsame hill,²
Fed the same flock, by fountain, shade, and rill;
Together both, ere the high lawns appeared 25
Under the opening eyelids of the Morn,
We drove afield, and both together heard
What time the gray-fly winds her sultry horn,
Battening our flocks with the fresh dews of night,
Oft till the star that rose at evening, bright, 30
Toward heaven's descent had sloped his westering wheel.

Meanwhile the rural ditties were not mute,
Tempered to the oaten flute;
Rough Satyrs danced, and Fauns with cloven heel
From the glad sound would not be absent long;
And old Damoetas loved to hear our song. 36

But, oh! the heavy change, now thou art gone,
Now thou art gone, and never must return!
Thee, Shepherd, thee the woods and desert caves,
With wild thyme and the gadding vine o'ergrown,
And all their echoes, mourn. 41

The willows, and the hazel copses green,
Shall now no more be seen
Fanning their joyous leaves to thy soft lays.
As killing as the canker to the rose, 45
Or taint-worm to the weanling herds that graze,
Or frost to flowers, that their gay wardrobe wear,
When first the white-thorn blows—
Such, Lycidas, thy loss to Shepherd's ear.

Where were ye, Nymphs, when the remorseless 50 deep
Closed o'er the head of your loved Lycidas?
For neither were ye playing on the steep
Where your old bards, the famous Druids, lie,
Nor on the shaggy top of Mona³ high,
Nor yet where Deva spreads her wizard stream. 56
Aye me! I fondly dream
"Had ye been there"—for what could that have done?

What could the Muse herself that Orpheus bore,
The Muse herself, for her enchanting son,
Whom universal nature did lament, 60
When, by the rout that made the hideous roar,
His gory visage down the stream was sent,
Down the swift Hebrus to the Lesbian shore?

Alas! what boots it with uncessant care 65
To tend the homely, slighted shepherd's trade,
And strictly meditate the thankless Muse?
Were it not better done as others use,
To sport with Amaryllis in the shade,
Or with the tangles of Neæra's hair?
Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise (That last infirmity of noble mind) 71
To scorn delights, and live laborious days;
But, the fair guerdon when we hope to find,
And think to burst out into sudden blaze, 74
Comes the blind Fury with the abhorréd shears,

¹ The Muses, who had their home in the Picrian Spring near Mt. Olympus.

² They went to college together at Cambridge. Here they are compared to shepherds in the usual manner of the pastoral.

³ Mona (the island of Anglesey), Deva (the River Dee).

And slits the thin-spun life. "But not the praise," Phœbus replied, and touched my trembling ears;
"Fame is no plant that grows on mortal soil,
Nor in the glistening foil
Set off to the world, nor in broad rumor lies, 80
But lives and spreads aloft by those pure eyes
And perfect witness of all-judging Jove;
As he pronounces lastly on each deed,
Of so much fame in heaven expect thy meed." 84

O fountain Arethuse,⁴ and thou honored flood,
Smooth-sliding Mincius, crowned with vocal reeds,
That strain I heard was of a higher mood.

But now my oar⁵ proceeds,
And listens to the Herald of the Sea
That came in Neptune's plea. 90

He asked the waves, and asked the felon winds,
What hard mishap hath doomed this gentle swain!
And questioned every gust of rugged wings
That blows from off each beakéd promontory.

They knew not of his story; 95
And sage Hippotades⁷ their answer brings,
That not a blast was from his dungeon strayed;
The air was calm, and on the level brine
Sleek Panope with all her sisters⁸ played.

It was that fatal and perfidious bark, 100
Built in the eclipse, and rigged with curses dark,
That sunk so low that sacred head of thine.

Next, Camus,⁹ reverend sire, went footing slow,
His mantle hairy, and his bonnet sedge,
Inwrought with figures dim, and on the edge 105
Like to that sanguine flower inscribed with woe.
"Ah! who hath reft," quoth he, "my dearest pledge?"

Last came, and last did go,
The Pilot of the Galilean Lake;¹⁰
Two massy keys he bore of metals twain 110
(The golden opes, the iron shuts amain).
He shook his mitered locks, and stern bespake:
"How well could I have spared for thee, young swain,

Enow of such as, for their bellies' sake,
Creep, and intrude, and climb into the fold! 115
Of other care they little reckoning make
Than how to scramble at the shearers' feast,
And shove away the worthy bidden guest.

Blind mouths! that scarce themselves know how to hold

A sheep-hook, or have learned aught else the least
That to the faithful herdman's art belongs! 121
What recks it them? What need they? They are sped;

And, when they list, their lean and flashy songs
Grate on their scrannel pipes of wretched straw;
The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed, 125
But, swoln with wind and the rank mist they draw,

Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread;
Besides what the grim wolf¹¹ with privy paw
Daily devours apace, and nothing said.
But that two-handed engine at the door 130
Stands ready to smite once, and smite no more."

Return, Alpheus, the dread voice is past
That shrunk thy streams; return, Sicilian Muse,
And call the vales, and bid them hither cast
Their bells and flowerets of a thousand hues. 135
Ye valleys low, where the mild whispers use
Of shades, and wanton winds, and gushing brooks,
On whose fresh lap the swart star sparely looks,
Throw hither all your quaint enameled eyes,
That on the green turf suck the honeyed showers,
And purple all the ground with vernal flowers. 141
Bring the rathe primrose that forsaken dies,
The tufted crow-toe, and pale jessamine,
The white pink, and the pansy freaked with jet,
The glowing violet, 145
The musk-rose, and the well-attired woodbine,
With cowslips wan that hang the pensive head,
And every flower that sad embroidery wears;
Bid amaranthus all his beauty shed,
And daffadillies fill their cups with tears, 150
To strew the laureate hearse where Lycid lies.

For so, to interpose a little ease,
Let our frail thoughts dally with false surmise.
Aye me! Whilst thee the shores and sounding seas
Wash far away, where'er thy bones are hurled,
Whether beyond the stormy Hebrides, 156
Where thou perhaps under the whelming tide
Visit'st the bottom of the monstrous world;
Or whether thou, to our moist vows denied,
Sleep'st by the fable of Bellerus¹² old, 160

⁴ Arethuse, Mincius (rivers alluded to by Virgil in his pastorals).

⁵ Flute.

⁶ Triton.

⁷ Hippotades (Æolus, god of the winds).

⁸ Daughters of the sea-god Nereus.

⁹ Camus (the River Cam at Cambridge), sanguine flower (hyacinth, supposed to bear on itself the Greek word for "alas").

¹⁰ Saint Peter, who bears the keys of heaven and wears the miter as first bishop of Rome.

¹¹ The church of Rome.

¹² Bellerus was said to have lived at Land's End, Cornwall, near where St. Michael's Mount faces cities in France and Spain.

Where the great Vision of the guarded mount Looks toward Namancos and Bayona's hold.
Look homeward, Angel, now, and melt with ruth;
And, O ye dolphins, waft the hapless youth.

Weep no more, woeful shepherds, weep no
more, 165

For Lycidas, your sorrow, is not dead,
Sunk though he be beneath the watery floor;
So sinks the day-star in the ocean bed,
And yet anon repairs his drooping head,
And tricks his beams, and with new-spangled ore
Flames in the forehead of the morning sky. 171
So Lycidas sunk low, but mounted high,
Through the dear might of Him that walked the waves,

Where, other groves and other streams along,
With nectar pure his oozy locks he laves, 175
And hears the unexpressive nuptial song,

In the blest kingdoms meek of joy and love.
There entertain him all the Saints above,
In solemn troops, and sweet societies,
That sing, and singing in their glory move, 180
And wipe the tears forever from his eyes.

Now, Lycidas, the shepherds weep no more;
Henceforth thou art the Genius of the shore,
In thy large recompense, and shalt be good
To all that wander in that perilous flood. 185

Thus sang the uncouth swain to the oaks and rills,

While the still morn went out with sandals gray;
He touched the tender stops of various quills,
With eager thought warbling his Doric lay.
And now the sun had stretched out all the hills,
And now was dropped into the western bay. 190
At last he rose, and twitched his mantle blue;
Tomorrow to fresh woods and pastures new.

L'Allegro

Hence, loathéd Melancholy,
Of Cerberus and blackest Midnight born
In Stygian cave forlorn
'Mongst horrid shapes, and shrieks, and sights unholy!

Find out some uncouth cell, 5
Where brooding Darkness spreads his jealous wings,

And the night-raven sings;
There, under ebon shades and low-browed rocks,
As ragged as thy locks,

In dark Cimmerian desert ever dwell. 10
But come, thou Goddess fair and free,

In heaven yclept Euphrosyne,
And by men heart-easing Mirth,
Whom lovely Venus, at a birth,

With two sister Graces more, 15
To ivy-crownéd Bacchus bore;
Or whether—as some sager sing—

The frolic wind that breathes the spring,
Zephyr, with Aurora playing,
As he met her once a-Maying, 20
There, on beds of violets blue,

And fresh-blown roses washed in dew,

Filled her with thee, a daughter fair,
So buxom, blithe, and debonair.
Haste thee, Nymph, and bring with thee 25
Jest and youthful Jollity,

Quips and cranks and wanton wiles,
Nods and becks and wreathéd smiles,
Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
And love to live in dimple sleek; 30

Sport that wrinkled Care derides,
And Laughter holding both his sides.
Come, and trip it, as you go,

On the light, fantastic toe;
And in thy right hand lead with thee 35
The mountain-nymph, sweet Liberty;

And, if I give thee honor due,
Mirth, admit me of thy crew,
To live with her, and live with thee, 40

In unreprieved pleasures free:
To hear the lark begin his flight,
And, singing, startle the dull night,

From his watch-tower in the skies,
Till the dappled dawn doth rise; 45
Then to come, in spite of sorrow,

And at my window bid good-morrow,

Milton, L'Allegro. In this poem and in the next Milton contrasts the desirable life as it would appear to the lighthearted and to the contemplative man. Most of the mythological references have been explained in the Myths of Greece and Rome, p. 12.

Through the sweet-brier or the vine
 Or the twisted eglantine;
 While the cock, with lively din,
 Scatters the rear of darkness thin,
 And to the stack, or the barn-door,
 Stoutly struts his dames before;
 Oft listening how the hounds and horn
 Cheerly rouse the slumbering morn,
 From the side of some hoar hill,
 Through the high wood echoing shrill;
 Sometime walking, not unseen,
 By hedgerow elms, on hillocks green,
 Right against the eastern gate,
 Where the great Sun begins his state,
 Robed in flames and amber light,
 The clouds in thousand liveries dight;
 While the plowman, near at hand,
 Whistles o'er the furrowed land,
 And the milkmaid singeth blithe,
 And the mower whets his scythe,
 And every shepherd tells his tale¹
 Under the hawthorn in the dale.
 Straight mine eye hath caught new pleasures,
 Whilst the landskip round it measures:
 Russet lawns, and fallows gray,
 Where the nibbling flocks do stray;
 Mountains on whose barren breast
 The laboring clouds do often rest;
 Meadows trim, with daisies pied;
 Shallow brooks and rivers wide;
 Towers and battlements it sees
 Bosomed high in tufted trees,
 Where perhaps some beauty lies,
 The cynosure of neighboring eyes.
 Hard by, a cottage chimney smokes
 From betwixt two aged oaks,
 Where Corydon and Thyrsis met
 Are at their savory dinner set
 Of herbs and other country messes,
 Which the neat-handed Phyllis dresses;
 And then in haste her bower she leaves
 With Thestylis to bind the sheaves;
 Or, if the earlier season lead,
 To the tanned haycock in the mead.
 Sometimes, with secure delight,
 The upland hamlets will invite,
 When the merry bells ring round,
 And the jocund rebecks sound
 To many a youth and many a maid
 Dancing in the checkered shade;

And young and old come forth to play
 On a sunshine holiday,
 Till the livelong daylight fail;
 50 Then to the spicy nut-brown ale,
 100 With stories told of many a feat,
 How Faëry Mab² the junkets eat.
 She was pinched and pulled, she said;
 And he, by Friar's lantern led,
 55 Tells how the drudging goblin sweat
 105 To earn his cream-bowl duly set,
 When in one night, ere glimpse of morn,
 His shadowy flail hath threshed the corn
 That ten day-laborers could not end;
 60 Then lies him down, the lubber-fiend,
 110 And, stretched out all the chimney's length,
 Basks at the fire his hairy strength,
 And crop-full out of doors he flings,
 Ere the first cock his matin rings.
 65 Thus done the tales, to bed they creep,
 115 By whispering winds soon lulled asleep.
 Towered cities please us then,
 And the busy hum of men,
 Where throngs of knights and barons bold,
 70 In weeds of peace, high triumphs hold,
 120 With store of ladies, whose bright eyes
 Rain influence, and judge the prize
 Of wit or arms, while both contend
 To win her grace whom all commend.
 75 There let Hymen oft appear
 125 In saffron robe, with taper clear,
 And pomp, and feast, and revelry,
 With masque and antique pageantry;
 Such sights as youthful poets dream
 80 On summer eves by haunted stream.
 130 Then to the well-trod stage anon,
 If Jonson's learned sock be on,
 Or sweetest Shakespeare, Fancy's child,
 Warble his native wood-notes wild.
 85 And ever, against eating cares,
 135 Lap me in soft Lydian airs,
 Married to immortal verse,
 Such as the meeting soul may pierce,
 In notes with many a winding bout
 90 Of linked sweetness long drawn out
 140 With wanton heed and giddy cunning,
 The melting voice through mazes running,
 Untwisting all the chains that tie
 The hidden soul of harmony;
 95 That Orpheus' self may heave his head
 145 From golden slumber on a bed

¹ Counts his flock.² Mab (queen of the fairies), Friar's lantern (will-o'-the-wisp).

Of heaped Elysian flowers, and hear
Such strains as would have won the ear
Of Pluto to have quite set free

His half-regained Eurydice.
These delights if thou canst give,
Mirth, with thee I mean to live.

150

Il Penseroso

Hence, vain, deluding Joys,
The brood of Folly without father bred!
How little you bestéd,
Or fill the fixé mind with all your toys!
Dwell in some idle brain,
And fancies fond with gaudy shapes possess,
As thick and numberless
As the gay motes that people the sunbeams,
Or likest hovering dreams,
The fickle pensioners of Morpheus' train.
But, hail! thou Goddess, sage and holy!
Hail, divinest Melancholy!
Whose saintly visage is too bright
To hit the sense of human sight,
And therefore to our weaker view,
O'erlaid with black, staid Wisdom's hue;
Black, but such as in esteem
Prince Memnon's sister¹ might beseem,
Or that starred Ethiop queen that strove
To set her beauty's praise above
The Sea-nymphs, and their powers offended.
Yet thou art higher far descended;
Thee bright-haired Vesta long of yore
To solitary Saturn bore;
His daughter she; in Saturn's reign
Such mixture was not held a stain.
Oft in glimmering bowers and glades
He met her, and in secret shades
Of woody Ida's inmost grove,
Whilst yet there was no fear of Jove.
Come, pensive Nun, devout and pure,
Sober, steadfast, and demure,
All in a robe of darkest grain,
Flowing with majestic train,
And sable stole of cypress lawn
Over thy decent shoulders drawn.
Come; but keep thy wonted state
With even step, and musing gait,
And looks commercing with the skies
Thy rapt soul sitting in thine eyes;

There, held in holy passion still,
Forget thyself to marble, till
With a sad, leaden, downward cast
Thou fix them on the earth as fast.
5 And join with thee calm Peace and Quiet,
Spare Fast, that oft with gods doth diet,
And hears the Muses in a ring
Aye round about Jove's altar sing;
And add to these retiréd Leisure,
10 That in trim gardens takes his pleasure;
But, first and chiefest, with thee bring
Him that yon soars on golden wing,
Guiding the fiery-wheeléd throne,
The cherub Contemplation;
15 And the mute Silence hist along,
'Less Philomel will deign a song,
In her sweetest, saddest plight,
Smoothing the rugged brow of Night,
While Cynthia checks her dragon yoke
20 Gently o'er the accustomed oak.
Sweet bird, that shunn'st the noise of folly,
Most musical, most melancholy!
Thee, chauntress, oft the woods among
I woo, to hear thy evensong;
25 And, missing thee, I walk unseen
On the dry, smooth-shaven green,
To behold the wandering moon
Riding near her highest noon,
Like one that had been led astray
30 Through the heaven's wide, pathless way,
And oft, as if her head she bowed,
Stooping through a fleecy cloud.
Oft, on a plat of rising ground,
I hear the far-off curfew sound,
35 Over some wide-watered shore,
Swinging slow with sullen roar;
Or, if the air will not permit,
Some still, removéd place will fit,
Where glowing embers through the room
40 Teach light to counterfeit a gloom,

80

¹ Sister of the handsome Prince Memnon, ally of the Trojan. The Ethiop queen was Cassiopeia who was punished by being made into a constellation.

Far from all resort of mirth,
 Save the cricket on the hearth,
 Or the bellman's drowsy charm
 To bless the doors from nightly harm.
 Or let my lamp, at midnight hour,
 Be seen in some high, lonely tower,
 Where I may oft outwatch the Bear,
 With thrice-great Hermes,² or unsphere
 The spirit of Plato, to unfold
 What worlds or what vast regions hold
 The immortal mind that hath forsook
 Her mansion in this fleshly nook;
 And of those demons that are found
 In fire, air, flood, or underground,
 Whose power hath a true consent
 With planet or with element.
 Sometime let gorgeous Tragedy
 In sceptered pall come sweeping by,
 Presenting Thebes, or Pelops' line,
 Or the tale of Troy divine.
 Or what—though rare—of later age
 Ennobled hath the buskined stage.
 But, O sad Virgin! that thy power
 Might raise Musæus from his bower;
 Or bid the soul of Orpheus sing
 Such notes as, warbled to the string,
 Drew iron tears down Pluto's cheek,
 And made Hell grant what love did seek;
 Or call up him that left half told
 The story of Cambuscan bold,³
 Of Camball, and of Algarsife,
 And who had Canace to wife,
 That owned the virtuous ring and glass,
 And of the wondrous horse of brass
 On which the Tartar king did ride;
 And if aught else great bards beside
 In sage and solemn tunes have sung,
 Of tourneys, and of trophies hung,
 Of forests, and enchantments drear,
 Where more is meant than meets the ear.
 Thus, Night, oft see me in thy pale career,
 Till civil-suited Morn appear,
 Not tricked and frownced, as she was wont
 With the Attic boy to hunt,
 But kerchiefed in a comely cloud,
 While rocking winds are piping loud,
 Or ushered with a shower still,
 When the gust hath blown his fill,
 Ending on the rustling leaves,
 With minute-drops from off the eaves.

And, when the sun begins to fling
 His flaring beams, me, Goddess, bring
 To archéd walks of twilight groves,
 And shadows brown, that Silvan loves,
 85 Of pine, or monumental oak, 135
 Where the rude ax with heavéd stroke
 Was never heard the nymphs to daunt,
 Or fright them from their hallowed haunt.
 There in close covert, by some brook,
 90 Where no profaner eye may look, 140
 Hide me from day's garish eye,
 While the bee with honeyed thigh,
 That at her flowery work doth sing,
 And the waters murmuring,
 95 With such consort as they keep, 145
 Entice the dewy-feathered Sleep.
 And let some strange, mysterious dream
 Wave at his wings, in airy stream
 Of lively portraiture displayed,
 100 Softly on my eyelids laid; 150
 And, as I wake, sweet music breathe
 Above, about, or underneath,
 Sent by some Spirit to mortals good,
 Or the unseen Genius of the wood.
 105 But let my due feet never fail 155
 To walk the studious cloister's pale,
 And love the high embowéd roof,
 With antique pillars massy-proof,
 And storied windows richly dight,
 110 Casting a dim, religious light. 160
 There let the pealing organ blow,
 To the full-voiced choir below,
 In service high and anthems clear,
 As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
 Dissolve me into ecstasies,
 115 And bring all heaven before mine eyes. 165
 And may at last my weary age
 Find out the peaceful hermitage
 The hairy gown and mossy cell,
 Where I may sit and rightly spell
 120 Of every star that heaven doth shew, 170
 And every herb that sips the dew,
 Till old experience do attain
 To something like prophetic strain.
 These pleasures, Melancholy, give,
 125 And I with thee will choose to live. 175

On His Having Arrived at the Age of Twenty-three

How soon hath Time, the subtle thief of youth,
 130 Stolen on his wing my three and twentieth year!

² Hermes Trismegistus (thrice great), a mythical Egyptian king and magician.

³ This refers to the unfinished Squire's Tale in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales.

My hasting days fly on with full career,
 But my late spring no bud or blossom shew'th.
 Perhaps my semblance might deceive the truth 5
 That I to manhood am arrived so near;
 And inward ripeness doth much less appear,
 That some more timely-happy spirits endu'th.
 Yet be it less or more, or soon or slow,
 It shall be still in strictest measure even 10
 To that same lot, however mean or high,
 Toward which Time leads me, and the will of Heaven;

All is, if I have grace to use it so,
 As ever in my great Task-Master's eye.

When the Assault Was Intended to the City

Captain, or Colonel, or Knight in arms,
 Whose chance on these defenseless doors may seize,

If ever deed of honor did thee please,
 Guard them, and him within protect from harms.
 He can requite thee; for he knows the charms 5
 That call fame on such gentle acts as these,
 And he can spread thy name o'er lands and seas,
 Whatever clime the sun's bright circle warms.
 Lift not thy spear against the Muses' bower;
 The great Emathian conqueror¹ bid spare 10
 The house of Pindarus, when temple and tower
 Went to the ground; and the repeated air
 Of sad Electra's poet had the power
 To save the Athenian walls from ruin bare.

To the Lord General Cromwell, May, 1652

ON THE PROPOSALS OF CERTAIN MINISTERS AT THE COMMITTEE FOR PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL

Cromwell, our chief of men, who through a cloud
 Not of war only, but detractions rude,
 Guided by faith and matchless fortitude,
 To peace and truth thy glorious way hast plowed,
 And on the neck of crowned Fortune proud 5
 Hast reared God's trophies, and his work pursued, While Darwen² stream, with blood of Scots imbru'd,
 And Dunbar field resounds thy praises loud,

And Worcester's laureate wreath. Yet much remains

To conquer still; peace hath her victories 10
 No less renowned than war; new foes arise,
 Threatening to bind our souls with secular chains.
 Help us to save free conscience from the paw
 Of hireling wolves, whose gospel is their maw.

On the Late Massacre in Piedmont

Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones

Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold;
 Even them who kept thy truth so pure of old,
 When all our fathers worshiped stocks and stones,
 Forget not; in thy book record their groans 5
 Who were thy sheep, and in their ancient fold
 Slain by the bloody Piedmontese, that rolled Mother with infant down the rocks. Their moans
 The vales redoubled to the hills, and they
 To heaven. Their martyred blood and ashes 10 sow

O'er all the Italian fields, where still doth sway
 The triple tyrant; that from these may grow
 A hundredfold, who, having learnt thy way,
 Early may fly the Babylonian woe.

On His Blindness

When I consider how my light is spent
 Ere half my days, in this dark world and wide,
 And that one talent which is death to hide Lodged with me useless, though my soul more bent

To serve therewith my Maker, and present 5
 My true account, lest he returning chide;
 "Doth God exact day-labor, light denied?"
 I fondly ask. But Patience, to prevent
 That murmur, soon replies, "God doth not need
 Either man's work or his own gifts. Who best 10
 Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best. His state
 Is kingly; thousands at his bidding speed,
 And post o'er land and ocean without rest;
 They also serve who only stand and wait."

¹ Alexander the Great. Sad Electra's poet is Sophocles.

² This and the following are names of battles in the English Civil War.

Paradise Lost

BOOK I

ARGUMENT

This First Book proposes, first in brief, the whole subject,—Man's disobedience, and the loss thereupon of Paradise, wherein he was placed: then touches the prime cause of his fall,—the serpent, or rather Satan in the serpent; who, revolting from God, and drawing to his side many legions of angels, was, by the command of God, driven out of heaven, with all his crew, into the great deep. Which action passed over, the poem hastens into the midst of things, presenting Satan, with his angels, now fallen into hell, described here, not in the center (for heaven and earth may be supposed as yet not made, certainly not yet accursed), but in a place of utter darkness, fitliest called Chaos: here Satan with his angels, lying on the burning lake, thunderstruck and astonished, after a certain space recovers, as from confusion; calls up him who next in order and dignity lay by him. They confer of their miserable fall; Satan awakens all his legions, who lay till then in the same manner confounded. They rise; their numbers; array of battle; their chief leaders named, according to the idols known afterwards in Canaan and the countries adjoining. To these Satan directs his speech, comforts them with hope yet of regaining heaven, but tells them lastly of a new world and new kind of creature to be created, according to an ancient prophecy, or report, in heaven—for, that the angels were long before this visible creation, was the opinion of many ancient fathers. To find out the truth of this prophecy, and what to determine thereon, he refers to a full council. What his associates thence attempt. Pandemonium, the palace of Satan, rises, suddenly built out of the deep: the infernal peers there sit in council.

Of Man's first disobedience, and the fruit
Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world, and all our woe,
With loss of Eden, till one greater Man
Restore us, and regain the blissful seat, 5
Sing, heavenly Muse, that on the secret top
Of Oreb, or of Sinai, did'st inspire
That shepherd, who first taught the chosen seed,
In the beginning how the heavens and earth
Rose out of chaos: or, if Sion hill 10
Delight thee more; and Siloa's brook that flowed Fast by the oracle of God, I thence Invoke thy aid to my adventurous song,

That with no middle flight intends to soar
Above the Aonian mount, while it pursues 15
Things unattempted yet in prose or rime.
And chiefly thou, O Spirit, that dost prefer
Before all temples the upright heart and pure,
Instruct me, for thou know'st; thou from the first
Wast present, and, with mighty wings outspread,
Dove-like, sat'st brooding on the vast abyss, 21
And mad'st it pregnant: what in me is dark,
Illumine; what is low, raise and support;
That to the height of this great argument
I may assert eternal Providence, 25
And justify the ways of God to men.

Say first—for heaven hides nothing from thy view,

Nor the deep tract of hell—say first, what cause
Moved our grand Parents, in that happy state,
Favored of Heaven so highly, to fall off 30
From their Creator, and transgress his will
For one restraint, lords of the world besides.
Who first seduced them to that foul revolt?

The infernal Serpent; he it was, whose guile,
Stirred up with envy and revenge, deceived 35
The mother of mankind; what time his pride
Had cast him out from heaven, with all his host
Of rebel angels; by whose aid, aspiring
To set himself in glory above his peers,
He trusted to have equaled the Most High, 40
If he opposed; and, with ambitious aim
Against the throne and monarchy of God,
Raised impious war in heaven, and battle proud,
With vain attempt. Him the Almighty Power
Hurled headlong flaming from the ethereal sky,
With hideous ruin and combustion, down 46
To bottomless perdition; there to dwell
In adamant chains and penal fire,
Who durst defy the Omnipotent to arms.

Nine times the space that measures day and
night 50

To mortal men, he with his horrid crew
Lay vanquished, rolling in the fiery gulf,
Confounded, though immortal. But his doom
Reserved him to more wrath; for now the thought
Both of lost happiness and lasting pain 55
Torments him; round he throws his baleful eyes,
That witnessed huge affliction and dismay,
Mixed with obdurate pride, and steadfast hate.
At once, as far as angels' ken, he views

The dismal situation waste and wild. 60
 A dungeon horrible, on all sides round,
 As one great furnace, flamed; yet from those flames
 No light; but rather darkness visible
 Served only to discover sights of woe,
 Regions of sorrow, doleful shades, where peace 65
 And rest can never dwell; hope never comes
 That comes to all; but torture without end
 Still urges, and a fiery deluge, fed
 With ever-burning sulphur unconsumed.
 Such place eternal justice had prepared 70
 For those rebellious; here their prison ordained
 In utter darkness, and their portion set
 As far removed from God and light of heaven,
 As from the center thrice to the utmost pole. 74
 O, how unlike the place from whence they fell!
 There the companions of his fall, o'erwhelmed
 With floods and whirlwinds of tempestuous fire,
 He soon discerns; and weltering by his side
 One next himself in power, and next in crime,
 Long after known in Palestine, and named 80
 Beelzebub. To whom the arch-enemy,
 And thence in heaven called Satan, with bold words
 Breaking the horrid silence, thus began:—
 "If thou beest he—but O, how fall'n! how changed
 From him who, in the happy realms of light, 85
 Clothed with transcendent brightness, didst outshine
 Myriads, though bright! If he, whom mutual league,
 United thoughts and counsels, equal hope
 And hazard in the glorious enterprise,
 Joined with me once, now misery hath joined 90
 In equal ruin; into what pit thou seest
 From what height fall'n, so much the stronger proved
 He with his thunder: and till then who knew
 The force of those dire arms? Yet not for those,
 Nor what the potent victor in his rage 95
 Can else inflict, do I repent or change,
 Though changed in outward luster, that fixed
 mind,
 And high disdain from sense of injured merit,
 That with the Mightiest raised me to contend,
 And to the fierce contention brought along 100
 Innumerable force of spirits armed,
 That durst dislike his reign, and, me preferring
 His utmost power with adverse power opposed
 In dubious battle on the plains of heaven,
 And shook his throne. What though the field be lost? 105
 All is not lost; the unconquerable will,
 And study of revenge, immortal hate,
 And courage never to submit or yield,
 And what is else not to be overcome;
 That glory never shall his wrath or might 110
 Extort from me. To bow and sue for grace
 With suppliant knee, and deify his power
 Who from the terror of this arm so late
 Doubted his empire—that were low indeed,
 That were an ignominy, and shame beneath 115
 This downfall; since, by fate, the strength of gods,
 And this empyreal substance, cannot fail:
 Since, through experience of this great event,
 In arms not worse, in foresight much advanced,
 We may with more successful hope resolve 120
 To wage by force or guile eternal war,
 Irreconcilable to our grand foe,
 Who now triumphs, and, in the excess of joy
 Sole reigning, holds the tyranny of heaven." 124
 So spake the apostate angel, though in pain,
 Vaunting aloud, but racked with deep despair
 And him thus answered soon his bold compeer:—
 "O prince, O chief of many-thronèd powers
 That led the embattled seraphim to war
 Under thy conduct and in dreadful deeds 130
 Fearless, endangered heaven's perpetual King,
 And put to proof his high supremacy,
 Whether upheld by strength, or chance, or fate;
 Too well I see, and rue the dire event,
 That with sad overthrow, and foul defeat, 135
 Hath lost us heaven, and all this mighty host
 In horrible destruction laid thus low,
 As far as gods and heavenly essences
 Can perish: for the mind and spirit remain
 Invincible, and vigor soon returns, 140
 Though all our glory extinct, and happy state
 Here swallowed up in endless misery.
 But what if he our Conqueror (whom I now
 Of force believe Almighty, since no less Than such could have o'erpowered such force as ours) 145
 Have left us this our spirit and strength entire,
 Strongly to suffer and support our pains,
 That we may so suffice his vengeful ire,
 Or do him mightier service as his thralls
 By right of war, whate'er his business be, 150
 Here in the heart of hell to work in fire,
 Or do his errands, in the gloomy deep?
 What can it then avail, though yet we feel Strength undiminished, or eternal being
 To undergo eternal punishment?" 155

Whereto with speedy words the arch-fiend replied:—

“Fallen cherub, to be weak is miserable,
Doing or suffering; but of this be sure,
To do aught good never will be our task,
But ever to do ill our sole delight, 160
As being the contrary to his high will Whom we resist. If then his providence
Out of our evil seek to bring forth good,
Our labor must be to pervert that end,
And out of good still to find means of evil, 165
Which oftentimes may succeed, so as perhaps Shall grieve him, if I fail not, and disturb
His inmost counsels from their destined aim.
But see, the angry Victor hath recalled
His ministers of vengeance and pursuit 170
Back to the gates of heaven; the sulphurous hail,
Shot after us in storm, o’erblown, hath laid
The fiery surge, that from the precipice
Of heaven received us falling; and the thunder, Winged with red lightning and impetuous rage, 175
Perhaps hath spent his shafts, and ceases now
To bellow through the vast and boundless deep.
Let us not slip the occasion, whether scorn
Or satiate fury yield it from our foe.
Seest thou yon dreary plain, forlorn and wild, 180
The seat of desolation, void of light,
Save what the glimmering of these livid flames Casts pale and dreadful? Thither let us tend
From off the tossing of these fiery waves;
There rest, if any rest can harbor there; 185
And, re-assembling our afflicted powers,
Consult how we may henceforth most offend
Our enemy; our own loss how repair;
How overcome this dire calamity;
What reinforcement we may gain from hope; 190
If not, what resolution from despair.”

Thus Satan, talking to his nearest mate,
With head uplift above the wave, and eyes
That sparkling blazed; his other parts besides
Prone on the flood, extended long and large, 195
Lay floating many a rood; in bulk as huge
As whom the fables name of monstrous size,
Titanian, or Earth-born, that warred on Jove;
Briareos or Typhon, whom the den
By ancient Tarsus held; or that sea-beast 200
Leviathan, which God of all his works
Created hugest that swim the ocean stream.
Him, haply, slumbering on the Norway foam,
The pilot of some small night-foundered skiff,
Deeming some island, oft, as seamen tell, 205
With fixed anchor in his scaly rind

Moors by his side under the lee, while night
Invests the sea, and wished morn delays:
So stretched out huge in length the arch-fiend lay
Chained on the burning lake: nor ever thence 210
Had risen, or heaved his head; but that the will
And high permission of all-ruling Heaven
Left him at large to his own dark designs;
That with reiterated crimes he might
Heap on himself damnation, while he sought 215
Evil to others; and, enraged, might see
How all his malice served but to bring forth
Infinite goodness, grace, and mercy, shown
On man by him seduced; but on himself 219
Treble confusion, wrath, and vengeance poured.

Forthwith upright he rears from off the pool
His mighty stature; on each hand the flames, Driven backward, slope their pointing spires, and rolled

In billows, leave it the midst a horrid vale.
Then with expanded wings he steers his flight 225
Aloft, incumbent on the dusky air,
That felt unusual weight; till on dry land
He lights, if it were land that ever burned
With solid, as the lake with liquid fire;
And such appeared in hue, as when the force 230
Of subterranean wind transports a hill
Torn from Pelorus, or the shattered side
Of thundering Etna, whose combustible
And fueled entrails thence conceiving fire,
Sublimed with mineral fury, aid the winds, 235
And leave a singed bottom, all involved
With stench and smoke: such resting found the sole

Of unblest feet. Him followed his next mate:
Both glorying to have ’scaped the Stygian flood,
As gods, and by their own recovered strength, 240
Not by the sufferance of supernal power.

“Is this the region, this the soil, the clime,”
Said then the lost archangel, “this the seat
That we must change for heaven; this mournful gloom

For that celestial light? Be it so, since he, 245
Who now is Sovereign, can dispose and bid
What shall be right: farthest from him is best,
Whom reason hath equaled, force hath made supreme

Above his equals. Farewell, happy fields,
Where joy for ever dwells! Hail, horrors! hail 250
Infernal world! and thou profoundest hell,
Receive thy new possessor—one who brings
A mind not to be changed by place or time:
The mind is its own place, and in itself
Can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven. 255

What matter where, if I be still the same,
 And what I should be; all but less than he Whom thunder hath made greater? Here at least
 We shall be free: the Almighty hath not built
 Here for his envy, will not drive us hence: 260
 Here we may reign secure, and, in my choice,
 To reign is worth ambition, though in hell;
 Better to reign in hell, than serve in heaven.
 But wherefore let we then our faithful friends,
 The associates and co-partners of our loss, 265
 Lie thus astonished on the oblivious pool,
 And call them not to share with us their part
 In this unhappy mansion; or once more
 With rallied arms to try what may be yet
 Regained in heaven, or what more lost in hell?"

So Satan spake, and him Beelzebub 271
 Thus answered: "Leader of those armies bright,
 Which, but the Omnipotent, none could have foiled,

If once they hear that voice, their liveliest pledge
 Of hope in fears and dangers, heard so oft 275
 In worst extremes, and on the perilous edge
 Of battle when it raged, in all assaults
 Their surest signal, they will soon resume
 New courage and revive; though now they lie
 Groveling and prostrate on yon lake of fire, 280
 As we erewhile, astounded and amazed;
 No wonder, fall'n such a pernicious height."

He scarce had ceased, when the superior fiend
 Was moving toward the shore: his ponderous shield

Ethereal temper, massy, large, and round, 285
 Behind him cast; the broad circumference
 Hung on his shoulders like the moon, whose orb
 Through optic glass the Tuscan artist views
 At evening, from the top of Fesolè,
 Or in Valdarno, to descry new lands, 290
 Rivers, or mountains, in her spotty globe.
 His spear—to equal which the tallest pine
 Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the mast
 Of some great ammiral, were but a wand—
 He walked with, to support uneasy steps 295
 Over the burning marl, not liké those steps
 On heaven's azure, and the torrid clime
 Smote on him sore besides, vaulted with fire:
 Nathless he so endured, till on the beach
 Of that inflamèd sea he stood, and called 300
 His legions, angel forms, who lay entranced,
 Thick as autumnal leaves, that strew the brooks
 In Vallombrosa, where the Etrurian shades,
 High over-arched, embower; or scattered sedge
 Afloat, when with fierce winds Orion armed 305

Hath vexed the Red Sea coast, whose waves o'er threw

Busiris and his Memphian chivalry,
 While with perfidious hatred they pursued
 The sojourners of Goshen, who beheld
 From the safe shore their floating carcasses 310
 And broken chariot-wheels; so thick bestrewn,
 Abject and lost lay these, covering the flood,
 Under amazement of their hideous change.
 He called so loud, that all the hollow deep
 Of hell resounded. "Princes, potentates, 315
 Warriors, the flower of heaven, once yours, now
 lost,

If such astonishment as this can seize Eternal spirits; or have ye chosen this place
 After the toil of battle to repose
 Your wearied virtue, for the ease you find 320
 To slumber here, as in the vales of heaven?
 Or in this abject posture have ye sworn
 To adore the Conqueror? who now beholds
 Cherub and seraph rolling in the flood
 With scattered arms and ensigns, till anon 325
 His swift pursuers from heaven-gates discern
 The advantage, and descending, tread us down
 Thus drooping, or with linkèd thunderbolts
 Transfix us to the bottom of this gulf?
 Awake, arise, or be for ever fall'n!" 330

They heard, and were abashed, and up they sprung

Upon the wing; as when men, wont to watch
 On duty, sleeping found by whom they dread,
 Rouse and bestir themselves ere well awake.
 Nor did they not perceive the evil plight 335
 In which they were, or the fierce pains not feel;
 Yet to their general's voice they soon obeyed,
 Innumerable. As when the potent rod
 Of Amram's son, in Egypt's evil day,
 Waved round the coast, up called a pitchy cloud
 Of locusts, warping on the eastern wind, 341
 That o'er the realm of impious Pharaoh hung
 Like night, and darkened all the land of Nile:
 So numberless were those bad angels seen
 Hovering on wing under the cope of hell, 345
 'Twixt upper, nether, and surrounding fires;
 Till, at a signal given, the uplifted spear
 Of their great sultan waving to direct
 Their course, in even balance down they light
 On the firm brimstone, and fill all the plain: 350
 A multitude like which the populous north
 Poured never from her frozen loins, to pass
 Rhine or the Danube, when her barbarous sons
 Came like a deluge on the south and spread
 Beneath Gibraltar to the Libyan sands. 355

Forthwith from every squadron and each band
 The heads and leaders thither haste where stood
 Their great commander; godlike shapes and forms
 Excelling human; princely dignities; 359
 And powers that erst in heaven sat on thrones,
 Though of their names in heavenly records now
 Be no memorial; blotted out and rased
 By their rebellion from the books of life.
 Nor had they yet among the sons of Eve Got them new names; till, wandering o'er the earth, 365
 Through God's high sufferance, for the trial of
 man,
 By falsities and lies the greater part
 Of mankind they corrupted to forsake
 God their Creator, and the invisible
 Glory of him that made them, to transform 370
 Oft to the image of a brute, adorned
 With gay religions, full of pomp and gold,
 And devils to adore for deities:
 Then were they known to men by various names,
 And various idols through the heathen world. 375
 Say, Muse, their names then known, who first,
 who last,
 Roused from the slumber on that fiery couch,
 At their great emperor's call, as next in worth,
 Came singly where he stood on the bare strand,
 While the promiscuous crowd stood yet aloof. 380
 The chief were those who from the pit of hell,
 Roaming to seek their prey on earth, durst fix
 Their seats long after next the seat of God,
 Their altars by his altars, gods adored
 Among the nations round, and durst abide 385
 Jehovah thundering out of Sion, throned
 Between the cherubim; yea, often placed Within his sanctuary itself their shrines,
 Abominations; and with cursed things
 His holy rites and solemn feasts profaned, 390
 And with their darkness durst affront his light.
 First, Moloch, horrid king, besmeared with blood
 Of human sacrifice, and parents' tears;
 Though, for the noise of drums and timbrels loud,
 Their children's cries unheard, that passed through fire 395
 To his grim idol. Him the Ammonite
 Worshiped in Rabba and her watery plain,
 In Argob and in Basan, to the stream
 Of utmost Arnon. Nor content with such Audacious neighborhood, the wisest heart 400
 Of Solomon he led by fraud to build
 His temple right against the temple of God,
 On that opprobrious hill; and made his grove
 The pleasant valley of Hinnom, Tophet thence

And black Gehenna called, the type of hell. 405
 Next, Chemos, the obscene dread of Moab's sons,
 From Aroer to Nebo, and the wild
 Of southmost Abarim; in Hesebon
 And Horonáim, Seon's realm, beyond
 The flowery dale of Sibma clad with vines, 410
 And Eleale to the asphaltic pool;
 Peor his other name, when he enticed
 Israel in Sittim, on their march from Nile,
 To do him wanton rites, which cost them woe.
 Yet thence his lustful orgies he enlarged 415
 Even to that hill of scandal, by the grove
 Of Moloch homicide: lust hard by hate;
 Till good Josiah drove them thence to hell.
 With these came they who, from the bordering flood
 Of old Euphrates to the brook that parts 420
 Egypt from Syrian ground, had general names
 Of Bálím and Ashtaroth; those male,
 These feminine; for spirits, when they please,
 Can either sex assume, or both; so soft
 And uncompounded is their essence pure; 425
 Not tied or manacled with joint or limb,
 Nor founded on the brittle strength of bones,
 Like cumbrous flesh; but, in what shape they choose,
 Dilated or condensed, bright or obscure,
 Can execute their æry purposes, 430
 And works of love or enmity fulfill.
 For those the race of Israel oft forsook
 Their living Strength, and unfrequented left
 His righteous altar, bowing lowly down
 To bestial gods; for which their heads as low 435
 Bowed down in battle, sunk before the spear
 Of despicable foes. With these in troop Came Astoreth, whom the Phenicians called Astarté, queen of heaven, with crescent horns;
 To whose bright image nightly by the moon 440
 Sidonian virgins paid their vows and songs;
 In Sion also not unsung, where stood
 Her temple on the offensive mountain, built
 By that uxorious king, whose heart, though large,
 Beguiled by fair idolatresses, fell 445
 To idols foul. Thammuz came next behind,
 Whose annual wound in Lebanon allured
 The Syrian damsels to lament his fate
 In amorous ditties all a summer's day;
 While smooth Adonis from his native rock 450
 Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood
 Of Thammuz yearly wounded; the love-tale
 Infected Sion's daughters with like heat;
 Whose wanton passions in the sacred porch
 Ezekiel saw, when, by the vision led, 455

His eye surveyed the dark idolatries
Of alienated Judah. Next came one
Who mourned in earnest, when the captive ark
Maimed his brute image, head and hands lopped
off

In his own temple, on the grunsel edge, 460
Where he fell flat, and shamed his worshipers;
Dagon his name, sea-monster, upward man
And downward fish; yet had his temple high
Reared in Azotus, dreaded through the coast
Of Palestine, in Gath and Ascalon, 465
And Accaron and Gazar's frontier bounds.
Him followed Rimmon, whose delightful seat
Was fair Damascus, on the fertile banks
Of Abbana and Pharphar, lucid streams.
He also 'gainst the house of God was bold: 470
A leper once he lost, and gained a king;
Ahaz his sottish conqueror, whom he drew
God's altar to disparage and displace
For one of Syrian mode, whereon to burn
His odious offerings, and adore the gods 475
Whom he had vanquished. After these appeared
A crew who, under names of old renown,
Osiris, Isis, Orus, and their train,
With monstrous shapes and sorceries abused
Fanatic Egypt and her priests, to seek 480
Their wandering gods disguised in brutish forms
Rather than human. Nor did Israel 'scape
The infection, when their borrowed gold composed

The calf in Oreb; and the rebel king
Doubled that sin in Bethel and in Dan, 485
Likening his Maker to the grazèd ox—
Jehovah, who in one night, when he passed
From Egypt marching, equaled with one stroke
Both her first-born and all her bleating gods.
Belial came last, than whom a spirit more lewd
Fell not from heaven, or more gross to love 491
Vice for itself; to him no temple stood,
Or altar smoked; yet who more oft than he
In temples and at altars, when the priest
Turns atheist, as did Eli's sons, who filled 495
With lust and violence the house of God?
In courts and palaces he also reigns,
And in luxurious cities, where the noise
Of riot ascends above their loftiest towers,
And injury and outrage: and when night 500
Darkens the streets, then wander forth the sons
Of Belial, flown with insolence and wine.
Witness the streets of Sodom, and that night
In Gibeah, when the hospitable door
Exposed a matron, to avoid worse rape. 505

These were the prime in order and in might:

The rest were long to tell, though far renowned,
The Ionian gods—of Javan's issue held
Gods, yet confessed later than heaven and earth,
Their boasted parents: Titan, heaven's first-born 510

With his enormous brood, and birthright seized
By younger Saturn; he from mightier Jove,
His own and Rhea's son, like measure found;
So Jove usurping reigned: these first in Crete
And Ida known, thence on the snowy top 515
Of cold Olympus ruled the middle air,
Their highest heaven; or on the Delphian cliff,
Or in Dodona, and through all the bounds
Of Doric land: or who with Saturn old
Fled over Adria to the Hesperian fields, 520
And o'er the Celtic roamed the utmost isles.

All these and more came flocking, but with looks
Downcast and damp; yet such wherein appeared Obscure some glimpse of joy, to have found their chief

Not in despair, to have found themselves not lost 525

In loss itself; which on his countenance cast
Like doubtful hue; but he, his wonted pride
Soon recollecting, with high words, that bore
Semblance of worth, not substance, gently raised
Their fainting courage, and dispelled their fears.
Then straight commands that at the warlike sound 531

Of trumpets loud and clarions be upreared
His mighty standard; that proud honor claimed
Azazel as his right, a cherub tall; 534
Who forthwith from the glittering staff unfurled
The imperial ensign; which, full high advanced,
Shone like a meteor, streaming to the wind,
With gems and golden luster rich emblazed,
Seraphic arms and trophies, all the while
Sonorous metal blowing martial sounds: 540

At which the universal host up-sent
A shout, that tore hell's concave, and beyond
Frighted the reign of Chaos and old Night.
All in a moment through the gloom were seen
Ten thousand banners rise into the air, 545

With orient colors waving; with them rose
A forest huge of spears; and thronging helms
Appeared, and serried shields in thick array
Of depth immeasurable; anon they move
In perfect phalanx to the Dorian mood 550
Of flutes and soft recorders; such as raised
To height of noblest temper heroes old
Arming to battle, and instead of rage,
Deliberate valor breathed, firm and unmoved

With dread of death to flight or foul retreat; 555
 Nor wanting power to mitigate and 'suage
 With solemn touches troubled thoughts, and chase Anguish, and doubt, and fear, and sorrow, and pain

From mortal or immortal minds. Thus they,
 Breathing united force, with fixèd thought, 560
 Moved on in silence, to soft pipes, that charmed
 Their painful steps o'er the burnt soil: and now
 Advanced in view they stand; a horrid front
 Of dreadful length and dazzling arms, in guise
 Of warriors old with ordered spear and shield,
 Awaiting what command their mighty chief 566
 Had to impose: he through the armèd files
 Darts his experienced eye, and soon traverse
 The whole battalion views, their order due,
 Their visages and stature as of gods; 570
 Their number last he sums. And now his heart
 Distends with pride, and hardening in his strength
 Glories: for never since created man
 Met such embodied force as, named with these,
 Could merit more than that small infantry 575
 Warred on by cranes: though all the giant brood
 Of Phlegra with the heroic race were joined
 That fought at Thebes and Ilium, on each side
 Mixed with auxiliar gods; and what resounds
 In fable or romance of Uther's son ¹ 580
 Begirt with British and Armoric knights;
 And all who since, baptized or infidel,
 Jousted in Aspramont, or Montalban,
 Damascus, or Morocco, or Trebizond,
 Or whom Biserta sent from Afric shore, 585
 When Charlemagne with all his peerage fell
 By Fontarabbia. Thus far these beyond
 Compare of mortal prowess, yet observed
 Their dread commander; he, above the rest
 In shape and gesture proudly eminent, 590
 Stood like a tower; his form had yet not lost
 All its original brightness; nor appeared
 Less than archangel ruined, and the excess
 Of glory obscured: as when the sun, new risen,
 Looks through the horizontal misty air 595
 Shorn of his beams, or from behind the moon,
 In 'dim eclipse, disastrous twilight sheds
 On half the nations, and with fear of change
 Perplexes monarchs. Darkened so, yet shone
 Above them all the archangel; but his face 600
 Deep scars of thunder had entrenched; and care
 Sat on his faded cheek; but under brows
 Of dauntless courage, and considerate pride
 Waiting revenge; cruel his eye, but cast
 Signs of remorse and passion, to behold 605

The fellows of his crime, the followers rather (Far other once beheld in bliss), condemned
 For ever now to have their lot in pain;
 Millions of spirits for his fault amerced
 Of heaven, and from eternal splendors flung 610
 For his revolt; yet faithful how they stood,
 Their glory withered; as when heavens' fire
 Hath scathed the forest oaks, or mountain pines,
 With singèd top their stately growth, though bare,
 Stands on the blasted heath. He now prepared 615
 To speak; whereat their doubled ranks they bend
 From wing to wing, and half enclose him round
 With all his peers: attention held them mute.
 Thrice he essayed, and thrice, in spite of scorn,
 Tears, such as angels weep, burst forth; at last 620
 Words, interwove with sighs, found out their way.

"O myriads of immortal spirits! O powers
 Matchless, but with the Almighty; and that strife
 Was not inglorious, though the event was dire,
 As this place testifies, and this dire change, 625
 hateful to utter! but what power of mind,
 Forseeing or presaging, from the depth
 Of knowledge, past or present, could have feared
 How such united force of gods, how such
 As stood like these, could ever know repulse? 630
 For who can yet believe, though after loss,
 That all these puissant legions, whose exile
 Hath emptied heaven, shall fail to reascend
 Self-raised, and repossess their native seat?
 For me, be witness all the host of heaven, 635
 If counsels different, or dangers shunned
 By me, have lost our hopes. But he who reigns Monarch in heaven, till then as one secure
 Sat on this throne upheld by old repute,
 Consent or custom; and his regal state 640
 Put forth at full, but still his strength concealed,
 Which tempted our attempt, and wrought our fall.
 Henceforth his might we know, and know our own;

So as not either to provoke, or dread
 New war, provoked; our better part remains, 645
 To work in close design, by fraud or guile,
 What force effected not; that he no less
 At length from us may find, who overcomes
 By force, hath overcome but half his foe.
 Space may produce new worlds; whereof so rife 650
 There went a fame in heaven that he ere long
 Intended to create, and therein plant
 A generation, whom his choice regard
 Should favor equal to the sons of heaven:
 Thither, if but to pry, shall be perhaps 655

¹ King Arthur. The following references are all to the medieval romantic heroes.

Our first eruption; thither, or elsewhere;
 For this infernal pit shall never hold
 Celestial spirits in bondage, nor the abyss
 Long under darkness cover. But these thoughts
 Full counsel must mature; peace is despaired; 660
 For who can think submission? War, then, war,
 Open or understood, must be resolved."

He spake; and, to confirm his words, outflow
 Millions of flaming swords, drawn from the thighs
 Of mighty cherubim; the sudden blaze 665
 Far round illumined hell; highly they raged
 Against the Highest, and fierce with grasped arms
 Clashed on their sounding shields the din of war,
 Hurling defiance toward the vault of heaven.

There stood a hill not far, whose grisly top 670
 Belched fire and rolling smoke; the rest entire Shone with a glossy scurf, undoubted sign
 That in his womb was hid metallic ore,
 The work of sulphur. Thither, winged with speed,
 A numerous brigade hastened: as when bands
 Of pioneers, with spade and pickax armed, 676
 Forerun the royal camp, to trench a field,
 Or cast a rampart. Mammon led them on:
 Mammon, the least erected spirit that fell From heaven; for even in heaven his looks and thoughts 680

Were always downward bent, admiring more
 The riches of heaven's pavement, trodden gold,
 Than aught, divine or holy, else enjoyed
 In vision beatific; by him first
 Men also, and by his suggestion taught, 685
 Ransacked the center, and with impious hands
 Rifled the bowels of their mother earth
 For treasures, better hid. Soon had his crew Opened into the hill a spacious wound,
 And digged out ribs of gold. Let none admire 690
 That riches grow in hell; that soil may best Deserve the precious bane. And here let those Who boast in mortal things, and wondering tell
 Of Babel, and the works of Memphian kings,
 Learn how their greatest monuments of fame,
 And strength and art, are easily outdone 696
 By spirits reprobate, and in an hour
 What in an age they with incessant toil
 And hands innumerable scarce perform.
 Nigh on the plain, in many cells prepared, 700
 That underneath had veins of liquid fire
 Sluiced from the lake, a second multitude
 With wondrous art founded the massy ore,
 Severing each kind, and scummed the bullion
 dross;

A third as soon had formed within the ground
 A various mold, and from the boiling cells, 706

By strange conveyance, filled each hollow nook,
 As in an organ, from one blast of wind,
 To many a row of pipes the sound-board breathes.
 Anon, out of the earth a fabric huge 710
 Rose like an exhalation, with the sound
 Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet,
 Built like a temple, where pilasters round
 Were set, and Doric pillars overlaid
 With golden architrave; nor did there want 715
 Cornice or frieze, with bossy sculptures graven:
 The roof was fretted gold. Not Babylon,
 Nor great Alcairo, such magnificence
 Equaled in all their glories, to enshrine
 Belus or Serapis their gods, or seat 720
 Their kings, when Egypt with Assyria strove
 In wealth and luxury. The ascending pile Stood fixed her stately height: and straight the doors,

Opening their brazen folds, discover, wide
 Within, her ample spaces, o'er the smooth 725
 And level pavement; from the archèd roof,
 Pendent by subtle magic, many a row
 Of starry lamps and blazing cressets, fed
 With naphtha and asphaltus, yielded light
 As from a sky. The hasty multitude 730
 Admiring entered; and the work some praise,
 And some the architect: his hand was known
 In heaven by many a towered structure high
 Where sceptered angels held their residence,
 And sat as princes; whom the supreme King 735
 Exalted to such power, and gave to rule,
 Each in his hierarchy, the orders bright.
 Nor was his name unheard or unadored
 In ancient Greece; and in Ausonian land
 Men called him Mulciber; and how he fell 740
 From heaven they fabled, thrown by angry Jove
 Sheer o'er the crystal battlements: from morn
 To noon he fell, from noon to dewy eve,
 A summer's day; and with the setting sun
 Dropped from the zenith like a falling star, 745
 On Lemnos, th' Ægean isle: thus they relate,
 Erring; for he with this rebellious rout
 Fell long before; nor aught availed him now
 To have built in heaven high towers; nor did he
 'scape

By all his engines, but was headlong sent 750
 With his industrious crew to build in hell.

Meanwhile, the wingèd heralds, by command
 Of sovereign power, with awful ceremony
 And trumpet's sound, throughout the host proclaim

A solemn council, forthwith to be held 755
 At Pandemonium, the high capital

Of Satan and his peers: their summons called
 From every band and squared regiment
 By place or choice the worthiest; they anon,
 With hundreds and with thousands, trooping came, 760
 Attended; all access was thronged; the gates
 And porches wide, but chief the spacious hall (Though like a covered field, where champions bold
 Wont ride in armed, and at the soldan's chair
 Defied the best of paynim chivalry 765
 To mortal combat, or career with lance),
 Thick swarmed, both on the ground and in the air,
 Brushed with the hiss of rustling wings. As bees
 In spring-time, when the sun with Taurus rides,
 Pour forth their populous youth about the hive 770
 In clusters; they among fresh dews and flowers
 Fly to and fro, or on the smoothèd plank,
 The suburb of their straw-built citadel,
 New rubbed with balm, expatiate, and confer
 Their state affairs; so thick the aery crowd 775
 Swarmed and were straitened; till, the signal given,

Behold a wonder! They, but now who seemed
 In bigness to surpass earth's giant sons,
 Now less than smallest dwarfs, in narrow room
 Throng numberless, like that Pygmean race 780
 Beyond the Indian mount, or faery elves,
 Whose midnight revels, by a forest side
 Or fountain, some belated peasant sees,
 Or dreams he sees, while over head the moon
 Sits arbitress, and nearer to the earth 785 Wheels her pale course; they, on their mirth and dance
 Intent, with jocund music charm his ear;
 At once with joy and fear his heart rebounds.
 Thus incorporeal spirits to smallest forms Reduced their shapes immense, and were at large, 790
 Though without number still, amidst the hall
 Of that infernal court. But far within,
 And in their own dimensions, like themselves,
 The great seraphic lords and cherubim
 In close recess and secret conclave sat; 795
 A thousand demi-gods on golden seats
 Frequent and full. After short silence then,
 And summons read, the great consult began.

PROSE FROM BACON TO PEPYS

For the development of English prose the seventeenth century is of supreme importance. When we read the prose writings of the great Elizabethans, we feel the need of some kind of discipline. The style may be rich and ornate, but it is seldom clear. If, however, we take up the prose of a man like Addison at the beginning of the eighteenth century, we see that in the intervening century English authors had learned to write a prose that is not only pleasing but also clear and distinct. The paragraph as we know it had been invented and developed. The prose writer had learned to plan his work as carefully as does the poet.

No student of English prose can neglect the essays of Francis Bacon. With them he brought into England a literary form that was to occupy some of the most gifted English authors and was to produce some of the finest English literature. Bacon himself did not use the essay form for any great variety of purposes. In his hands essays are used merely for the expression of ideas on all kinds of subjects. As we read them we feel that they are merely abstracts of what he would write if he had a great deal of time. He says as much in a page as the usual writer does in ten, and this means that he has left out all illustrative material and all kinds of elaboration. What we have is a bare, straightforward statement of his ideas about friendship, or marriage, or scholarship. It must be said that there is a great skill used in this unadorned writing. Frequently he has crystallized a whole essay in a single sentence. Even where the sentences are not so memorable, the experienced reader feels that he is reading English that is very heavily charged with ideas. Bacon is not for the lazy reader, but to the thoughtful man or woman the reading of his essays can be a very stimulating experience.

For the half century after Bacon English prose did not take the direction which he had indicated. It was a generation of great sermon writers, such as Jeremy Taylor, and eloquent essayists, such as Sir Thomas Browne. Some of the finest sentences ever written in English appeared in Browne's essay on Urn Burial and in his Religio Medici.

Possibly because of his importance as a poet, but more likely because of the practical influence of his essay, John Milton's Arcopagitica is the best known of any prose work of the middle of the seventeenth century. This is perhaps the most persuasive plea ever made for the complete freedom of the press. At times Milton rises to a level of great eloquence in his fervent address to the Lords and Commons of England.

No history of the prose of this century would be complete without mention of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. The fervent religious idealism which is expressed by this simple man in plain but extraordinarily imaginative language exercised a profound influence over the readers of English prose for more than two centuries. And it has likewise made a very great impression on our writers, for its expressions and characters have become a part of their traditional background. Its importance in this respect can only be compared with the King James version of the Bible.

The charmingly discursive sketches of fishing life in Izaak Walton's The Compleat Angler and the formal scholarly prose of Dryden's critical essays each contributed its part to that development of English prose which we have mentioned.

The casual reader, however, will turn with most eagerness to the pages of a man who apparently had no ambition to be considered a writer of literature. When Samuel Pepys composed his Diary, he wrote it in shorthand, presumably for his own amusement. After one hundred fifty years it was transcribed, and for the past century his interest in his own times has been shared by a host of readers.

On the opening day of the year 1660 he begins his Diary with the realization that important events are likely to happen very soon. Within the year we see the restoration of Charles II, and in the course of the ten years covered by this record we are taken through the experiences of the Great Fire, the Great Plague, and the war with Holland. We also become acquainted with all of Pepys's friends and learn, as we can in no other way, what life was like in the 1660's.

FRANCIS BACON

Of Truth

"What is truth?" said jesting Pilate; and would not stay for an answer. Certainly there be that delight in giddiness, and count it a bondage to fix a belief, affecting free-will in thinking, as well as in acting. And though the sects of philosophers of that kind be gone, yet there remain certain discouraging wits which are of the same veins, though there be not so much blood in them as was in those of the ancients. But it is not only the difficulty and labor which men take in finding out truth; nor again, that when it is found, it imposeth upon men's thoughts, that doth bring lies in favor: but a natural though corrupt love of the lie itself. One of the later school of the Grecians examineth the matter, and is at a stand to think what should be in it, that men should love lies, where neither they make for pleasure, as with poets, nor for advantage as with the merchant, but for the lie's sake. But I cannot tell: this same truth is a naked and open day-light that doth not shew the masques and mummeries and triumphs of the world half so stately and daintily as candle-lights. Truth may, perhaps, come to the price of a pearl, that sheweth best by day; but it will not rise to the price of a diamond or carbuncle, that sheweth best in varied lights. A mixture of a lie doth ever add pleasure. Doth any man doubt that if there were taken out of men's minds vain opinions, flattering hopes, false valuations, imaginations as one would, and the like, but it would leave the minds of a number of men poor shrunken things, full of melancholy and indisposition, and unpleasing to themselves? One of the fathers, in great severity, called poesy vinum dæmonum, because it filleth the imagination, and yet it is but with the shadow of a lie. But it is not the lie that passeth through the mind, but the lie that sinketh in and settleth in it, that doth the hurt, such as we spake of before. But howsoever these things are thus in men's depraved judgments and affections, yet truth, which only doth judge itself, teacheth that the inquiry of truth, which is the lovemaking or wooing of it; the knowledge of truth, which is the presence of it; and the belief of truth, which is the enjoying of it, is the sovereign good of human nature. The first creature of God, in the works of the days, was the light of the sense; the last was the light of reason; and his sabbath work, ever since, is the illumination of his spirit. First he breathed light upon the face of the matter or chaos; then he breathed light into the face of man; and still he breatheth and inspireth light into the face of his chosen. The poet¹ that beautified the sect that was otherwise inferior to the rest, saith yet excellently well: It is a pleasure to stand upon the shore, and to see ships tossed upon the sea; a pleasure to stand in the window of a castle, and to see a battle and the adventures thereof below: but no pleasure is comparable to the standing upon the vantage ground of Truth (a hill not too commanded, and where the air is always clear and serene), and to see the errors, and wanderings, and mists, and tempests, in the vale below; so always that this prospect be with pity, and not with swelling or pride. Certainly, it is heaven upon earth to have a man's mind move in charity, rest in providence, and turn upon the poles of truth.

Bacon, Of Truth. Francis Bacon (1561-1626), a son of Sir Nicholas Bacon, was created Baron Varulam and Viscount St. Albans. He had an active life in public office but his fame rests on his contributions to science and philosophy, and on his essays.

To pass from theological and philosophical truth to the truth of civil business, it will be acknowledged, even by those that practice it not, that clear and round dealing is the honor of man's nature, and that mixture of falsehood is like alloy in coin of gold and silver, which may make the metal work the better, but it embaseth it; for these winding and crooked courses are the goings of the serpent, which goeth basely upon the belly, and not upon the feet. There is no vice that doth so cover a man with shame as to be found false and perfidious; and therefore Montaigne saith prettily, when he inquired the reason why the word of the lie should be such a disgrace and such an odious charge, "If it be well weighed, to say that a man lieth, is as much to say as that he is brave towards God and a coward towards men." For a lie faces God, and shrinks from man. Surely the wickedness of falsehood and breach of faith cannot possibly be so highly expressed as in that it shall be the last peal to call the judgments of God upon the generations of men; it being foretold, that when Christ cometh, "he shall not find faith upon the earth."

Of Marriage and Single Life

He that hath wife and children hath given hostages to fortune; for they are impediments to great enterprises, either of virtue or of mischief. Certainly the best works and of greatest merit for the public have proceeded from the unmarried or childless men; which, both in affection and means, have married and endowed the public. Yet it were great reason that those that have children should have greatest care of future times unto which they know they must transmit their dearest pledges. Some there are, who, though they lead a single life, yet their thoughts do end with themselves, and account future times impertinences; nay, there are some other that account wife and children but as bills of charges. Nay, more, there are some foolish rich covetous men that take a pride in having no children, because they may be thought so much the richer. For, perhaps, they have heard some talk, "Such a one is a great rich man," and another except to it, "Yea, but he hath a great charge of children," as if it were an abatement to his riches. But the most ordinary cause of a single life is liberty, especially in certain self-pleasing and humorous minds, which are so sensible of every restraint, as they will go near to think their girdles and garters to be bonds and shackles. Unmarried men are best friends, best masters, best servants, but not always best subjects, for they are light to run away, and almost all fugitives are of that condition. A single life doth well with churchmen, for charity will hardly water the ground where it must first fill a pool. It is indifferent for judges and magistrates, for if they be facile and corrupt, you shall have a servant five times worse than a wife. For soldiers, I find the generals commonly, in their hortatives, put men in mind of their wives and children. And I think the despising of marriage amongst the Turks maketh the vulgar soldier more base. Certainly, wife and children are a kind of discipline of humanity; and single men, though they be many times more charitable, because their means are less exhaust, yet, on the other side, they are more cruel and hard-hearted, good to make severe inquisitors, because their tenderness is not so oft called upon. Grave natures, led by custom, and therefore constant, are commonly loving husbands; as was said of Ulysses, "Vetulam suam prætulit immortalitati."² Chaste women are often proud and froward, as presuming upon the merit of their chastity. It is one of the best bonds, both of chastity and obedience, in the wife, if she think her husband wise; which she will never do if she find him jealous. Wives are young men's mistresses, companions for middle age, and old men's nurses. So as a man may have a quarrel to marry when he will. But yet he was reputed one of the wise men that made answer to the question when a man should marry, "A young man not yet, an elder man not at all." It is often seen that bad husbands have very good wives; whether it be that it raiseth the price of their husbands' kindness when it comes, or that the wives take a pride in their patience; but this never fails if the bad husbands were of their own choosing, against their friends' consent; for then they will be sure to make good their own folly.

¹ Lucretius.

² He preferred his little old wife to immortality.

Of Studies

Studies serve for delight, for ornament, and for ability. Their chief use for delight is in privateness and retiring; for ornament, is in discourse; and for ability, is in the judgment and disposition of business. For expert men can execute, and perhaps judge of particulars, one by one; but the general counsels, and the plots and marshaling of affairs, come best from those that are learned. To spend too much time in studies is sloth; to use them too much for ornament is affectation; to make judgment wholly by their rules is the humor of a scholar. They perfect nature, and are perfected by experience; for natural abilities are like natural plants, that need pruning by study; and studies themselves do give forth directions too much at large, except they be bounded in by experience. Crafty men condemn studies, simple men admire them, and wise men use them, for they teach not their own use; but that is a wisdom without them and above them, won by observation. Read not to contradict and confute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider. Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested; that is, some books are to be read only in parts; others to be read, but not curiously; and some few to be read wholly, and with diligence and attention. Some books also may be read by deputy and extracts made of them by others; but that would be only in the less important arguments, and the meaner sort of books; else distilled books are like common distilled waters, flashy things. Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man. And therefore, if a man write little, he had need have a great memory; if he confer little, he had need have a present wit; and if he read little, he had need have 20 much cunning, to seem to know that he doth not. Histories make men wise, poets witty, the mathematics subtle, natural philosophy deep, moral grave, logic and rhetoric able to contend. *Abecunt studia in mores.*¹ Nay, there is no stand or impediment in the wit but may be wrought out by fit studies, like as diseases of the body may have appropriate exercises. Bowling is good for the stone and reins, shooting for the lungs and breast; gentle walking for the stomach, riding for the head, and the like. So if a man's wit be wandering, let him study the mathematics; for in demonstrations, if his wit be called away never so little, he must begin again. If his wit be not apt to distinguish or find differences, let him study the schoolmen, for they are *cymini sectores.*² If he be not apt to beat over matters and to call up one thing to prove and illustrate another, let him study the lawyers' cases. So every defect of the mind may have a special receipt.

JOHN MILTON

Areopagitica

[Milton is here pleading against any restriction on the printing of books.]

. . . I deny not but that it is of greatest concernment in the Church and Commonwealth, to have a vigilant eye how books demean themselves as well as men; and thereafter to confine, imprison, and do sharpest justice on them as malefactors. For books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a potency of life in them to be as active as that soul was whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. I know they are as lively, and as vigorously productive, as those fabulous dragon's teeth; and being sown up and down, may chance to spring up armed men. And yet, on the other hand, unless wariness be used, as good almost kill a man as kill a good book: who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book, kills reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were, in the eye. Many a man lives a burden to the earth; but a good book is the precious life-blood of a master spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life. 'Tis true, no age can restore a life, whereof perhaps there is no great loss; and revolutions of ages do not oft recover the loss of a rejected truth, for the want of which whole nations fare the worse. We should be wary, therefore, what persecution we raise against the living labors of public men, how we spill that seasoned life of man, preserved and stored up in books; since we see a kind of homicide may be thus committed, sometimes a martyrdom; and if it extend to the whole impression, a kind of massacre, whereof the execution ends not in the slaying of an elemental life, but strikes at that ethereal and fifth essence, the breath of reason itself, slays an immortality rather than a life. . . .

¹ Studies develop into habits.

² Hair-splitters.

I conceive, therefore, that when God did enlarge the universal diet of man's body, saving ever the rules of temperance, he then also, as before, left arbitrary the dieting and repasting of our minds; as wherein every mature man might have to exercise his own leading capacity. How great a virtue is temperance, how much of moment through the whole life of man! Yet God commits the managing so great a trust, without particular law or prescription, wholly to the demeanor of every grown man. And, therefore, when he himself tabled the Jews from heaven, that omer, which was every man's daily portion of manna, is computed to have been more than might have well sufficed the heartiest feeder thrice as many meals. For those actions which enter into a man, rather than issue out of him, and therefore defile not, God uses not to captivate under a perpetual childhood of prescription, but trusts him with the gift of reason to be his own chooser; there were but little work left for preaching, if law and compulsion should grow so fast upon those things which heretofore were governed only by exhortation. Solomon informs us, that much reading is a weariness to the flesh; but neither he nor other inspired author tells us that such or such reading is unlawful; yet certainly had God thought good to limit us herein, it had been much more expedient to have told us what was unlawful, than what was wearisome. . . .

Good and evil we know in the field of this world grow up together almost inseparably; and the knowledge of good is so involved and interwoven with the knowledge of evil, and in so many cunning resemblances hardly to be discerned, that those confused seeds which were imposed upon Psyche as an incessant labor to cull out, and sort asunder, were not more intermixed. It was from out the rind of one apple tasted, that the knowledge of good and evil, as two twins cleaving together, leaped forth into the world. And perhaps this is that doom which Adam fell into of knowing good and evil, that is to say, of knowing good by evil.

As, therefore, the state of man now is; what wisdom can there be to choose, what continence to forbear without the knowledge of evil? He that can apprehend and consider vice with all her baits and seeming pleasures, and yet abstain, and yet distinguish, and yet prefer that which is truly better, he is the true wayfaring Christian. I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race, where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat. Assuredly we bring not innocence into the world; we bring impurity much rather; that which purifies us is trial, and trial is by what is contrary. That virtue, therefore, which is but a youngling in the contemplation of evil, and knows not the utmost that vice promises to her followers, and rejects it, is but a blank virtue, not a pure.

Since, therefore, the knowledge and survey of vice is in this world so necessary to the constituting of human virtue, and the scanning of error to the confirmation of truth, how can we more safely, and with less danger, scout into the regions of sin and falsity, than by reading all manner of tractates and hearing all manner of reason? And this is the benefit which may be had of books promiscuously read. . . .

For if they fell upon one kind of strictness, unless their care were equal to regulate all other things of like aptness to corrupt the mind, that single endeavor they knew would be but a fond labor; to shut and fortify one gate against corruption, and be necessitated to leave others round about wide open. If we think to regulate printing, thereby to rectify manners, we must regulate all recreations and pastimes, all that is delightful to man. No music must be heard, no song be set or sung, but what is grave and Doric. There must be licensing dancers, that no gesture, motion, or deportment be taught our youth, but what by their allowance shall be thought honest; for such Plato was provided of. It will ask more than the work of twenty licensers to examine all the lutes, the violins, and the guitars in every house; they must not be suffered to prattle as they do, but must be licensed what they may say. And who shall silence all the airs and madrigals that whisper softness in chambers? The windows also, and the balconies must be thought on; these are shrewd books, with dangerous frontispieces, set to sale; who shall prohibit them, shall twenty licensers? The villages also must have their visitors to inquire what lectures the bagpipe and the rebeck reads even to the ballatry, and the gamut of every municipal fiddler, for these are the countryman's Arcadias, and his Monte Mayors.

Next, what more national corruption, for which England hears ill abroad, than household gluttony? Who shall be the rectors of our daily rioting? And what shall be done to inhibit the multitudes that frequent those houses where drunkenness is sold and harbored? Our garments also should be referred to the licensing of some more sober workmasters, to see them cut into a less wanton garb. Who shall regulate all the mixed conversation of our youth, male and female together, as is the fashion of this country? Who shall still appoint what shall be discoursed, what presumed, and no further? Lastly, who shall forbid and separate all idle resort, all evil company? These things will be, and must be; but how they shall be least hurtful, how least enticing, herein consists the grave and governing wisdom of a state.

To sequester out of the world into Atlantic and Utopian polities, which never can be drawn into use, will not mend our condition; but to ordain wisely as in this world of evil, in the midst whereof God hath placed us unavoidably. Nor is it Plato's licensing of books will do this, which necessarily pulls along with it so many other kinds of licensing, as will make us all both ridiculous and weary, and yet frustrate; but those unwritten, or at least unconstraining, laws of virtuous education, religious and civil nurture, which Plato there mentions as the bonds and ligaments of the commonwealth, the pillars and the sustainers of every written statute; these they be which will bear chief sway in such matters as these, when all licensing will be easily eluded. Impunity and remissness, for certain, are the bane of a commonwealth; but here the great art lies, to discern in what the law is to bid restraint and punishment, and in what things persuasion only is to work. If every action which is good or evil in man at ripe years, were to be under pittance and prescription and compulsion, what were virtue but a name, what praise could be then due to well-doing, what gramercy to be sober, just, or continent?

Many there be that complain of divine Providence for suffering Adam to transgress. Foolish tongues! when God gave him reason, he gave him freedom to choose, for reason is but choosing; he had been else a mere artificial Adam, such an Adam as he is in the motions. We ourselves esteem not of that obedience, or love, or gift, which is of force; God, therefore, left him free, set before him a provoking object, ever almost in his eyes; herein consisted his merit, herein the right of his reward, the praise of his abstinence. Wherefore did he create passions within us, pleasures round about us, but that these rightly tempered are the very ingredients of virtue? They are not skillful considerers of human things, who imagine to remove sin by removing the matter of sin; for, besides that it is a huge heap increasing under the very act of diminishing, though some part of it may for a time be withdrawn from some persons, it cannot from all, in such a universal thing as books are; and when this is done, yet the sin remains entire. Though ye take from a covetous man all his treasure, he has yet one jewel left, ye cannot bereave him of his covetousness. Banish all objects of lust, shut up all youth into the severest discipline that can be exercised in any hermitage, ye cannot make them chaste, that came not thither so: such great care and wisdom is required to the right managing of this point.

Suppose we could expel sin by this means; look how much we thus expel of sin, so much we expel of virtue: for the matter of them both is the same; remove that, and ye remove them both alike. This justifies the high providence of God, who, though he commands us temperance, justice, continence, yet pours out before us, even to a profuseness, all desirable things, and gives us minds that can wander beyond all limit and satiety. Why should we then affect a rigor contrary to the manner of God and of nature, by abridging or scanting those means, which books freely permitted are both to the trial of virtue, and the exercise of truth?

It would be better done, to learn that the law must needs be frivolous, which goes to restrain things, uncertainly and yet equally working to good and to evil. And were I the chooser, a dram of well doing should be preferred before many times as much the forcible hindrance of evil doing. For God sure esteems the growth and completing of one virtuous person, more than the restraint of ten vicious. . . .

Truth indeed came once into the world with her divine Master, and was a perfect shape most glorious to look on; but when he ascended, and his apostles after him were laid asleep, then straight arose a wicked race of deceivers, who, as that story goes of the Egyptian Typhon with his conspirators, how they dealt with the good Osiris, took the virgin Truth, hewed her lovely form into a thousand pieces, and scattered them to the four winds. From that time ever since, the sad friends of Truth, such as durst appear, imitating the careful search that Isis made for the mangled body of Osiris, went up and down gathering up limb by limb still as they could find them. We have not yet found them all, Lords and Commons, nor ever shall do, till her Master's second coming; he shall bring together every joint and member, and shall mold them into an immortal feature of loveliness and perfection. Suffer not these licensing prohibitions to stand at every place of opportunity, forbidding and disturbing them that continue seeking, that continue to do our obsequies to the torn body of our martyred saint. . . .

Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks; methinks I see her as an eagle mewing her mighty youth, and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full mid-day beam; purging and unscaling her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about, amazed at what she means, and in their envious gabble would prognosticate a year of sects and schisms.

What should ye do then, should ye suppress all this flowery crop of knowledge and new light sprung up and yet springing daily in this city; should ye set an oligarchy of twenty engrossers over it, to bring a famine upon our minds again, when we shall know nothing but what is measured to us by their bushel? Believe it, Lords and Commons, they who counsel ye to such a suppressing, do as good as bid ye suppress yourselves; and I will soon show how.

If it be desired to know the immediate cause of all this free writing and free speaking, there cannot be assigned a truer than your own mild and free and humane government; it is the liberty, Lords and Commons, which your own valorous and happy counsels have purchased us, liberty which is the nurse of all great wits; this is that which hath rarefied and enlightened our spirits like the influence of heaven; this is that which hath enfranchised, enlarged, and lifted up our apprehensions degrees above themselves. Ye cannot make us now less capable, less knowing, less eagerly pursuing of the truth, unless ye first make yourselves, that made us so, less the lovers, less the founders of our true liberty. We can grow ignorant again, brutish, formal, and slavish, as ye found us; but you then must first become that which ye cannot be, oppressive, arbitrary, and tyrannous; as they were from whom ye have freed us. That our hearts are now more capacious, our thoughts more erected to the search and expectation of greatest and exactest things, is the issue of your own virtue propagated in us; ye cannot suppress that unless ye reinforce an abrogated and merciless law, that fathers may despatch at will their own children. And who shall then stick closest to ye, and excite others? not he who takes up arms for coat and conduct, and his four nobles of Danegelt. Although I dispraise not the defense of just immunities, yet love my peace better, if that were all. Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties.

SAMUEL PEPYS

*DiaryBringing in the King*¹

*May 21, 1660.*² By letters that came hither in my absence, I understand that the Parliament had ordered all persons to be secured, in order to a trial, that did sit as judges in the late King's death, and all the officers too attending the Court. News brought that the two Dukes are coming on board, which, by and by, they did, in a Dutch boat, the Duke of York in yellow trimmings, the Duke of Gloucester in gray and red. My Lord went in a boat to meet them, the captain, myself, and others, standing at the entering port. So soon as they were entered we shot the guns off round the fleet. After that they went to view the ship all over, and were most exceedingly pleased with it. They seem to be both very fine gentlemen. News is sent us that the King is on shore; so my Lord fired all his guns round twice, and all the fleet after him, which in the end fell into disorder, which seemed very handsome. The gun over against my cabin I fired myself to the King, which was the first time that he had been saluted by his own ships since this change; but holding my head too much over the gun, I had almost spoiled my right eye. Nothing in the world but going of guns almost all this day.

May 23, 1660. The Doctor and I waked very merry. In the morning came infinity of people on board from the King to go along with him. My Lord, Mr. Crew, and others, go on shore to meet the King as he comes off from shore, where Sir R. Stayner bringing His Majesty into the boat, I hear that His Majesty did with a great deal of affection kiss my Lord upon his first meeting. The King, with the two Dukes and Queen of Bohemia, Princess Royal, and Prince of Orange, came on board, where I in their coming in kissed the King's, Queen's, and Princess's hands, having done the other before. Infinite shooting off of the guns, and that in a disorder on purpose, which was better than if it had been otherwise. All day nothing but Lords and persons of honor on board, that we were exceeding full. Dined in a great deal of state, the Royal company by themselves in the coach, which was a blessed sight to see. After dinner the King and Duke altered the name of some of the ships, viz., the Nazeby into Charles; the Richard, James; the Speaker, Mary; the Dunbar (which was not in company with us), the Henry; Winsly, Happy Return; Wakefield, Richmond; Lambert, the Henrietta; Cheriton, the Speedwell; Bradford, the Success. That done, the Queen, Princess Royal, and Prince of Orange, took leave of the King, and the Duke of York went on board the London, and the Duke of Gloucester, the Swiftsure. Which done, we weighed anchor, and with a fresh gale and most happy weather we set sail for England. All the afternoon the King walked here and there, up and down (quite contrary to what I thought him to have been), very active and stirring. Upon the quarter-deck he fell into discourse of his escape from Worcester, where it made me ready to weep to hear the stories that he told of his difficulties that he had passed through, as his traveling four days and three nights on foot, every step up to his knees in dirt, with nothing but a green coat and a pair of country breeches on, and a pair of country shoes that made him so sore all over his feet, that he could scarce stir. Yet he was forced to run away from a miller and other company, that took them for rogues. His sitting at table at one place, where the master of the house, that had not seen him in eight years, did know him, but kept it private; when at the same table there was one that had been of his own regiment at Worcester, could not know him, but made him drink the King's health, and said that the King was at least four fingers higher than he. At another place he was by some servants of the house made to drink, that they might know him not to be a Roundhead, which they swore he was. In another place at his inn, the master of the house, as the King was standing, with his hands upon the back of a chair by the fireside, kneeled down and Pepys, Diary. Samuel Pepys (1633-1703) was educated at Cambridge and entered public service shortly before the Restoration. He was influential in placing the English navy on an efficient basis.

¹ Charles II, who is being restored to his throne after eleven years of exile.

² At the opening of this selection Pepys is aboard ship off the coast of Holland, waiting for the king and his court.

kissed his hand, privately, saying, that he would not ask who he was, but bid God bless him whither he was going. Then the difficulty of getting a boat to get into France, where he was fain to plot with the master thereof to keep his design from the four men and a boy (which was all his ship's company), and so go to Fécamp in France. At Rouen he looked so poorly, that the people went into the rooms before he went away to see whether he had not stolen something or other. The King supped alone in the coach; after that I got a dish, and we four supped in my cabin, as at noon. So to my cabin again, where the company still was, and were talking more of the King's difficulties; as how he was fain to eat a piece of bread and cheese out of a poor boy's pocket; how, at a Catholic house he was fain to lie in the priest's hole a good while in the house for his privacy. Under sail all night, and most glorious weather.

May 24, 1660. Up, and make myself as fine as I could, with the linning stockings on and wide canons that I bought the other day at Hague. Extraordinary press of noble company, and great mirth all the day. Walking upon the decks, where persons of honor all the afternoon, among others, Thomas Killigrew (a merry droll, but a gentleman of great esteem with the King), who told us many merry stories. After this discourse I was called to write a pass for my Lord Mandeville to take up horses to London, which I wrote in the King's name, and carried it to him to sign, which was the first and only one that ever he signed in the ship Charles. To bed, coming in sight of land a little before night.

May 25, 1660. By the morning we were come close to the land, and every body made ready to get on shore. The King and the two Dukes did eat their breakfast before they went, and there being set some ship's diet before them, only to show them the manner of the ship's diet, they eat of nothing else but peas and pork, and boiled beef. I spoke with the Duke of York about business, who called me Pepys by name, and upon my desire did promise me his future favor. Great expectation of the King's making some knights, but there was none. About noon (though the brigantine that Beale made was there ready to carry him) yet he would go in my Lord's barge with the two Dukes. Our Captain steered, and my Lord went along bare with him. I went, and Mr. Mansell, and one of the King's footmen, with a dog that the King loved, (which [dirtied] the boat, which made us laugh, and methink that a King and all that belong to him are but just as others are), in a boat by ourselves, and so got on shore when the King did, who was received by General Monk with all imaginable love and respect at his entrance upon the land of Dover. Infinite the crowd of people and the horsemen, citizens, and noblemen of all sorts. The Mayor of the town came and gave him his white staff, the badge of his place, which the King did give him again. The Mayor also presented him from the town a very rich Bible, which he took and said it was the thing that he loved above all things in the world. A canopy was provided for him to stand under, which he did, and talked awhile with General Monk and others, and so into a stately coach there set for him, and so away through the town towards Canterbury, without making any stay at Dover. The shouting and joy expressed by all is past imagination. My Lord returned late, and at his coming did give me order to cause the marke to be gilded, and a Crown and C. R. to be made at the head of the coach table, where the King today with his own hand did mark his height, which accordingly I caused the painter to do, and is not done as is to be seen.

Coronation of Charles II

April 23, 1661. About 4 I rose and got to the Abbey, where I followed Sir J. Denham, the Surveyor, with some company that he was leading in. And with much ado, by the favor of Mr. Cooper, his man, did get up into a great scaffold across the North end of the Abbey, where with a great deal of patience I sat from past 4 till 11 before the King came in. And a great pleasure it was to see the Abbey raised in the middle, all covered with red, and a throne (that is a chair) and footstool on the top of it; and all the officers of all kinds, so much as the very fiddlers, in red vests. At last comes in the Dean and Prebends of Westminster, with the Bishops (many of them in cloth of gold copes), and after them the Nobility, all in their Parliament robes, which was a most magnificent sight. Then the Duke, and the King with a scepter (carried by my Lord Sandwich) and sword and mond before him, and the crown too. The King in his robes, bareheaded, which was very fine. And after all had placed themselves, there was a sermon and the service; and then in the Quire at the high altar, the King passed through all the ceremonies of the Coronation, which to my great grief I and most in the Abbey could not see. The crown being put upon his head, a great shout begun, and he came forth to the throne, and there passed more ceremonies: as taking the oath, and having things read to him by the Bishop; and his lords (who put on their caps as soon as the King put on his crown) and bishops come, and kneeled before him. And three times the King at Arms went to the three open places on the scaffold, and proclaimed, that if anyone could show any reason why Charles Stuart should not be King of England, that now he should come and speak. And a General Pardon also was read by the Lord Chancellor, and medals flung up and down by my Lord Cornwallis, of silver, but I could not come by any. And the King came in with his crown on, and his scepter in his hand, under a canopy borne up by six silver staves, carried by Barons of the Cinque Ports, and little bells at every end. After a long time, he got up to the farther end, and all set themselves down at their several tables; and that was also a brave sight: and the King's first course carried up by the Knights of the Bath. And many fine ceremonies there was of the Heralds leading up people before him, and bowing; and my Lord of Albermarle's going to the kitchen and eat a bit of the first dish that was to go to the King's table. But, above all, was these three Lords, Northumberland, and Suffolk, and the Duke of Ormond, coming before the courses on horseback, and staying so all dinner-time, and at last to bring up [Dymock] the King's Champion, all in armor on horseback, with his spear and target carried before him. And a Herald proclaims "That if any dare deny Charles Stuart to be lawful King of England, here was a Champion that would fight with him;" and with these words, the Champion flings down his gauntlet, and all this he do three times in his going up towards the King's table. At last when he is come, the King drinks to him, and then sends him the cup which is of gold, and he drinks it off, and then rides back again with the cup in his hand. I went from table to table to see the Bishops and all others at their dinner, and was infinitely pleased with it. At Mr. Bowyer's; a great deal of company, some I knew, others I did not. Here we stayed upon the leads and below till it was late, expecting to see the fire-works, but they were not performed tonight: only the City had a light like a glory round about it with bonfires. And after a little stay more I took my wife and Mrs. Frankleyn (who I proffered the civility of lying with my wife at Mrs. Hunt's tonight) to Axe-yard, in which at the further end there were three great bonfires, and a great many great gallants, men and women; and they laid hold of us, and would have us drink the King's health upon our knees, kneeling upon a faggot, which we all did, they drinking to us one after another. Which we thought a strange frolic; but these gallants continued thus a great while, and I wondered to see how the ladies did tittle. Thus did the day end with joy everywhere. Now, after all this, I can say that, besides the pleasure of the sight of these glorious things, I may now shut my eyes against any other objects, nor for the future trouble myself to see things of state and show, as being sure never to see the like again in this world.

The Great Fire of London

September 2 (Lord's day), 1666. Some of our maids sitting up late last night to get things ready against our feast today, Jane called us up about three in the morning, to tell us of a great fire they saw in the City. So I rose and slipped on my nightgown, and went to her window, and thought it to be on the back-side of Marke-lane at the farthest; but, being unused to such fires as followed, I thought it far enough off; and so went to bed again and to sleep. About seven rose again to dress myself, and there looked out at the window, and saw the fire not so much as it was and further off. By and by Jane comes and tells me that she hears that above 300 houses have been burned down tonight by the fire we saw, and that it is now burning down all Fish-street, by London Bridge. So I made myself ready presently, and walked to the Tower, and there got up upon one of the high places, Sir J. Robinson's little son going up with me; and there I did see the houses at that end of the bridge all on fire, and an infinite great fire on this and the other side the end of the bridge; which, among other people, did trouble me for poor little Michell and our Sarah on the bridge. So down, with my heart full of trouble, to the Lieutenant of the Tower, who tells me that it begun this morning in the King's baker's house in Pudding-lane, and that it hath burned St. Magnus's Church and most part of Fish-street already. So I down to the water-side, and there got a boat and through bridge, and there saw a lamentable fire. Poor Michell's house, as far as the Old Swan, already burned that way, and the fire running further, that in a very little time it got as far as the Steele-yard, while I was there. Everybody endeavoring to remove their goods, and flinging into the river or bringing them into lighters that lay off; poor people staying in their houses as long as till the very fire touched them, and then running into boats, or clambering from one pair of stairs by the water-side to another. And among other things, the poor pigeons, I perceive, were loth to leave their houses, but hovered about the windows and balconys till they were, some of them burned, their wings, and fell down. Having stayed, and in an hour's time seen the fire rage every way, and nobody, to my sight, endeavoring to quench it, but to remove their goods, and leave all to the fire, and having seen it get as far as the Steele-yard, and the wind mighty high and driving it into the City; and every thing, after so long a drought, proving combustible, even the very stones of churches, and among other things the poor steeple by which pretty Mrs. — lives, and whereof my old schoolfellow Elborough is parson, taken fire in the very top, and there burned till it fell down: I to White Hall (with a gentleman with me who desired to go off from the Tower, to see the fire, in my boat); to White Hall, and there up to the King's closet in the Chapel, where people come about me, and I did give them an account dismayed them all, and word was carried in to the King. So I was called for, and did tell the King and Duke of York what I saw, and that unless his Majesty did command houses to be pulled down nothing could stop the fire. They seemed much troubled, and the King commanded me to go to my Lord Mayor from him, and command him to spare no houses, but to pull down before the fire every way. At last met my Lord Mayor in Canning-street, like a man spent, with a handkerchief about his neck. To the King's message he cried, like a fainting woman, "Lord, what can I do? I am spent: people will not obey me. I have been pulling down houses; but the fire overtakes us faster than we can do it." People all almost distracted, and no manner of means used to quench the fire. The houses, too, so very thick thereabouts, and full of matter of burning, as pitch and tar, in Thames-street; and warehouses of oil, and wines, and brandy, and other things. And to see the churches all filling with goods by people who themselves should have been quietly there at this time. Met with the King and Duke of York in their barge, and with them to Queenhithe, and there called Sir Richard Browne to apace. Their order was only to pull down houses apace, and so below bridge at the water-side; but little was or could be done, the fire coming upon them so fast. River full of lighters and boats taking in goods, and good goods swimming in the water, and only

I observed that hardly one lighter or boat in three that had the goods of a house in, but there was a pair of Virginals in it. So near the fire as we could for smoke; and all over the Thames, with one's face in the wind, you were almost burned with a shower of fire-drops. This is very true; so as houses were burned by these drops and flakes of fire, three or four, nay, five or six houses, one from another. When we could endure no more upon the water, we to a little ale-house on the Bankside, over against the Three Cranes, and there stayed till it was dark almost, and saw the fire grow; and, as it grew darker, appeared more and more, and in corners and upon steeples, and between churches and houses, as far as we could see up the hill of the City, in a most horrid malicious bloody flame, not like the fine flame of an ordinary fire. Barbary and her husband away before us. We stayed till, it being darkish, we saw the fire as only one entire arch of fire from this to the other side the bridge, and in a bow up the hill for an arch of above a mile long: it made me weep to see it. The churches, houses, and all on fire and flaming at once; and a horrid noise the flames made, and the cracking of houses at their ruin. So home with a sad heart, and there find every body discoursing and lamenting the fire; and poor Tom Hater come with some few of his goods saved out of his house, which is burned upon Fish-street Hill. I invited him to lie at my house, and did receive his goods, but was deceived in his lying there, the news coming every moment of the growth of the fire; so as we were forced to begin to pack up our own goods, and prepare for their removal; and did by moonshine (it being brave dry, and moonshine, and warm weather) carry much of my goods into the garden, and Mr. Hater and I did remove my money and iron chests into my cellar, as thinking that the safest place. And got my bags of gold into my office, ready to carry away, and my chief papers of accounts also there, and my tallies into a box by themselves.

September 3, 1666. About four o'clock in the morning, my Lady Batten sent me a cart to carry away all my money, and plate, and best things, to Sir W. Rider's at Bednall-green. Which I did, riding myself in my nightgown in the cart; and, Lord! to see how the streets and the highways are crowded with people running and riding, and getting of carts at any rate to fetch away things. The Duke of York come this day by the office, and spoke to us, and did ride with his guard up and down the City to keep all quiet (he being now General, and having the care of all). At night lay down a little upon a quilt of W. Hewer's in the office, all my own things being packed up or gone; and after me my poor wife did the like, we having fed upon the remains of yesterday's dinner, having no fire nor dishes, nor any opportunity of dressing any thing.

September 4, 1666. Up by break of day to get away the remainder of my things. Sir W. Batten not knowing how to remove his wine, did dig a pit in the garden, and laid it in there; and I took the opportunity of laying all the papers of my office that I could not otherwise dispose of. And in the evening Sir W. Pen and I did dig another, and put our wine in it; and I my Parmazan cheese, as well as my wine and some other things. Only now and then walking into the garden, and saw how horribly the sky looks, all on a fire in the night, was enough to put us out of our wits; and, indeed, it was extremely dreadful, for it looks just as if it was at us, and the whole heaven on fire. I after supper walked in the dark down to Tower-street, and there saw it all on fire, at the Trinity House on that side, and the Dolphin Tavern on this side, which was very near us; and the fire with extraordinary vehemence. Now begins the practice of blowing up of houses in Tower-street, those next the Tower, which at first did frighten people more than any thing; but it stopped the fire where it was done, it bringing down the houses to the ground in the same places they stood, and then it was easy to quench what little fire was in it, though it kindled nothing almost. Paul's is burned, and all Cheap-side. I wrote to my father this night, but the post-house being burned, the letter could not go.

September 5, 1666. About two in the morning my wife calls me up and tells me of new cries of fire, it being come to Barking Church, which is the bottom of our lane. I up, and finding it so, resolved presently to take her away, and did, and took my gold, which was about £2350, W. Hewer, and Jane, down by Proundy's boat to Woolwich; but, Lord! what a sad sight it was by moonlight to see the whole City almost on fire, that you might see it plain at Woolwich, as if you were by it. There, when I come, I find the gates shut, but no guard kept at all, which troubled me, because of discourse now begun, that there is plot in it, and that the French had done it. I got the gates open, and to Mr. Shelden's, where I locked up my gold, and charged my wife and W. Hewer never to leave the room without one of them in it, night or day. So back again, by the way seeing my goods well in the lighters at Deptford, and watched well by people. Home, and whereas I expected to have seen our house on fire, it being now about seven o'clock, it was not. I up to the top of Barking steeple, and there saw the saddest sight of desolation that I ever saw; everywhere great fires, oil-cellars, and brimstone, and other things burning. I became afraid to stay there long, and therefore down again as fast as I could, the fire being spread as far as I could see it; and to Sir W. Pen's, and there eat a piece of cold meat, having eaten nothing since Sunday, but the remains of Sunday's dinner.

September 6, 1666. It was pretty to see how hard the women did work in the cannells, sweeping of water; but then they would scold for drink, and be as drunk as devils. I saw good butts of sugar broke open in the street, and people go and take handfuls out, and put into beer, and drink it. And now all being pretty well, I took boat, and over to Southwarke, and took boat on the other side the bridge, and so to Westminster, thinking to shift myself, being all in dirt from top to bottom; but could not there find any place to buy a shirt or pair of gloves. A sad sight to see how the River looks; no houses nor church near it, to the Temple, where it stopped.

September 7, 1666. Up by five o'clock; and, blessed be God! find all well; and by water to Paul's Wharf. Walked thence, and saw all the town burned, and a miserable sight of Paul's church, with all the roofs fallen, and the body of the quire fallen into St. Fayth's; Paul's school also, Ludgate, and Fleet-street, my father's house, and the church, and a good part of the Temple the like. This day our Merchants first met at Gresham College, which, by proclamation, is to be their Exchange. Strange to hear what is bid for houses all up and down here; a friend of Sir W. Rider's having £150 for what he used to let for £40 per annum. Much dispute where the Custom-house shall be; thereby the growth of the City again to be foreseen. I home late to Sir W. Pen's, who did give me a bed; but without curtains or hanging, all being down. So here I went the first time into a naked bed, only my drawers on; and did sleep pretty well: but still both sleep and waking had a fear of fire in my heart, that I took little rest. People do all the world over cry out of the simplicity of my Lord Mayor in general, and more particularly in this business of the fire, laying it all upon him.

PROSE OF THE NEW CLASSICISM

Although Matthew Arnold has been frequently attacked for calling the eighteenth century the age of prose and reason, it can, nevertheless, be maintained that some of the greatest prose produced in the English language was written during that century.

Beginning in the very early years of the eighteenth century there appeared a long series of periodical essays. These essays came out at stated intervals, usually several times a week. In some newspapers they were all written by a single editor and in others, such as the Spectator, they were written by two or more persons in collaboration. These journalistic writings occupied some of the most talented Englishmen of the century, particularly Joseph Addison and Sir Richard Steele at the beginning of the movement and Samuel Johnson and Oliver Goldsmith at a later stage. The habit of receiving and perusing these periodicals produced a generation of intelligent essay readers, and this appreciative public in turn has been a great help in the later development of English prose.

The eighteenth century was a time when satire flourished. Beginning as early as Dryden in the last quarter of the seventeenth century, both poets and prose writers had given themselves over very freely to a fierce criticism of their political and social opponents. With Dryden and Pope this was largely done in verse, but with Jonathan Swift and Daniel Defoe it took the form of prose.

Swift wrote a number of essays savagely attacking political and social conditions, but his masterpiece of satire is Gulliver's Travels. In this work he sends his hero into various strange countries, and either by observing the people in these countries or having the people observe him, he brings out comparisons and contrasts that can be applied directly to conditions in England.

Though Defoe is important as a satirist, he is best known as the author of some very realistic fiction. Not to speak of Robinson Crusoe, which is familiar to every boy and girl, he wrote a Journal of the Plague Year, in which the Great Plague of London is described as if he had been there. Defoe's method of making his stories realistic will be seen in The Apparition of Mrs. Veal.

The great prose form developed in the eighteenth century was the novel in the sense that we now know it. It is unfortunate that an anthology cannot include some of these important English novels, but they must be read completely if they are to be appreciated.

After Robinson Crusoe the next step in the development of fiction was taken by Samuel Richardson, who wrote long novels in the form of letters exchanged between the principal characters. These epistolary novels continued throughout the eighteenth century and they may be even found today, but it was not more than ten years after the appearance of Richardson's Pamela that Henry Fielding was writing novels without the use of letters. The great English novel tradition which was to be followed by Jane Austen, Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, and George Eliot was well developed and established before 1760.

The literary dictator of the middle years of the century was Samuel Johnson, the author of the English Dictionary. Johnson not only wrote periodical essays, plays, poems, and literary criticism, but was one of the greatest of conversationalists. James Boswell, his inseparable companion, recorded many of his most interesting conversations and published them in his great biography. Johnson's influence on English literature is perhaps greater because of his personality than because of his writings themselves.

Even a cursory account of eighteenth century English prose must make some mention of the orations of Edmund Burke. In them we see the clearness and force of eighteenth century prose most effectively employed.

Another important achievement of English prose writing is in the field of history. Edward Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire is not only the first history written according to the research technique of the modern historian, but is written with such an excellent command of English that it is one of the enduring monuments of our prose.

DANIEL DEFOE

The Apparition of Mrs. Veal

This thing is so rare in all its circumstances, and on so good authority, that my reading and conversation have not given me anything like it. It is fit to gratify the most ingenious and serious inquirer. Mrs. Bargrave is the person to whom Mrs. Veal appeared after her death; she is my intimate friend, and I can avouch for her reputation for these last fifteen or sixteen years, on my own knowledge; and I can confirm the good character she had from her youth to the time of my acquaintance; though since this relation she is calumniated by some people that are friends to the brother of Mrs. Veal who appeared, who think the relation of this appearance to be a reflection, and endeavor what they can to blast Mrs. Bargrave's reputation, and to laugh the story out of countenance. But by the circumstances thereof, and the cheerful disposition of Mrs. Bargrave, notwithstanding the ill-usage of a very wicked husband, there is not the least sign of dejection in her face; nor did I ever hear her let fall a desponding or murmuring expression; nay, not when actually under her husband's barbarity, which I have been witness to, and several other persons of undoubted reputation.

Now you must know Mrs. Veal was a maiden gentlewoman of about thirty years of age, and for some years last past had been troubled with fits, which were perceived coming on her by her going off from her discourses very abruptly to some impertinence. She was maintained by an only brother, and kept his house in Dover. She was a very pious woman, and her brother a very sober man, to all appearance; but now he does all he can to null or quash the story. Mrs. Veal was intimately acquainted with Mrs. Bargrave from her childhood. Mrs. Veal's circumstances were then mean; her father did not take care of his children as he ought, so that they were exposed to hardships; and Mrs. Bargrave in those days had as unkind a father, though she wanted neither for food nor clothing, whilst Mrs. Veal wanted for both, insomuch that she would often say, "Mrs. Bargrave, you are not only the best, but the only friend I have in the world; and no circumstance in life shall ever dissolve my friendship." They would often condole each other's adverse fortunes, and read together Drelincourt upon Death, and other good books; and so, like two Christian friends, they comforted each other under their sorrow.

Some time after Mr. Veal's friends got him a place in the custom-house at Dover, which occasioned Mrs. Veal, by little and little, to fall off from her intimacy with Mrs. Bargrave, though there never was any such thing as a quarrel; but an indifferency came on by degrees, till at last Mrs. Bargrave had not seen her in two years and a half; though about a twelve-month of the time Mrs. Bargrave had been absent from Dover, and this last half-year had been in Canterbury about two months of the time, dwelling in a house of her own.

In this house, on the 8th of September 1705, she was sitting alone, in the forenoon, thinking over her unfortunate life, and arguing herself into a due resignation to Providence, though her condition seemed hard. "And," said she, "I have been provided for hitherto, and doubt not but I shall be still; and am well satisfied that my afflictions shall end when it is most fit for me;" and then took up her sewing-work, which she had no sooner done but she hears a knocking at the door. She went to see who was there, and this proved to be Mrs. Veal, her old friend, who was in a riding-habit; at that moment of time the clock struck twelve at noon.

"Madam," says Mrs. Bargrave, "I am surprised to see you, you have been so long a stranger;" but told her she was glad to see her, and offered to salute her, which Mrs. Veal complied with, till their lips almost touched; and then Mrs. Veal drew her hand across her own eyes and said, "I am not very well," and so waived it. She told Mrs. Bargrave she was going a journey, and had a great mind to see her first. "But," says Mrs. Bargrave, "how came you to take a journey alone? I am amazed at it, because I know you have a good brother." "Oh," says Mrs. Veal, "I gave my brother the slip, and came away, because I had so great a desire to see you before I took my journey." So Mrs. Bargrave went in with her into another room within the first, and Mrs. Veal set her down in an elbow-chair, in which Mrs. Bargrave was sitting when she heard Mrs. Veal knock. Then says Mrs. Veal, "My dear friend, I am come to renew our old friendship again, and beg your pardon for my breach of it; and if you can forgive me, you are the best of women." "Oh," says Mrs. Bargrave, "do not mention such a thing. I have not had an uneasy thought about it; I can easily forgive it." "What did you think of me?" said Mrs. Veal. Says Mrs. Bargrave, "I thought you were like the rest of the world, and that prosperity had made you forget yourself and me." Then Mrs. Veal reminded Mrs. Bargrave of the many friendly offices she did in her former days, and much of the conversation they had with each other in the times of their adversity; what books they read, and what comfort in particular they received from Drelincourt's Book of Death, which was the best, she said, on that subject ever written. She also mentioned Dr. Sherlock, the two Dutch books which were translated, written upon Death, and several others; but Drelincourt, she said, had the clearest notions of death and of the future state of any who had handled that subject. Then she asked Mrs. Bargrave whether she had Drelincourt. She said, "Yes." Says Mrs. Veal, "Fetch it." And so Mrs. Bargrave goes upstairs and brings it down. Says Mrs. Veal, "Dear Mrs. Bargrave, if the eyes of our faith were as open as the eyes of our body, we should see numbers of angels about us for our guard. The notions we have of heaven now are nothing like to what it is, as Drelincourt says. Therefore be comforted under your afflictions, and believe that the Almighty has a particular regard to you, and that your afflictions are marks of God's favor; and when they have done the business they are sent for, they shall be removed from you. And believe me, my dear friend, believe what I say to you, one minute of future happiness will infinitely reward you for all your sufferings; for I can never believe" (and claps her hands upon her knees with great earnestness, which indeed ran through most of her discourse) "that ever God will suffer you to spend all your days in this afflicted state; but be assured that your afflictions shall leave you, or you them, in a short time." She spake in that pathetic and heavenly manner that Mrs. Bargrave wept several times, she was so deeply affected with it.

Then Mrs. Veal mentioned Dr. Horneck's Ascetic, at the end of which he gives an account of the lives of the primitive Christians. Their pattern she recommended to our imitation, and said, "Their conversation was not like this of our age; for now," says she, "there is nothing but frothy, vain discourse, which is far different from theirs. Theirs was to edification, and to build one another up in faith; so that they were not as we are, nor are we as they were; but," said she, "we ought to do as they did. There was a hearty friendship among them; but where is it now to be found?" Says Mrs. Bargrave, "It is hard indeed to find a true friend in these days." Says Mrs. Veal, "Mr. Norris has a fine copy of verses, called Friendship in Perfection, which I wonderfully admire. Have you seen the book?" says Mrs. Veal. "No," says Mrs. Bargrave, "but I have the verses of my own writing out." "Have you?" says Mrs. Veal; "then fetch them." Which she did from above-stairs, and offered them to Mrs. Veal to read, who refused, and waived the thing, saying holding down her head would make it ache; and then desired Mrs. Bargrave to read them to her, which she did. As they were admiring Friendship Mrs. Veal said, "Dear Mrs. Bargrave, I shall love you for ever." In these verses there is twice used the word Elysian. "Ah!" says Mrs. Veal, "these poets have such names for heaven!" She would often draw her hand across her own eyes and say, "Mrs. Bargrave, do not you think I am mightily impaired by my fits?" "No," says Mrs. Bargrave, "I think you look as well as ever I knew you."

After all this discourse, which the apparition put in much finer words than Mrs. Bargrave said she could pretend to, and as much more than she can remember, for it cannot be thought that an hour and three-quarters' conversation could be retained, though the main of it she thinks she does, she said to Mrs. Bargrave she would have her write a letter to her brother, and tell him she would have him give rings to such and such, and that there was a purse of gold in her cabinet, and that she would have two broad pieces given to her cousin Watson.

Talking at this rate, Mrs. Bargrave thought that a fit was coming upon her, and so placed herself in a chair just before her knees, to keep her from falling to the ground, if her fits should occasion it (for the elbow-chair, she thought, would keep her from falling on either side); and to divert Mrs. Veal, as she thought, took hold of her gown-sleeve several times and commended it. Mrs. Veal told her it was a scoured silk, and newly made up. But for all this, Mrs. Veal persisted in her request, and told Mrs. Bargrave that she must not deny her, and she would have her tell her brother all their conversation when she had an opportunity. "Dear Mrs. Veal," said Mrs. Bargrave, "this seems so impertinent that I cannot tell how to comply with it; and what a mortifying story will our conversation be to a young gentleman!" "Well," says Mrs. Veal, "I must not be denied." "Why," says Mrs. Bargrave, "it is much better, methinks, to do it yourself." "No," says Mrs. Veal, "though it seems impertinent to you now, you will see more reason for it hereafter." Mrs. Bargrave then, to satisfy her opportunity, was going to fetch a pen and ink, but Mrs. Veal said, "Let it alone now, but do it when I am gone; but you must be sure to do it;" which was one of the last things she enjoined her at parting. So she promised her.

Then Mrs. Veal asked for Mrs. Bargrave's daughter. She said she was not at home, "But if you have a mind to see her," says Mrs. Bargrave, "I'll send for her." "Do," says Mrs. Veal. On which she left her, and went to a neighbor's to see for her; and by the time Mrs. Bargrave was returning, Mrs. Veal was got without the door into the street, in the face of the beast-market, on a Saturday (which is market-day), and stood ready to part. As soon as Mrs. Bargrave came to her, she asked her why she was in such haste. She said she must be going, though perhaps she might not go her journey until Monday; and told Mrs. Bargrave she hoped she should see her again at her cousin Watson's before she went whither she was going. Then she said she would take her leave of her, and walked from Mrs. Bargrave in her view, till a turning interrupted the sight of her, which was three-quarters after one in the afternoon.

Mrs. Veal died the 7th of September, at twelve o'clock at noon, of her fits, and had not above four hours' sense before death, in which time she received the sacrament. The next day after Mrs. Veal's appearing, being Sunday, Mrs. Bargrave was so mightily indisposed with a cold and a sore throat, that she could not go out that day; but on Monday morning she sent a person to Captain Watson's to know if Mrs. Veal was there. They wondered at Mrs. Bargrave's inquiry, and sent her word that she was not there, nor was expected. At this answer, Mrs. Bargrave told the maid she had certainly mistook the name or made some blunder. And though she was ill, she put on her hood, and went herself to Captain Watson's, though she knew none of the family, to see if Mrs. Veal was there or not. They said they wondered at her asking, for that she had not been in town; they were sure, if she had, she would have been there. Says Mrs. Bargrave, "I am sure she was with me on Saturday almost two hours." They said it was impossible; for they must have seen her, if she had. In comes Captain Watson while they are in dispute, and said that Mrs. Veal was certainly dead, and her escutcheons were making. This strangely surprised Mrs. Bargrave, when she sent to the person immediately who had the care of them, and found it true. Then she related the whole story to Captain Watson's family, and what gown she had on, and how striped, and that Mrs. Veal told her it was scoured. Then Mrs. Watson cried out, "You have seen her indeed, for none knew but Mrs. Veal and myself that the gown was scoured." And Mrs. Watson owned that she described the gown exactly; "for," said she, "I helped her to make it up." This Mrs. Watson blazed all about the town, and avouched the demonstration of the truth of Mrs. Bargrave's seeing Mrs. Veal's apparition; and Captain Watson carried two gentlemen immediately to Mrs. Bargrave's house to hear the relation from her own mouth. And when it spread so fast that gentlemen and persons of quality, the judicious and skeptical part of the world, flocked in upon her, it at last became such a task that she was forced to go out of the way; for they were in general extremely well satisfied of the truth of the thing, and plainly saw that Mrs. Bargrave was no hypochondriac, for she always appears with such a cheerful air and pleasing mien, that she has gained the favor and esteem of all the gentry, and it is thought a great favor if they can but get the relation from her own mouth. I should have told you before that Mrs. Veal told Mrs. Bargrave that her sister and brother-in-law were just come down from London to see her. Says Mrs. Bargrave, "How came you to order matters so strangely?" "It could not be helped," said Mrs. Veal. And her brother and sister did come to see her, and entered the town of Dover just as Mrs. Veal was expiring. Mrs. Bargrave asked her whether she would drink some tea. Says Mrs. Veal, "I do not care if I do; but I'll warrant you this mad fellow" (meaning Mrs. Bargrave's husband) "has broken all your trinkets." "But," says Mrs. Bargrave, "I'll get something to drink in for all that." But Mrs. Veal waived it, and said, "It is no matter; let it alone;" and so it passed.

All the time I sat with Mrs. Bargrave, which was some hours, she recollected fresh sayings of Mrs. Veal. And one material thing more she told Mrs. Bargrave—that old Mr. Breton allowed Mrs.

Veal ten pounds a year, which was a secret, and unknown to Mrs. Bargrave till Mrs. Veal told it her. Mrs. Bargrave never varies in her story, which puzzles those who doubt of the truth or are unwilling to believe it. A servant in the neighbor's yard adjoining to Mrs. Bargrave's house heard her talking to somebody an hour of the time Mrs. Veal was with her. Mrs. Bargrave went out to her next neighbor's the very moment she parted with Mrs. Veal, and told her what ravishing conversation she had with an old friend, and told the whole of it. Drelincourt's Book of Death is, since this happened, bought up strangely. And it is to be observed that, notwithstanding all the trouble and fatigue Mrs. Bargrave has undergone upon this account, she never took the value of a farthing, nor suffered her daughter to take anything of anybody, and therefore can have no interest in telling the story.

But Mr. Veal does what he can to stifle the matter, and said he would see Mrs. Bargrave; but yet it is certain matter of fact that he has been at Captain Watson's since the death of his sister, and yet never went near Mrs. Bargrave; and some of his friends report her to be a liar, and that she knew of Mr. Breton's ten pounds a year. But the person who pretends to say so has the reputation of a notorious liar among persons whom I know to be of undoubted credit. Now, Mr. Veal is more of a gentleman than to say she lies, but says a bad husband has crazed her. But she needs only present herself and it will effectually confute that pretense. Mr. Veal says he asked his sister on her death-bed whether she had a mind to dispose of anything, and she said no. Now, the things which Mrs. Veal's apparition would have disposed of were so trifling, and nothing of justice aimed at in their disposal, that the design of it appears to me to be only in order to make Mrs. Bargrave so to demonstrate the truth of her appearance, as to satisfy the world of the reality thereof as to what she had seen and heard, and to secure her reputation among the reasonable and understanding part of mankind. And then again Mr. Veal owns that there was a purse of gold; but it was not found in her cabinet, but in a comb-box. This looks improbable; for that Mrs. Watson owned that Mrs. Veal was so very careful of the key of the cabinet that she would trust nobody with it; and if so, no doubt she would not trust her gold out of it. And Mrs. Veal's often drawing her hand over her eyes, and asking Mrs. Bargrave whether her fits had not impaired her, looks to me as if she did it on me, but in the posture I lay, could see nothing except the sky. In a little time I felt something alive moving on my left leg, which advancing gently forward over my breast, came almost up to my chin; when bending my eyes downwards as much as I could, I perceived it to be a human creature not six inches high, with a bow and arrow in his hands, and a quiver at his back. In the mean time, I felt at least forty more of the same kind (as I conjectured) following the first. I was in the utmost astonishment, and roared so loud, that they all ran back in a fright; and some of them, as I was afterwards told, were hurt with the falls they got by leaping from my sides upon the ground. However, they soon returned, and one of them, who ventured so far as to get a full sight of my face, lifting up his hands and eyes by way of admiration, cried out in a shrill, but distinct voice, Hekinah degul: the others repeated the same words several times, but then I knew not what they meant. I lay all this while, as the reader may believe, in great uneasiness: at length, struggling to get loose, I had the fortune to break the strings, and wrench out the pegs that fastened my left arm to the ground; for, by lifting it up to my face, I discovered the methods they had taken to bind me, and at the same time with a violent pull, which gave me excessive pain, I a little loosened the strings that tied down my hair on the left side, so that I was just able to turn my head about two inches. But the creatures ran off a second time, before I could seize them; whereupon there was a great shout in a very shrill accent, and after it ceased, I heard one of them cry aloud Tolgo phonac; when in an instant I felt above an hundred arrows discharged on my left hand, which pricked me like so many needles; and besides, they shot another flight into the air, as we do bombs in Europe, whereof many, I suppose, fell on my body, (though I felt them not) and some on my face, which I immediately covered with my left hand. When this shower of arrows was over, I fell a groaning with grief and pain, and then striving again to get loose, they discharged another volley larger than the first, and some of them attempted with spears to stick me in the sides; but, by good luck, I had on a buff jerkin, which they could not pierce. I thought it the most prudent method to lie still, and my design was to continue so till night, when, my left hand being already loose, I could easily free myself: and as for the inhabitants, I had reason to believe I might be a match for the greatest armies they could bring against me, if they were all of the same size with him that I saw. But fortune disposed otherwise of me. When the people observed I was quiet, they discharged no more arrows; but, by the noise I heard, I knew their numbers increased; and about four yards from me, over-against my right ear, I heard a knocking for above an hour, like that of people at work; when turning my head that way, as well as the pegs and strings would permit me, I saw a stage erected, about a foot and a half from the ground, capable of holding four of the inhabitants, with two or three ladders to mount it: from whence one of them, who seemed to be a person of quality, made me a long speech, whereof I understood not one syllable. But I should have mentioned, that before the principal person began his oration, he cried out three times, Langro dehul san: (these words and the former were afterwards repeated and explained to me). Whereupon immediately about fifty of the inhabitants came and cut the strings that fastened the left side of my head, which gave me the liberty of turning it to the right, and of observing the person and gesture of him that was to speak. He appeared to be of a middle age, and taller than any of the other three who attended him, whereof one was a page that held up his train, and seemed to be somewhat longer than my middle finger; the other two stood one on each side to support him. He acted every part of an orator, and I could observe many periods of threatenings, and others of promises, pity, and kindness. I answered in a few words, but in the most submissive manner, lifting up my left hand, and both my eyes to the sun, as calling him for a witness; and being almost famished with hunger, having not eaten a morsel for some hours before I left the ship, I found the demands of nature so strong upon me, that I could not forbear showing my impatience (perhaps against the strict rules of decency) by putting my finger frequently on my mouth, to signify that I wanted food. The Hurgo (for so they call a great lord, as I afterwards learnt) understood me very well. He descended from the stage, and commanded that several ladders should be applied to my sides, on which above an hundred of the inhabitants mounted and walked towards my mouth, laden with baskets full of meat, which had been provided and sent thither by the King's orders, upon the first intelligence he received of me. I observed there was the flesh of several animals, but could not distinguish them by the taste. There were shoulders, legs, and loins, shaped like those of mutton, and very well dressed, but smaller than the wings of a lark. I eat them by two or three at a mouthful, and took three loaves at a time, about the bigness of musket bullets. They supplied me as fast as they could, showing a thousand marks of wonder and astonishment at my bulk and appetite. I then made another sign that I wanted drink. They found by my eating, that a small quantity would not suffice me; and being a most ingenious people, they slung up with great dexterity one of their largest hogsheads, then rolled it towards my hand, and beat out the top; I drank it off at a draught, which I might well do, for it did not hold half a pint, and tasted like a small wine of Burgundy, but much more delicious. They brought me a second hogshead, which I drank in the same manner, and made signs for more, but they had none to give me. When I had performed these wonders, they shouted for joy, and danced upon my breast, repeating several times as they did at first, Hekinah degul. They made me a sign that I should throw down the two hogsheads, but first warning the people below to stand out of the way, crying aloud, Borach mivola, and when they saw the vessels in the air, there was an universal shout of Hekinah degul. I confess I was often tempted while they were passing backwards and forwards on my body, to seize forty or fifty of the first that came in my reach, and dash them against the ground. But the remembrance of what I had felt, which probably might not be the worst they could do, and the promise of honor I made them, for so I interpreted my submissive behavior, soon drove out these imaginations. Besides, I now considered myself as bound by the laws of hospitality to a people who had treated me with so much expense and magnificence. However, in my thoughts, I could not sufficiently wonder at the intrepidity of these diminutive mortals, who durst venture to mount and walk upon my body, while one of my hands was at liberty, without trembling at the very sight of so prodigious a creature as I must appear to them. After some time, when they observed that I made no more demands for meat, there appeared before me a person of high rank from his Imperial Majesty. His Excellency, having mounted on the small of my right leg, advanced forwards up to my face, with about a dozen of his retinue. And producing his credentials under the Signet Royal, which he applied close to my eyes, spoke about ten minutes, without any signs of anger, but with a kind of determinate resolution; often pointing forwards, which, as I afterwards found, was towards the capital city, about half a mile distant, whither it was agreed by his Majesty in council that I must be conveyed. I answered in few words, but to no purpose, and made a sign with my hand that was loose, putting it to the other (but over his Excellency's head for fear of hurting him or his train) and then to my own head and body, to signify that I desired my liberty. It appeared that he understood me well enough, for he shook his head by way of disapprobation, and held his hand in a posture to show that I must be carried as a prisoner. However, he made other signs to let me understand that I should have meat and drink enough, and very good treatment. Whereupon I once more thought of attempting to break my bonds; but again, when I felt the smart of their arrows, upon my face and hands, which were all in blisters, and many of the darts still sticking in them, and observing likewise that the number of my enemies increased, I gave tokens to let them know that they might do with me what they pleased. Upon this, the Hurgo and his train withdrew, with much civility and cheerful countenances. Soon after I heard a general shout, with frequent repetitions of the words, Peplom selan, and I felt great numbers of people on my left side relaxing the cords to such a degree, that I was able to turn upon my right, and to ease myself with making water; which I very plentifully did, to the great astonishment of the people, who conjecturing by my motions what I was going to do, immediately opened to the right and left on that side to avoid the torrent which fell with such noise and violence from me. But before this, they had daubed my face and both my hands with a sort of ointment very pleasant to the smell, which in a few minutes removed all the smart of their arrows. These circumstances, added to the refreshment I had received by their victuals and drink, which were very nourishing, disposed me to sleep. I slept about eight hours, as I was afterwards assured; and it was no wonder, for the physicians, by the Emperor's order, had mingled a sleepy potion in the hogshead of wine.

It seems that upon the first moment I was discovered sleeping on the ground after my landing, the Emperor had early notice of it by an express; and determined in council that I should be tied in the manner I have related, (which was done in the night while I slept) that plenty of meat and drink should be sent to me, and a machine prepared to carry me to the capital city.

This resolution perhaps may appear very bold and dangerous, and I am confident would not be imitated by any prince in Europe on the like occasion; however, in my opinion, it was extremely prudent, as well as generous: for supposing these people had endeavored to kill me with their spears and arrows while I was asleep, I should certainly have awaked with the first sense of smart, which might so far have roused my rage and strength, as to have enabled me to break the strings where-with I was tied; after which, as they were not able 10 to make resistance, so they could expect no mercy.

These people are most excellent mathematicians, and arrived to a great perfection in mechanics, by the countenance and encouragement of the Emperor, who is a renowned patron of learning. This prince hath several machines fixed on wheels, for the carriage of trees and other great weights. He often builds his largest men of war, whereof some are nine foot long, in the woods where the timber grows, and has them carried on these engines three 20 or four hundred yards to the sea. Five hundred carpenters and engineers were immediately set at work to prepare the greatest engine they had. It was a frame of wood raised three inches from the ground, about seven foot long and four wide, moving upon twenty-two wheels. The shout I heard was upon the arrival of this engine, which it seems set out in four hours after my landing. It was brought parallel to me as I lay. But the principal difficulty was to raise and place me in 30 this vehicle. Eighty poles, each of one foot high, were erected for this purpose, and very strong cords of the bigness of packthread were fastened by hooks to many bandages, which the workmen had girt round my neck, my hands, my body, and my legs. Nine hundred of the strongest men were employed to draw up these cords by many pulleys fastened on the poles, and thus, in less than three hours, I was raised and slung into the engine, and there tied fast. All this I was told, for, while the whole operation was performing, I lay in a profound sleep, by the force of that soporiferous medicine infused into my liquor. Fifteen hundred of the Emperor's largest horses, each about four inches and a half high, were employed to draw me towards the metropolis, which, as I said, was half a mile distant.

About four hours after we began our journey, I awaked by a very ridiculous accident; for the carriage being stopped a while to adjust something 50 that was out of order, two or three of the young natives had the curiosity to see how I looked when I was asleep; they climbed up into the engine, and advancing very sortly to my face, one of them, an officer in the guards, put the sharp end of his half-pike a good way up into my left nostril, which tickled my nose like a straw, and made me sneeze violently: whereupon they stole off unperceived, and it was three weeks before I knew the cause of my awaking so suddenly. We made a long march the remaining part of that day, and rested at night with five hundred guards on each side of me, half with torches, and half with bows and arrows, ready to shoot me if I should offer to stir. The next morning at sun-rise we continued our march, and arrived within two hundred yards of the city gates about noon. The Emperor, and all his court, came out to meet us; but his great officers would by no means suffer his Majesty to endanger his person by mounting on my body.

At the place where the carriage stopped, there stood an ancient temple, esteemed to be the largest in the whole kingdom; which having been polluted some years before by an unnatural murder, was, according to the zeal of those people, looked upon as profane, and therefore had been applied to common uses, and all the ornaments and furniture carried away. In this edifice it was determined I should lodge. The great gate fronting to the north was about four foot high, and almost two foot wide, through which I could easily creep. On each side of the gate was a small window not above six inches from the ground: into that on the left side, the King's smiths conveyed fourscore and eleven chains, like those that hang to a lady's watch in Europe, and almost as large, which were locked to my left leg with six and thirty padlocks. Over-against this temple, on t'other side of the great highway, at twenty foot distance, there was a turret at least five foot high. Here the Emperor ascended, with many principal lords of his court, to have an opportunity of viewing me, as I was told, for I could not see them. It was reckoned that above an hundred thousand inhabitants came out of the town upon the same errand; and, in spite of my guards, I believe there could not be fewer than ten thousand at several times, who mounted my body by the help of ladders. But a proclamation was soon issued to forbid it upon pain of death. When the workmen found it was impossible for me to break loose, they cut all the strings that bound me; whereupon I rose up, with 50 as melancholy a disposition as ever I had in my life. But the noise and astonishment of the people at seeing me rise and walk, are not to be expressed. The chains that held my left leg were about two yards long, and gave me not only the liberty of walking backwards and forwards in a semicircle; but, being fixed within four inches of the gate, allowed me to creep in, and lie at my full length in the temple.

CHAPTER II

The Emperor of Lilliput, attended by several of the nobility, comes to see the Author in his confinement. The Emperor's person and habit described. Learned men appointed to teach the Author their language. He gains favor by his mild disposition. His pockets are searched, and his sword and pistols taken from him.

When I found myself on my feet, I looked about me and must confess I never beheld a more entertaining prospect. The country round appeared like a continued garden, and the inclosed fields, which were generally forty foot square, resembled so many beds of flowers. These fields were intermingled with woods of half a stang, and the tallest trees, as I could judge, appeared to be seven foot high. I viewed the town on my left hand, which looked like the painted scene of a city in a theater.

The Emperor was already descended from the tower, and advancing on horseback towards me, which had like to have cost him dear; for the beast, though very well trained, yet wholly unused to such a sight, which appeared as if a mountain moved before him, reared up on his hinder feet: but that prince, who is an excellent horseman, kept his seat, till his attendants ran in, and held the bridle, while his Majesty had time to dismount. When he alighted, he surveyed me round with great admiration, but kept beyond the length of my chain. He ordered his cooks and butlers, who were already prepared, to give me victuals and drink, which they pushed forward in a sort of vehicles upon wheels, till I could reach them. I took these vehicles, and soon emptied them all; twenty of them were filled with meat, and ten with liquor; each of the former afforded me two or three good mouthfuls, and I emptied the liquor of ten vessels, which was contained in earthen vials, into one vehicle, drinking it off at a draught; and so I did with the rest. The Empress, and young Princes of the blood of both sexes, attended by many ladies, sat at some distance in their chairs; but upon the accident that happened to the Emperor's horse, they alighted, and came near his person, which I am now going to describe. He is taller by almost the breadth of my nail, than any of his court; which alone is enough to strike an awe into the beholders. His features are strong and masculine, with an Austrian lip and arched nose, his complexion olive, his countenance erect, his body and limbs well proportioned, all his motions graceful, and his deportment majestic. He was then past his prime, being twenty-eight years and three quarters old, of which he had reigned about seven, in great felicity, and generally victorious. For the better convenience of beholding him, I lay on my side, so that my face was parallel to his, and he stood but three yards off: however, I have had him since many times in my hand, and therefore cannot be deceived in the description. His dress was very plain and simple, and the fashion of it between the Asiatic and the European: but he had on his head a light helmet of gold, adorned with jewels, and a plume on the crest. He held his sword drawn in his hand, to defend himself, if I should happen to break loose; it was almost three inches long, the hilt and scabbard were gold enriched with diamonds. His voice was shrill, but very clear and articulate, and I could distinctly hear it when I stood up. The ladies and courtiers were all most magnificently clad, so that the spot they stood upon seemed to resemble a petticoat spread on the ground, embroidered with figures of gold and silver. His Imperial Majesty spoke often to me, and I returned answers, but neither of us could understand a syllable. There were several of his priests and lawyers present (as I conjectured by their habits) who were commanded to address themselves to me, and I spoke to them in as many languages as I had the least smattering of, which were High and Low Dutch, Latin, French, Spanish, Italian, and Lingua Franca; but all to no purpose. After about two hours the court retired, and I was left with a strong guard, to prevent the impertinence, and probably the malice of the rabble, who were very impatient to crowd about me as near as they durst, and some of them had the impudence to shoot their arrows at me as I sat on the ground by the door of my house, whereof one very narrowly missed my left eye. But the colonel ordered six of the ringleaders to be seized, and thought no punishment so proper as to deliver them bound into my hands, which some of his soldiers accordingly did, pushing them forwards with the butt-ends of their pikes into my reach; I took them all in my right hand, put five of them into my coat-pocket, and as to the sixth, I made a countenance as if I would eat him alive. The poor man squalled terribly, and the colonel and his officers were in much pain, especially when they saw me take out my pen-knife: but I soon put them out of fear: for, looking mildly, and immediately cutting the strings he was bound with, I set him gently on the ground, and away he ran. I treated the rest in the same manner, taking them one by one out of my pocket, and I observed both the soldiers and people were highly obliged at this mark of my clemency, which was represented very much to my advantage at court.

Towards night I got with some difficulty into my house, where I lay on the ground, and continued to do so about a fortnight; during which time the Emperor gave orders to have a bed prepared for me. Six hundred beds of the common measure were brought in carriages, and worked up in my house; an hundred and fifty of their beds sewn together made up the breadth and length, and these were four double, which however kept me but very indifferently from the hardness of the floor, that was of smooth stone. By the same computation they provided me with sheets, blankets, and coverlets, tolerable enough for one who had been so long inured to hardships as I.

As the news of my arrival spread through the kingdom, it brought prodigious numbers of rich, idle, and curious people to see me; so that the villages were almost emptied, and great neglect of tillage and household affairs must have ensued, if his Imperial Majesty had not provided, by several proclamations and orders of state, against this inconvenience. He directed that those who had already beheld me should return home, and not presume to come within fifty yards of my house without license from court; whereby the secretaries of state got considerable fees.

In the meantime, the Emperor held frequent councils to debate what course should be taken with me; and I was afterwards assured by a particular friend, a person of great quality, who was looked upon to be as much in the secret as any, that the court was under many difficulties concerning me. They apprehended my breaking loose, that my diet would be very expensive, and might cause a famine. Sometimes they determined to starve me, or at least to shoot me in the face and hands with poisoned arrows, which would soon dispatch me; but again they considered, that the stench of so large a carcass might produce a plague in the metropolis, and probably spread through the whole kingdom. In the midst of these consultations, several officers of the army went to the door of the great council-chamber; and two of them being admitted, gave an account of my behavior to the six criminals above-mentioned, which made so favorable an impression in the breast of his Majesty and the whole board, in my behalf, that an Imperial Commission was issued out, obliging all the villages nine hundred yards round the city, to deliver in every morning six beeves, forty sheep, and other victuals for my sustenance; together with a proportionable quantity of bread, and wine, and other liquors; for the due payment of which his Majesty gave assignments upon his treasury. For this prince lives chiefly upon his own demesnes, seldom, except upon great occasions, raising any subsidies upon his subjects, who are bound to attend him in his wars at their own expense. An establishment was also made of six hundred persons to be my domestics, who had board-wages allowed for their maintenance, and tents built for them very conveniently on each side of my door. It was likewise ordered, that three hundred tailors should make me a suit of clothes after the fashion of the country: that six of his Majesty's greatest scholars should be employed to instruct me in their language: and, lastly, that the Emperor's horses, and those of the nobility, and troops of guards, should be frequently exercised in my sight, to accustom themselves to me. All these orders were duly put in execution, and in about three weeks I made a great progress in learning their language; during which time, the Emperor frequently honored me with his visits, and was pleased to assist my masters in teaching me. We began already to converse together in some sort; and the first words I learnt were to express my desire that he would please give me my liberty, which I every day repeated on my knees. His answer, as I could comprehend it, was, that this must be a work of time, not to be thought on without the advice of his council, and that first I must Lumos kelmin pesso desmar lon Emposo; that is, swear a peace with him and his kingdom. However, that I should be used with all kindness; and he advised me to acquire, by my patience and discreet behavior, the good opinion of himself and his subjects. He desired I would not take it ill, if he gave orders to certain proper officers to search me; for probably I might carry about me several weapons, which must needs be dangerous things, if they answered the bulk of so prodigious a person. I said, his Majesty should be satisfied, for I was ready to strip myself, and turn up my pockets before him. This I delivered part in words, and part in signs. He replied, that by the laws of the kingdom I must be searched by two of his officers; that he knew this could not be done without my consent and assistance; that he had so good an opinion of my generosity and justice, as to trust their persons in my hands: that whatever they took from me should be returned when I left the country, or paid for at the rate which I would set upon them. I took up the two officers in my hands, put them first into my coat-pockets, and then into every other pocket about me, except my two fobs, and another secret pocket which I had no mind should be searched, wherein I had some little necessities that were of no consequence to any but myself. In one of my fobs there was a silver watch, and in the other a small quantity of gold in a purse. These gentlemen, having pen, ink, and paper about them, made an exact inventory of every thing they saw; and when they had done, desired I would set them down, that they might deliver it to the Emperor. This inventory I afterwards translated into English, and is word for word as follows.

Imprimis, In the right coat-pocket of the Great Man-Mountain (for so I interpret the words Quinbus Flestrin) after the strictest search, we found only one great piece of coarse cloth, large enough to be a foot-cloth for your Majesty's chief room of state. In the left pocket we saw a huge silver chest, with a cover of the same metal, which we, the searchers, were not able to lift. We desired it should be opened, and one of us stepping into it, found himself up to the mid leg in a sort of dust, some part whereof flying up to our faces, set us both a sneezing for several times together. In his right waistcoat-pocket we found a prodigious bundle of white thin substances, folded one over another, about the bigness of three men, tied with a strong cable, and marked with black figures; which we humbly conceive to be writings, every letter almost half as large as the palm of our hands. In the left there was a sort of engine, from the back of which were extended twenty long poles, resembling the pallisados before your Majesty's court; wherewith we conjecture the Man-Mountain combs his head; for we did not always trouble him with questions, because we found it a great difficulty to make him understand us. In the large pocket on the right side of his middle cover (so I translate the word ranfu-lo, by which they meant my breeches) we saw a hollow pillar of iron, about the length of a man, fastened to a strong piece of timber, larger than the pillar; and upon one side of the pillar were huge pieces of iron sticking out, cut into strange figures, which we know not what to make of. In the left pocket, another engine of the same kind. In the smaller pocket on the right side, were several round flat pieces of white and red metal, of different bulk; some of the white, which seemed to be silver, were so large and heavy, that my comrade and I could hardly lift them. In the left pocket were two black pillars irregularly shaped: we could not, without difficulty, reach the top of them as we stood at the bottom of his pocket. One of them was covered, and seemed all of a piece: but at the upper end of the other, there appeared a white round substance, about twice the bigness of our heads. Within each of these was enclosed a prodigious plate of steel; which, by our orders, we obliged him to show us, because we apprehended they might be dangerous engines. He took them out of their cases, and told us, that in his own country his practice was to shave his beard with one of these, and cut his meat with the other. There were two pockets which we could not enter: these he called his fobs; they were two large slits cut into the top of his middle cover, but squeezed close by the pressure of his belly. Out of the right fob hung a great silver chain, with a wonderful kind of engine at the bottom. We directed him to draw out whatever was fastened to that chain; which appeared to be a globe, half silver, and half of some transparent metal; for, on the transparent side, we saw certain strange figures circularly drawn, and thought we could touch them, till we found our fingers stopped by that lucid substance. He put this engine to our ears, which made an incessant noise like that of a water-mill. And we conjecture it is either some unknown animal, or the god that he worships; but we are more inclined to the latter opinion, because he assured us, (if we understood him right, for he expressed himself very imperfectly) that he seldom did any thing without consulting it. He called it his oracle, and said it pointed out the time for every action of his life. From the left fob he took out a net almost large enough for a fisherman, but contrived to open and shut like a purse, and served him for the same use: we found therein several massy pieces of yellow metal, which, if they be real gold, must be of immense value.

Having thus, in obedience to your Majesty's commands, diligently searched all his pockets, we observed a girdle about his waist made of the hide of some prodigious animal; from which, on the left side, hung a sword of the length of five men; and on the right, a bag or pouch divided into two cells, each cell capable of holding three of your Majesty's subjects. In one of these cells were several globes or balls of a most ponderous metal, about the bigness of our heads, and requiring a strong hand to lift them: the other cell contained a heap of certain black grains, but of no great bulk or weight, for we could hold above fifty of them in the palms of our hands.

This is an exact inventory of what we found about the body of the Man-Mountain, who used us with great civility, and due respect to your Majesty's Commission. Signed and sealed on the fourth day of the eighty-ninth moon of your Majesty's auspicious reign.

CLEFRIN FRELOCK, MARS FRELOCK.

When this inventory was read over to the Emperor, he directed me, although in very gentle terms, to deliver up the several particulars. He first called for my scimitar, which I took out, scabbard and all. In the mean time he ordered three thousand of his choicest troops (who then attended him) to surround me at a distance, with their bows and arrows just ready to discharge: but I did not observe it, for my eyes were wholly fixed upon his Majesty. He then desired me to draw my scimitar, which, although it had got some rust by the sea-water, was in most parts exceeding bright. I did so, and immediately all the troops gave a shout between terror and surprise; for the sun shone clear, and the reflection dazzled their eyes, as I waved the scimitar to and fro in my hand. His Majesty, who is a most magnanimous prince, was less daunted than I could expect; he ordered me to return it into the scabbard, and cast it on the ground as gently as I could, about six foot from the end of my chain. The next thing he demanded, was one of the hollow iron pillars, by which he meant my pocket-pistols. I drew it out, and at his desire, as well as I could, expressed to him the use of it; and charging it only with powder, which, by the closeness of my pouch, happened to escape wetting in the sea (an inconvenience against which all prudent mariners take special care to provide,) I first cautioned the Emperor not to be afraid, and then I let it off in the air. The astonishment here was much greater than at the sight of my scimitar. Hundreds fell down as if they had been struck dead; and even the Emperor; although he stood his ground, could not recover himself in some time. I delivered up both my pistols in the same manner as I had done my scimitar, and then my pouch of powder and bullets; begging him that the former might be kept from fire, for it would kindle with the smallest spark, and blow up his imperial palace into the air. I likewise delivered up my watch, which the Emperor was very curious to see, and commanded two of his tallest yeomen of the guards to bear it on a pole upon their shoulders, as draymen in England do a barrel of ale. He was amazed at the continual noise it made, and the motion of the minute-hand, which he could easily discern; for their sight is much more acute than ours: and asked the opinions of his learned men about him, which were various and remote, as the reader may well imagine without my repeating; although indeed I could not very perfectly understand them. I then gave up my silver and copper money, my purse, with nine large pieces of gold, and some smaller ones; my knife and razor, my comb and silver snuff-box, my handkerchief and journal-book. My scimitar, pistols, and pouch, were conveyed in carriages to his Majesty's stores; but the rest of my goods were returned to me.

I had, as I before observed, one private pocket which escaped their search, wherein there was a pair of spectacles, (which I sometimes use for the weakness of my eyes) a pocket perspective, and several other little conveniences; which being of no consequence to the Emperor, I did not think myself bound in honor to discover, and I apprehended they might be lost or spoiled if I ventured them out of my possession.

CHAPTER III

The Author diverts the Emperor, and his nobility of both sexes, in a very uncommon manner. The diversions of the court of Lilliput described. The Author has his liberty granted him upon certain conditions.

My gentleness and good behavior had gained so far on the Emperor and his court, and indeed upon the army and people in general, that I began to conceive hopes of getting my liberty in a short time. I took all possible methods to cultivate this favorable disposition. The natives came by degrees to be less apprehensive of any danger from me. I would sometimes lie down, and let five or six of them dance on my hand. And at last the boys and girls would venture to come and play at hide and seek in my hair. I had now made a good progress in understanding and speaking their language.

The Emperor had a mind one day to entertain me with several of the country shows, wherein they exceed all nations I have known, both for dexterity and magnificence. I was diverted with none so much as that of the rope-dancers, performed upon a slender white thread, extended about two foot, and twelve inches from the ground. Upon which I shall desire liberty, with the reader's patience, to enlarge a little.

This diversion is only practiced by those persons who are candidates for great employments, and high favor, at court. They are trained in this art from their youth, and are not always of noble birth, or liberal education. When a great office is vacant, either by death or disgrace, (which often happens) five or six of those candidates petition the Emperor to entertain his Majesty and the court with a dance on the rope, and whoever jumps the highest without falling, succeeds in the office. Very often the chief ministers themselves are commanded to show their skill, and to convince the Emperor that they have not lost their faculty. Flimnap, the Treasurer, is allowed to cut a caper on the straight rope, at least an inch higher than any other lord in the whole empire. I have seen him do the summerset several times together upon a trencher fixed on the rope, which is no thicker than a common packthread in England. My friend Reldresal, principal Secretary for private Affairs, is, in my opinion, if I am not partial, the second after the Treasurer; the rest of the great officers are much upon a par.

These diversions are often attended with fatal accidents, whereof great numbers are on record. I myself have seen two or three candidates break a limb. But the danger is much greater when the ministers themselves are commanded to show their dexterity; for, by contending to excel themselves and their fellows, they strain so far, that there is hardly one of them who hath not received a fall, and some of them two or three. I was assured that a year or two before my arrival, Flimnap would have infallibly broke his neck, if one of the King's cushions, that accidentally lay on the ground, had not weakened the force of his fall.

There is likewise another diversion, which is only shown before the Emperor and Empress, and first minister, upon particular occasions. The Emperor lays on the table three fine silken threads of six inches long. One is blue, the other red, and the third green. These threads are proposed as prizes for those persons whom the Emperor hath a mind to distinguish by a peculiar mark of his favor. The ceremony is performed in his Majesty's great chamber of state, where the candidates are to undergo a trial of dexterity very different from the former, and such as I have not observed the least resemblance of in any other country of the old or the new world. The Emperor holds a stick in his hands, both ends parallel to the horizon, while the candidates advancing one by one, sometimes leap over the stick, sometimes creep under it backwards and forwards several times, according as the stick is advanced or depressed. Sometimes the Emperor holds one end of the stick, and his first minister the other; sometimes the minister has it entirely to himself. Whoever performs his part with most agility, and holds out the longest in leaping and creeping, is rewarded with the blue-colored silk; the red is given to the next, and the green to the third, which they all wear girt twice round about the middle; and you see few great persons about this court, who are not adorned with one of these girdles.

The horses of the army, and those of the royal stables, having been daily led before me, were no longer shy, but would come up to my very feet without starting. The riders would leap them over my hand as I held it on the ground, and one of the Emperor's huntsmen, upon a large courser, took my foot, shoe and all; which was indeed a prodigious leap. I had the good fortune to divert the Emperor one day after a very extraordinary manner. I desired he would order several sticks of two foot high, and the thickness of an ordinary cane, to be brought me; whereupon his Majesty commanded the master of his woods to give directions accordingly; and the next morning six woodmen arrived with as many carriages, drawn by eight horses to each. I took nine of these sticks, fixing them firmly in the ground in a quadrangular figure, two foot and a half square. I took four other sticks, and tied them parallel at each corner, about two foot from the ground; then I fastened my handkerchief to the nine sticks that stood erect, and extended it on all sides, till it was tight as the top of a drum; and the four parallel sticks rising about five inches higher than the handkerchief, served as ledges on each side. When I had finished my work, I desired the Emperor to let a troop of his best horse, twenty-four in number, come and exercise upon this plain. His Majesty approved of the proposal, and I took them up, one by one, in my hands, ready mounted and armed, with the proper officers to exercise them. As soon as they got into order, they divided into two parties, performed mock skirmishes, discharged blunt arrows, drew their swords, fled and pursued, attacked and retired, and in short discovered the best military discipline I ever beheld. The parallel sticks secured them and their horses from falling over the stage; and the Emperor was so much delighted that he ordered this entertainment to be repeated several days, and once was pleased to be lifted up and give the word of command; and, with great difficulty, persuaded even the Empress herself to let me hold her in her close chair within two yards of the stage, from whence she was able to take a full view of the whole performance. It was my good fortune that no ill accident happened in these entertainments, only once a fiery horse, that belonged to one of the captains, pawing with his hoof, struck a hole in my handkerchief, and his foot slipping, he overthrew his rider and himself; but I immediately relieved them both, and covering the hole with one hand, I set down the troop with the other, in the same manner as I took them up. The horse that fell was strained in the left shoulder, but the rider got no hurt, and I repaired my handkerchief as well as I could: however, I would not trust to the strength of it any more in such dangerous enterprises.

About two or three days before I was set at liberty, as I was entertaining the court with these kind of feats, there arrived an express to inform his Majesty, that some of his subjects riding near the place where I was first taken up, had seen a great black substance lying on the ground, very oddly shaped, extending its edges round as wide as his Majesty's bedchamber, and rising up in the middle as high as a man; that it was no living creature, as they at first apprehended, for it lay on the grass without motion, and some of them had walked round it several times: that by mounting upon each other's shoulders, they had got to the top, which was flat and even, and stamping upon it they found it was hollow within; that they humbly conceived it might be something belonging to the Man-Mountain; and if his Majesty pleased, they would undertake to bring it with only five horses. I presently knew what they meant, and was glad at heart to receive this intelligence. It seems upon my first reaching the shore after our shipwreck, I was in such confusion, that before I came to the place where I went to sleep, my hat, which I had fastened with a string to my head while I was rowing, and had stuck on all the time I was swimming, fell off after I came to land; the string, as I conjecture, breaking by some accident which I never observed, but thought my hat had been lost at sea. I intreated his Imperial Majesty to give orders it might be brought to me as soon as possible, describing to him the use and the nature of it: and the next day the waggoners arrived with it, but not in a very good condition; they had bored two holes in the brim, within an inch and half of the edge, and fastened two hooks in the holes; these hooks were tied by a long cord to the harness, and thus my hat was dragged along for above half an English mile; but the ground in that country being extremely smooth and level, it received less damage than I expected.

Two days after this adventure, the Emperor having ordered that part of his army which quarters in and about his metropolis to be in readiness, took a fancy of diverting himself in a very singular manner. He desired I would stand like a Colossus, with my legs as far asunder as I conveniently could. He then commanded his General (who was an old experienced leader, and a great patron of mine) to draw up the troops in close order, and march them under me; the foot by twenty-four in a breast, and the horse by sixteen, with drums beating, colors flying, and pikes advanced. This body consisted of three thousand foot, and a thousand horse. His Majesty gave orders, upon pain of death, that every soldier in his march should observe the strictest decency with regard to my person; which, however, could not prevent some of the younger officers from turning up their eyes as they passed under me. And, to confess the truth, my breeches were at that time in so ill a condition, that they afforded some opportunities for laughter and admiration.

I had sent so many memorials and petitions for my liberty, that his Majesty at length mentioned the matter, first in the cabinet, and then in a full council; where it was opposed by none, except Skyresh Bolgolam,² who was pleased, without any provocation, to be my mortal enemy. But it was carried against him by the whole board, and confirmed by the Emperor. That minister was Galbet, or Admiral of the Realm, very much in his master's confidence, and a person well versed in affairs, but of a morose and sour complexion. However, he was at length persuaded to comply; but prevailed that the articles and conditions upon which I should be set free, and to which I must swear, should be drawn up by himself. These articles were brought to me by Skyresh Bolgolan in person, attended by two under-secretaries, and several persons of distinction. After they were read, I was demanded to swear to the performance of them; first in the manner of my own country, and afterwards in the method prescribed by their laws; which was to hold my right foot in my left hand, to place the middle finger of my right hand on the crown of my head, and my thumb on the tip of my right ear. But because the reader may be curious to have some idea of the style and manner of expression peculiar to that people, as well as to know the articles upon which I recovered my liberty, I have made a translation of the whole instrument word for word, as near as I was able, which I here offer to the public.

² Perhaps the Duke of Argyll, whom Swift had angered by strictures against the Scotch in his political pamphlet, The Public Spirit of the Whigs.

GOLBASTO MOMAREM EVLAME GURDILLO SHEFIN MULLY ULLY GUE, most mighty Emperor of Lilliput, delight and terror of the universe, whose dominions extend five thousand blustrugs (about twelve miles in circumference) to the extremities of the globe; monarch of all monarchs, taller than the sons of men; whose feet press down to the center, and whose head strikes against the sun; at whose nod the princes of the earth shake their knees; pleasant as the spring, comfortable as the summer, fruitful as autumn, dreadful as winter. His most sublime Majesty proposeth to the Man-Mountain, lately arrived to our celestial dominions, the following articles, which by a solemn oath he shall be obliged to perform.

First, The Man-Mountain shall not depart from our dominions, without our license under our great seal.

2d, He shall not presume to come into our metropolis, without our express order; at which time, the inhabitants shall have two hours' warning to keep within their doors.

3d, The said Man-Mountain shall confine his walks to our principal high roads, and not offer to walk or lie down in a meadow or field of corn.

4th, As he walks the said roads, he shall take the utmost care not to trample upon the bodies of any of our loving subjects, their horses, or carriages, nor take any of our subjects into his hands, without their own consent.

5th, If an express requires extraordinary dispatch, the Man-Mountain shall be obliged to carry in his pocket the messenger and horse a six days' journey once in every moon, and return the said messenger back (if so required) safe to our Imperial Presence.

6th, He shall be our ally against our enemies in the Island of Blefuscu, and do his utmost to destroy their fleet, which is now preparing to invade us.

7th, That the said Man-Mountain shall, at his times of leisure, be aiding and assisting our workmen, in helping to raise certain great stones, towards covering the wall of the principal park, and other our royal buildings.

8th, That the said Man-Mountain shall, in two moons' time, deliver in an exact survey of the circumference of our dominions by a computation of his own paces round the coast.

Lastly, That upon his solemn oath to observe all the above articles, the said Man-Mountain shall have a daily allowance of meat and drink sufficient for the support of 1728 of our subjects, with free access to our Royal Person, and other marks of our favor. Given at our Palace at Belfaborac the twelfth day of the ninety-first moon of our reign.

I swore and subscribed to these articles with great cheerfulness and content, although some of them were not so honorable as I could have wished; which proceeded wholly from the malice of Skyresh Bolgolan, the High-Admiral: whereupon my chains were immediately unlocked, and I was at full liberty; the Emperor himself in person did me the honor to be by at the whole ceremony. I made my acknowledgments by prostrating myself at his Majesty's feet: but he commanded me to rise; and after many gracious expressions, which, to avoid the censure of vanity, I shall not repeat, he added, that he hoped I should prove a useful servant, and well deserve all the favors he had already conferred upon me, or might do for the future.

The reader may please to observe, that in the last article for the recovery of my liberty, the Emperor stipulates to allow me a quantity of meat and drink sufficient for the support of 1728 Lilliputians. Some time after, asking a friend at court how they came to fix on that determinate number; he told me that his Majesty's mathematicians, having taken the height of my body by the help of a quadrant, and finding it to exceed theirs in the proportion of twelve to one, they concluded from the similarity of their bodies, that mine must contain at least 1728 of theirs, and consequently would require as much food as was necessary to support that number of Lilliputians. By which, the reader may conceive an idea of the ingenuity of that people, as well as the prudent and exact economy of so great a prince.

CHAPTER IV

Mildendo, the metropolis of Lilliput, described, together with the Emperor's palace. A conversation between the Author and a principal Secretary, concerning the affairs of that empire. The Author's offer to serve the Emperor in his wars.

The first request I made after I had obtained my liberty, was, that I might have license to see Mildendo, the metropolis; which the Emperor easily granted me, but with a special charge to do no hurt either to the inhabitants or their houses. The people had notice by proclamation of my design to visit the town. The wall which encompassed it, is two foot and an half high, and at least eleven inches broad, so that a coach and horses may be driven very safely round it; and it is flanked with strong towers at ten foot distance. I stepped over the great Western Gate, and passed very gently, and sideling through the two principal streets, only in my short waistcoat, for fear of damaging the roofs and eaves of the houses with the skirts of my coat. I walked with the utmost circumspection, to avoid treading on any stragglers, that might remain in the streets, although the orders were very strict, that all people should keep in their houses, at their own peril. The garret windows and tops of houses were so crowded with spectators, that I thought in all my travels I had not seen a more populous place. The city is an exact square, each side of the wall being five hundred foot long. The two great streets, which run cross and divide it into four quarters, are five foot wide. The lanes and alleys, which I could not enter, but only viewed them as I passed, are from twelve to eighteen inches. The town is capable of holding five hundred thousand souls. The houses are from three to five stories. The shops and markets well provided.

The Emperor's palace is in the center of the city, where the two great streets meet. It is inclosed by a wall of two foot high, and twenty foot distant from the buildings. I had his Majesty's permission to step over his wall; and the space being so wide between that and the palace, I could easily view it on every side. The outward court is a square of forty foot, and includes two other courts:

in the inmost are the royal apartments, which I was very desirous to see, but found it extremely difficult; for the great gates, from one square into another, were but eighteen inches high, and seven inches wide. Now the buildings of the outer court were at least five foot high, and it was impossible for me to stride over them without infinite damage to the pile, though the walls were strongly built of hewn stone, and four inches thick. At the same time the Emperor had a great desire that I should see the magnificence of his palace; but this I was not able to do till three days after, which I spent in cutting down with my knife some of the largest trees in the royal park, about an hundred yards distant from the city. Of these trees I made two stools, each about three foot high, and strong enough to bear my weight. The people having received notice a second time, I went again through the city to the palace, with my two stools in my hands. When I came to the side of the outer court, I stood upon one stool, and took the other in my hand: this I lifted over the roof, and gently set it down on the space between the first and second court, which was eight foot wide. I then stepped over the buildings very conveniently from one stool to the other, and drew up the first after me with a hooked stick. By this contrivance I got into the inmost court; and lying down upon my side, I applied my face to the windows of the middle stories, which were left open on purpose, and discovered the most splendid apartments that can be imagined. There I saw the Empress and the young Princes, in their several lodgings, with their chief attendants about them. Her Imperial Majesty³ was pleased to smile very graciously upon me, and gave me out of the window her hand to kiss.

But I shall not anticipate the reader with farther descriptions of this kind, because I reserve them for a greater work, which is now almost ready for the press, containing a general description of this empire, from its first erection, through a long series of princes, with a particular account of their wars and politics, laws, learning, and religion: their plants and animals, their peculiar manners and customs, with other matters very curious and useful; my chief design at present being only to relate such events and transactions as happened to the public, or to myself, during a residence of about nine months in that empire.

One morning, about a fortnight after I had obtained my liberty, Reldresal, principal Secretary (as they style him) of private Affairs, came to my house attended only by one servant. He ordered his coach to wait at a distance, and desired I would give him an hour's audience; which I readily consented to, on account of his quality and personal merits, as well as the many good offices he had done me during my solicitations at court. I offered to lie down, that he might the more conveniently reach my ear; but he chose rather to let me hold him in my hand during our conversation. He began with compliments on my liberty; said he might pretend to some merit in it: but, however, added, that if it had not been for the present situation of things at court, perhaps I might not have obtained it so soon. For, said he, as flourishing a condition as we may appear to be in to foreigners, we labor under two mighty evils; a violent faction at home, and the danger of an invasion by a most potent enemy from abroad. As to the first, you are to understand, that for about seventy moons past there have been two struggling parties in this empire, under the names of Trameçksan and Slameçksan, from the high and low heels on their shoes, by which they distinguish themselves. It is alleged indeed, that the high heels are most agreeable to our ancient constitution: but however this be, his Majesty hath determined to make use of only low heels in the administration of the government, and all offices in the gift of the Crown, as you cannot but observe; and particularly, that his Majesty's Imperial heels are lower at least by a drurr than any of his court; (drurr is a measure about the fourteenth part of an inch). The animosities between these two parties run so high, that they will neither eat nor drink, nor talk with each other. We compute the Trameçksan, or High-Heels, to exceed us in number; but the power is wholly on our side. We apprehend his Imperial Highness, the Heir to the Crown, to have some tendency towards the High-Heels; at least we can plainly discover one of his heels higher than the other, which gives him a hobble in his gait. Now, in the midst of these intestine disquiets, we are threatened with an invasion from the Island of Blefuscu, which is the other great empire of the universe, almost as large and powerful as this of his Majesty. For as to what we have heard you affirm, that there are other kingdoms and states in the world inhabited by human creatures as large as yourself, our philosophers are in much doubt, and would rather conjecture that you dropped from the moon, or one of the stars; because it is certain, that an hundred mortals of your bulk would, in a short time, destroy all the fruits and cattle of his Majesty's dominions. Besides, our histories of six thousand moons make no mention of any other regions, than the two great empires of Lilliput and Blefuscu. Which two mighty powers have, as I was going to tell you, been engaged in a most obstinate war for six and thirty moons past. It began upon the following occasion. It is allowed on all hands, that the primitive way of breaking eggs before we eat them, was upon the larger end: but his present Majesty's grandfather, while he was a boy, going to eat an egg, and breaking it according to the ancient practice, happened to cut one of his fingers. Whereupon the Emperor his father published an edict, commanding all his subjects, upon great penalties, to break the smaller end of their eggs. The people so highly resented this law, that our histories tell us there have been six rebellions raised on that account; wherein one Emperor lost his life, and another his crown. These civil commotions were constantly fomented by the monarchs of Blefuscu; and when they were quelled, the exiles always fled for refuge to that empire. It is computed, that eleven thousand persons have, at several times, suffered death, rather than submit to break their eggs at the smaller end. Many hundred large volumes have been published upon this controversy: but the books of the Big-Endians have been long forbidden, and the whole party rendered incapable by law of holding employments. During the course of these troubles, the Emperors of Blefuscu did frequently expostulate by their ambassadors, accusing us of making a schism in religion, by offending against a fundamental doctrine of our great prophet Lustrog, in the fifty-fourth chapter of the Blundecral (which is their Alcoran). This, however, is thought to be a mere strain upon the text: for the words are these; That all true believers break their eggs at the convenient end: and which is the convenient end, seems, in my humble opinion, to be left to every man's conscience, or at least in the power of the chief magistrate to determine. Now the Big-Indian exiles have found so much credit in the Emperor of Blefuscu's court, and so much private assistance and encouragement from their party here at home, that a bloody war has been carried on between the two empires for six and thirty moons with various success; during which time we have lost forty capital ships, and a much greater number of smaller vessels, together with thirty thousand of our best seamen and soldiers; and the damage received by the enemy is reckoned to be somewhat greater than ours. However, they have now equipped a numerous fleet, and are just preparing to make a descent upon us; and his Imperial Majesty, placing great confidence in your valor and strength, has commanded me to lay this account of his affairs before you.

³ Queen Anne.

I desired the Secretary to present my humble duty to the Emperor, and to let him know, that I thought it would not become me, who was a foreigner, to interfere with parties; but I was ready, with the hazard of my life, to defend his person ¹⁰ and state against all invaders.

[An outline of the remaining chapters of the voyage to Lilliput follows:

The Author, by an extraordinary stratagem, prevents an invasion. A high title of honor is conferred upon him. Ambassadors arrive from the Emperor of Blefuscu, and sue for peace. The Emperor's apartment on fire by an accident; the Author instrumental in saving the rest of the palace.—Of the inhabitants of Lilliput; their learning, laws, and customs, the manner of educating their children. The Author's way of living in that country. His vindication of a great lady.—The Author, being informed of a design to accuse him of high-treason, makes his escape to Blefuscu. His reception there.—The Author, by a lucky accident, finds means to leave Blefuscu; and, after some difficulties, returns safe to his native country.]

JOSEPH ADDISON

The Character of Mr. Spectator

*Non fumum ex fulgore, sed ex fumo dare lucem Cogitat, ut speciosa dehinc miracula promat.*¹—HOR.

I have observed that a reader seldom peruses a book with pleasure, until he knows whether the writer of it be a black or a fair man, of a mild or choleric disposition, married or a bachelor, with other particulars of the like nature, that conduce very much to the right understanding of an author. To gratify this curiosity, which is so natural to a reader, I design this paper, and my next as prefatory discourses to my following writings, and shall give some account in them of the several persons that are engaged in this work. As the chief trouble of compiling, digesting, and correcting, will fall to my share, I must do myself the justice to open the work with my own history.

I was born to a small hereditary estate, which, according to the tradition of the village where it lies, was bounded by the same hedges and ditches in William the Conqueror's time that it is at present, and has been delivered down from father to son, whole and entire, without the loss or acquisition of a single field or meadow, during the space of six hundred years; there runs a story in the family, that when my mother was gone with child of me about three months, she dreamed that she was brought to bed of a judge: whether this might proceed from a law-suit which was then depending in the family, or my father's being a justice of the peace, I cannot determine; for I am not so vain as to think it presaged any dignity that I should arrive at in my future life, though that was the interpretation which the neighborhood put upon it. The gravity of my behavior at my very first appearance in the world, and all the time that I sucked, seemed to favor my mother's dream; for, as she has often told me, I threw away my rattle before I was two months old, and would not make use of my coral until they had taken away the bells from it.

As for the rest of my infancy, there being nothing in it remarkable, I shall pass over it in silence. I find that during my nonage, I had the reputation of a very sullen youth, but was always a favorite of my schoolmaster, who used to say that my parts were solid and would wear well. I had not been long at the university, before I distinguished my-

Addison, The Character of Mr. Spectator. Joseph Addison was born in Wiltshire in 1672 and died in London in 1719. He was educated at Oxford, traveled, held political offices, and wrote periodical essays.

¹ One with a flash begins and ends in smoke;
Another out of smoke brings glorious light,
And without raising expectation high
Surprises us with dazzling miracles.

—HORACE, translated by Roscommon.

self by a most profound silence; for during the space of eight years, excepting in the public exercise of the college, I scarce uttered the quantity of a hundred words; and indeed do not remember that I ever spoke three sentences together in my whole life. Whilst I was in this learned body, I applied myself with so much diligence to my studies, that there are few very celebrated books, either in the learned or the modern tongues, which I am not acquainted with.

Upon the death of my father, I was resolved to travel into foreign countries, and therefore left the university, with the character of an odd unaccountable fellow that had a great deal of learning, if I would but show it. An insatiable thirst after knowledge carried me into all the countries of Europe in which there was anything new or strange to be seen; nay, to such a degree was my curiosity raised, that having read the controversies of some great men concerning the antiquities of Egypt, I made a voyage to Grand Cairo, on purpose to take the measure of a pyramid; and, as soon as I had set myself right in that particular, returned to my native country with great satisfaction.

I have passed my latter years in this city, where I am frequently seen in most public places, though there are not above half-a-dozen of my select friends that know me; of whom my next paper shall give a more particular account. There is no place of general resort wherein I do not often make my appearance. Sometimes I am seen thrusting my head into a round of politicians at Will's, and listening with great attention to the narratives that are made in those little circular audiences. Sometimes I smoke a pipe at Child's, and while I seem attentive to nothing but the postman, overhear the conversation of every table in the room. I appear on Sunday nights at St. James's coffee-house, and sometimes join the little committee of politics in the inner room, as one who comes there to hear and improve. My face is likewise very well known at the Grecian, the Cocoa-tree, and in the theaters both of Drurylane and the Haymarket. I have been taken for a merchant upon the exchange for above these ten years, and sometimes pass for a Jew in the assembly of stock-jobbers at Jonathan's: in short, wherever I see a cluster of people, I always mix with them, though I never open my lips but in my own club.

Thus I live in the world rather as a Spectator of mankind, than as one of the species, by which means I have made myself a speculative statesman, soldier, merchant, and artisan, without ever meddling with any practical part in life. I am very well versed in the theory of a husband or a father, and can discern the errors in the economy, business, and diversions of others, better than those who are engaged in them; as standers-by discover blots, which are apt to escape those who are in the game. I never espoused any party with violence, and am resolved to observe an exact neutrality between the Whigs and Tories, unless I shall be forced to declare myself by the hostilities of either side. In short, I have acted in all the parts of my life as a looker-on, which is the character I intend to preserve in this paper.

I have given the reader just so much of my history and character, as to let him see I am not altogether unqualified for the business I have undertaken. As for other particulars in my life and adventures, I shall insert them in the following papers as I shall see occasion. In the mean time, when I consider how much I have seen, read, and heard, I begin to blame my own taciturnity; and since I have neither time nor inclination to communicate the fullness of my heart in speech, I am resolved to do it in writing, and to print myself out, if possible, before I die. I have been often told by my friends, that it is pity so many useful discoveries which I have made should be in the possession of a silent man. For this reason, therefore, I shall publish a sheetful of thoughts every morning, for the benefit of my contemporaries; and if I can any way contribute to the diversion or improvement of the country in which I live, I shall leave it, when I am summoned out of it, with the secret satisfaction of thinking that I have not lived in vain.

There are three very material points which I have not spoken to in this paper; and which, for several important reasons, I must keep to myself at least for some time: I mean, an account of my name, my age, and my lodgings. I must confess, I would gratify my reader in anything that is reasonable; but as for these three particulars, though I am sensible they might tend very much to the embellishment of my paper, I cannot yet come to a resolution of communicating them to the public. They would indeed draw me out of that obscurity which I have enjoyed for many years, and expose me in public places to several salutes and civilities, which have been always very disagreeable to me; for the greatest pain I can suffer is the being talked to, and being stared at. It is for this reason likewise, that I keep my complexion and dress as very great secrets; though it is not impossible but I may make discoveries of both in the progress of the work I have undertaken.

After having been thus particular upon myself, I shall, in tomorrow's paper, give an account of those gentlemen who are concerned with me in this work; for, as I have before intimated, a plan of it is laid and concerted, as all other matters of importance are, in a club. However, as my friends have engaged me to stand in the front, those who have a mind to correspond with me, may direct their letters to the Spectator, at Mr. Buckley's in Little Britain. For I must further acquaint the reader, that though our club meets only on Tuesdays and Thursdays, we have appointed a committee to sit every night for the inspection of all such papers as may contribute to the advancement of the public weal.

Meditations in Westminster Abbey

When I am in a serious humor, I very often walk by myself in Westminster Abbey: where the gloominess of the place, and the use to which it is applied, with the solemnity of the building, and the condition of the people who lie in it, are apt to fill the mind with a kind of melancholy, or rather thoughtfulness, that is not disagreeable. I yesterday passed a whole afternoon in the churchyard, the cloisters and the church, amusing myself with the tombstones, and inscriptions that I met with in those several regions of the dead. Most of them recorded nothing else of the buried person, but that he was born upon one day, and died upon another; the whole history of his life being comprehended in those two circumstances that are common to all mankind. I could not but look upon these registers of existence, whether of brass or marble, as a kind of satire upon the departed persons; who had left no other memorial of them, but that they were born, and that they died. They put me in mind of several persons mentioned in the battles of heroic poems, who have sounding names given them for no other reason but that they may be killed, and are celebrated for nothing but being knocked on the head.

Glaucumque, Medontaque, Thersilochumque.— VIRG.

The life of these men is finely described in holy writ by "the path of an arrow," which is immediately closed up and lost.

Upon my going into the church, I entertained myself with the digging of a grave; and saw, in every shovel-full of it that was thrown up, the fragment of a bone or skull intermixed with a kind of fresh moldering earth, that some time or other had a place in the composition of a human body. Upon this I began to consider with myself what innumerable multitudes of people lay confused together under the pavement of that ancient cathedral; how men and women, friends and enemies, priests and soldiers, monks and prebendaries, were crumbled amongst one another, and blended together in the same common mass; how beauty, strength, and youth, with old age, weakness, and deformity, lay undistinguished in the same promiscuous heap of matter.

After having thus surveyed this great magazine of mortality, as it were in the lump, I examined it more particularly by the accounts which I found on several of the monuments which are raised in every quarter of that ancient fabric. Some of them were covered with such extravagant epitaphs, that if it were possible for the dead person to be acquainted with them, he would blush at the praises which his friends have bestowed upon him. There are others so excessively modest that they deliver the character of the person departed in Greek or Hebrew, and by that means are not understood once in a twelvemonth. In the poetical corner, I found there were poets who had no monuments, and monuments which had no poets. I observed, indeed, that the present war has filled the church with many of these uninhabited monuments, which had been erected to the memory of persons whose bodies were perhaps buried in the plains of Blenheim, or in the bosom of the ocean.

I could not but be very much delighted with several modern epitaphs, which are written with great elegance of expression and justness of thought, and therefore do honor to the living as well as to the dead. As a foreigner is very apt to conceive an idea of the ignorance or politeness of a nation from the turn of their public monuments and inscriptions, they should be submitted to the perusal of men of learning and genius before they are put in execution. Sir Cloudesly Shovel's monument has very often given me great offense; instead of the brave, rough English admiral, which was the distinguishing character of that plain, gallant man, he is represented on his tomb by the figure of a beau, dressed in a long periwig, and reposing himself upon velvet cushions, under a canopy of state. The inscription is answerable to the monument; for instead of celebrating the many remarkable actions he had performed in the service of his country, it acquaints us only with the manner of his death, in which it was impossible for him to reap any honor. The Dutch, whom we are apt to despise for want of genius, show an infinitely greater taste of antiquity and politeness in their buildings and works of this nature than what we meet with in those of our own country. The monuments of their admirals, which have been erected at the public expense, represent them like themselves, and are adorned with rostral crowns and naval ornaments, with beautiful festoons of sea-weed, shells, and coral.

But to return to our subject; I have left the repository of our English kings for the contemplation of another day, when I shall find my mind disposed for so serious an amusement. I know that entertainments of this nature are apt to raise dark and dismal thoughts in timorous minds and gloomy imaginations; but for my own part, though I am always serious, I do not know what it is to be melancholy; and can therefore take a view of nature in her deep and solemn scenes with the same pleasure as in her most gay and delightful ones. By this means I can improve myself with those objects which others consider with terror. When I look upon the tombs of the great, every emotion of envy dies within me; when I read the epitaphs of the beautiful, every inordinate desire goes out; when I meet with the grief of parents upon a tombstone, my heart melts with compassion; when I see the tomb of the parents themselves, I consider the vanity of grieving for those whom we must quickly follow; when I see kings lying by those who deposed them, when I consider rival wits placed side by side, or the holy men that divided the world with their contests and disputes, I reflect with sorrow and astonishment on the little competitions, factions, and debates of mankind. When I read the several dates of the tombs, of some that died yesterday, and some six hundred years ago, I consider that great day when we shall all of us be contemporaries, and make our appearance together.

RICHARD STEELE

A Happy Marriage

There are several persons who have many pleasures and entertainments in their possession which they do not enjoy. It is therefore a kind and good office to acquaint them with their own happiness, and turn their attention to such instances of their good fortune which they are apt to overlook. Persons in the married state often want such a monitor, and pine away their days, by looking upon the same condition in anguish and murmur which carries with it in the opinion of others a complication of all the pleasures of life, and a retreat from its inquietudes.

I am led into this thought by a visit I made an old friend who was formerly my school-fellow. He came to town last week with his family for the winter, and yesterday morning sent me word his wife expected me to dinner. I am as it were at home at that house, and every member of it knows me for their well-wisher. I cannot indeed express the pleasure it is to be met by the children with so much joy as I am when I go thither: the boys and girls strive who shall come first when they think it is I that am knocking at the door; and that child which loses the race to me runs back again to tell the father it is Mr. Bickerstaff. This day I was led in by a pretty girl, that we all thought must have forgot me; for the family has been out of town these two years. Her knowing me again was a mighty subject with us, and took up our discourse at the first entrance. After which, they began to rally me upon a thousand little stories they heard in the country about my marriage to one of my neighbor's daughters: upon which the gentleman, my friend, said, "Nay, if Mr. Bickerstaff marries a child of any of his old companions, I hope mine shall have the preference; there's Mrs. Mary is now sixteen, and would make him as fine a widow as the best of them: but I know him too well; he is so enamored with the very memory of those who flourished in our youth, that he will not so much as look upon the modern beauties. I remember, old gentleman, how often you went home in a day to refresh your countenance and dress when Teraminta reigned in your heart. As we came up in the coach, I repeated to my wife some of your verses on her." With such reflections on little passages which happened long ago, we passed our time during a cheerful and elegant meal. After dinner, his lady left the room, as did also the children. As soon as we were alone, he took me by the hand; "Well, my good friend," says he, "I am heartily glad to see thee; I was afraid you would never have seen all the company that dined with you today again. Do not you think the good woman of the house a little altered since you followed her from the play-house, to find out who she was, for me?" I perceived a tear fall down his cheek as he spoke, which moved me not a little. But to turn the discourse, said I, "She is not indeed quite that creature she was when she returned me the letter I carried from you; and told me, she hoped, as I was a gentleman, I would be employed no more to trouble her who had never offended me, but would be so much the gentleman's friend as to dissuade him from a pursuit which he could never succeed in. You may remember, I thought her in earnest, and you were forced to employ your cousin Will, who made his sister get acquainted with her for you. You cannot expect her to be forever fifteen. "Fifteen?" replied my good friend: "ah! you little understand, you that have lived a bachelor, how great, how exquisite a pleasure there is in being really beloved! It is impossible that the most beautiful face in nature should raise in me such pleasing ideas as when I look upon that excellent woman. That fading in her countenance is chiefly caused by her watching with me in my fever. This was followed by a fit of sickness, which had like to have carried her off last winter. I tell you sincerely, I have so many obligations to her, that I cannot with any sort of moderation think of her present state of health. But as to what you say of fifteen, she gives me every day pleasures beyond what I ever knew in the possession of her beauty when I was in the vigor of youth. Every moment of her life brings me fresh instances of her complacency to my inclinations, and her prudence in regard to my fortune. Her face is to me much more beautiful than when I first saw it; there is no decay in any feature which I cannot trace from the very instant it was occasioned by some anxious concern for my welfare and interests. Thus at the same time, methinks, the love I conceived towards her for what she was, is heightened by my gratitude for what she is. The love of a wife is as much above the idle passion commonly called by that name, as the loud laughter of buffoons is inferior to the elegant mirth of gentlemen. Oh! she is an inestimable jewel. In her examination of her household affairs, she shows a certain fearfulness to find a fault, which makes her servants obey her like children; and the meanest we have has an ingenuous shame for an offense, not always to be seen in children in other families. I speak freely to you, my old friend; ever since her sickness, things that gave me the quickest joy before, turn now to a certain anxiety. As the children play in the next room, I know the poor things by their steps, and am considering what they must do, should they lose their mother in their tender years. The pleasure I used to take in telling my boy stories of the battles, and asking my girl questions about the disposal of her baby, and the gossiping of it, is turned into inward reflection and melancholy."

He would have gone on in this tender way, when the good lady entered, and with an inexpressible sweetness in her countenance told us, she had been searching her closet for something very good to treat such an old friend as I was. Her husband's eyes sparkled with pleasure at the cheerfulness of her countenance; and I saw all his fears vanish in an instant. The lady observing something in our looks which showed we had been more serious than ordinary, and seeing her husband receive her with great concern under a forced cheerfulness, immediately guessed at what we had been talking of; and applying herself to me, said, with a smile, "Mr. Bickerstaff, don't believe a word of what he tells you. I shall still live to have you for my second, as I have often promised you, unless he takes more care of himself than he has done since his coming to town. You must know, he tells me that he finds London is a much more healthy place than the country; for he sees several of his old acquaintance and school-fellows are here, young fellows with fair full-bottomed periwigs. I could scarce keep him this morning from going out open-breasted." My friend, who is always extremely delighted with her agreeable humor, made her sit down with us. She did it with that easiness which is peculiar to women of sense; and to keep up the good humor she had brought in with her, turned her raillery upon me. "Mr. Bickerstaff, you remember you followed me one night from the play-house; suppose you should carry me thither tomorrow night, and lead me into the front box." This put us into a long field of discourse about the beauties, who were mothers to the present, and shone in the boxes twenty years ago. I told her, I was glad she had transferred so many of her charms, and I did not question but her eldest daughter was within half-a-year of being a toast.

We were pleasing ourselves with this fantastical preferment of the young lady, when on a sudden we were alarmed with the noise of a drum, and immediately entered my little godson to give me a point of war. His mother, between laughing and chiding, would have put him out of the room; but I would not part with him so. I found, upon conversation with him, though he was a little noisy in his mirth, that the child had excellent parts, and was a great master of all the learning on the other side eight years old. I perceived him a very great historian in Æsop's Fables; but he frankly declared to me his mind, that he did not delight in that learning, because he did not believe they were true; for which reason, I found he had very much turned his studies, for about a twelve-month past, into the lives and adventures of Don Bellianis of Greece, Guy of Warwick, the Seven Champions, and other historians of that age. I could not but observe the satisfaction the father took in the forwardness of his son; and that these diversions might turn to some profit, I found the boy had made remarks which might be of service to him during the course of his whole life. He would tell you the mismanagements of John Hickathrift, find fault with the passionate temper in Bevis of Southampton, and loved St. George for being the champion of England; and by this means had his thoughts insensibly molded into the notions of discretion, virtue, and honor. I was extolling his accomplishments, when the mother told me, that the little girl who led me in this morning was in her way a better scholar than he. "Betty," says she, "deals chiefly in fairies and sprites; and sometimes in a winter night will terrify the maids with her accounts, until they are afraid to go up to bed."

I sat with them until it was very late, sometimes in merry, sometimes in serious discourse, with this particular pleasure, which gives the only true relish to all conversation, a sense that every one of us liked each other. I went home, considering the different conditions of a married life and that of a bachelor; and I must confess, it struck me with a secret concern to reflect that whenever I go off I shall leave no traces behind me. In this pensive mood I returned to my family; that is to say, to my maid, my dog, and my cat, who only can be the better or worse for what happens to me.

SAMUEL JOHNSON

Epigrams

Dr. Johnson used to say, that where secrecy or mystery began, vice or roguery was not far off; and that he leads in general an ill life, who stands in fear of no man's observation.

When a friend of his who had not been very lucky in his first wife, married a second, he said—Alas! another instance of the triumph of hope over experience.

Of Sheridan's writings on Elocution, he said, they were a continual renovation of hope, and an unvaried succession of disappointments.

He used to say, that no man read long together with a folio on his table:—Books, said he, that you may carry to the fire, and hold readily in your hand, are the most useful after all. He would say, such books form the man of general and easy reading.

When accused of mentioning ridiculous anecdotes in the lives of the poets, he said, he should not have been an exact biographer if he had omitted them. The business of such a one, said he, is to give a complete account of the person whose life he is writing, and to discriminate him from all other persons by any peculiarities of character or sentiment he may happen to have.

Dr. Sumner, of Harrow, used to tell this story of Johnson: they were dining one day, with many other persons, at Mrs. Macaulay's; she had talked a long time at dinner about the natural equality of mankind; Johnson, when she had finished her harangue, rose up from the table, and with great solemnity of countenance, and a bow to the ground, said to the servant, who was waiting behind his chair, Mr. John, pray be seated in my place, and permit me to wait upon you in my turn: your mistress says, you hear, that we are all equal.

Johnson, Epigrams, selected. Samuel Johnson (1709-1784) came to London in 1737 and earned his living by his pen. His writing of The English Dictionary established him as the literary dictator of his age. The epigrams are taken from Boswell's Life of Johnson.

When someone was lamenting Foote's unlucky fate in being kicked in Dublin, Johnson said he was glad of it; he is rising in the world, said he: when he was in England, no one thought it worth while to kick him.

Of the state of learning among the Scots, he said:—"It is with their learning as with provisions in a besieged town, everyone has a mouthful, and no one a bellyful."

When he first felt the stroke of palsy, he prayed to God that he would spare his mind, whatever he thought fit to do with his body.

To some lady who was praising Shenstone's poems very much, and who had an Italian greyhound lying by the fire, he said, "Shenstone holds amongst poets the same rank your dog holds amongst dogs; he has not the sagacity of the hound, the docility of the spaniel, nor the courage of the bulldog, yet he is still a pretty fellow."

When someone asked him, whether they should introduce Hugh Kelly, the author, to him;—"No, Sir," says he, "I never desire to converse with a man who has written more than he has read." Yet when his play was acted for the benefit of his widow, Johnson furnished a prologue.

He held all authors very cheap, that were not satisfied with the opinion of the public about them. He used to say, that every man who writes, thinks he can amuse or inform mankind, and they must be the best judges of his pretensions.

When someone asked him for what he should marry, he replied, first, for virtue; secondly, for wit; thirdly, for beauty; and fourthly, for money.

He thought worse of the vices of retirement than of those of society.

One day, on seeing an old terrier lie asleep by the fire-side at Streatham, he said, Presto, you are, if possible, a more lazy dog than I am.

Being asked by Dr. Lawrence what he thought of the best system of education, he replied,—School in school-hours, and home-instruction in the intervals.

I would never, said he, desire a young man to neglect his business for the purpose of pursuing his studies, because it is unreasonable; I would only desire him to read at those hours when he would otherwise be unemployed. I will not promise that he will be a Bentley; but if he be a lad of any parts, he will certainly make a sensible man. He thought the happiest life was that of a man of business, with some literary pursuits for his amusement; and that in general no one could be virtuous or happy, that was not completely employed.

Of a certain lady's entertainments, he said,—What signifies going thither? there is neither meat, drink, nor talk.

Johnson said of the Chattertonian controversy,—It is a sword that cuts both ways. It is as wonderful to suppose that a boy of sixteen years old had stored his mind with such a train of images and ideas as he had acquired, as to suppose the poems, with their ease of versification and elegance of language, to have been written by Rowley in the time of Edward the Fourth.

Talking with some persons about allegorical painting, he said, "I had rather see the portrait of a dog that I know, than all the allegorical paintings they can show me in the world."

A Scotsman upon his introduction to Johnson said:—"I am afraid, Sir, you will not like me, I have the misfortune to come from Scotland." "Sir," answered he, "that is a misfortune; but such a one as you and the rest of your countrymen cannot help."

Speaking one day of tea, he said,—What a delightful beverage must that be, that pleases all palates, at a time when they can take nothing else at breakfast!

Of a member of parliament, who, after having harangued for some hours in the house of commons, came into a company where Johnson was, and endeavored to talk him down, he said, This man has a pulse in his tongue.

One who had long known Johnson, said of him, In general you may tell what the man to whom you are speaking will say next: this you can never do of Johnson: his images, his allusions, his great powers of ridicule throw the appearance of novelty upon the most common conversation.

Whoever thinks of going to bed before twelve o'clock, said Johnson, is a scoundrel:—having nothing in particular to do himself, and having none of his time appropriated, he was a troublesome guest to persons who had much to do.

Definitions

[FROM THE "DICTIONARY"]

excise: a hateful tax levied upon commodities, and adjudged, not by the common judges of property, but wretches hired by those to whom excise is paid.

Grub Street: the name of a street in London, much inhabited by writers of small histories, dictionaries, and temporary poems; whence any mean production is called Grub Street.

lexicographer: a writer of dictionaries, a harmless drudge that busies himself in tracing the original and detailing the significance of words.

network: anything reticulated or decussated at equal distances with interstices between the intersections.

oats: a grain which in England is generally given to horses, but in Scotland supports the people.

patriotism: the last refuge of a scoundrel.

patron: one who countenances, supports, or protects. Commonly a wretch who supports with insolence, and is paid with flattery.

pension: an allowance made to anyone without an equivalent. In England it is generally understood to mean pay given to a state hireling for treason to his country.

pensioner: a slave of state, hired by a stipend to obey his master.

politician: a man of artifice; one deep of contrivance.

thunder: a most bright flame rising on a sudden, moving with great violence, and with a very rapid velocity, through the air, according to any determination, and commonly ending with a loud noise or rattling.

Tory: one who adheres to the ancient constitution of the state, and the apostolical hierarchy of the Church of England, opposed to a Whig.

transpire: to escape from secrecy to notice, a sense lately innovated from France without necessity.

Whig: the name of a faction.

Letter to Lord Chesterfield

["Lord Chesterfield, to whom Johnson had paid the high compliment of addressing to his Lordship the Plan of his Dictionary, had behaved to him in such a manner as to excite his contempt and indignation. The world has been for many years amused with a story confidently told, and as confidently repeated with additional circumstances, that a sudden disgust was taken by Johnson upon occasion of his having been one day kept long in waiting in his Lordship's ante-chamber, for which the reason assigned was, that he had company with him; and that at last, when the door was opened, out walked Colley Cibber; and that Johnson was so violently provoked when he found for whom he had been so long excluded, that he went away in a passion, and never would return. I remember having mentioned this story to George Lord Lyttelton, who told me, he was very intimate with Lord Chesterfield; and holding it as a well-known truth, defended Lord Chesterfield, by saying, that 'Cibber, who had been introduced familiarly by the backstairs, had probably not been there above ten minutes.' It may seem strange even to entertain a doubt concerning a story so long and so widely current, and thus implicitly adopted, if not sanctified, by the authority which I have mentioned; but Johnson himself assured me, that there was not the least foundation for it. He told me, that there never was any particular incident which produced a quarrel between Lord Chesterfield and him; but that his Lordship's continued neglect was the reason why he resolved to have no connection with him. When the Dictionary was upon the eve of publication, Lord Chesterfield, who, it is said, had flattered himself with expectations that Johnson would dedicate the work to him, attempted, in a courtly manner, to soothe, and insinuate himself with the sage, conscious, as it should seem, of the cold indifference with which he had treated its learned author; and further attempted to conciliate him, by writing two papers in The World, in recommendation of the work; and it must be confessed, that they contain some studied compliments, so finely turned, that if there had been no previous offense, it is probable that Johnson would have been highly delighted. Praise, in general, was pleasing to him; but by praise from a man of rank and elegant accomplishments, he was peculiarly gratified. . . .

"This courtly device failed of its effect. Johnson, who thought that 'all was false and hollow,' despised the honeyed words, and was even indignant that Lord Chesterfield should, for a moment, imagine, that he should be the dupe of such an artifice. His expression to me concerning Lord Chesterfield, upon this occasion, was, 'Sir, after making great professions, he had, for many years, taken no notice of me; but when my Dictionary was coming out, he fell a scribbling in The World about it. Upon which, I wrote him a letter, expressed in civil terms, but such as might show him that I did not mind what he said or wrote, and that I had done with him.'"—BOSWELL, Life of Johnson.]

To the Right Honorable the Earl of CHESTERFIELD

February, 1755.

My Lord,

I have been lately informed, by the proprietor of The World, that two papers, in which my Dictionary is recommended to the public, were written by your Lordship. To be so distinguished, is an honor, which, being very little accustomed to favors from the great, I know not well how to receive, or in what terms to acknowledge.

When, upon some slight encouragement, I first visited your Lordship, I was overpowered, like the rest of mankind, by the enchantment of your address; and could not forbear to wish that I might boast myself Le vainqueur du vainqueur de la terre;—that I might obtain that regard for which I saw the world contending; but I found my attendance so little encouraged, that neither pride nor modesty would suffer me to continue it. When I had once addressed your Lordship in public, I had exhausted all the art of pleasing which a retired and uncourtly scholar can possess. I had done all that I could; and no man is well pleased to have his all neglected, be it ever so little.

Seven years, my Lord, have now past, since I waited in your outward rooms, or was repulsed from your door, during which time I have been pushing on my work through difficulties, of which it is useless to complain, and have brought it, at last, to the verge of publication, without one act of assistance, one word of encouragement, or one smile of favor. Such treatment I did not expect, for I never had a Patron before.

The shepherd in Virgil grew at last acquainted with Love, and found him a native of the rocks.

Is not a Patron, my Lord, one who looks with unconcern on a man struggling for life in the water, and, when he has reached ground, encumbers him with help? The notice which you have been pleased to take of my labors, had it been early, had been kind, but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it; till I am solitary, and cannot impart it; till I am known, and do not want it. I hope it is no very cynical asperity not to confess obligations where no benefit has been received, or to be unwilling that the public should consider me as owing to a Patron, what Providence has enabled me to do for myself.

Having carried on my work thus far with so little obligation to any favorer of learning, I shall not be disappointed though I should conclude it, if less be possible, with less; for I have been long wakened from that dream of hope, in which I once boasted myself with so much exultation,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most humble

Most obedient servant

Sam. Johnson

POETRY OF THE NEW CLASSICISM

When Charles II came back to the throne of England in 1660, he brought many changes into English life. For a dozen years he and his companions had been living under the influence of French culture, so that after his return English social life, English drama, and even English poetry became more French than English. Though Milton's great epics appeared after the Restoration, they produced no effect on the immediate history of English poetry. With Dryden, poetry became in a large measure a medium for the expression of social and political satire. If he wrote a narrative poem, it was not "to justify the ways of God to man" but to illustrate the wickedness or absurdity of some political enemy. Occasionally he would compose a beautiful lyric, such as Alexander's Feast, but even about such a poem there is a degree of artificiality that makes us admire the workmanship without undergoing any emotional experience.

In addition to the development of poetry for satirical purposes, Dryden perfected the heroic couplet, the five-foot iambic verse that was to be an accepted medium of poetry for two generations. In both these respects Dryden's successor was Alexander Pope.

In spite of a certain revival of interest in Pope, it is hard for us, after the lapse of two centuries, to see why this man should have seemed so important to his own generation. He was a master of the heroic couplet; he knew how to say cruel things in his verse; he was acquainted with the elegances of English society; he knew the conventional ideas of literary criticism and the current books of morality. His ideal of poetry was: "What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed." We see all the commonplace moral ideas and critical principles turned into clever heroic couplets. Without having an original thought of his own, he thus became something of a teacher for his generation and he acquired the reputation for wisdom and profound knowledge.

In the light of two centuries all this seems rather thin, and most of us prefer to read our Pope in his playful mood, where he has given us something that no one else could supply. In The Rape of the Lock he has had an opportunity to make use of all his gifts in the celebration of trivial things. In such a piece we expect and receive the greatest artificiality of treatment. With this subject such a handling is the only one possible. Perhaps no other poet could ever have done it so well as Pope.

Beginning about 1730 a new spirit seems to be entering English poetry. With James Thomson's The Seasons, which began to appear in 1726, we have not only the first occurrence of blank verse since the time of Milton but also evidences of direct observation of nature. After Pope had been maintaining that the poet should treat "Nature to advantage dressed," it was refreshing to have a description of the seasons as they actually appeared to an honest observer.

In addition to getting away from the restricted heroic couplet, the poets of the new generation revised the ideal of what subjects were proper for poetic treatment. From poetry which deliberately repressed emotional states they went to the opposite extreme and wrote verses the only purpose of which was to express the poet's real or imagined emotions. Melancholy particularly interested the new poets, whose favorite subjects were lonely walks at night or burying grounds at twilight. A part of this movement produced Gray's Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard and Collins's Ode to Evening.

Meantime, the influence of Pope and Dryden lived on. Much poetry was written throughout the eighteenth century that showed no effect whatever of the new romantic feeling. There was also much that displayed qualities of both schools, the older formalism being somewhat sentimentalized by the new emotional interests. Such a poet was Goldsmith. In The Deserted Village we see this peculiar blend so characteristic of the late eighteenth century.

JOHN DRYDEN

Alexander's Feast, or, The Power of Music

A SONG

IN HONOR OF ST. CECILIA'S DAY, 1697

'Twas at the royal feast for Persia won
 By Philip's warlike son—
 Aloft in awful state
 The godlike hero sate
 On his imperial throne; 5
 His valiant peers were placed around,
 Their brows with roses and with myrtles bound
 (So should desert in arms be crowned);
 The lovely Thais by his side
 Sate like a blooming Eastern bride, 10
 In flower of youth and beauty's pride—
 Happy, happy, happy pair!
 None but the brave,
 None but the brave,
 None but the brave deserves the fair! 15

CHORUS

Happy, happy, happy pair!
 None but the brave,
 None but the brave,
 None but the brave deserves the fair.
 Timotheus, placed on high 20
 Amid the tuneful quire,
 With flying fingers touched the lyre;
 The trembling notes ascend the sky,
 And heavenly joys inspire.
 The song began from Jove 25
 Who left his blissful seats above—
 Such is the power of mighty love!
 A dragon's fiery form belied the god;
 Sublime on radiant spires he rode
 When he to fair Olympia pressed, 30
 And while he sought her snowy breast;

Dryden, Alexander's Feast. John Dryden (1631-1700) was Poet Laureate and literary dictator of the Restoration period. He wrote dramas, satires, and lyrics, and did much translating.

Then round her slender waist he curled,
And stamped an image of himself, a sovereign of
the world.

The listening crowd admire the lofty sound;
A present deity! they shout around; 35
A present deity! the vaulted roofs rebound.

With ravished ears
The monarch hears,
Assumes the god,
Affects to nod, 40
And seems to shake the spheres.

CHORUS

With ravished ears
The monarch hears,
Assumes the god,
Affects to nod, 45
And seems to shake the spheres.

The praise of Bacchus then the sweet musician sung,

Of Bacchus ever fair and ever young.
The jolly god in triumph comes;
Sound the trumpets, beat the drums! 50
Flushed with a purple grace
He shows his honest face.

Now give the hautboys breath; he comes, he comes.

Bacchus, ever fair and young,
Drinking joys did first ordain; 55
Bacchus' blessings are a treasure,
Drinking is the soldier's pleasure;
Rich the treasure,
Sweet the pleasure,
Sweet is pleasure after pain. 60

CHORUS

Bacchus' blessings are a treasure,
Drinking is the soldier's pleasure;
Rich the treasure,
Sweet the pleasure,
Sweet is pleasure after pain. 65

Soothed with the sound, the king grew vain;
Fought all his battles o'er again;
And thrice he routed all his foes, and thrice he slew the slain!

The master saw the madness rise,
His glowing cheeks, his ardent eyes; 70
And while he heaven and earth defied,
Changed his hand and checked his pride.
He chose a mournful Muse
Soft pity to infuse.

He sung Darius great and good, 75

By too severe a fate
Fallen, fallen, fallen, fallen,

Fallen from his high estate,
And weltering in his blood; 80
Deserted at his utmost need

By those his former bounty fed;
On the bare earth exposed he lies
With not a friend to close his eyes.

With downcast looks the joyless victor sate,
Revolving in his altered soul 85

The various turns of chance below;
And now and then a sigh he stole,
And tears began to flow.

CHORUS

Revolving in his altered soul
The various turns of chance below; 90

And, now and then, a sigh he stole,
And tears began to flow.

The mighty master smiled to see
That love was in the next degree;
'Twas but a kindred sound to move, 95
For pity melts the mind to love.

Softly sweet, in Lydian measures,
Soon he soothed his soul to pleasures.
War (he sung) is toil and trouble,
Honor but an empty bubble; 100

Never ending, still beginning,
Fighting still, and still destroying;
If the world be worth thy winning,
Think, O think, it worth enjoying.

Lovely Thais sits beside thee, 105
Take the good the gods provide thee!
The many rend the skies with loud applause;
So love was crowned, but music won the cause.

The prince, unable to conceal his pain,
Gazed on the fair 110

Who caused his care,
And sighed and looked, sighed and looked,
Sighed and looked, and sighed again.

At length, with love and wine at once oppressed
The vanquished victor sunk upon her breast. 115

CHORUS

The prince, unable to conceal his pain,
Gazed on the fair

Who caused his care,
And sighed and looked, sighed and looked,
Sighed and looked, and sighed again. 120

At length, with love and wine at once oppressed,
The vanquished victor sunk upon her breast.

Now strike the golden lyre again,
 A louder yet, and yet a louder strain!
 Break his bands of sleep asunder 125
 And rouse him like a rattling peal of thunder.
 Hark, hark! the horrid sound
 Has raised up his head;
 As awaked from the dead
 And amazed he stares around. 130
 "Revenge, revenge!" Timotheus cries,
 "See the Furies arise!
 See the snakes that they rear,
 How they hiss in their hair,
 And the sparkles that flash from their eyes!
 Behold a ghastly band, 136
 Each a torch in his hand!
 Those are Grecian ghosts that in battle were slain
 And unburied remain
 Inglorious on the plain. 140
 Give the vengeance due
 To the valiant crew!
 Behold how they toss their torches on high,
 How they point to the Persian abodes
 And glittering temples of their hostile gods!" 145
 The princes applaud with a furious joy;
 And the King seized a flambeau with zeal to destroy;
 Thais led the way
 To light him to his prey,
 And, like another Helen, fired another Troy! 150

CHORUS

And the King seized a flambeau with zeal to destroy;

Thais led the way,
 To light him to his prey,
 And, like another Helen, fired another Troy.
 Thus, long ago, 155
 Ere heaving bellows learned to blow,
 While organs yet were mute,
 Timotheus, to his breathing flute
 And sounding lyre,
 Could swell the soul to rage, or kindle soft desire.
 At last divine Cecilia came, 161
 Inventress of the vocal frame;
 The sweet enthusiast from her sacred store
 Enlarged the former narrow bounds,
 And added length to solemn sounds, 165
 With nature's mother-wit, and arts unknown before.
 Let old Timotheus yield the prize
 Or both divide the crown;
 He raised a mortal to the skies;
 She drew an angel down! 170

GRAND CHORUS

At last divine Cecilia came,
 Inventress of the vocal frame;
 The sweet enthusiast from her sacred store
 Enlarged the former narrow bounds,
 And added length to solemn sounds, 175
 With nature's mother-wit, and arts unknown before.
 Let old Timotheus yield the prize
 Or both divide the crown;
 He raised a mortal to the skies;
 She drew an angel down! 180

ALEXANDER POPE

The Rape of the Lock

AN HEROI-COMICAL POEM

TO MRS. ARABELLA FERMOR

Madam,

It will be in vain to deny that I have some regard for this piece, since I dedicate it to You. Yet you may bear me witness, it was intended only to divert a few young Ladies, who have good sense and good humor enough to laugh not only at their sex's little unguarded follies, but at their own. But as it was communicated with the air of a Secret, it soon found its way into the world. An imperfect copy having been offered to a Bookseller, you had the good nature for my sake to consent to the publication of one more

Pope, The Rape of the Lock. Alexander Pope (1688-1744) because he was a Roman Catholic had no university education, but nevertheless became the chief poet of his age. He spent his life in or near London.

correct: This I was forced to, before I had executed half my design, for the Machinery was entirely wanting to complete it.

The Machinery, Madam, is a term invented by the Critics, to signify that part which the Deities, Angels, or Demons are made to act in a Poem: For the ancient Poets are in one respect like many modern Ladies: let an action be never so trivial in itself, they always make it appear of the utmost importance. These Machines I determined to raise on a very new and odd foundation, the Rosicrucian doctrine of Spirits.

I know how disagreeable it is to make use of hard words before a Lady; but 'tis so much the concern of a Poet to have his works understood, and particularly by your Sex, that you must give me leave to explain two or three difficult terms.

The Rosicrucians are a people I must bring you acquainted with. The best account I know of them is in a French book called Le Comte de Gabalis, which both in its title and size is so like a Novel, that many of the Fair Sex have read it for one by mistake. According to these Gentlemen, the four Elements are inhabited by Spirits, which they call Sylphs, Gnomes, Nymphs, and Salamanders. The Gnomes or Demons of Earth delight in mischief; but the Sylphs, whose habitation is in the Air, are the best-conditioned creatures imaginable. For, they say, any mortals may enjoy the most intimate familiarities with these gentle Spirits, upon a condition very easy to all true Adepts, an inviolate preservation of Chastity.

As to the following Cantos, all the passages of them are as fabulous as the Vision at the beginning, or the Transformation at the end (except the loss of your Hair, which I always mention with reverence). The Human persons are as fictitious as the airy ones; and the character of Belinda, as it is now managed, resembles you in nothing but in Beauty.

If this Poem had as many Graces as there are in your Person, or in your Mind, yet I could never hope it should pass through the world half so Uncensured as You have done. But let its fortune be what it will, mine is happy enough, to have given me this occasion of assuring you that I am, with the truest esteem,
MADAM,

Your most obedient, Humble Servant,

A. Pope.

CANTO I

What dire offense from am'rous causes springs,
What mighty contests rise from trivial things,
I sing—This verse to Caryl, Muse! is due:
This, e'en Belinda may vouchsafe to view:
Slight is the subject, but not so the praise, 5
If She inspire, and He approve my lays.

Say what strange motive, Goddess! could compel

A well-bred Lord t' assault a gentle Belle?
O say what stranger cause, yet unexplored,
Could make a gentle Belle reject a Lord? 10

In tasks so bold, can little men engage,
And in soft bosoms dwells such mighty Rage?
Sol through white curtains shot a tim'rous ray,
And oped those eyes that must eclipse the day:
Now lap-dogs give themselves the rousing shake,
And sleepless lovers, just at twelve, awake: 16
Thrice rung the bell, the slipper knocked the ground,

And the pressed watch returned a silver sound.
Belinda still her downy pillow pressed,
Her guardian Sylph prolonged the balmy rest: 20
'Twas He had summoned to her silent bed
The morning-dream that hovered o'er her head;
A Youth more glitt'ring than a Birth-night Beau
(That e'en in slumber caused her cheek to glow),
Seemed to her ear his winning lips to lay, 25
And thus in whispers said, or seemed to say:

"Fairest of mortals, thou distinguished care
Of thousand bright Inhabitants of Air!
If e'er one vision touched thy infant thought,
Of all the Nurse and all the Priest have taught;
Of airy Elves by moonlight shadows seen, 31
The silver token, and the circled green,
Or virgins visited by Angel-pow'rs,
With golden crowns and wreaths of heav'nly flow'rs;

Hear and believe! thy own importance know, 35
Nor bound thy narrow views to things below.
Some secret truths, from learned pride concealed,
To Maids alone and Children are revealed:
What though no credit doubting Wits may give?
The Fair and Innocent shall still believe. 40

Know, then, unnumbered Spirits round thee fly,
The light Militia of the lower sky:
These, though unseen, are ever on the wing,
Hang o'er the Box, and hover round the Ring.
Think what an equipage thou hast in Air, 45
And view with scorn two Pages and a Chair.

As now your own, our beings were of old,
And once enclosed in Woman's beauteous mold;
Thence, by a soft transition, we repair
From earthly Vehicles to these of air. 50
Think not, when Woman's transient breath is fled,
That all her vanities at once are dead;
Succeeding vanities she still regards,
And though she plays no more, o'erlooks the cards.
Her joy in gilded Chariots, when alive, 55
And love of Ombre, after death survive.
For when the Fair in all their pride expire,
To their first Elements their Souls retire.

The Sprites of fiery Termagants in Flame
Mount up, and take a Salamander's name. 60
Soft yielding minds to Water glide away,
And sip, with Nymphs, their elemental Tea.
The graver Prude sinks downward to a Gnome,
In search of mischief still on Earth to roam.
The light Coquettes in Sylphs aloft repair, 65
And sport and flutter in the fields of Air.

"Know further yet; whoever fair and chaste
Rejects mankind, is by some Sylph embraced:
For Spirits, freed from mortal laws, with ease
Assume what sexes and what shapes they please.
What guards the purity of melting Maids, 71
In courtly balls, and midnight masquerades,
Safe from the treach'rous friend, the daring spark,
The glance by day, the whisper in the dark,
When kind occasion prompts their warm desires,
When music softens, and when dancing fires? 76
'Tis but their Sylph, the wise Celestials know,
Though Honor is the word with Men below.

"Some nymphs there are, too conscious of their face,
For life predestined to the Gnomes' embrace. 80
These swell their prospects and exalt their pride,
When offers are disdained, and love denied:
Then gay Ideas crowd the vacant brain,
While Peers, and Dukes, and all their sweeping train,
And Garters, Stars, and Coronets appear, 85
And in soft sounds, Your Grace salutes their ear.
'Tis these that early taint the female soul,
Instruct the eyes of young Coquettes to roll,
Teach Infant-cheeks a bidden blush to know,
And little hearts to flutter at a Beau. 90

"Oft, when the world imagine women stray,
The Sylphs through mystic mazes guide their way,
Through all the giddy circle they pursue,
And old impertinence expel by new.
What tender maid but must a victim fall 95
To one man's treat, but for another's ball?
When Florio speaks what virgin could withstand,
If gentle Damon did not squeeze her hand?
With varying vanities, from ev'ry part,
They shift the moving Toyshop of their heart; 100
Where wigs with wigs, with sword-knots swordknots strive,

Beaux banish beaux, and coaches coaches drive.
This erring mortals Levity may call;
Oh blind to truth! the Sylphs contrive it all.

"Of these am I, who thy protection claim, 105
A watchful sprite, and Ariel is my name.
Late, as I ranged the crystal wilds of air,
In the clear Mirror of thy ruling Star

I saw, alas! some dread event impend,
Ere to the main this morning sun descend, 110
But heav'n reveals not what, or how, or where:
Warned by the Sylph, oh pious maid, beware!
This to disclose is all thy guardian can:
Beware of all, but most beware of Man!"

He said; when Shock, who thought she slept too
long, 115
Leaped up, and waked his mistress with his tongue.

'Twas then, Belinda, if report say true;
Thy eyes first opened on a Billet-doux;
Wounds, Charms, and Ardors were no sooner
read,

But all the Vision vanished from thy head. 120
And now, unveiled, the Toilet stands displayed,
Each silver Vase in mystic order laid.

First, robed in white, the Nymph intent adores,
With head uncovered, the Cosmetic pow'rs.
A heav'nly image in the glass appears, 125

To that she bends, to that her eyes she rears;
Th' inferior Priestess, at her altar's side,
Trembling begins the sacred rites of Pride.
Unnumbered treasures ope at once, and here
The various off'rings of the world appear; 130
From each she nicely culls with curious toil,
And decks the Goddess with the glitt'ring spoil.
This casket India's glowing gems unlocks,
And all Arabia breathes from yonder box.
The Tortoise here and Elephant unite, 135 Transformed to combs, the speckled, and the white.

Here files of pins extend their shining rows,
Puffs, Powders, Patches, Bibles, Billet-doux.
Now awful Beauty puts on all its arms;
The fair each moment rises in her charms, 140
Repairs her smiles, awakens ev'ry grace,
And calls forth all the wonders of her face;
Sees by degrees a purer blush arise,
And keener lightnings quicken in her eyes.
The busy Sylphs surround their darling care, 145
These set the head, and those divide the hair,
Some fold the sleeve, whilst others plait the gown;
And Betty's praised for labors not her own.

CANTO II

Not with more glories, in th' ethereal plain,
The Sun first rises o'er the purpled main, 150
Than, issuing forth, the rival of his beams
Launched on the bosom of the silver Thames.
Fair Nymphs, and well-dressed Youths around her shone,

But ev'ry eye was fixed on her alone.
 On her white breast a sparkling Cross she wore,
 Which Jews might kiss, and Infidels adore. 156
 Her lively looks a sprightly mind disclose,
 Quick as her eyes, and as unfixed as those:
 Favors to none, to all she smiles extends;
 Oft she rejects, but never once offends. 160
 Bright as the sun, her eyes the gazers strike,
 And, like the sun, they shine on all alike.
 Yet graceful ease, and sweetness void of pride,
 Might hide her faults, if Belles had faults to hide:
 If to her share some female errors fall, 165
 Look on her face, and you'll forget 'em all.

This Nymph, to the destruction of mankind,
 Nourished two Locks which graceful hung behind
 In equal curls, and well conspired to deck
 With shining ringlets the smooth iv'ry neck. 170
 Love in these labyrinths his slaves detains,
 And mighty hearts are held in slender chains.
 With hairy springes we the birds betray,
 Slight lines of hair surprise the finny prey,
 Fair tresses man's imperial race ensnare, 175
 And beauty draws us with a single hair.

Th' advent'rous Baron the bright locks admired;
 He saw, he wished, and to the prize aspired.
 Resolved to win, he meditates the way,
 By force to ravish, or by fraud betray; 180
 For when success a Lover's toil attends,
 Few ask, if fraud or force attained his ends.

For this, ere Phœbus rose, he had implored
 Propitious heav'n, and every pow'r adored,
 But chiefly Love—to Love an Altar built, 185
 Of twelve vast French Romances, neatly gilt.
 There lay three garters, half a pair of gloves;
 And all the trophies of his former loves;
 With tender Billet-doux he lights the pyre,
 And breathes three am'rous sighs to raise the 190
 fire.

Then prostrate falls, and begs with ardent eyes
 Soon to obtain, and long possess the prize:
 The pow'rs gave ear, and granted half his pray'r,
 The rest, the winds dispersed in empty air.

But now secure the painted vessel glides, 195
 The sun-beams trembling on the floating tides:
 While melting music steals upon the sky,
 And softened sounds along the waters die;
 Smooth flow the waves, the Zephyrs gently play,
 Belinda smiled, and all the world was gay. 200
 All but the Sylph—with careful thoughts oppressed,

Th' impending woe sat heavy on his breast.
 He summons straight his Denizens of air;
 The lucid squadrons round the sails repair:

Soft o'er the shrouds aerial whispers breathe, 205
 That seemed but Zephyrs to the train beneath.
 Some to the sun their insect-wings unfold,
 Waft on the breeze, or sink in clouds of gold;
 Transparent forms, too fine for mortal sight,
 Their fluid bodies half dissolved in light, 210
 Loose to the wind their airy garments flew,
 Thin glitt'ring textures of the filmy dew,
 Dipped in the richest tincture of the skies,
 Where light disports in ever-mingling dyes,
 While ev'ry beam new transient colors flings, 215
 Colors that change whene'er they wave their wings.

Amid the circle, on the gilded mast,
 Superior by the head, was Ariel placed;
 His purple pinions op'ning to the sun,
 He raised his azure wand, and thus begun: 220
 "Ye Sylphs and Sylphids, to your chief give ear!
 Fays, Fairies, Genii, Elves, and Demons, hear!
 Ye know the spheres and various tasks assigned
 By laws eternal to th' aerial kind.

Some in the fields of purest ether play, 225
 And bask and whiten in the blaze of day.
 Some guide the course of wand'ring orbs on high,
 Or roll the planets through the boundless sky.
 Some less refined, beneath the moon's pale light
 Pursue the stars that shoot athwart the night, 230
 Or suck the mists in grosser air below,
 Or dip their pinions in the painted bow,
 Or brew fierce tempests on the wintry main,
 Or o'er the glebe distill the kindly rain.

Others on earth o'er human race preside, 235
 Watch all their ways, and all their actions guide:
 Of these the chief the care of Nations own,
 And guard with Arms divine the British Throne.

"Our humbler province is to tend the Fair,
 Not a less pleasing, though less glorious care; 240
 To save the powder from too rude a gale,
 Nor let th' imprisoned essences exhale;
 To draw fresh colors from the vernal flow'rs;
 To steal from rainbows ere they drop in show'rs
 A brighter wash; to curl their waving hairs, 245
 Assist their blushes, and inspire their airs;
 Nay oft, in dreams, invention we bestow,
 To change a Flounce, or add a Furbelow.

"This day, black Omens threat the brightest Fair,
 That e'er deserved a watchful spirit's care; 250
 Some dire disaster, or by force, or slight;
 But what, or where, the fates have wrapped in
 night.

Whether the nymph shall break Diana's law,
 Or some frail China jar receive a flaw;

Or stain her honor or her new brocade; 255
 Forget her pray'rs, or miss a masquerade;
 Or lose her heart, or necklace, at a ball;
 Or whether Heav'n has doomed that Shock must fall.

Haste, then, ye spirits! to your charge repair:
 The flutt'ring fan be Zephyretta's care; 260
 The drops to thee, Brillante, we consign;
 And, Momentilla, let the watch be thine;
 Do thou, Crispissa, tend her fav'rite Lock;
 Ariel himself shall be the guard of Shock.

"To fifty chosen Sylphs, of special note, 265
 We trust th' important charge, the Petticoat:
 Oft have we known that seven-fold fence to fail, Though stiff with hoops, and armed with ribs of whale;

Form a strong line about the silver bound,
 And guard the wide circumference around. 270

"Whatever spirit, careless of his charge,
 His post neglects, or leaves the fair at large,
 Shall feel sharp vengeance soon o'ertake his sins,
 Be stopped in vials, or transfix'd with pins;
 Or plunged in lakes of bitter washes lie, 275
 Or wedged whole ages in a bodkin's eye:
 Gums and Pomatums shall his flight restrain,
 While clogged he beats his silken wings in vain;
 Or Alum styptics with contracting pow'r
 Shrink his thin essence like a riveled flow'r: 280
 Or, as Ixion fixed, the wretch shall feel
 The giddy motion of the whirling Mill,
 In fumes of burning Chocolate shall glow,
 And tremble at the sea that froths below!"

He spoke; the spirits from the sails descend;
 Some, orb in orb, around the nymph extend; 286
 Some thread the mazy ringlets of her hair;
 Some hang upon the pendants of her ear:
 With beating hearts the dire event they wait,
 Anxious, and trembling for the birth of Fate. 290

CANTO III

Close by those meads, for ever crowned with flow'rs,
 Where Thames with pride surveys his rising
 tow'rs,
 There stands a structure of majestic frame,
 Which from the neighb'ring Hampton takes its name.¹

Here Britain's statesmen oft the fall foredoom 295
 Of foreign Tyrants and of Nymphs at home;
 Here thou, great Anna! whom three realms obey,
 Dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes Tea.

Hither the heroes and the nymphs resort,
 To taste awhile the pleasures of a Court; 300
 In various talk th' instructive hours they passed,
 Who gave the ball, or paid the visit last;
 One speaks the glory of the British Queen,
 And one describes a charming Indian screen;
 A third interprets motions, looks, and eyes; 305
 At ev'ry word a reputation dies.

Snuff, or the fan, supply each pause of chat,
 With singing, laughing, ogling, and all that.
 Meanwhile, declining from the noon of day,
 The sun obliquely shoots his burning ray; 310
 The hungry Judges soon the sentence sign,
 And wretches hang that jurymen may dine;
 The merchant from th' Exchange returns in peace,
 And the long labors of the Toilet cease.

Belinda now, whom thirst of fame invites, 315
 Burns to encounter two advent'rous Knights,
 At Ombre singly to decide their doom;
 And swells her breast with conquests yet to come.
 Straight the three bands prepare in arms to join,
 Each band the number of the sacred nine. 320

Soon as she spreads her hand, th' aërial guard
 Descend, and sit on each important card:
 First Ariel perched upon a Matadore,
 Then each, according to the rank they bore;
 For Sylphs, yet mindful of their ancient race, 325
 Are, as when women, wondrous fond of place.

Behold, four Kings in majesty revered,
 With hoary whiskers and a forky beard;
 And four fair Queens whose hands sustain a flow'r,

Th' expressive emblem of their softer pow'r; 330
 Four Knaves in garbs succinct, a trusty band,
 Caps on their heads, and halberts in their hand;
 And particolored troops, a shining train,
 Draw forth to combat on the velvet plain.

The skillful Nymph reviews her force with care: 335
 "Let Spades be trumps!" she said, and trumps they were.

Now move to war her sable Matadores,
 In show like leaders of the swarthy Moors.
 Spadillio first, unconquerable Lord!
 Led off two captive trumps, and swept the board. 340

As many more Manillio forced to yield,
 And marched a victor from the verdant field.
 Him Basto followed, but his fate more hard
 Gained but one trump and one plebeian card.
 With his broad saber next, a chief in years, 345
 The hoary Majesty of Spades appears,

¹ Hampton Court, a palace a few miles southwest of London.

Puts forth one manly leg, to sight revealed,
 The rest, his many-colored robe concealed.
 The rebel Knave, who dares his prince engage,
 Proves the just victim of his royal rage. 350
 E'en mighty Pam, that Kings and Queens o'er-
 threw

And mowed down armies in the fights of Lu,
 Sad chance of war! now destitute of aid,
 Falls undistinguished by the victor spade!

Thus far both armies to Belinda yield; 355
 Now to the Baron fate inclines the field.
 His warlike Amazon her host invades,
 Th' imperial consort of the crown of Spades.
 The Club's black Tyrant first her victim died,
 Spite of his haughty mien, and barb'rous pride:
 What boots the regal circle on his head, 361
 His giant limbs, in state unwieldy spread;
 That long behind he trails his pompous robe,
 And, of all monarchs, only grasps the globe?

The Baron now his Diamonds pours apace; 365
 Th' embroidered King who shows but half his face,

And his refulgent Queen, with pow'rs combined
 Of broken troops an easy conquest find.
 Clubs, Diamonds, Hearts, in wild disorder seen,
 With throngs promiscuous strew the level green.
 Thus when dispersed a routed army runs, 371
 Of Asia's troops, and Afric's sable sons,
 With like confusion different nations fly,
 Of various habit, and of various dye,
 The pierced battalions dis-united fall, 375
 In heaps on heaps; one fate o'erwhelms them all.

The Knave of Diamonds tries his wily arts,
 And wins (oh shameful chance!) the Queen of Hearts.

At this, the blood the virgin's cheek forsook,
 A livid paleness spreads o'er all her look; 380
 She sees, and trembles at th' approaching ill,
 Just in the jaws of ruin, and Codille.

And now (as oft in some distempered State)
 On one nice Trick depends the gen'ral fate.
 An Ace of Hearts steps forth. The King unseen 385

Lurked in her hand, and mourned his captive
 Queen:

He springs to Vengeance with an eager pace,
 And falls like thunder on the prostrate Ace.
 The nymph exulting fills with shouts the sky;
 The walls, the woods, and long canals reply. 390

O thoughtless mortals! ever blind to fate,
 Too soon dejected, and too soon elate.
 Sudden, these honors shall be snatched away,
 And cursed for ever this victorious day.

For lo! the board with cups and spoons is crowned, 395

The berries crackle, and the mill turns round;
 On shining Altars of Japan they raise
 The silver lamp; the fiery spirits blaze:
 From silver spouts the grateful liquors glide,
 While China's earth receives the smoking tide:
 At once they gratify their scent and taste, 401
 And frequent cups prolong the rich repast.
 Straight hover round the Fair her airy band;
 Some, as she sipped, the fuming liquor fanned,
 Some o'er her lap their careful plumes displayed,
 Trembling, and conscious of the rich brocade. 406
 Coffee (which makes the politician wise,
 And see through all things with his half-shut eyes),

Sent up in vapors to the Baron's brain
 New Stratagems, the radiant Lock to gain. 410
 Ah cease, rash youth! desist ere 'tis too late,
 Fear the just Gods, and think of Scylla's Fate!
 Changed to a bird, and sent to flit in air,
 She dearly pays for Nisus' injured hair!

But when to mischief mortals bend their will,
 How soon they find fit instruments of ill! 416
 Just then, Clarissa drew with tempting grace
 A two-edged weapon from her shining case:
 So Ladies in Romance assist their Knight,
 Present the spear, and arm him for the fight. 420
 He takes the gift with rev'rence, and extends
 The little engine on his fingers' ends;
 This just behind Belinda's neck he spread,
 As o'er the fragrant steams she bends her head.
 Swift to the Lock a thousand Sprites repair, 425
 A thousand wings, by turns, blow back the hair;
 And thrice they twitched the diamond in her ear;
 Thrice she looked back, and thrice the foe drew near.

Just in that instant, anxious Ariel sought
 The close recesses of the Virgin's thought; 430
 As on the nosegay in her breast reclined,
 He watched th' Ideas rising in her mind,
 Sudden he viewed, in spite of all her art,
 An earthly Lover lurking at her heart.
 Amazed, confused, he found his pow'r expired,
 Resigned to fate, and with a sigh retired. 436

The Peer now spreads the glitt'ring Forfex wide,
 T' enclose the Lock; now joins it, to divide.
 E'en then, before the fatal engine closed,
 A wretched Sylph too fondly interposed; 440
 Fate urged the shears, and cut the Sylph in twain
 (But airy substance soon unites again),
 The meeting points the sacred hair dis sever
 From the fair head, for ever, and for ever!

Then flashed the living lightning from her eyes, 445
 And screams of horror rend th' affrighted skies.
 Not louder shrieks to pitying heav'n are cast,
 When husbands, or when lap-dogs breathe their last;
 Or when rich China vessels fall'n from high,
 In glitt'ring dust and painted fragments lie! 450
 Let wreaths of triumph now my temples twine
 (The victor cried) the glorious Prize is mine!
 While fish in streams, or birds delight in air,
 Or in a coach and six the British Fair,
 As long as Atalantis shall be read, 455
 Or the small pillow grace a Lady's bed,
 While visits shall be paid in solemn days,
 When num'rous wax-lights in bright order blaze,
 While nymphs take treats, or assignations give,
 So long my honor, name, and praise shall live!
 What Time would spare, from Steel receives its date, 461
 And monuments, like men, submit to fate!
 Steel could the labor of the Gods destroy,
 And strike to dust th' imperial towers of Troy;
 Steel could the works of mortal pride confound,
 And hew triumphal arches to the ground. 466
 What wonder then, fair nymph! thy hairs should feel,
 The conqu'ring force of unresisted steel?

CANTO IV

But anxious cares the pensive nymph oppressed,
 And secret passions labored in her breast. 470
 Not youthful kings in battle seized alive,
 Not scornful virgins who their charms survive,
 Not ardent lovers robbed of all their bliss,
 Not ancient ladies when refused a kiss,
 Not tyrants fierce that unrepenting die, 475
 Not Cynthia when her manteau's pinned awry,
 E'er felt such rage, resentment, and despair,
 As thou, sad Virgin! for thy ravished Hair.
 For, that sad moment, when the Sylphs withdrew
 And Ariel weeping from Belinda flew, 480
 Umbriel, a dusky, melancholy sprite,
 As ever sullied the fair face of light,
 Down to the central earth, his proper scene,
 Repaired to search the gloomy Cave of Spleen.
 Swift on his sooty pinions flits the Gnome, 485
 And in a vapor reached the dismal dome.
 No cheerful breeze this sullen region knows,
 The dreaded East is all the wind that blows.
 Here in a grotto, sheltered close from air,

And screened in shades from day's detested glare,
 She sighs for ever on her pensive bed, 491
 Pain at her side, and Megrim at her head.

Two handmaids wait the throne: alike in place,
 But diff'ring far in figure and in face.
 Here stood Ill-nature like an ancient maid, 495
 Her wrinkled form in black and white arrayed;
 With store of pray'rs, for mornings, nights, and noons,

Her hand is filled; her bosom with lampoons.
 There Affectation, with a sickly mien,
 Shows in her cheek the roses of eighteen, 500
 Practiced to lisp, and hang the head aside,
 Faints into airs, and languishes with pride,
 On the rich quilt sinks with becoming woe,
 Wrapped in a gown, for sickness, and for show.
 The fair ones feel such maladies as these, 505
 When each new night-dress gives a new disease.

A constant Vapor o'er the palace flies;
 Strange phantoms rising as the mists arise;
 Dreadful, as hermit's dreams in haunted shades,
 Or bright, as visions of expiring maids. 510
 Now glaring fiends, and snakes on rolling spires,
 Pale specters, gaping tombs, and purple fires:
 Now lakes of liquid gold, Elysian scenes,
 And crystal domes, and angels in machines. 514

Unnumbered throngs on every side are seen,
 Of bodies changed to various forms by Spleen.
 Here living Tea-pots stand, one arm held out,
 One bent; the handle this, and that the spout:
 A Pipkin there, like Homer's Tripod walks;
 Here sighs a Jar, and there a Goose-pie talks; 520
 Men prove with child, as powerful fancy works,
 And maids turned bottles, call aloud for corks.

Safe passed the Gnome through this fantastic band,
 A branch of healing Spleenwort in his hand.
 Then thus addressed the pow'r: "Hail, wayward
 Queen! 525

Who rule the sex to fifty from fifteen:
 Parent of vapors and of female wit,
 Who give th' hysteric, or poetic fit,
 On various tempers act by various ways,
 Make some take physic, others scribble plays; 530
 Who cause the proud their visits to delay,
 And send the godly in a pet to pray.
 A nymph there is, that all thy pow'r disdains,
 And thousands more in equal mirth maintains.
 But oh! if e'er thy Gnome could spoil a grace,
 Or raise a pimple on a beauteous face. 536
 Like Citron-waters matrons' cheeks inflame,
 Or change complexions at a losing game;
 If e'er with airy horns I planted heads,

Or rumpled petticoats, or tumbled beds, 540
 Or caused suspicion when no soul was rude,
 Or discomposed the head-dress of a Prude,
 Or e'er to costive lap-dog gave disease,
 Which not the tears of brightest eyes could ease:
 Hear me, and touch Belinda with chagrin, 545
 That single act gives half the world the spleen."

The Goddess with a discontented air
 Seems to reject him, though she grants his pray'r.
 A wondrous Bag with both her hands she binds,
 Like that where once Ulysses held the winds; 550
 There she collects the force of female lungs,
 Sighs, sobs, and passions, and the war of tongues.
 A Vial next she fills with fainting fears,
 Soft sorrows, melting griefs, and flowing tears.
 The Gnome rejoicing bears her gifts away, 555
 Spreads his black wings, and slowly mounts to day.

Sunk in Thalestris' arms the nymph he found,
 Her eyes dejected and her hair unbound.
 Full o'er their heads the swelling bag he rent,
 And all the Furies issued at the vent. 560
 Belinda burns with more than mortal ire,
 And fierce Thalestris fans the rising fire.
 "O wretched maid!" she spread her hands, and cried (While Hampton's echoes, "Wretched maid!" replied),

"Was it for this you took such constant care 565
 The bodkin, comb, and essence to prepare?
 For this your locks in paper durance bound,
 For this with tort'ring irons wreathed around?
 For this with fillets strained your tender head,
 And bravely bore the double loads of lead? 570
 Gods! shall the ravisher display your hair,
 While the Fops envy, and the Ladies stare!
 Honor forbid! at whose unrivaled shrine
 Ease, pleasure, virtue, all our sex resign.
 Methinks already I your tears survey, 575
 Already hear the horrid things they say,
 Already see you a degraded toast,
 And all your honor in a whisper lost!
 How shall I, then, your helpless fame defend?
 'Twill then be infamy to seem your friend! 580
 And shall this prize, th' inestimable prize,
 Exposed through crystal to the gazing eyes,
 And heightened by the diamond's circling rays,
 On that rapacious hand for ever blaze?
 Sooner shall grass in Hyde-park Circus grow, 585
 And wits take lodgings in the sound of Bow;
 Sooner let earth, air, sea, to Chaos fall,
 Men, monkeys, lap-dogs, parrots, perish all!"

She said; then raging to Sir Plume repairs,

And bids her Beau demand the precious hairs:
 (Sir Plume of amber snuff-box justly vain, 591
 And the nice conduct of a clouded cane)

With earnest eyes, and round unthinking face,
 He first the snuff-box opened, then the case,
 And thus broke out—"My lord, why, what the devil? 595

Z—ds! damn the lock! 'fore Gad, you must be civil!

Plague on 't! 'tis past a jest—nay prithee, pox!
 Give her the hair"—he spoke, and rapped his box.

"It grieves me much" (replied the Peer again)
 "Who speaks so well should ever speak in vain.
 But by this Lock, this sacred Lock I swear 601
 (Which never more shall join its parted hair;
 Which never more its honors shall renew,
 Clipped from the lovely head where late it grew),
 That while my nostrils draw the vital air, 605
 This hand, which won it, shall for ever wear."

He spoke, and speaking, in proud triumph spread
 The long-contended honors of her head.

But Umbriel, hateful Gnome! forbears not so;
 He breaks the Vial whence the sorrows flow. 610
 Then see! the nymph in beauteous grief appears,
 Her eyes half-languishing, half-drowned in tears;
 On her heaved bosom hung her drooping head,
 Which, with a sigh, she raised; and thus she said:

"For ever cursed be this detested day, 615
 Which snatched my best, my fav'rite curl away!
 Happy! ah, ten times happy had I been,
 If Hampton Court these eyes had never seen!
 Yet am not I the first mistaken maid,
 By love of Courts to num'rous ills betrayed. 620
 O had I rather un-admired remained
 In some lone isle, or distant Northern land;
 Where the gilt Chariot never marks the way,
 Where none learn Ombre, none e'er taste Bohea!
 There kept my charms concealed from mortal eye,
 Like roses, that in deserts bloom and die. 626
 What moved my mind with youthful Lords to roam?

O had I stayed, and said my pray'rs at home!
 'Twas this, the morning omens seemed to tell,
 Thrice from my trembling hand the patch-box
 fell; 630

The tot'ring China shook without a wind,
 Nay, Poll sat mute, and Shock was most unkind!
 A Sylph too warned me of the threats of fate,
 In mystic visions, now believed too late!
 See the poor remnants of these slighted hairs! 635
 My hands shall rend what e'en thy rapine spares:
 These in two sable ringlets taught to break,
 Once gave new beauties to the snowy neck;

The sister-lock now sits uncouth, alone,
 And in its fellow's fate foresees its own; 640
 Uncurled it hangs, the fatal shears demands,
 And tempts once more thy sacrilegious hands.
 O hadst thou, cruel! been content to seize Hairs less in sight, or any hairs but these!"

CANTO V

She said: the pitying audience melt in tears. 645
 But Fate and Jove had stopped the Baron's ears.
 In vain Thalestris with reproach assails,
 For who can move when fair Belinda fails?
 Not half so fixed the Trojan could remain,
 While Anna begged and Dido raged in vain. 650
 Then grave Clarissa graceful waved her fan;
 Silence ensued, and thus the nymph began:

"Say why are Beauties praised and honored most,

The wise man's passion, and the vain man's toast?
 Why decked with all that land and sea afford, 655
 Why Angels called, and Angel-like adored?
 Why round our coaches crowd the white-gloved
 Beaux,

Why bows the side-box from its inmost rows;
 How vain are all these glories, all our pains,
 Unless good sense preserve what beauty gains; 660
 That men may say, when we the front-box grace:
 'Behold the first in virtue as in face!'

Oh! if to dance all night, and dress all day,
 Charmed the small-pox, or chased old age away;
 Who would not scorn what housewife's cares produce, 665

Or who would learn one earthly thing of use?
 To patch, nay ogle, might become a Saint,
 Nor could it sure be such a sin to paint.
 But since, alas! frail beauty must decay, 669
 Curled or uncurled, since Locks will turn to gray;
 Since painted, or not painted, all shall fade,
 And she who scorns a man, must die a maid;
 What then remains but well our pow'r to use,
 And keep good-humor still whate'er we lose?
 And trust me, dear! good-humor can prevail, 675
 When airs, and flights, and screams, and scolding fail.

Beauties in vain their pretty eyes may roll;
 Charms strike the sight, but merit wins the soul."

So spoke the Dame, but no applause ensued;
 Belinda frowned, Thalestris called her Prude. 680
 "To arms, to arms!" the fierce Virago cries,
 And swift as lightning to the combat flies.
 All side in parties, and begin th' attack;

Fans clap, silks rustle, and tough whalebones crack;

Heroes' and Heroines' shouts confus'dly rise, 685
 And bass, and treble voices strike the skies.

No common weapons in their hands are found,
 Like Gods they fight, nor dread a mortal wound.

So when bold Homer makes the Gods engage,
 And heav'nly breasts with human passions rage;
 'Gainst Pallas, Mars; Latona, Hermes arms; 691
 And all Olympus rings with loud alarms:

Jove's thunder roars, heav'n trembles all around,
 Blue Neptune storms, the bellowing deeps re-
 sound:

Earth shakes her nodding tow'rs, the ground gives
 way, 695

And the pale ghosts start at the flash of day!
 Triumphant Umbriel on a sconce's height

Clapped his glad wings, and sat to view the fight:
 Propped on the bodkin spears, the Sprites survey
 The growing combat, or assist the fray. 700

While through the press enraged Thalestris flies,

And scatters death around from both her eyes,
 A Beau and Witling perished in the throng,
 One died in metaphor, and one in song.
 "O cruel nymph! a living death I bear," 705

Cried Dapperwit, and sunk beside his chair.
 A mournful glance Sir Fopling upwards cast,
 "Those eyes are made so killing"—was his last.
 Thus on Mæander's flowery margin lies
 Th' expiring Swan, and as he sings he dies. 710

When bold Sir Plume had drawn Clarissa down,
 Chloe stepped in, and killed him with a frown;
 She smiled to see the doughty hero slain,
 But, at her smile, the Beau revived again.

Now Jove suspends his golden scales in air, 715
 Weighs the Men's wits against the Lady's hair;
 The doubtful beam long nods from side to side;
 At length the wits mount up, the hairs subside.

See, fierce Belinda on the Baron flies,
 With more than usual lightning in her eyes: 720
 Nor feared the Chief th' unequal fight to try,
 Who sought no more than on his foe to die.
 But this bold Lord with manly strength endued,
 She with one finger and a thumb subdued:

Just where the breath of life his nostrils drew, 725
 A charge of Snuff the wily virgin threw;
 The Gnomes direct, to ev'ry atom just,

The pungent grains of titillating dust.
 Sudden, with starting tears each eye o'erflows,
 And the high dome re-echoes to his nose. 730
 "Now meet thy fate," incensed Belinda cried,

And drew a deadly bodkin from her side.
 (The same, his ancient personage to deck,
 Her great great grandsire wore about his neck,
 In three seal-rings; which after, melted down, 735
 Formed a vast buckle for his widow's gown:
 Her infant grandame's whistle next it grew,
 The bells she jingled, and the whistle blew;
 Then in a bodkin graced her mother's hairs, 739
 Which long she wore, and now Belinda wears.)

"Boast not my fall" (he cried) "insulting foe!
 Thou by some other shalt be laid as low,
 Nor think, to die dejects my lofty mind:
 All that I dread is leaving you behind!
 Rather than so, ah, let me still survive, 745
 And burn in Cupid's flames—but burn alive."

"Restore the Lock!" she cries; and all around
 "Restore the Lock!" the vaulted roofs rebound.
 Not fierce Othello in so loud a strain
 Roared for the handkerchief that caused his pain.
 But see how oft ambitious aims are crossed, 751
 And chiefs contend till all the prize is lost!
 The Lock, obtained with guilt, and kept with pain,

In every place is sought, but sought in vain:
 With such a prize no mortal must be bless'd, 755
 So heav'n decrees! with heav'n who can contest?

Some thought it mounted to the Lunar sphere,
 Since all things lost on earth are treasured there.
 There Heroes' wits are kept in pond'rous vases,
 And beaux' in snuff-boxes and tweezer-cases. 760
 There broken vows and death-bed alms are found,
 And lovers' hearts with ends of riband bound,
 The courtier's promises, and sick man's pray'rs,

The smiles of harlots, and the tears of heirs,
 Cages for gnats, and chains to yoke a flea, 765
 Dried butterflies, and tomes of casuistry.

But trust the Muse—she saw it upward rise,
 Though marked by none but quick, poetic eyes (So Rome's great founder to the heav'n's withdrew,

To Proculus alone confessed in view); 770
 A sudden Star, it shot through liquid air,
 And drew behind a radiant trail of hair.

Not Berenice's Locks first rose so bright,
 The heav'n's bespangling with disheveled light.
 The Sylph's behold it kindling as it flies, 775
 And pleased pursue its progress through the skies.

This the Beau monde shall from the Mall survey,
 And hail with music its propitious ray.
 This the bless'd Lover shall for Venus take,
 And send up vows from Rosamonda's lake. 780
 This Partridge soon shall view in cloudless skies,
 When next he looks through Galileo's eyes;
 And hence th' egregious wizard shall foredoom
 The fate of Louis, and the fall of Rome.

Then cease, bright Nymph! to mourn thy ravished hair, 785

Which adds new glory to the shining sphere!
 Not all the tresses that fair head can boast,
 Shall draw such envy as the Lock you lost.
 For, after all the murders of your eye,
 When, after millions slain, yourself shall die: 790
 When those fair suns shall set, as set they must,
 And all those tresses shall be laid in dust,
 This Lock, the Muse shall consecrate to fame,
 And 'midst the stars inscribe Belinda's name.

An Essay on Criticism

PART I

'Tis hard to say if greater want of skill
 Appear in writing or in judging ill;
 But of the two less dangerous is th' offense
 To tire our patience than mislead our sense:
 Some few in that, but numbers err in this; 5
 Ten censure wrong for one who writes amiss;
 A fool might once himself alone expose;
 Now one in verse makes many more in prose.
 'Tis with our judgments as our watches, none
 Go just alike, yet each believes his own. 10
 In Poets as true Genius is but rare,

True Taste as seldom is the Critic's share;
 Both must alike from Heav'n derive their light,
 These born to judge, as well as those to write.
 Let such teach others who themselves excel, 15
 And censure freely who have written well;
 Authors are partial to their wit, 'tis true,
 But are not Critics to their judgment too?
 Yet if we look more closely, we shall find
 Most have the seeds of judgment in their mind:
 Nature affords at least a glimm'ring light; 21
 The lines, tho' touch'd but faintly, are drawn right:
 But as the slightest sketch, if justly traced,

Is by ill col'ring but the more disgraced,
 So by false learning is good sense defaced: 25
 Some are bewilder'd in the maze of schools,
 And some made coxcombs Nature meant but fools:

In search of wit these lose their common sense,
 And then turn Critics in their own defense:
 Each burns alike, who can or cannot write, 30
 Or with a rival's or an eunuch's spite.
 All fools have still an itching to deride,
 And fain would be upon the laughing side.
 If Mævius scribble in Apollo's spite, 34
 There are who judge still worse than he can write.

Some have at first for Wits, then Poets pass'd;
 Turn'd Critics next, and prov'd plain Fools at last.
 Some neither can for Wits nor Critics pass,
 As heavy mules are neither horse nor ass.
 Those half-learn'd wtlings, numerous in our isle,
 As half-form'd insects on the banks of Nile; 41
 Unfinish'd things, one knows not what to call,
 Their generation's so equivocal;
 To tell them would a hundred tongues require,
 Or one vain Wit's, that might a hundred tire. 45

But you who seek to give and merit fame,
 And justly bear a Critic's noble name,
 Be sure yourself and your own reach to know,
 How far your Genius, Taste, and Learning go, Launch not beyond your depth, but be discreet, 50
 And mark that point where Sense and Dullness meet.

Nature to all things fix'd the limits fit,
 And wisely curb'd proud man's pretending wit.
 As on the land while here the ocean gains,
 In other parts it leaves wide sandy plains; 55
 Thus in the soul while Memory prevails,
 The solid power of Understanding fails;
 Where beams of warm Imagination play,
 The Memory's soft figures melt away.
 One Science only will one genius fit; 60
 So vast is Art, so narrow human wit:
 Not only bounded to peculiar arts,
 But oft in those confin'd to single parts.
 Like Kings we lose the conquests gain'd before,
 By vain ambition still to make them more: 65
 Each might his sev'ral province well command,
 Would all but stoop to what they understand.

First follow Nature, and your judgment frame
 By her just standard, which is still the same;
 Unerring Nature, still divinely bright, 70
 One clear, unchanged, and universal light,
 Life, force, and beauty must to all impart,
 At once the source, and end, and test of Art,

Art from that fund each just supply provides,
 Works without show, and without pomp presides.
 In some fair body thus th' informing soul 76
 With spirits feeds, with vigor fills the whole;
 Each motion guides, and every nerve sustains,
 Itself unseen, but in th' effects remains.

Some, to whom Heav'n in wit has been profuse,
 Want as much more to turn it to its use; 81
 For Wit and Judgment often are at strife,
 Tho' meant each other's aid, like man and wife.
 'Tis more to guide than spur the Muse's steed,
 Restrain his fury than provoke his speed: 85
 The winged courser, like a gen'rous horse,
 Shows most true mettle when you check his course.

Those rules of old, discover'd, not devised,
 Are Nature still, but Nature methodized;
 Nature, like Liberty, is but restrain'd 90
 By the same laws which first herself ordain'd.

Hear how learn'd Greece her useful rules indites
 When to repress and when indulge our flights:
 High on Parnassus' top her sons she show'd,
 And pointed out those arduous paths they trod;
 Held from afar, aloft, th' immortal prize, 96
 And urged the rest by equal steps to rise.
 Just precepts thus from great examples giv'n,
 She drew from them what they derived from Heav'n.

The gen'rous Critic fann'd the poet's fire, 100
 And taught the world with reason to admire.
 Then Criticism the Muse's handmaid prov'd,
 To dress her charms, and make her more below'd:
 But following Wits from that intention stray'd:
 Who could not win the mistress woo'd the maid;
 Against the Poets their own arms they turn'd, 106 Sure to hate most the men from whom they learn'd.

So modern 'pothecaries, taught the art
 By doctors' bills to play the doctor's part,
 Bold in the practice of mistaken rules, 110
 Prescribe, apply, and call their masters fools.
 Some on the leaves of ancient authors prey;
 Nor time nor moths e'er spoil'd so much as they:
 Some drily plain, without invention's aid,
 Write dull receipts how poems may be made; 115
 These leave the sense their learning to display,
 And those explain the meaning quite away.

You then whose judgment the right course would steer,
 Know well each ancient's proper character;
 His fable, subject, scope in every page; 120
 Religion, country, genius of his age:
 Without all these at once before your eyes,
 Cavil you may, but never criticize.

Be Homer's works your study and delight,
Read them by day, and meditate by night; 125
Thence form your judgment, thence your maxims bring,

And trace the Muses upward to their spring.
Still with itself compared, his text peruse;
And let your comment be the Mantuan Muse.

When first young Maro in his boundless mind
A work t' outlast immortal Rome design'd, 131
Perhaps he seem'd above the critic's law,
And but from Nature's fountains scorn'd to draw;
But when t' examine ev'ry part he came,
Nature and Homer were, he found, the same. 135
Convinced, amazed, he checks the bold design,
And rules as strict his labor'd work confine
As if the Stagyrite o'erlook'd each line.
Learn hence for ancient rules a just esteem;
To copy Nature is to copy them. 140

Some beauties yet no precepts can declare,
For there's a happiness as well as care.
Music resembles poetry; in each
Are nameless graces which no methods teach,
And which a master-hand alone can reach. 145
If, where the rules not far enough extend,
(Since rules were made but to promote their end)
Some lucky license answer to the full
Th' intent proposed, that license is a rule.
Thus Pegasus, a nearer way to take, 150
May boldly deviate from the common track.
Great Wits sometimes may gloriously offend,
And rise to faults true Critics dare not mend;
From vulgar bounds with brave disorder part,
And snatch a grace beyond the reach of Art, 155
Which, without passing thro' the judgment, gains
The heart, and all its end at once attains.
In prospects thus some objects please our eyes,
Which out of Nature's common order rise,
The shapeless rock, or hanging precipice. 160
But tho' the ancients thus their rules invade, (As Kings dispense with laws themselves have made)

Moderns, beware! or if you must offend
Against the precept, ne'er transgress its end;
Let it be seldom, and compell'd by need; 165
And have at least their precedent to plead;
The Critic else proceeds without remorse,
Seizes your fame, and puts his laws in force.

I know there are to whose presumptuous
thoughts
Those freer beauties, ev'n in them, seem faults.
Some figures monstrous and misshaped appear, 171
Consider'd singly, or beheld too near,

Which, but proportion'd to their light or place,
Due distance reconciles to form and grace.
A prudent chief not always must display 175
His powers in equal ranks and fair array,
But with th' occasion and the place comply,
Conceal his force, nay, seem sometimes to fly.
Those oft are stratagems which errors seem,
Nor is it Homer nods, but we that dream. 180

Still green with bays each ancient altar stands
Above the reach of sacrilegious hands,
Secure from flames, from Envy's fiercer rage,
Destructive war, and all-involving Age.
See from each clime the learn'd their incense
bring! 185

Hear in all tongues consenting pæans ring!
In praise so just let ev'ry voice be join'd,
And fill the gen'ral chorus of mankind.
Hail, Bards triumphant! born in happier days,
Immortal heirs of universal praise! 190
Whose honors with increase of ages grow,
As streams roll down, enlarging as they flow;
Nations unborn your mighty names shall sound,
And worlds applaud that must not yet be found!
O may some spark of your celestial fire 195
The last, the meanest of your sons inspire, (That on weak wings, from far, pursues your flights,
Glows while he reads, but trembles as he writes)
To teach vain Wits a science little known, 199
T' admire superior sense, and doubt their own.

PART II

Of all the causes which conspire to blind
Man's erring judgment, and misguide the mind,
What the weak head with strongest bias rules,
Is Pride, the never failing vice of fools.
Whatever Nature has in worth denied 205
She gives in large recruits of needful Pride:
For as in bodies, thus in souls, we find What wants in blood and spirits swell'd with wind:

Pride, where Wit fails, steps in to our defense,
And fills up all the mighty void of Sense: 210
If once right Reason drives that cloud away,
Truth breaks upon us with resistless day.
Trust not yourself; but your defects to know,
Make use of ev'ry friend—and ev'ry foe.

A little learning is a dangerous thing; 215
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring:
There shallow draughts intoxicate the brain,
And drinking largely sobers us again.
Fired at first sight with what the Muse imparts,

In fearless youth we tempt the heights of arts, 220
 While from the bounded level of our mind
 Short views we take, nor see the lengths behind:
 But more advanc'd, behold with strange surprise
 New distant scenes of endless science rise!
 So pleas'd at first the tow'ring Alps we try, 225
 Mount o'er the vales, and seem to tread the sky;
 Th' eternal snows appear already past,
 And the first clouds and mountains seem the last:
 But those attain'd, we tremble to survey
 The growing labors of the lengthen'd way; 230
 Th' increasing prospect tires our wand'ring eyes,
 Hills peep o'er hills, and Alps on Alps arise!

A perfect judge will read each work of wit
 With the same spirit that its author writ;
 Survey the whole, nor seek slight faults to find 235
 Where Nature moves, and Rapture warms the
 mind:
 Nor lose, for that malignant dull delight,
 The gen'rous pleasure to be charm'd with wit.
 But in such lays as neither ebb nor flow,
 Correctly cold, and regularly low, 240
 That shunning faults one quiet tenor keep,
 We cannot blame indeed—but we may sleep.
 In Wit, as Nature, what affects our hearts
 Is not th' exactness of peculiar parts;
 'Tis not a lip or eye we beauty call, 245
 But the joint force and full result of all.
 Thus when we view some well proportion'd dome,
 (The world's just wonder, and ev'n thine, O Rome!)

No single parts unequally surprise,
 All comes united to th' admiring eyes; 250
 No monstrous height, or breadth, or length, appear;
 The whole at once is bold and regular.
 Whoever thinks a faultless piece to see,
 Thinks what ne'er was, nor is, nor e'er shall be.
 In every work regard the writer's end, 255
 Since none can compass more than they intend;
 And if the means be just, the conduct true,
 Applause, in spite of trivial faults, is due.
 As men of breeding, sometimes men of wit,
 T' avoid great errors must the less commit; 260
 Neglect the rules each verbal critic lays,
 For not to know some trifles is a praise.
 Most critics, fond of some subservient art,
 Still make the whole depend upon a part:
 They talk of Principles, but Notions prize, 265
 And all to one lov'd folly sacrifice.

Once on a time La Mancha's Knight, they say,
 A certain bard encount'ring on the way,
 Discours'd in terms as just, with looks as sage,
 As e'er could Dennis, of the Grecian Stage; 270
 Concluding all were desperate sots and fools
 Who durst depart from Aristotle's rules.
 Our author, happy in a judge so nice,
 Produced his play, and begg'd the knight's advice;
 Made him observe the Subject and the Plot, 275
 The Manners, Passions, Unities; what not?
 All which exact to rule were brought about,
 Were but a combat in the lists left out.
 "What! leave the combat out?" exclaims the knight.
 "Yes, or we must renounce the Stagyrity." 280
 "Not so, by Heaven!" (he answers in a rage)
 "Knights, squires, and steeds must enter on the stage."
 "So vast a throng the stage can ne'er contain."
 "Then build a new, or act it in a plain."
 Thus critics of less judgment than caprice, 285
 Curious, not knowing, not exact, but nice,
 Form short ideas, and offend in Arts
 (As most in Manners), by a love to parts.
 Some to Conceit alone their taste confine, 289
 And glitt'ring thoughts struck out at every line;
 Pleas'd with a work where nothing's just or fit,
 One glaring chaos and wild heap of wit.
 Poets, like painters, thus unskill'd to trace
 The naked nature and the living grace,
 With gold and jewels cover every part, 295
 And hide with ornaments their want of Art.
 True Wit is Nature to advantage dress'd,
 What oft was thought, but ne'er so well express'd;
 Something whose truth convinced at sight we find,
 That gives us back the image of our mind. 300
 As shades more sweetly recommend the light,
 So modest plainness sets off sprightly wit:
 For works may have more wit than does them good,
 As bodies perish thro' excess of blood.
 Others for language all their care express, 305
 And value books, as women men, for dress:
 Their praise is still—the Style is excellent;
 The Sense they humbly take upon content.
 Words are like leaves; and where they most abound,
 Much fruit of sense beneath is rarely found. 310
 False eloquence, like the prismatic glass,
 Its gaudy colors spreads on every place;
 The face of Nature we no more survey,
 All glares alike, without distinction gay;
 But true expression, like th' unchanging sun, 315
 Clears and improves whate'er it shines upon;
 It gilds all objects, but it alters none.

Expression is the dress of thought, and still Appears more decent as more suitable.
 A vile Conceit in pompous words express'd 320
 Is like a clown in regal purple dress'd:
 For diff'rent styles with diff'rent subjects sort,
 As sev'ral garbs with country, town, and court.
 Some by old words to fame have made pretense,
 Ancients in phrase, mere moderns in their sense;
 Such labor'd nothings, in so strange a style, 326
 Amaze th' unlearn'd, and make the learned smile;
 Unlucky as Fungoso in the play,
 These sparks with awkward vanity display
 What the fine gentleman wore yesterday; 330
 And but so mimic ancient wits at best,
 As apes our grandsires in their doublets drest.
 In words as fashions the same rule will hold,
 Alike fantastic if too new or old:
 Be not the first by whom the new are tried, 335
 Nor yet the last to lay the old aside.
 But most by Numbers judge a poet's song,
 And smooth or rough with them is right or wrong.
 In the bright Muse tho' thousand charms conspire,
 Her voice is all these tuneful fools admire; 340
 Who haunt Parnassus but to please their ear,
 Not mend their minds; as some to church repair,
 Not for the doctrine, but the music there.
 These equal syllables alone require,
 Tho' oft the ear the open vowels tire, 345
 While expletives their feeble aid do join,
 And ten low words oft creep in one dull line:
 While they ring round the same unvaried chimes,
 With sure returns of still expected rhymes;
 Where'er you find "the cooling western breeze,"
 In the next line, it "whispers thro' the trees"; 351
 If crystal streams "with pleasing murmurs creep,"
 The reader's threaten'd (not in vain) with "sleep";
 Then, at the last and only couplet, fraught
 With some unmeaning thing they call a thought,
 A needless Alexandrine ends the song, 356
 That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along.
 Leave such to tune their own dull rhymes, and
 know
 What's roundly smooth, or languishingly slow;
 And praise the easy vigor of a line 360
 Where Denham's strength and Waller's sweetness join.
 True ease in writing comes from Art, not Chance,
 As those move easiest who have learn'd to dance.
 'Tis not enough no harshness gives offense;
 The sound must seem an echo to the sense. 365
 Soft is the strain when Zephyr gently blows,

And the smooth stream in smoother numbers flows;
 But when loud surges lash the sounding shore,
 The hoarse rough verse should like the torrent roar.
 When Ajax strives some rock's vast weight to throw, 370
 The line, too, labors, and the words move slow:
 Not so when swift Camilla scours the plain, Flies o'er th' unbending corn, and skims along the main.
 Hear how Timotheus' varied lays surprise,
 And bid alternate passions fall and rise! 375
 While at each change the son of Libyan Jove
 Now burns with glory, and then melts with love;
 Now his fierce eyes with sparkling fury glow,
 Now sighs steal out, and tears begin to flow: 379
 Persians and Greeks like turns of nature found,
 And the world's Victor stood subdued by sound!
 The power of music all our hearts allow,
 And what Timotheus was is Dryden now.
 Avoid extremes, and shun the fault of such
 Who still are pleas'd too little or too much. 385
 At ev'ry trifle scorn to take offense;
 That always shows great pride or little sense:
 Those heads, as stomachs, are not sure the best
 Which nauseate all, and nothing can digest.
 Yet let not each gay turn thy rapture move; 390
 For fools admire, but men of sense approve:
 As things seem large which we thro' mist descry,
 Dullness is ever apt to magnify.
 Some foreign writers, some our own despise;
 The ancients only, or the moderns prize. 395
 Thus Wit, like Faith, by each man is applied
 To one small sect, and all are damn'd beside.
 Meanly they seek the blessing to confine,
 And force that sun but on a part to shine,
 Which not alone the southern wit sublimed, 400
 But ripens spirits in cold northern climes;
 Which from the first has shone on ages past,
 Enlights the present, and shall warm the last;
 Tho' each may feel increases and decays,
 And see now clearer and now darker days. 405
 Regard not then if wit be old or new,
 But blame the False and value still the True.
 Some ne'er advance a judgment of their own,
 But catch the spreading notion of the town;
 They reason and conclude by precedent, 410
 And own stale nonsense which they ne'er invent.
 Some judge of authors' names, not works, and then
 Nor praise nor blame the writings, but the men.
 Of all this servile herd, the worst is he

That in proud dullness joins with quality; 415
 A constant critic at the great man's board,
 To fetch and carry nonsense for my lord.
 What woeful stuff this madrigal would be
 In some starv'd hackney sonneteer or me!
 But let a lord once own the happy lines, 420
 How the Wit brightens! how the Style refines!
 Before his sacred name flies every fault,
 And each exalted stanza teems with thought!
 The vulgar thus thro' imitation err,
 As oft the learn'd by being singular; 425
 So much they scorn the crowd, that if the throng
 By chance go right, they purposely go wrong.
 So schismatics the plain believers quit,
 And are but damn'd for having too much wit.
 Some praise at morning what they blame at night,
 But always think the last opinion right. 431
 A Muse by these is like a mistress used,
 This hour she's idolized, the next abused;
 While their weak heads, like towns unfortified,
 'Twixt sense and nonsense daily change their side.
 Ask them the cause; they're wiser still they say;
 And still tomorrow's wiser than today. 437
 We think our fathers fools, so wise we grow;
 Our wiser sons no doubt will think us so.
 Once school-divines this zealous isle o'er-spread;
 Who knew most sentences was deepest read. 441
 Faith, Gospel, all seem'd made to be disputed,
 And none had sense enough to be confuted.
 Scotists and Thomists now in peace remain
 Amidst their kindred cobwebs in Duck-lane. 445
 If Faith itself has diff'rent dresses worn,
 What wonder modes in Wit should take their turn?
 Oft, leaving what is natural and fit,
 The current Folly proves the ready Wit;
 And authors think their reputation safe, 450
 Which lives as long as fools are pleas'd to laugh.
 Some, valuing those of their own side or mind,
 Still make themselves the measure of mankind:
 Fondly we think we honor merit then,
 When we but praise ourselves in other men. 455
 Parties in wit attend on those of state,
 And public faction doubles private hate.
 Pride, Malice, Folly, against Dryden rose,
 In various shapes of parsons, critics, beaux:
 But sense survived when merry jests were past;
 For rising merit will buoy up at last. 461
 Might he return and bless once more our eyes,
 New Blackmores and new Milbournes must arise.
 Nay, should great Homer lift his awful head,
 Zoilus again would start up from the dead. 465
 Envy will Merit as its shade pursue,
 But like a shadow proves the substance true;
 For envied Wit, like Sol eclips'd, makes known
 Th' opposing body's grossness, not its own.
 When first that sun too powerful beams displays,
 It draws up vapors which obscure its rays; 471
 But ev'n those clouds at last adorn its way,
 Reflect new glories, and augment the day.
 Be thou the first true merit to befriend;
 His praise is lost who stays till all commend. 475
 Short is the date, alas! of modern rhymes,
 And 'tis but just to let them live betimes.
 No longer now that Golden Age appears,
 When patriarch wits survived a thousand years:
 Now length of fame (our second life) is lost, 480
 And bare threescore is all ev'n that can boast:
 Our sons their fathers' failing language see,
 And such as Chaucer is shall Dryden be.
 So when the faithful pencil has design'd
 Some bright idea of the master's mind, 485
 Where a new world leaps out at his command,
 And ready Nature waits upon his hand;
 When the ripe colors soften and unite,
 And sweetly melt into just shade and light;
 When mellowing years their full perfection give,
 And each bold figure just begins to live, 491
 The treach'rous colors the fair art betray,
 And all the bright creation fades away!
 Unhappy Wit, like most mistaken things,
 Atones not for that envy which it brings: 495
 In youth alone its empty praise we boast,
 But soon the short-lived vanity is lost;
 Like some fair flower the early Spring supplies,
 That gaily blooms, but ev'n in blooming dies.
 What is this Wit, which must our cares employ?
 The owner's wife that other men enjoy; 501
 Then most our trouble still when most admired,
 And still the more we give, the more required;
 Whose fame with pains we guard, but lose with ease,
 Sure some to vex, but never all to please, 505
 'Tis what the vicious fear, the virtuous shun;
 By fools 'tis hated, and by knaves undonel
 If Wit so much from Ignorance undergo,
 Ah, let not Learning too commence its foe!
 Of old those met rewards who could excel, 510
 And such were prais'd who but endeavor'd well;
 Tho' triumphs were to gen'als only due,
 Crowns were reserv'd to grace the soldiers too.
 Now they who reach Parnassus' lofty crown 514
 Employ their pains to spurn some others down;
 And while self-love each jealous writer rules,
 Contending wits become the sport of fools;

But still the worst with most regret commend,
 For each ill author is as bad a friend.
 To what base ends, and by what abject ways, 520
 Are mortals urged thro' sacred lust of praise!
 Ah, ne'er so dire a thirst of glory boast,
 Nor in the critic let the man be lost!
 Good nature and good sense must ever join;
 To err is human, to forgive divine. 525

But if in noble minds some dregs remain,
 Not yet purged off, of spleen and sour disdain,
 Discharge that rage on more provoking crimes,
 Nor fear a dearth in these flagitious times.
 No pardon vile obscenity should find, 530
 Tho' Wit and Art conspire to move your mind;
 But dullness with obscenity must prove
 As shameful sure as impotence in love.
 In the fat age of pleasure, wealth, and ease Sprung the rank weed, and thrived with large increase: 535

When love was all an easy monarch's care,
 Seldom at council, never in a war;
 Jilts ruled the state, and statesmen farces writ;

Nay wits had pensions, and young lords had wit;
 The Fair sat panting at a courtier's play, 540
 And not a mask went unimprov'd away;
 The modest fan was lifted up no more,
 And virgins smil'd at what they blush'd before.
 The following license of a foreign reign
 Did all the dregs of bold Socinus drain; 545
 Then unbelieving priests reform'd the nation,
 And taught more pleasant methods of salvation;
 Where Heav'n's free subjects might their rights dispute,
 Lest God himself should seem too absolute;
 Pulpits their sacred satire learn'd to spare, 550
 And vice admired to find a flatt'rer there!
 Encouraged thus, Wit's Titans braved the skies,
 And the press groan'd with licens'd blasphemies.
 These monsters, Critics! with your darts engage,
 Here point your thunder, and exhaust your rage!
 Yet shun their fault, who, scandalously nice, 555
 Will needs mistake an author into vice:
 All seems infected that th' infected spy,
 As all looks yellow to the jaundic'd eye.

WILLIAM COLLINS

Ode to Evening

If aught of oaten stop, or pastoral song,
 May hope, chaste Eve, to soothe thy modest ear,
 Like thy own solemn springs,
 Thy springs and dying gales;

O nymph reserved—while now the bright-haired
 sun 5
 Sits in yon western tent, whose cloudy skirts,
 With brede ethereal wove,
 O'erhang his wavy bed;

Now air is hushed, save where the weak-eyed bat
 With short shrill shriek flits by on leathern wing,
 Or where the beetle winds 11
 His small but sullen horn,

As oft he rises, 'midst the twilight path
 Against the pilgrim borne in heedless hum—
 Now teach me, maid composed, 15
 To breathe some softened strain,

Whose numbers, stealing through thy darkening
 vale,
 May not unseemly with its stillness suit,
 As, musing slow, I hail
 Thy genial loved return! 20

For when thy folding-star arising shows
 His paly circlet, at his warning lamp
 The fragrant Hours, and elves
 Who slept in buds the day,

And many a nymph who wreathes her brows with sedge, 25
 And sheds the freshening dew, and, lovelier still,
 The pensive Pleasures sweet,
 Prepare thy shadowy car.

Then lead, calm votaress, where some sheety lake
 Cheers the lone heath, or some time-hallowed pile,
 Or upland fallows gray 31
 Reflect its last cool gleam.

Collins, Ode to Evening. William Collins (1721-1759) studied at Oxford and went to London where he wrote for a living. His later years were obscured by insanity.

But when chill blustering winds, or driving rain,
Prevent my willing feet, be mine the hut
That from the mountain's side 35
Views wilds and swelling floods,

And hamlets brown, and dim-discovered spires,
And hears their simple bell, and marks o'er all Thy dewy fingers draw
The gradual dusky veil. 40

While Spring shall pour his show'rs, as oft he wont,
And bathe thy breathing tresses, meekest Eve!
While Summer loves to sport
Beneath thy lingering light;

While sallow Autumn fills thy lap with leaves,
Or Winter, yelling through the troublous air, 46
Affrights thy shrinking train,
And rudely rends thy robes;

So long, regardful of thy quiet rule,
Shall Fancy, Friendship, Science, rose-lipped
Health, 50
Thy gentlest influence own,
And hymn thy favorite name!

Ode

WRITTEN IN THE BEGINNING OF THE YEAR 1746

How sleep the brave who sink to rest
By all their country's wishes blest!
When Spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallowed mold, 5
She there shall dress a sweeter sod
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod.

By fairy hands their knell is rung;
By forms unseen their dirge is sung.
There Honor comes, a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay; 10
And Freedom shall awhile repair,
To dwell a weeping hermit there!

THOMAS GRAY

Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard

The curfew tolls the knell of parting day,
The lowing herd wind slowly o'er the lea,
The plowman homeward plods his weary way,
And leaves the world to darkness and to me.

Now fades the glimmering landscape on the sight,
And all the air a solemn stillness holds, 6
Save where the beetle wheels his droning flight,
And drowsy tinklings lull the distant folds;

Save that from yonder ivy-mantled tower
The moping owl does to the moon complain 10
Of such, as wandering near her secret bower,
Molest her ancient solitary reign.

Beneath those rugged elms, that yew-tree's shade,
Where heaves the turf in many a moldering heap,
Each in his narrow cell for ever laid, 15
The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep.

The breezy call of incense-breathing morn,
The swallow twittering from the straw-built shed,
The cock's shill clarion, or the echoing horn,
No more shall rouse them from their lowly bed.

For them no more the blazing hearth shall burn,
Or busy housewife ply her evening care: 22
No children run to lisp their sire's return,
Or climb his knees the envied kiss to share.

Oft did the harvest to their sickle yield, 25
Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe has broke;
How jocund did they drive their team afield!
How bowed the woods beneath their sturdy stroke!

Let not Ambition mock their useful toil,
Their homely joys, and destiny obscure; 30
Nor Grandeur hear with a disdainful smile,
The short and simple annals of the poor.

Gray, Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard. Thomas Gray (1716-1771) spent most of his life quietly as professor of history at Cambridge.

- The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Awaits alike the inevitable hour. 35
The paths of glory lead but to the grave.
- Nor you, ye proud, impute to these the fault,
If Memory o'er their tomb no trophies raise,
Where through the long-drawn aisle and fretted vault
The pealing anthem swells the note of praise.
- Can storied urn or animated bust 41
Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
Can Honor's voice provoke the silent dust,
Or Flattery soothe the dull cold ear of Death?
- Perhaps in this neglected spot is laid 45
Some heart once pregnant with celestial fire;
Hands, that the rod of empire might have swayed,
Or waked to ecstasy the living lyre.
- But Knowledge to their eyes her ample page
Rich with the spoils of time did ne'er unroll; 50
Chill Penury repressed their noble rage,
And froze the genial current of the soul.
- Full many a gem of purest ray serene,
The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear:
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen, 55
And waste its sweetness on the desert air.
- Some village Hampden, that with dauntless breast
The little tyrant of his fields withstood;
Some mute inglorious Milton here may rest, 59
Some Cromwell guiltless of his country's blood.
- The applause of listening senates to command,
The threats of pain and ruin to despise,
To scatter plenty o'er a smiling land,
And read their history in a nation's eyes,
- Their lot forbade: nor circumscribed alone 65
Their growing virtues, but their crimes confined;
Forbade to wade through slaughter to a throne,
And shut the gates of mercy on mankind,
- The struggling pangs of conscious truth to hide,
To quench the blushes of ingenuous shame, 70
Or heap the shrine of Luxury and Pride
With incense kindled at the Muse's flame.
- Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife,
Their sober wishes never learned to stray;
- Along the cool sequestered vale of life 75
They kept the noiseless tenor of their way.
- Yet even these bones from insult to protect,
Some frail memorial still erected nigh,
With uncouth rhymes and shapeless sculpture
decked,
Implores the passing tribute of a sigh. 80
- Their name, their years, spelt by the unlettered
muse,
The place of fame and elegy supply;
And many a holy text around she strews,
That teach the rustic moralist to die.
- For who to dumb Forgetfulness a prey, 85
This pleasing anxious being e'er resigned,
Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,
Nor cast one longing lingering look behind?
- On some fond breast the parting soul relies,
Some pious drops the closing eye requires; 90
Ev'n from the tomb the voice of Nature cries,
Ev'n in our ashes live their wonted fires.
- For thee, who mindful of the unhonored dead
Dost in these lines their artless tale relate;
If chance, by lonely contemplation led, 95
Some kindred spirit shall inquire thy fate,
- Haply some hoary-headed swain may say,
"Oft have we seen him at the peep of dawn
Brushing with hasty steps the dews away
To meet the sun upon the upland lawn. 100
- "There at the foot of yonder nodding beech
That wreathes its old fantastic roots so high,
His listless length at noontide would he stretch,
And pore upon the brook that babbles by.
- "Hard by yon wood, now smiling as in scorn, 105
Muttering his wayward fancies he would rove,
Now drooping, woeful wan, like one forlorn,
Or crazed with care, or crossed in hopeless love.
- "One morn I missed him on the customed hill,
Along the heath and near his favorite tree; 110
Another came; nor yet beside the rill,
Nor up the lawn, nor at the wood was he;
- "The next with dirges due in sad array Slow through the church-way path we saw him
borne. 114

Approach and read (for thou can'st read) the lay, Graved on the stone beneath yon aged thorn."

THE EPITAPH

*Here rests his head upon the lap of earth
A youth to fortune and to fame unknown.
Fair Science frowned not on his humble birth,
And Melancholy marked him for her own.* 120

*Large was his bounty, and his soul sincere,
Heaven did a recompense as largely send:
He gave to Misery all he had, a tear,
He gained from Heaven ('twas all he wished) a friend.*

*No farther seek his merits to disclose, 125
Or draw his frailties from their dread abode,
(There they alike in trembling hope repose)
The bosom of his Father and his God.*

Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College

Ye distant spires, ye antique towers,
That crown the watery glade,
Where grateful Science still adores
Her Henry's holy Shade;¹
And ye that from the stately brow 5
Of Windsor's heights² th' expanse below
Of grove, of lawn, of mead survey,
Whose turf, whose shade, whose flowers among Wanders the hoary Thames along
His silver-winding way: 10

Ah happy hills, ah pleasing shade,
Ah fields beloved in vain,
Where once my careless childhood strayed,
A stranger yet to pain!
I feel the gales, that from ye blow, 15
A momentary bliss bestow,
As, waving fresh their gladsome wing,
My weary soul they seem to sooth,
And, redolent of joy and youth,
To breathe a second spring. 20

Say, Father Thames, for thou hast seen
Full many a sprightly race
Disporting on thy margent green
The paths of pleasure trace,
Who foremost now delight to cleave 25
With pliant arm thy glassy wave?
The captive linnet which enthrall?

What idle progeny succeed
To chase the rolling circle's speed,
Or urge the flying ball? 30

While some, on earnest business bent
Their murmuring labors ply
'Gainst graver hours, that bring constraint
To sweeten liberty;
Some bold adventurers disdain 35
The limits of their little reign,
And unknown regions dare descry;
Still as they run they look behind,
They hear a voice in every wind,
And snatch a fearful joy. 40

Gay Hope is theirs by Fancy fed,
Less pleasing when possessed;
The tear forgot as soon as shed,
The sunshine of the breast;
Theirs buxom health of rosy hue, 45
Wild wit, invention ever new,
And lively cheer of vigor born;
The thoughtless day, the easy night,
The spirits pure, the slumbers light,
That fly th' approach of morn. 50

Alas, regardless of their doom,
The little victims play!
No sense have they of ills to come,
Nor care beyond today:
Yet see how all around 'em wait 55
The Ministers of human fate,
And black Misfortune's baleful train!
Ah, show them where in ambush stand
To seize their prey the murd'rous band!
Ah, tell them, they are men! 60

These shall the fury Passions tear,
The vultures of the mind,
Disdainful Anger, pallid Fear,
And Shame that skulks behind;
Or pining Love shall waste their youth, 65
Or Jealousy with rankling tooth,
That inly gnaws the secret heart,
And Envy wan, and faded Care,
Grim-visaged comfortless Despair,
And Sorrow's piercing dart. 70

Ambition this shall tempt to rise,
Then whirl the wretch from high,
To bitter Scorn a sacrifice,
And grinning Infamy.

¹ Henry VI, who founded the college in 1440.

² Windsor Castle.

- The stings of Falsehood those shall try, 75
 And hard Unkindness' alter'd eye,
 That mocks the tear it forced to flow;
 And keen Remorse with blood defiled,
 And moody Madness laughing wild
 Amid severest woe. 80
- Lo, in the vale of years beneath
 A grisly troop are seen,
 The painful family of Death,
 More hideous than their Queen:
 This racks the joints, this fires the veins, 85
 That every laboring sinew strains,
 Those in the deeper vitals rage:
- Lo, Poverty, to fill the band,
 That numbs the soul with icy hand,
 And slow-consuming Age. 90
- To each his sufferings: all are men,
 Condemned alike to groan;
 The tender for another's pain,
 Th' unfeeling for his own.
 Yet ah! why should they know their fate? 95
 Since sorrow never comes too late,
 And happiness too swiftly flies.
 Thought would destroy their paradise.
 No more; where ignorance is bliss,
 'Tis folly to be wise. 100

OLIVER GOLDSMITH

The Deserted Village

- Sweet Auburn! loveliest village of the plain,
 Where health and plenty cheer'd the laboring
 swain,
 Where smiling spring its earliest visit paid,
 And parting summer's lingering blooms delay'd:
 Dear lovely bowers of innocence and ease, 5
 Seats of my youth, when every sport could please:
 How often have I loiter'd o'er thy green
 Where humble happiness endear'd each scene!
 How often have I paused on every charm,
 The shelter'd cot, the cultivated farm, 10
 The never failing brook, the busy mill,
 The decent church that topp'd the neighboring hill,
 The hawthorn bush, with seats beneath the shade,
 For talking age and whispering lovers made!
 How often have I bless'd the coming day, 15
 When toil remitting lent its turn to play,
 And all the village train, from labor free,
 Led up their sports beneath the spreading tree:
 While many a pastime circled in the shade,
 The young contending as the old survey'd; 20
 And many a gambol frolick'd o'er the ground,
 And sleights of art and feats of strength went round.
 And still, as each repeated pleasure tired,
- Succeeding sports the mirthful band inspired;
 The dancing pair that simply sought renown, 25
 By holding out to tire each other down;
 The swain mistrustless of his smutt'd face,
 While secret laughter titter'd round the place;
 The bashful virgin's sidelong looks of love,
 The matron's glance that would those looks re-
 prove. 30
 These were thy charms, sweet village! sports like these,
 With sweet succession taught e'en toil to please;
 These round thy bowers their cheerful influence
 shed,
 These were thy charms—but all these charms are fled. 35
 Sweet smiling village, loveliest of the lawn,
 Thy sports are fled, and all thy charms withdrawn;
 Amidst thy bowers the tyrant's hand is seen,
 And desolation saddens all thy green:
 One only master grasps the whole domain,
 And half a tillage stints thy smiling plain; 40
 No more thy glassy brook reflects the day,
 But choked with sedges works its weedy way;
 Along thy glades, a solitary guest,
 The hollow-sounding bittern guards its nest;
 Amidst thy desert walks the lapwing flies, 45

Goldsmith, The Deserted Village. Oliver Goldsmith was born in Ireland in 1728. After traveling as a vagabond over Europe, he settled in London as a literary hack. Here he became a friend of Johnson and his circle. He died in 1774.

And tires their echoes with unvaried cries.
Sunk are thy bowers in shapeless ruin all,
And the long grass o'ertops the moldering wall;
And, trembling, shrinking from the spoiler's hand,
Far, far away thy children leave the land. 50

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates, and men decay;
Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade;
A breath can make them, as a breath has made:
But a bold peasantry, their country's pride, 55
When once destroy'd, can never be supplied.

A time there was, ere England's griefs began,
When every rood of ground maintain'd its man;
For him light labor spread her wholesome store,
Just gave what life required, but gave no more:
His best companions, innocence and health, 61
And his best riches, ignorance of wealth.

But times are alter'd; trade's unfeeling train
Usurp the land, and dispossess the swain;
Along the lawn, where scatter'd hamlets rose, 65
Unwieldy wealth, and cumbrous pomp repose;
And every want to luxury allied,
And every pang that folly pays to pride.
Those gentle hours that plenty bade to bloom,
Those calm desires that ask'd but little room, 70
Those healthful sports that graced the peaceful scene,

Lived in each look, and brighten'd all the green;
These, far departing, seek a kinder shore,
And rural mirth and manners are no more.

Sweet Auburn! parent of the blissful hour, 75
Thy glades forlorn confess the tyrant's power.
Here, as I take my solitary rounds,
Amidst thy tangling walks and ruin'd grounds,
And, many a year elapsed, return to view
Where once the cottage stood, the hawthorn grew,
Remembrance wakes with all her busy train, 81
Swells at my breast, and turns the past to pain.

In all my wanderings round this world of care,
In all my griefs—and God has given my share—
I still had hopes, my latest hours to crown, 85
Amidst these humble bowers to lay me down;
To husband out life's taper at the close,
And keep the flame from wasting by repose:
I still had hopes, for pride attends us still,
Amidst the swains to show my book-learn'd skill,
Around my fire an evening group to draw, 91
And tell of all I felt, and all I saw;
And as a hare, whom hounds and horns pursue,
Pants to the place from whence at first she flew,
I still had hopes, my long vexations pass'd, 95
Here to return—and die at home at last.

O bless'd retirement, friend to life's decline,

Retreats from care, that never must be mine,
How bless'd is he who crowns, in shades like these,
A youth of labor with an age of ease; 100

Who quits a world where strong temptations try,
And, since 'tis hard to combat, learns to fly!

For him no wretches, born to work and weep,
Explore the mine, or tempt the dangerous deep;
No surly porter stands, in guilty state, 105

To spurn imploring famine from the gate;

But on he moves to meet his latter end,
Angels around befriending virtue's friend;

Sinks to the grave with unperceived decay,

While resignation gently slopes the way; 110

And, all his prospects brightening to the last,
His heaven commences ere the world be pass'd.

Sweet was the sound, when oft at evening's close
Up yonder hill the village murmur rose; 114

There, as I pass'd with careless steps and slow,
The mingling notes came soften'd from below;

The swain responsive as the milkmaid sung,
The sober herd that low'd to meet their young;

The noisy geese that gabbled o'er the pool,
The playful children just let loose from school,

The watch-dog's voice that bayed the whispering

wind, 121

And the loud laugh that spoke the vacant mind;

These all in sweet confusion sought the shade,

And fill'd each pause the nightingale had made.

But now the sounds of population fail, 125

No cheerful murmurs fluctuate in the gale,

No busy steps the grass-grown footway tread,

But all the bloomy flush of life is fled;

All but yon widow'd, solitary thing,

That feebly bends beside the plashy spring; 130

She, wretched matron, forced, in age, for bread,

To strip the brook with mantling cresses spread,

To pick her wintry faggot from the thorn,

To seek her nightly shed, and weep till morn;

She only left of all the harmless train, 135

The sad historian of the pensive plain.

Near yonder copse, where once the garden smiled,

And still where many a garden flower grows wild,

There, where a few torn shrubs the place disclose,

The village preacher's modest mansion rose. 140

A man he was to all the country dear,

And passing rich with forty pounds a year;

Remote from towns he ran his godly race,

Nor e'er had changed, nor wish'd to change his place;

Unskillful he to fawn, or seek for power, 145

By doctrines fashion'd to the varying hour;

Far other aims his heart had learn'd to prize,

More bent to raise the wretched than to rise.
 His house was known to all the vagrant train,
 He chid their wanderings, but relieved their pain;
 The long remember'd beggar was his guest, 151
 Whose beard descending swept his aged breast;
 The ruin'd spendthrift, now no longer proud,
 Claim'd kindred there, and had his claims allow'd;
 The broken soldier, kindly bade to stay, 155
 Sat by his fire, and talk'd the night away;
 Wept o'er his wounds, or, tales of sorrow done,
 Shoulder'd his crutch, and show'd how fields were won.

Pleased with his guests, the good man learn'd to glow,
 And quite forgot their vices in their woe; 160
 Careless their merits or their faults to scan,
 His pity gave ere charity began.

Thus to relieve the wretched was his pride,
 And e'en his failings lean'd to virtue's side;
 But in his duty prompt, at every call, 165
 He watch'd and wept, he pray'd and felt for all:
 And, as a bird each fond endearment tries
 To tempt its new-fledged offspring to the skies,
 He tried each art, reproved each dull delay,
 Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way. 170

Beside the bed where parting life was laid,
 And sorrow, guilt, and pain by turns dismay'd,
 The reverend champion stood. At his control
 Despair and anguish fled the struggling soul; 174
 Comfort came down the trembling wretch to raise,
 And his last faltering accents whisper'd praise.

At church, with meek and unaffected grace,
 His looks adorn'd the venerable place;
 Truth from his lips prevail'd with double sway,
 And fools, who came to scoff, remain'd to pray.
 The service pass'd, around the pious man, 181
 With steady zeal, each honest rustic ran:
 E'en children follow'd, with endearing wile,
 And pluck'd his gown, to share the good man's smile.

His ready smile a parent's warmth express'd, 185
 Their welfare pleased him, and their cares distress'd:

To them his heart, his love, his griefs were given,
 But all his serious thoughts had rest in heaven.
 As some tall cliff, that lifts its awful form,
 Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm,
 Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread, 191

Eternal sunshine settles on its head.

Beside yon straggling fence that skirts the way
 With blossom'd furze, unprofitably gay,
 There, in his noisy mansion, skill'd to rule, 195

The village master taught his little school:
 A man severe he was, and stern to view,
 I knew him well, and every truant knew;
 Well had the boding tremblers learn'd to trace 200
 The day's disasters in his morning face;
 Full well they laugh'd with counterfeited glee
 At all his jokes, for many a joke had he;
 Full well the busy whisper, circling round,
 Convey'd the dismal tidings when he frown'd;
 Yet he was kind, or if severe in aught, 205
 The love he bore to learning was in fault;
 The village all declared how much he knew,
 'Twas certain he could write and cipher too;
 Lands he could measure, terms and tides presage;
 And e'en the story ran that he could gauge: 210
 In arguing, too, the parson own'd his skill,
 For e'en though vanquish'd, he could argue still;
 While words of learned length and thundering sound

Amazed the gazing rustics ranged around; 214
 And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew
 That one small head could carry all he knew.

But pass'd is all his fame. The very spot,
 Where many a time he triumph'd, is forgot.
 Near yonder thorn, that lifts its head on high,
 Where once the signpost caught the passing eye, Low lies that house where nutbrown draughts inspired, 221

Where graybeard mirth and smiling toil retired,
 Where village statesmen talk'd with looks profound,

And news much older than their ale went round.
 Imagination fondly stoops to trace 225

The parlor splendors of that festive place;
 The whitewash'd wall, the nicely sanded floor,
 The varnish'd clock that click'd behind the door:
 The chest contrived a double debt to pay,
 A bed by night, a chest of drawers by day; 230
 The pictures placed for ornament and use,
 The twelve good rules, the royal game of goose;
 The hearth, except when winter chill'd the day,
 With aspen boughs, and flowers, and fennel gay;
 While broken teacups, wisely kept for show, 235
 Ranged o'er the chimney, glisten'd in a row.

Vain transitory splendors! could not all
 Reprieve the tottering mansion from its fall?
 Obscure it sinks, nor shall it more impart
 An hour's importance to the poor man's heart;
 Thither no more the peasant shall repair 241
 To sweet oblivion of his daily care;
 No more the farmer's news, the barber's tale,
 No more the woodman's ballad shall prevail; 244
 No more the smith his dusky brow shall clear,

Relax his ponderous strength, and lean to hear;
The host himself no longer shall be found
Careful to see the mantling bliss go round;
Nor the coy maid, half willing to be press'd,
Shall kiss the cup to pass it to the rest. 250

Yes! let the rich deride, the proud disdain,
These simple blessings of the lowly train;
To me more dear, congenial to my heart,
One native charm, than all the gloss of art;
Spontaneous joys, where Nature has its play, 255
The soul adopts, and owns their firstborn sway;
Lightly they frolic o'er the vacant mind,
Unenvied, unmolested, unconfined.

But the long pomp, the midnight masquerade,
With all the freaks of wanton wealth array'd, 260
In these, ere triflers half their wish obtain,
The toiling pleasure sickens into pain;
And, e'en while fashion's brightest arts decoy,
The heart distrusting asks, if this be joy?

Ye friends to truth, ye statesmen, who survey
The rich man's joys increase, the poor's decay, 266
'Tis yours to judge how wide the limits stand
Between a splendid and a happy land.
Proud swells the tide with loads of freighted ore,
And shouting Folly hails them from her shore; 270
Hoards e'en beyond the miser's wish abound,
And rich men flock from all the world around.
Yet count our gains. This wealth is but a name
That leaves our useful products still the same.
Not so the loss. The man of wealth and pride 275
Takes up a space that many poor supplied;
Space for his lake, his park's extended bounds,
Space for his horses, equipage, and hounds;
The robe that wraps his limbs in silken sloth
Has robb'd the neighboring fields of half their 280 growth;

His seat, where solitary sports are seen,
Indignant spurns the cottage from the green;
Around the world each needful product flies,
For all the luxuries the world supplies;
While thus the land, adorn'd for pleasure all, 285
In barren splendor feebly waits the fall.

As some fair female, unadorn'd and plain,
Secure to please while youth confirms her reign,
Slight every borrow'd charm that dress supplies,
Nor shares with art the triumph of her eyes; 290
But when those charms are pass'd, for charms are frail,

When time advances, and when lovers fail,
She then shines forth, solicitous to bless,
In all the glaring impotence of dress:
Thus fares the land, by luxury betray'd, 295
In nature's simplest charms at first array'd:

But verging to decline, its splendors rise,
Its vistas strike, its palaces surprise;
While, scourged by famine, from the smiling land
The mournful peasant leads his humble band; 300
And while he sinks, without one arm to save,
The country blooms—a garden and a grave.

Where then, ah! where shall poverty reside,
To 'scape the pressure of contiguous pride?
If to some common's fenceless limits stray'd, 305
He drives his flock to pick the scanty blade,
Those fenceless fields the sons of wealth divide,
And e'en the bare-worn common is denied.

If to the city sped—What waits him there?
To see profusion that he must not share; 310
To see ten thousand baneful arts combined
To pamper luxury, and thin mankind:
To see each joy the sons of pleasure know,
Extorted from his fellow-creatures' woe.
Here, while the courtier glitters in brocade, 315
There the pale artist plies the sickly trade;
Here, while the proud their long-drawn pomp display,

There the black gibbet glooms beside the way;
The dome where pleasure holds her midnight reign,

Here, richly deck'd, admits the gorgeous train; 320
Tumultuous grandeur crowds the blazing square,
The rattling chariots clash, the torches glare.
Sure scenes like these no troubles e'er annoy!
Sure these denote one universal joy!
Are these thy serious thoughts?—Ah, turn thine 325
eyes

Where the poor houseless shivering female lies:
She once, perhaps, in village plenty bless'd,
Has wept at tales of innocence distress'd;
Her modest looks the cottage might adorn, 329
Sweet as the primrose peeps beneath the thorn;
Now lost to all; her friends, her virtue fled,
Near her betrayer's door she lays her head,
And, pinch'd with cold, and shrinking from the shower,

With heavy heart, deploras that luckless hour,
When idly first, ambitious of the town, 335
She left her wheel and robes of country brown.

Do thine, sweet Auburn, thine, the loveliest train,
Do thy fair tribes participate her pain?
E'en now, perhaps, by cold and hunger led,
At proud men's doors they ask a little bread! 340

Ah, no. To distant climes, a dreary scene,
Where half the convex world intrudes between,
Through torrid tracts with fainting steps they go,
Where wild Altama murmurs to their woe.
Far different there from all that charm'd before,

The various terrors of that horrid shore; 346
 Those blazing suns that dart a downward ray,
 And fiercely shed intolerable day;
 Those matted woods where birds forget to sing,
 But silent bats in drowsy clusters cling; 350
 Those poisonous fields with rank luxuriance
 crown'd,

Where the dark scorpion gathers death around:
 Where at each step the stranger fears to wake
 The rattling terrors of the vengeful snake; 354
 Where crouching tigers wait their hapless prey,
 And savage men more murderous still than they:
 While oft in whirls the mad tornado flies,
 Mingling the ravaged landscape with the skies.
 Far different these from every former scene,
 The cooling brook, the grassy vested green, 360
 The breezy covert of the warbling grove,
 That only shelter'd thefts of harmless love.

Good Heaven! what sorrows gloom'd that parting day,

That call'd them from their native walks away;
 When the poor exiles, every pleasure pass'd, 365 Hung round the bowers, and fondly look'd their last,

And took a long farewell, and wish'd in vain
 For seats like these beyond the western main;
 And, shuddering still to face the distant deep,
 Return'd and wept, and still return'd to weep. 370
 The good old sire the first prepared to go,
 To new-found worlds, and wept for others' woe;
 But for himself, in conscious virtue brave,
 He only wish'd for worlds beyond the grave.
 His lovely daughter, lovelier in her tears, 375
 The fond companion of his helpless years,
 Silent went next, neglectful of her charms,
 And left a lover's for her father's arms.

With louder plaints the mother spoke her woes,
 And bless'd the cot where every pleasure rose; 380
 And kiss'd her thoughtless babes with many a tear,
 And clasp'd them close, in sorrow doubly dear;
 Whilst her fond husband strove to lend relief
 In all the silent manliness of grief.

O luxury! thou cursed by heaven's decree, 385
 How ill exchanged are things like these for thee!

How do thy potions, with insidious joy,
 Diffuse their pleasures only to destroy!
 Kingdoms by thee, to sickly greatness grown,
 Boast of a florid vigor not their own: 390
 At every draught more large and large they grow,
 A bloated mass of rank unwieldy woe;
 Till sapp'd their strength, and every part unsound,
 Down, down they sink, and spread a ruin round.

E'en now the devastation is begun, 395
 And half the business of destruction done;
 E'en now, methinks, as pondering here I stand,
 I see the rural virtues leave the land.

Down where yon anchoring vessel spreads the sail,
 That idly waiting flaps with every gale, 400
 Downward they move, a melancholy band,
 Pass from the shore, and darken all the strand.

Contented toil, and hospitable care,
 And kind connubial tenderness are there:
 And piety with wishes placed above, 405
 And steady loyalty, and faithful love.

And thou, sweet Poetry, 'thou loveliest maid,
 Still first to fly where sensual joys invade,
 Unfit in these degenerate times of shame,
 To catch the heart, or strike for honest fame; 410

Dear charming nymph, neglected and decried,
 My shame in crowds, my solitary pride;
 Thou source of all my bliss, and all my woe,
 That found'st me poor at first, and keep'st me so;
 Thou guide, by which the nobler arts excel, 415

Thou nurse of every virtue, fare thee well;
 Farewell! and O! where'er thy voice be tried,
 On Torno's cliffs, or Pambamarca's side,
 Whether where equinoctial fervors glow,
 Or winter wraps the polar world in snow, 420

Still let thy voice, prevailing over time,
 Redress the rigors of th' inclement clime;
 Aid slighted Truth with thy persuasive train;
 Teach erring man to spurn the rage of gain;
 Teach him, that states of native strength possess'd,
 Though very poor, may still be very bless'd; 426
 That trade's proud empire hastes to swift decay,
 As ocean sweeps the labor'd mole away;
 While self-dependent power can time defy,
 As rocks resist the billows and the sky. 430

THE ROMANTIC POETS

We have already observed how the regular classical poetry of the age of Pope continued well on to the end of the eighteenth century. But we have also seen, beginning as early as 1730, a new spirit manifesting itself. Since this new way of looking at life and of expressing it in art and letters came by the end of the eighteenth century to dominate English literature, it is important to look a little more closely at the nature of this Romantic Movement.

Some mention has already been made of the increased interest in the description of nature which began with Thomson's Seasons (1726). The romantic melancholy of the writers of "graveyard" poetry has been illustrated by the poems of Gray and Collins. These, however, were only two of the forces that were beginning to show themselves in the 1730's.

A whole series of related currents in the intellectual and spiritual life of England may be expressed by the term "sentimentalism." After a generation of repressed emotions, many people went to the opposite extreme of emotional excess. The new novels which began around 1740 were filled with highly sentimental scenes, and over these scenes even cultivated ladies and gentlemen wept unashamed. This opening up of the flood-gates of feeling for the reading public came at the same time as the great wave of religious enthusiasm caused by the preaching of the Wesleys and George Whitefield. Sentimentalism invaded the domain of scholarship as well. The literary student was no longer content with the well-assured excellence of the old Greek and Latin classics. He began to be fascinated by literatures which up to that time had not been thought worth the attention of scholars. The strangeness and mystery of Oriental tales, the rich imagery of the older Celtic poems and romances, the vigor and masculinity of the Norse hero stories came to him as something new and wonderful and opened up unexplored worlds for the imagination. The peoples who produced these literatures became immensely interesting and were endowed by those who were now first discovering them with a sentimental glamor. At the same time occurred a change in men's ideas towards the Middle Ages. Instead of being thought of as ages of darkness the medieval era now came to be fondly regarded as romantic. Poets interested themselves in gothic castles and cathedrals and stories of chivalry. The intervening centuries were a haze through which the romantic poet saw only pageantry and quaintness and bravery. Novelists delighted in evoking thrills of horror by tales of these olden times so filled with suggestions of the strange and marvelous.

The widened interest in mankind extended itself to primitive peoples. The American Indian, viewed from the safe distance of three thousand miles, became the noble savage and was imagined to possess all human virtues, unsullied by the blight of civilization. "Nature's simple way" came to be prescribed as the remedy for all ills of man or society.

THE ROMANTIC POETS

Largely through the influence of Rousseau, this idyllic view of primitive man was extended into a theory of the social contract, in which it was supposed that governments arose in this perfect primitive world through voluntary agreement. The only uncorrupted social state, therefore, was the democracy, where each man had a voice in government. For this aspect of the Romantic Movement the American Declaration of Independence is the political and Burns's A Man's a Man for A' That the passionate personal expression.

As the age of common sense spent its force, it gave way in some of the ablest writers to a manifestation of mysticism. These men sought to perceive reality, not through their ordinary senses, but by immediate revelation. Many of the poems of William Blake and some of those of Wordsworth attempt to bring these experiences to the reader. Even if the ordinary man finds himself unable to move with understanding in the rarefied atmosphere which these poets sometimes evoke, he will nevertheless often find that these mystical visions are filled with beauty and emotional intensity.

Many of the forces which we have mentioned had their practical issue in two great political and social upheavals towards the end of the eighteenth century. First, the American Revolution and later the French Revolution served to break up political and social patterns and seemed to prepare the way for a new world compacted of all the romantic dreams of the age. The young Wordsworth threw himself heart and soul into the French Revolution, though later its excesses drove him away in disgust. Some of his contemporaries, however, held firm by the democratic faith through the years of reaction that came at the beginning of the new century. They carried on the ideal and handed it down to the poets of the new Victorian age.

When we speak of the Romantic Revival we are usually thinking of the years 1798-1830. There is no doubt that much of the work of Robert Burns is in a very real sense "romantic." But the first declaration of new literary principles came in the Lyrical Ballads, first issued by Wordsworth and Coleridge in 1798. In this small volume we have some of the most characteristic poems of Wordsworth. The actors are of lowly station in life and the language is that of common man. The old artificialities of poetic diction are discarded. Wordsworth shows his romantic point of view when he finds the simplest peasant worthy of dramatic treatment and the highest wisdom issuing from the mouths of babes. It is from his recollections of early childhood that he receives his intimations of Immortality. And it is from the meadows and the woods that he comes to feel the presence of God.

The young Coleridge is also romantic. But his romanticism goes in the direction of the mysterious and the supernatural. The curse laid on the Ancient Mariner for his killing of the albatross and all the train of strange events that followed gave the poet an outlet for his exhaustive knowledge of rare books of travel and adventure, real and fancied. This quality of the wonder of far-off places and impossible realms is what makes that tantalizing fragment, Kubla Khan, a masterpiece of romantic imagination.

Well after the turn of the century a group of three writers came into prominence, Byron, Shelley, and Keats. Lord Byron, the eldest of the group, exercised a profound influence on European literature. Throughout his works several ideas are predominant. His poetry is mostly concerned, in one way or another, with himself. He was the romantic hero, at odds with the world and calling on all sympathetic readers to view what Matthew Arnold calls "the pageant of his bleeding heart." He had a very sincere love of human liberty, so that it is entirely fitting that he met his death helping the Greeks in their struggle for independence. In one way Byron was not a romanticist, for on occasion he could be a bitter satirist. Sometimes he even satirizes himself, for in such poems as Don Juan he could write a highly romantic song and then laugh at his own romanticism.

Such a feat would have been impossible for Shelley. He, too, calls on us to share his sufferings, but he is more of an idealist than Byron and is always perfectly sincere. He felt called on to reform the world, but his ideas, though strongly felt, were never thought through to any practical conclusions. He remained to the end the poet of the clouds and skies, and he wrote his greatest poetry when he could wander in spirit with the skylark or the wild west wind.

The third of our trio, the young John Keats, perhaps wrote greater poetry than either of his contemporaries. But he concerned himself little with problems or persons of his own day. In his short six years of poetic activity this youth, born over a livery stable and trained as a surgeon's apprentice, sought one thing only. That was beauty. "A thing of beauty," he says, "is a joy forever." Wherever he might find it, there he sought it. Without a word of Greek he has handed on to us as no other English poet has done the Greek sense of beauty in his Endymion and his Ode on a Grecian Urn. In like manner we find in his poems expressions of beauty from many other sources, the gorgeousness of old castles, the song of nightingales, and the many colors of autumn.

The most prominent literary form during the Romantic Movement was poetry, but it must not be forgotten that during this period two important novelists were at work. Jane Austen produced her remarkable series of studies of the upper middle classes in such novels as Pride and Prejudice and Emma. In her hands the novel became a faithful record of a society which she well knew. The other great novelist of her period began as a poet, writing romantic tales of Scotland. But soon Sir Walter Scott discovered that his greatest contributions were not to be more Lady of the Lake's but stirring romances which would re-create the glamor of ancient days. During the last twenty years before his death in 1832 he wrote a long series of novels which have maintained their interest through four generations.

ROBERT BURNS

Tam O'Shanter

When chapman billies¹ leave the street,
And drouthy neebors neebors meet;
As market-days are wearing late,
An' folk begin to tak the gate;
While we sit bousing at the nappy,

An' getting fou and unco happy,
We think na on the lang Scots miles,
The mosses, waters, slaps, and styles,
That lie between us and our hame,
Whare sits our sulky, sullen dame,
Gathering her brows like gathering storm,
Nursing her wrath to keep it warm.

10

Burns, Tam O'Shanter. Robert Burns (1759-1796) lived in Ayrshire as farmer and small official. Edinburgh received him enthusiastically upon the publication of his poems in 1786.

¹ Chapman billies (peddlers), drouthy (thirsty), tak the gate (take the road for home), nappy (strong ale), fou (full), unco (very).

This truth fand honest Tam O'Shanter,
As he frae Ayr ae night did canter (Auld Ayr, wham ne'er a town surpasses,
For honest men and bonie lasses).

15

As bees flee hame wi' lades o' treasure,
The minutes winged their way wi' pleasure;
Kings may be blest, but Tam was glorious,
O'er a' the ills o' life victorious!

55

O Tam! hadst thou but been sae wise,
As taen thy ain wife Kate's advice!
She tauld thee weel thou was a skellum,
A blethering, blustering, drunken blellum;²
That frae November till October,
Ae market-day thou was nae sober:
That ilka melder wi' the miller,³
Thou sat as lang as thou had siller;
That ev'ry naig was ca'd a shoe on;⁴
The smith an' thee gat roaring fou on;
That at the Lord's house, ev'n on Sunday,
Thou drank wi' Kirkton Jean till Monday.
She prophesied that, late or soon,
Thou would be found deep drowned in Doon,
Or caught wi' warlocks in the mirk;⁵
By Alloway's auld haunted kirk.

20

25

31

Ah, gentle dames! it gars me greet,⁶
To think how mony counsels sweet,
How mony lengthened, sage advices,
The husband frae the wife despises!

35

But pleasures are like poppies spread—
You seize the flow'r, its bloom is shed;
Or like the snow falls in the river,
A moment white—then melts forever;
Or like the borealis race,
That flit ere you can point their place;
Or like the rainbow's lovely form,
Evanishing amid the storm.—
Nae man can tether time nor tide;
The hour approaches Tam maun ride;
That hour, o' night's black arch the keystone,
That dreary hour he mounts his beast in;
And sic a night he taks the road in,
As ne'er poor sinner was abroad in.

60

65

70

The wind blew as 'twad blawn its last;
The rattling show'rs rose on the blast;
The speedy gleams the darkness swallowed;
Loud, deep, and lang the thunder bellowed;
That night, a child might understand,
The Deil had business on his hand.

75

But to our tale: Ae market night,
Tam had got planted unco right,
Fast by an ingle, bleezing finely,
Wi' reaming swats⁷ that drank divinely;
And at his elbow, Souter⁸ Johnny,
His ancient, trusty, drouthy crony—
Tam lo'ed him like a very brither;
They had been fou for weeks thegither.
The night drave on wi' sangs and clatter,
And aye the ale was growing better;
The landlady and Tam grew gracious,
Wi' favors secret, sweet, and precious;
The souter tauld his queerest stories;
The landlord's laugh was ready chorus.
The storm without might rair and rustle,
Tam did na mind the storm a whistle.

40

45

50

Weel mounted on his gray mare Meg—
A better never lifted leg—
Tam skelpit on thro' dub and mire,
Despising wind, and rain, and fire;
Whyles holding fast his guid blue bonnet,
Whyles crooning o'er some auld Scots sonnet,
Whyles glow'ring round wi' prudent cares,
Lest bogles catch him unawares—
Kirk-Alloway was drawing nigh,
Whare ghaists and houlets⁹ nightly cry.

80

85

By this time he was cross the ford,
Whare in the snaw the chapman smoored;¹⁰
And past the birks and meikle stane,
Whare drunken Charlie brak's neckbane;
And through the whins, and by the cairn,
Whare hunters fand the murdered bairn;
And near the thorn, aboon the well,
Whare Mungo's mither hanged hersel.

90

95

Care, mad to see a man sae happy,
E'en drowned himsel amang the nappy.

² Blabber.³ Each trip to the miller.⁴ Every time the horse was shod.⁵ Mirk (dark), kirk (church).⁶ It makes me weep.⁷ Creamy ale.⁸ Cobbler.⁹ Ghosts and owls.¹⁰ Smoored (smothered), birks (birches), meikle (great), stane (stone), whins (furze), cairn (pile of stone), bairn (child), aboon (above).

Before him Doon pours all his floods;
 The doubling storm roars through the woods;
 The lightnings flash from pole to pole;
 Near and more near the thunders roll; 100
 When, glimmering through the groaning trees,
 Kirk-Alloway seemed in a bleeze;
 Through ilka bore¹¹ the beams were glancing,
 And loud resounded mirth and dancing.

Inspiring bold John Barleycorn! 105
 What dangers thou canst make us scorn!
 Wi' tippenny, we fear nae evil;
 Wi' usquabae, we'll face the Devil!
 The swats sae reamed in Tammie's noddle,
 Fair play, he cared na deils a boddle.
 But Maggie stood, right sair astonished,
 Till, by the heel and hand admonished,
 She ventured forward on the light;
 And, wow! Tam saw an unco sight!

Warlocks and witches in a dance!
 Nae cotillion, brent new frae France,
 But hornpipes, jigs, strathspeys,¹² and reels
 Put life and mettle in their heels.
 A winnock-bunker in the east,
 There sat auld Nick, in shape o' beast,
 A towzie tyke, black, grim, and large;
 To gie them music was his charge.
 He screwed the pipes and gart them skirl,
 Till roof and rafters a' did dirl.
 Coffins stood round, like open presses,
 That shawed the dead in their last dresses;
 And by some devilish cantraip sleight,
 Each in its cauld hand held a light,
 By which heroic Tam was able
 To note upon the haly table,
 A murderer's banes in gibbet airns;
 Twa span-lang, wee, unchristened bairns;
 A thief, new-cutted frae the rape,
 Wi' his last gasp his gab did gape;
 Five tomahawks, wi' bluid red-rusted;
 Five scymitars, wi' murder crusted;
 A garter which a babe had strangled;
 A knife, a father's throat had mangled,

Whom his ain son o' life bereft—
 The gray hairs yet stack to the heft; 140
 Wi' mair of horrible and awfu',
 Which ev'n to name wad be unlawfu'.

As Tammie glowered, amazed and curious,
 The mirth and fun grew fast and furious.
 The piper loud and louder blew; 145
 The dancers quick and quicker flew;
 They reeled, they set, they crossed, they cleekit,
 Till ilka carlin swat and reekit,¹³
 And coost her duddies to the wark,
 And linket at it in her sark! 150

Now Tam, O Tam! had thae been queans,
 A' plump and strapping in their teens,
 Their sarks, instead o' creeshie flannen,
 Been snaw-white seventeen hunder linen!
 Thir breeks¹⁴ o' mine, my only pair, 155
 That ance were plush, o' guid blue hair,
 I wad hae gi'en them off my hurdies,
 For ae blink o' the bonie burdies!
 But withered beldams, auld and droll,
 Rigwoodie hags wad spean a foal, 160
 Louping an' flinging on a crummock,
 I wonder did na turn thy stomach.

But Tam kend what was what fu' brawlie;
 There was ae winsome wench and wawlie,
 That night enlisted in the core, 165
 Lang after kend on Carrick shore
 (For mony a beast to dead she shot,
 And perished mony a bonie boat,
 And shook baith meikle corn and bear,
 And kept the country-side in fear). 170
 Her cutty sark, o' Paisley harn,
 That while a lassie she had worn,
 In longitude though sorely scanty,
 It was her best, and she was vauntie.
 Ah! little kend thy reverend grannie, 175
 That sark she coft¹⁵ for her wee Nannie,
 Wi' twa pund Scots ('twas a' her riches),
 Wad ever graced a dance of witches!

¹¹ Bore (opening), tippenny (twopenny), usquabae (whiskey), swats sae reamed (ale so foamed), unco (awful).

¹² Strathspeys (a Scotch dance), winnock-bunker (window seat), towzie tyke (shaggy cur), pipes (bagpipes), gart them skirl (make them scream), dirl (vibrate), cantraip sleight (magical contrivance), rape (rope).

¹³ Ilka carlin swat and reekit (every old woman sweated and steamed), coost her duddies (cast off her clothes), sark (shirt).

¹⁴ Breeks (breeches), hurdies (hips), burdies (girls), rigwoodie (withered), louping (leaping), crummock (a cane), wawlie (large).

¹⁵ Coft (bought), twa pund Scots (two Scotch pounds, about one dollar), first ae caper, syne anither (first one caper, then another).

Mary Morison

But here my Muse her wing maun cour;
 Sic flights are far beyond her power; 180
 To sing how Nannie lap and flang
 (A souple jade she was and strang),
 And how Tam stood, like ane bewitched,
 And thought his very een enriched;
 Even Satan glowered, and fidget fu' fain, 185
 And hotched and blew wi' might and main
 Till first ae caper, syne anither,
 Tam tint his reason a' thegither,
 And roars out, "Weel done, Cutty sark!"
 And in an instant all was dark; 190
 And scarcely had he Maggie rallied,
 When out the hellish legion sallied.

As bees bizz out wi' angry fyke,
 When plundering herds assail their byke;
 As open pussie's mortal foes, 195
 When, pop! she starts before their nose;
 As eager runs the market-crowd,
 When "Catch the thief!" resounds aloud,
 So Maggie runs, the witches follow,
 Wi' mony an eldritch skriech and hollow. 200

Ah, Tam! ah, Tam! thou'll get thy fairin'
 In hell they'll roast thee like a herrin'
 In vain thy Kate awaits thy comin'
 Kate soon will be a woefu' woman!
 Now, do thy speedy utmost, Meg, 205
 And win the key-stane of the brig;¹⁶
 There, at them thou thy tail may toss—
 A running stream they dare na cross;
 But ere the key-stane she could make,
 The fient a tail she had to shake! 210
 For Nannie, far before the rest,
 Hard upon noble Maggie pressed,
 And flew at Tam wi' furious ettle;
 But little wist she Maggie's mettle!
 Ae spring brought off her master hale, 215
 But left behind her ain gray tail.
 The carlin clautht her by the rump,
 And left poor Maggie scarce a stump.

Now, wha this tale o' truth shall read,
 Ilk man and mother's son take heed: 220
 Whene'er to drink you are inclined,
 Or cutty sarks run in your mind,
 Think, ye may buy the joys o'er dear;
 Remember Tam O'Shanter's mare.

O Mary, at thy window be,
 It is the wished, the trysted hour!
 Those smiles and glances let me see,
 That make the miser's treasure poor.
 How blithely wad I bide the stoure, 5
 A weary slave frae sun to sun,
 Could I the rich reward secure,
 The lovely Mary Morison.

Yestreen, when to the trembling string
 The dance gaed through the lighted ha', 10
 To thee my fancy took its wing,
 I sat, but neither heard nor saw.
 Tho' this was fair, and that was braw,
 And yon the toast of a' the town,
 I sighed, and said amang them a': 15
 "Ye are na Mary Morison."

O Mary, canst thou wreck his peace,
 Wha for thy sake wad gladly die?
 Or canst thou break that heart of his,
 Whase only faut is loving thee? 20
 If love for love thou wilt na gie,
 At least be pity to me shown;
 A thought ungente canna be
 The thought o' Mary Morison.

To a Mouse

ON TURNING HER UP IN HER NEST WITH THE PLOW, NOVEMBER, 1785

Wee, sleekit,¹ cow'rin', tim'rous beastie,
 Oh, what a panic's in thy breastie!
 Thou needna start awa' sae hasty,
 Wi' bickerin' brattle!
 I wad be laith to rin and chase thee 5
 Wi' murd'ring pattle!

I'm truly sorry man's dominion
 Has broken Nature's social union,
 An' justifies that ill opinion,
 Which makes thee startle 10
 At me, thy poor earthborn companion,
 An' fellow-mortal!

I doubtna, whiles,² but thou mayst thieve;
 What then? poor beastie, thou maun live!

¹⁶ Key-stane of the brig (key-stone of the bridge).

¹ Sleekit (sleek), bickerin' brattle (hurrying clatter), laith (loath), pattle (plow-spade).

² Whiles (sometimes), maun (must), daimen icker in a thrave (occasional ear in twenty-four sheaves),
 'a' (rest).

A daimen icker in a thrave 15
 'S a sma' request:
 I'll get a blessin' wi' the lave,
 And never miss't!

Thy wee bit housie, too, in ruin!
 Its silly wa's the win's are strewin'! 20
 And naething now to big¹ a new ane
 O' foggage green!
 An' bleak December's winds ensuin',
 Baith snell an' keen!

Thou saw the fields laid bare an' waste, 25
 An' weary winter comin' fast,
 An' cozie here, beneath the blast,
 Thou thought to dwell,
 Till, crash! the cruel coulter passed
 Out through thy cell. 30

That wee-bit heap o' leaves an' stibble
 Hast cost thee monie a weary nibble!
 Now thou's turned out for a' thy trouble,
 But² house or hald,
 To thole the winter's sleety dribble, 35
 And cranreuch cauld!

But, Mousie, thou art no thy lane,
 In proving foresight may be vain:
 The best laid schemes o' mice an' men
 Gang aft a-gley, 40
 An' lea'e us nought but grief and pain,
 For promised joy.

Still thou art blest, compared wi' me!
 The present only toucheth thee:
 But, och! I backward cast my e'e 45
 On prospects drear!
 An' forward, though I canna see,
 I guess an' fear.

A Red, Red Rose

O my Luve's like a red, red rose
 That's newly sprung in June;
 O my Luve's like the melodie
 That's sweetly played in tune!

So fair art thou, my bonnie lass, 5
 So deep in luve am I;

And I will luve thee still, my dear,
 Till a' the seas gang dry—

Till a' the seas gang dry, my dear,
 And the rocks melt wi' the sun; 10
 I will luve thee still, my dear,
 While the sands o' life shall run.

And fare thee weel, my only Luve,
 And fare thee weel a while!
 And I will come again, my Luve, 15
 Though it were ten thousand mile.

My Jean

Of a' the airts³ the wind can blaw,
 I dearly like the west,
 For there the bonnie lassie lives,
 The lassie I lo'e best.
 There wild woods grow, and rivers row, 5
 And monie a hill between;
 But day and night my fancy's flight
 Is ever wi' my Jean.

I see her in the dewy flowers,
 I see her sweet and fair. 10
 I hear her in the tunefu' birds,
 I hear her charm the air.
 There's not a bonnie flower that springs
 By fountain, shaw, or green;
 There's not a bonnie bird that sings, 15
 But minds me o' my Jean.

Auld Lang Syne

Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
 And never brought to min'?
 Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
 And auld lang syne? ⁴

Chorus.—For auld lang syne, my dear, 5
 For auld lang syne,
 We'll tak a cup o' kindness yet
 For auld lang syne.

We twa hae run about the braes,
 And pu'd the gowans⁵ fine; 10
 But we've wandered monie a weary fit
 Sin' auld lang syne.

For auld, etc.

¹ Big (build), foggage (grass), snell (sharp).

² But (without), thole (endure), cranreuch (cold frost), a-gley (away).

³ Airts (directions).

⁴ Old long ago.

⁵ Gowans (daisies).

We twa hae paidl't i' the burn,¹
 Frae mornin' sun til dine;
 But seas between us braid hae roared
 Sin' auld lang syne.

For auld, etc.

And there's a hand, my trusty fiere,²
 And gie's a hand o' thine;
 And we'll tak a right guid-willie waught
 For auld lang syne!

For auld, etc.

And surely ye'll be your pint-stowp,
 And surely I'll be mine;
 And we'll tak a cup o' kindness yet
 For auld lang syne.

For auld, etc.

John Anderson, My Jo, John

John Anderson, my jo, John,
 When we were first acquent,
 Your locks were like the raven,
 Your bonnie brow was brent;
 But now your brow is beld, John,
 Your locks are like the snow;
 But blessings on your frosty pow,
 John Anderson, my jo!

John Anderson, my jo, John,
 We clamb the hill thegither;
 And monie a canty day, John,
 We've had wi' ane anither.
 Now we maun totter down, John,
 And hand in hand we'll go,
 And sleep thegither at the foot,
 John Anderson, my jo.

To Mary in Heaven

Thou ling'ring star, with less'ning ray,
 That lov'st to greet the early morn,
 Again thou usher'st in the day
 My Mary from my soul was torn.
 O Mary! dear departed shade!
 Where is thy place of blissful rest?
 See'st thou thy lover lowly laid?
 Hear'st thou the groans that rend his breast?

That sacred hour can I forget,
 Can I forget the hallowed grove,

Where by the winding Ayr we met
 To live one day of parting love?
 Eternity will not efface
 Those records dear of transports past,
 Thy image at our last embrace—
 Ah! little thought we 'twas our last!

Ayr, gurgling, kissed his pebbled shore,
 O'erhung with wild woods, thick'ning green;
 The fragrant birch and hawthorn hoar
 Twined amorous round the raptured scene.
 The flow'rs sprang wanton to be prest,
 The birds sang love on every spray,
 Till too, too soon the glowing west
 Proclaimed the speed of wingéd day.

Still o'er these scenes my mem'ry wakes,
 And fondly broods with miser care!
 Time but th' impression stronger makes,
 As streams their channels deeper wear.
 My Mary, dear departed shade!
 Where is thy place of blissful rest?
 See'st thou thy lover lowly laid?
 Hear'st thou the groans that rend his breast?

Ae Fond Kiss

Ae fond kiss, and then we sever;
 Ae fareweel, alas, forever!
 Deep in heart-wrung tears I'll pledge thee;
 Warring sighs and groans I'll wage thee!

Who shall say that Fortune grieves him
 While the star of hope she leaves him?
 Me, nae cheerfu' twinkle lights me;
 Dark despair around benights me.

I'll ne'er blame my partial fancy;
 Naething could resist my Nancy;
 But to see her was to love her,
 Love but her, and love forever.

Had we never loved sae kindly,
 Had we never loved sae blindly,
 Never met—or never parted,
 We had ne'er been broken-hearted.

Fare thee weel, thou first and fairest!
 Fare thee weel, thou best and dearest!
 Thine be ilka joy and treasure,
 Peace, enjoyment, love, and pleasure!

¹ Burn (brook), dine (dinner time), braid (broad).

² Fiere (companion), guid-willie waught (friendly big drink).

Ae fond kiss, and then we sever!
 Ae fareweel, alas, forever!
 Deep in heart-wrung tears I'll pledge thee;
 Warring sighs and groans I'll wage thee!

The Banks o' Doon

Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon,
 How can ye bloom sae fresh and fair?
 How can ye chant, ye little birds,
 And I sae weary fu' o' care?
 Thou'lt break my heart, thou warbling bird, 5
 That wantons through the flowering thorn;
 Thou minds me o' departed joys,
 Departed never to return.

Aft hae I roved by bonnie Doon,
 To see the rose and woodbine twine; 10
 And ilka bird sang o' its love,
 And fondly sae did I o' mine.
 Wi' lightsome heart I pu'd a rose,
 Fu' sweet upon its thorny tree;
 And my fause lover staw my rose, 15
 But ah! he left the thorn wi' me.

Highland Mary

Ye banks and braes and streams around
 The castle o' Montgomery,
 Green be your woods, and fair your flowers,
 Your waters never drumlie!
 There simmer first unfauld her robes, 5
 And there the langest tarry;
 For there I took the last fareweel
 O' my sweet Highland Mary.

How sweetly bloomed the gay green birk,
 How rich the hawthorn's blossom, 10
 As underneath their fragrant shade
 I clasped her to my bosom!
 The golden hours on angel wings
 Flew o'er me and my dearie;
 For dear to me as light and life 15
 Was my sweet Highland Mary.

Wi' monie a vow and locked embrace
 Our parting was fu' tender;
 And, pledging aft to meet again,
 We tore ourselves asunder; 20
 But oh! fell Death's untimely frost,
 That nipped my flower sae early!
 Now green's the sod, and cauld's the clay,
 That wraps my Highland Mary!

O pale, pale now, those rosy lips 25
 I aft hae kissed sae fondly!
 And closed for aye the sparkling glance
 That dwelt on me sae kindly!
 And mold'ring now in silent dust,
 That heart that lo'ed me dearly! 30
 But still within my bosom's core
 Shall live my Highland Mary.

Scots, Wha Hae

Scots, wha hae wi' Wallace bled,
 Scots, wham Bruce has aften led,
 Welcome to your gory bed,
 Or to victory! 5
 Now's the day, and now's the hour;
 See the front o' battle lour;
 See approach proud Edward's power—
 Chains and slavery!

Wha will be a traitor knave?
 Wha can fill a coward's grave? 10
 Wha sae base as be a slave?
 Let him turn and flee!
 Wha for Scotland's king and law
 Freedom's sword will strongly draw,
 Freeman stand, or Freeman fa', 15
 Let him follow me!

By oppression's woes and pains
 By your sons in servile chains!
 We will drain our dearest veins,
 But they shall be free! 20
 Lay the proud usurpers low!
 Tyrants fall in every foe!
 Liberty's in every blow!—
 Let us do or die!

A Man's a Man for A' That

Is there, for honest poverty,
 That hings his head, an' a' that?
 The coward slave, we pass him by,
 We dare be poor for a' that! 5
 For a' that, an' a' that,
 Our toils obscure, an' a' that;
 The rank is but the guinea's stamp;
 The man's the gowd¹ for a' that.

What though on hamely fare we dine,
 Wear hoddie-gray, an' a' that; 10
 Gie fools their silks, and knaves their wine,

¹ Gowd (gold).

A man's a man for a' that.
 For a' that, an' a' that,
 Their tinsel show, an' a' that;
 The honest man, though e'er sae poor, 15
 Is king o' men for a' that.

Ye see yon birkie, ca'd a lord,
 Wha struts, an' stares, an' a' that;
 Though hundreds worship at his word,
 He's but a coof for a' that. 20
 For a' that, an' a' that,
 His riband, star, an' a' that,
 The man o' independent mind,
 He looks and laughs at a' that.

A prince can mak a belted knight, 25
 A marquis, duke, an' a' that;
 But an honest man's aboon his might,
 Guid faith he mauna fa' that! ²
 For a' that, an' a' that,
 Their dignities, an' a' that, 30
 The pith o' sense, an' pride o' worth,
 Are higher rank than a' that.

Then let us pray that come it may,
 As come it will for a' that,
 That sense and worth, o'er a' the earth, 35

May bear the gree,³ an' a' that.
 For a' that, an' a' that,
 It's coming yet, for a' that,
 That man to man, the warld o'er,
 Shall brothers be for a' that. 40

O Wert Thou in the Cauld Blast

O wert thou in the cauld blast,
 On yonder lea, on yonder lea,
 My plaidie to the angry airt,
 I'd shelter thee, I'd shelter thee;
 Or did misfortune's bitter storms 5
 Around thee blaw, around thee blaw,
 Thy bield should be my bosom,
 To share it a', to share it a'.

Or were I in the wildest waste,
 Sae black and bare, sae black and bare, 10
 The desert were a paradise
 If thou wert there, if thou wert there;
 Or were I monarch o' the globe,
 Wi' thee to reign, wi' thee to reign,
 The brightest jewel in my crown 15
 Wad be my queen, wad be my queen.

WILLIAM BLAKE

To the Muses

Whether on Ida's shady brow
 Or in the chambers of the East,
 The chambers of the sun, that now
 From ancient melody have ceased;
 Whether in heaven ye wander fair, 5
 Or the green corners of the earth,
 Or the blue regions of the air
 Where the melodious winds have birth;

Whether on crystal rocks ye rove,
 Beneath the bosom of the sea, 10
 Wandering in many a coral grove,
 Fair Nine, forsaking Poetry—

How have you left the ancient love
 That bards of old enjoyed in you!

² He must not claim that.

³ Prize.

Blake, To the Muses. William Blake (1757-1827) was of almost equal importance as poet, engraver, and painter. He engraved many of his own poems. He lived in London.

The languid strings do scarcely move; 15
 The sound is forced, the notes are few.

Introduction to Songs of Innocence

Piping down the valleys wild,
 Piping songs of pleasant glee,
 On a cloud I saw a child,
 And he laughing said to me:

"Pipe a song about a Lamb!" 5
 So I piped with merry cheer.
 "Piper, pipe that song again";
 So I piped. He wept to hear.

"Drop thy pipe, thy happy pipe;
 Sing thy songs of happy cheer!" 10
 So I sung the same again,
 While he wept with joy to hear.

"Piper, sit thee down and write
In a book that all may read."
So he vanished from my sight;
And I plucked a hollow reed,

15

And I made a rural pen,
And I stained the water clear,
And I wrote my happy songs
Every child may joy to hear.

20

The Lamb

Little Lamb, who made thee?
Dost thou know who made thee?
Gave thee life and bid thee feed
By the stream and o'er the mead;
Gave thee clothing of delight,
Softest clothing, woolly, bright;
Gave thee such a tender voice,
Making all the vales rejoice?
Little Lamb, who made thee?
Dost thou know who made thee?

5

10

Little Lamb, I'll tell thee;
Little Lamb, I'll tell thee:
He is called by thy name,
For he calls himself a Lamb.
He is meek, and he is mild;
He became a little child.
I a child, and thou a lamb,
We are called by his name.
Little Lamb, God bless thee!
Little Lamb, God bless thee!

15

20

The Tiger

Tiger! tiger! burning bright
In the forests of the night,

What immortal hand or eye
Could frame thy fearful symmetry?

In what distant deeps or skies
Burned the fire of thine eyes?
On what wings dare he aspire?
What the hand dare seize the fire?

5

And what shoulder, and what art,
Could twist the sinews of thy heart?
And when thy heart began to beat,
What dread hand? and what dread feet?

10

What the hammer? what the chain?
In what furnace was thy brain?
What the anvil? what dread grasp
Dare its deadly terrors clasp?

15

When the stars threw down their spears
And watered heaven with their tears,
Did he smile his work to see?
Did he who made the Lamb make thee?

20

Tiger! tiger! burning bright
In the forests of the night,
What immortal hand or eye
Dare frame thy fearful symmetry?

Ah, Sunflower

Ah, Sunflower! weary of time,
Who countest the steps of the sun,
Seeking after that sweet golden clime
Where the traveler's journey is done—

Where the youth pined away with desire,
And the pale virgin, shrouded in snow,
Arise from their graves, and aspire
Where my sunflower wishes to go!

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH

Lines

COMPOSED A FEW MILES ABOVE TINTERN ABBEY, ON REVISITING THE BANKS OF THE WYE DURING
A TOUR JULY 13, 1798

Five years have passed; five summers, with the length

Of five long winters! and again I hear
These waters, rolling from their mountain springs
With a soft inland murmur.—Once again
Do I behold these steep and lofty cliffs,
That on a wild, secluded scene impress
Thoughts of more deep seclusion; and connect
The landscape with the quiet of the sky.

5

Wordsworth, Tintern Abbey. William Wordsworth (1770-1850) passed much of his life in the Lake District of Northern England, where he was born. He was educated at Cambridge and lived for a time in Somersetshire near Coleridge, with whom he published Lyrical Ballads in 1798.

The day is come when I again repose
 Here, under this dark sycamore, and view 10
 These plots of cottage-ground, these orchard-tufts,
 Which at this season, with their unripe fruits,
 Are clad in one green hue, and lose themselves
 'Mid groves and copses. Once again I see
 These hedgerows, hardly hedgerows, little lines 15
 Of sportive wood run wild; these pastoral farms,
 Green to the very door; and wreaths of smoke
 Sent up, in silence, from among the trees!
 With some uncertain notice, as might seem
 Of vagrant dwellers in the houseless woods, 20
 Or of some hermit's cave, where by his fire
 The hermit sits alone.

These beauteous forms,
 Through a long absence, have not been to me
 As is a landscape to a blind man's eye;
 But oft, in lonely rooms, and 'mid the din 25
 Of towns and cities, I have owed to them
 In hours of weariness, sensations sweet,
 Felt in the blood, and felt along the heart;
 And passing even into my purer mind,
 With tranquil restoration—feelings, too, 30
 Of unremembered pleasure; such, perhaps,
 As have no slight or trivial influence
 On that best portion of a good man's life,
 His little, nameless, unremembered acts
 Of kindness and of love. Nor less, I trust, 35
 To them I may have owed another gift,
 Of aspect more sublime; that blessed mood,
 In which the burthen of the mystery,
 In which the heavy and the weary weight
 Of all this unintelligible world, 40
 Is lightened—that serene and blessed mood
 In which the affections gently lead us on—
 Until, the breath of this corporeal frame
 And even the motion of our human blood
 Almost suspended, we are laid asleep 45
 In body, and become a living soul;
 While with an eye made quiet by the power
 Of harmony, and the deep power of joy,
 We see into the life of things.

If this
 Be but a vain belief, yet, oh! how oft— 50
 In darkness and amid the many shapes
 Of joyless daylight; when the fretful stir
 Unprofitable, and the fever of the world,
 Have hung upon the beatings of my heart—
 How oft, in spirit, have I turned to thee, 55
 O silvan Wye! thou wanderer through the woods,
 How often has my spirit turned to thee!
 And now, with gleams of half-extinguished
 thought,

With many recognitions dim and faint,
 And somewhat of a sad perplexity, 60
 The picture of the mind revives again;
 While here I stand, not only with the sense
 Of present pleasure, but with pleasing thoughts
 That in this moment there is life and food
 For future years. And so I dare to hope, 65 Though changed, no doubt, from what I was when first

I came among these hills; when like a roe
 I bounded o'er the mountains, by the sides
 Of the deep rivers, and the lonely streams,
 Wherever Nature led; more like a man 70
 Flying from something that he dreads, than one
 Who sought the thing he loved. For nature then (The coarser pleasures of my boyish days,
 And their glad animal movements all gone by)
 To me was all in all.—I cannot paint 75
 What then I was. The sounding cataract
 Haunted me like a passion; the tall rock,
 The mountain, and the deep and gloomy wood,
 Their colors and their forms, were then to me 80
 An appetite; a feeling and a love,
 That had no need of a remoter charm,
 By thought supplied, nor any interest
 Unborrowed from the eye.—That time is past,
 And all its aching joys are now no more, 85
 And all its dizzy raptures. Not for this
 Faint I, nor mourn, nor murmur; other gifts
 Have followed; for such loss, I would believe,
 Abundant recompense. For I have learned
 To look on Nature, not as in the hour 90
 Of thoughtless youth; but hearing oftentimes
 The still, sad music of humanity,
 Nor harsh nor grating, though of ample power
 To chasten and subdue. And I have felt 95
 A presence that disturbs me with the joy
 Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
 Of something far more deeply interfused,
 Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
 And the round ocean and the living air,
 And the blue sky, and in the mind of man;
 A motion and a spirit, that impels 100
 All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
 And rolls through all things. Therefore am I still
 A lover of the meadows and the woods,
 And mountains; and of all that we behold
 From this green earth; of all the mighty world 105
 Of eye, and ear—both what they half create,
 And what perceive; well pleased to recognize
 In Nature and the language of the sense,
 The anchor of my purest thoughts, the nurse,

The guide, the guardian of my heart, and soul 110
Of all my moral being.

Nor perchance,
If I were not thus taught, should I the more
Suffer my genial spirits to decay;
For thou art with me here upon the banks
Of this fair river; thou my dearest friend, 115
My dear, dear friend; and in thy voice I catch
The language of my former heart, and read
My former pleasures in the shooting lights
Of thy wild eyes. Oh! yet a little while
May I behold in thee what I was once, 120
My dear, dear sister! and this prayer I make,
Knowing that Nature never did betray
The heart that loved her; 'tis her privilege,
Through all the years of this our life, to lead
From joy to joy; for she can so inform 125
The mind that is within us, so impress
With quietness and beauty, and so feed
With lofty thoughts, that neither evil tongues,
Rash judgments, nor the sneers of selfish men,
Nor greetings where no kindness is, nor all 130
The dreary intercourse of daily life,
Shall e'er prevail against us, or disturb
Our cheerful faith that all which we behold
Is full of blessings. Therefore let the moon Shine on thee in thy solitary walk; 135
And let the misty mountain-winds be free
To blow against thee; and in after years,
When these wild ecstasies shall be matured
Into a sober pleasure; when thy mind
Shall be a mansion for all lovely forms, 140
Thy memory be as a dwelling-place
For all sweet sounds and harmonies; oh! then,
If solitude, or fear, or pain, or grief,
Should be thy portion, with what healing thoughts
Of tender joy wilt thou remember me, 145
And these my exhortations! Nor, perchance—
If I should be where I no more can hear Thy voice, nor catch from thy wild eyes these gleams

Of past existence—wilt thou then forget
That on the banks of this delightful stream 150
We stood together; and that I, so long
A worshiper of Nature, hither came Unwearied in that service; rather say
With warmer love—oh! with far deeper zeal
Of holier love. Nor wilt thou then forget 155
That after many wanderings, many years
Of absence, these steep woods and lofty cliffs,
And this green pastoral landscape, were to me
More dear, both for themselves and for thy sake!

She Dwelt Among the Untrodden Ways

She dwelt among the untrodden ways
Beside the springs of Dove,
A maid whom there were none to praise
And very few to love;

A violet by a mossy stone 5
Half hidden from the eye!
Fair as a star, when only one
Is shining in the sky.

She lived unknown, and few could know 10
When Lucy ceased to be;
But she is in her grave, and, oh!
The difference to me!

I Traveled Among Unknown Men

I traveled among unknown men,
In lands beyond the sea;
Nor, England! did I know till then
What love I bore to thee.

'Tis past, that melancholy dream! 5
Nor will I quit thy shore
A second time; for still I seem
To love thee more and more.

Among thy mountains did I feel 10
The joy of my desire;
And she I cherished turned her wheel
Beside an English fire.

Thy mornings showed, thy nights concealed,
The bowers where Lucy played;
And thine, too, is the last green field 15
That Lucy's eyes surveyed.

Three Years She Grew in Sun and Shower

Three years she grew in sun and shower.
Then Nature said, "A lovelier flower
On earth was never sown;
This child I to myself will take;
She shall be mine, and I will make 5
A lady of my own.

"Myself will to my darling be
Both law and impulse; and with me
The girl, in rock and plain,
In earth and heaven, in glade and bower, 10
Shall feel an overseeing power
To kindle or restrain.

"She shall be sportive as the fawn
 That wild with glee across the lawn
 Or up the mountain springs; 15
 And hers shall be the breathing balm,
 And hers the silence and the calm
 Of mute, insensate things.

"The floating clouds their state shall lend
 To her; for her the willow bend; 20
 Nor shall she fail to see,
 Even in the motions of the storm,
 Grace that shall mold the maiden's form
 By silent sympathy.

"The stars of midnight shall be dear 25
 To her; and she shall lean her ear
 In many a secret place
 Where rivulets dance their wayward round,
 And beauty born of murmuring sound
 Shall pass into her face. 30

"And vital feelings of delight
 Shall rear her form to stately height,
 Her virgin bosom swell;
 Such thoughts to Lucy I will give While she and I together live 35
 Here in this happy dell."

Thus Nature spake.—The work was done.—
 How soon my Lucy's race was run!
 She died, and left to me
 This heath, this calm and quiet scene; 40
 The memory of what has been,
 And never more will be.

A Slumber Did My Spirit Seal

A slumber did my spirit seal;
 I had no human fears—
 She seemed a thing that could not feel
 The touch of earthly years.

No motion has she now, no force;
 She neither hears nor sees;
 Rolled round in earth's diurnal course,
 With rocks, and stones, and trees.

My Heart Leaps Up When I Behold

My heart leaps up when I behold
 A rainbow in the sky.
 So was it when my life began;
 So is it now I am a man;

So be it when I shall grow old,
 Or let me die!
 The Child is father of the Man;
 And I could wish my days to be
 Bound each to each by natural piety.

Composed upon Westminster Bridge, Sept. 3, 1802

Earth has not anything to show more fair;
 Dull would he be of soul who could pass by
 A sight so touching in its majesty:
 This city now doth like a garment wear
 The beauty of the morning; silent, bare, 5
 Ships, towers, domes, theaters, and temples lie
 Open unto the fields, and to the sky;
 All bright and glittering in the smokeless air.
 Never did sun more beautifully steep
 In his first splendour valley, rock, or hill; 10
 Ne'er saw I, never felt, a calm so deep!
 The river glideth at his own sweet will.
 Dear God! the very houses seem asleep;
 And all that mighty heart is lying still!

Composed by the Seaside near Calais, August, 1802

Fair Star of evening, Splendor of the west,
 Star of my country!—on the horizon's brink
 Thou hangest, stooping, as might seem, to sink
 On England's bosom; yet well pleased to rest, 5
 Meanwhile, and be to her a glorious crest
 Conspicuous to the nations. Thou, I think, Should'st be my Country's emblem; and should'st wink,
 Bright Star! with laughter on her banners, drest
 In thy fresh beauty. There! that dusky spot
 Beneath thee that is England; there she lies. 10
 Blessings be on you both! one hope, one lot,
 One life, one glory! I with many a fear
 For my dear Country, many heartfelt sighs,
 Among men who do not love her, linger here.

It Is a Beauteous Evening, Calm and Free

It is a beauteous evening, calm and free.
 The holy time is quiet as a nun,
 Breathless with adoration; the broad sun
 Is sinking down in its tranquillity;
 The gentleness of heaven broods o'er the sea; 5
 Listen! the mighty Being is awake,
 And doth with his eternal motion make
 A sound like thunder—everlastingly.

Dear Child! dear Girl! that walkest with me here,
 If thou appear untouched by solemn thought, 10
 Thy nature is not therefore less divine;
 Thou liest in Abraham's bosom all the year,
 And worship'st at the Temple's inner shrine,
 God being with thee when we know it not.

London, 1802

Milton! thou shouldst be living at this hour:
 England hath need of thee; she is a fen
 Of stagnant waters; altar, sword, and pen,
 Fireside, the heroic wealth of hall and bower, 5
 Have forfeited their ancient English dower
 Of inward happiness. We are selfish men;
 Oh! raise us up, return to us again;
 And give us manners, virtue, freedom, power.
 Thy Soul was like a Star, and dwelt apart;
 Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the sea;
 Pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free, 11
 So didst thou travel on life's common way,
 In cheerful godliness; and yet thy heart
 The lowliest duties on herself did lay.

The World Is Too Much with Us

The world is too much with us: late and soon,
 Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers.
 Little we see in nature that is ours;
 We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon!
 This sea that bares her bosom to the moon, 5
 The winds that will be howling at all hours,
 And are up-gathered now like sleeping flowers;
 For this, for everything, we are out of tune;
 It moves us not.—Great God! I'd rather be 10
 A pagan suckled in a creed outworn;
 So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
 Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;
 Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea;
 Or hear old Triton blow his wreathéd horn.

On the Extinction of the Venetian Republic

Once did She hold the gorgeous east in fee;
 And was the safeguard of the west: the worth
 Of Venice did not fall below her birth,
 Venice, the eldest Child of Liberty.
 She was a maiden City, bright and free; 5
 No guile seduced, no force could violate;
 And when she took unto herself a Mate,
 She must espouse the everlasting Sea.
 And what if she had seen those glories fade,

Those titles vanish, and that strength decay; 10
 Yet shall some tribute of regret be paid
 When her long life hath reached its final day:
 Men are we, and must grieve when even the Shade
 Of that which once was great, is passed away.

The Solitary Reaper

Behold her, single in the field,
 Yon solitary Highland lass!
 Reaping and singing by herself;
 Stop here, or gently pass!
 Alone she cuts and binds the grain, 5
 And sings a melancholy strain;
 O listen! for the Vale profound
 Is overflowing with the sound.

No nightingale did ever chaunt
 More welcome notes to weary bands 10
 Of travelers in some shady haunt,
 Among Arabian sands.
 A voice so thrilling ne'er was heard
 In springtime from the cuckoo-bird,
 Breaking the silence of the seas 15
 Among the farthest Hebrides.

Will no one tell me what she sings?—
 Perhaps the plaintive numbers flow
 For old, unhappy, far-off things,
 And battles long ago. 20
 Or is it some more humble lay,
 Familiar matter of today?
 Some natural sorrow, loss, or pain,
 That has been, and may be again?

Whate'er the theme, the maiden sang 25
 As if her song could have no ending;
 I saw her singing at her work,
 And o'er the sickle bending—
 I listened, motionless and still;
 And, as I mounted up the hill, 30
 The music in my heart I bore,
 Long after it was heard no more.

Ode

INTIMATIONS OF IMMORTALITY FROM RECOLLECTIONS OF EARLY CHILDHOOD

"The Child is Father of the Man;
 And I could wish my days to be
 Bound each to each by natural piety."

There was a time when meadow, grove, and
 stream,

The earth, and every common sight,
 To me did seem
 Appareled in celestial light,
 The glory and the freshness of a dream. 5
 It is not now as it hath been of yore—
 Turn wheresoe'er I may,
 By night or day,
 The things which I have seen I now can see no
 more.

The rainbow comes and goes, 10
 And lovely is the rose;
 The moon doth with delight
 Look round her when the heavens are bare;
 Waters on a starry night
 Are beautiful and fair; 15
 The sunshine is a glorious birth;
 But yet I know, where'er I go,
 That there hath passed away a glory from the earth.

Now, while the birds thus sing a joyous song,
 And while the young lambs bound, 20
 As to the tabor's sound,
 To me alone there came a thought of grief;
 A timely utterance gave that thought relief,
 And I again am strong.
 The cataracts blow their trumpets from the steep;
 No more shall grief of mine the season wrong; 26
 I hear the echoes through the mountains throng,
 The winds come to me from the fields of sleep,
 And all the earth is gay;
 Land and sea 30
 Give themselves up to jollity,
 And with the heart of May Doth every beast keep holiday—
 Thou child of joy,
 Shout round me, let me hear thy shouts, thou 35 happy shepherd-boy!

Ye blesséd creatures, I have heard the call
 Ye to each other make; I see
 The heavens laugh with you in your jubilee.
 My heart is at your festival,
 My head hath its coronal, 40
 The fullness of your bliss, I feel—I feel it all.
 O evil day! if I were sullen
 While Earth herself is adorning,
 This sweet May-morning,
 And the children are culling 45
 On every side,
 In a thousand valleys far and wide,
 Fresh flowers; while the sun shines warm,

And the babe leaps up on his mother's arm—
 I hear, I hear, with joy I hear! 50
 —But there's a tree, of many, one,
 A single field which I have looked upon;
 Both of them speak of something that is gone.
 The pansy at my feet
 Doth the same tale repeat: 55
 Whither is fled the visionary gleam?
 Where is it now, the glory and the dream?

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting:
 The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
 Hath had elsewhere its setting, 60
 And cometh from afar;
 Not in entire forgetfulness,
 And not in utter nakedness,
 But trailing clouds of glory do we come
 From God, who is our home. 65
 Heaven lies about us in our infancy!
 Shades of the prison-house begin to close
 Upon the growing boy,
 But he beholds the light, and whence it flows,
 He sees it in his joy; 70
 The youth, who daily farther from the east
 Must travel, still is Nature's priest,
 And by the vision splendid
 Is on his way attended;
 At length the man perceives it die away, 75
 And fade into the light of common day.

Earth fills her lap with pleasures of her own;
 Yearnings she hath in her own natural kind,
 And, even with something of a mother's mind, 80
 And no unworthy aim,
 The homely nurse doth all she can
 To make her foster-child, her inmate man,
 Forget the glories he hath known,
 And that imperial palace whence he came.

Behold the child among his new-born blisses, 85
 A six years' darling of a pygmy size!
 See, where 'mid work of his own hand he lies,
 Fretted by sallies of his mother's kisses,
 With light upon him from his father's eyes!
 See, at his feet, some little plan or chart, 90
 Some fragment from his dream of human life,
 Shaped by himself with newly-learnéd art;
 A wedding or a festival,
 A mourning or a funeral;
 And this hath now his heart, 95
 And unto this he frames his song;
 Then will he fit his tongue
 To dialogues of business, love, or strife.

But it will not be long
 Ere this be thrown aside,
 And with new joy and pride
 The little actor cons another part;
 Filling from time to time his "humorous stage"
 With all the persons, down to palsied Age,
 That Life brings with her in her equipage;
 As if his whole vocation
 Were endless imitation.

Thou whose exterior semblance doth belie
 Thy soul's immensity;
 Thou best philosopher, who yet dost keep
 Thy heritage, thou eye among the blind,
 That, deaf and silent, read'st the eternal deep,
 Haunted forever by the eternal mind—
 Mighty prophet! Seer blest!
 On whom those truths do rest,
 Which we are toiling all our lives to find,
 In darkness lost, the darkness of the grave;
 Thou, over whom thy immortality
 Broods like the day, a master o'er a slave,
 A presence which is not to be put by;
 Thou little child, yet glorious in the might
 Of heaven-born freedom on thy being's height,
 Why with such earnest pains dost thou provoke
 The years to bring the inevitable yoke,
 Thus blindly with thy blessedness at strife?
 Full soon thy soul shall have her earthly freight,
 And custom lie upon thee with a weight,
 Heavy as frost, and deep almost as life!

O joy! that in our embers
 Is something that doth live,
 That Nature yet remembers
 What was so fugitive!
 The thought of our past years in me doth breed
 Perpetual benediction; not indeed
 For that which is most worthy to be blest—
 Delight and liberty, the simple creed
 Of childhood, whether busy or at rest,
 With new-fledged hope still fluttering in his breast—
 Not for these I raise
 The song of thanks and praise;
 But for those obstinate questionings
 Of sense and outward things,
 Fallings from us, vanishings;
 Blank misgivings of a creature
 Moving about in worlds not realized,
 High instincts before which our mortal nature
 Did tremble like a guilty thing surprised.

But for those first affections,
 Those shadowy recollections,
 Which, be they what they may,
 Are yet the fountain light of all our day,
 Are yet a master light of all our seeing;
 Uphold us, cherish, and have power to make
 Our noisy years seem moments in the being
 Of the eternal Silence: truths that wake,
 To perish never;
 Which neither listlessness, nor mad endeavor,
 Nor man nor boy,
 Nor all that is at enmity with joy,
 Can utterly abolish or destroy!
 Hence in a season of calm weather
 Though inland far we be,
 Our souls have sight of that immortal sea
 Which brought us hither,
 Can in a moment travel thither,
 And see the children sport upon the shore,
 And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore.

Then sing, ye birds, sing, sing a joyous song!
 And let the young lambs bound
 As to the tabor's sound!
 We in thought will join your throng,
 Ye that pipe and ye that play,
 Ye that through your hearts today
 Feel the gladness of the May!
 What though the radiance which was once so bright
 Be now forever taken from my sight,
 Though nothing can bring back the hour
 Of splendor in the grass, of glory in the flower;
 We will grieve not, rather find
 Strength in what remains behind;
 In the primal sympathy
 Which having been must ever be;
 In the soothing thoughts that spring
 Out of human suffering;
 In the faith that looks through death,
 In years that bring the philosophic mind.

And O ye fountains, meadows, hills, and groves,
 Forebode not any severing of our loves!
 Yet in my heart of hearts I feel your might;
 I only have relinquished one delight
 To live beneath your more habitual sway.
 I love the brooks which down their channels fret,
 Even more than when I tripped lightly as they;
 The innocent brightness of a new-born day
 Is lovely yet;
 The clouds that gather round the setting sun
 Do take a sober coloring from an eye

That hath kept watch o'er man's mortality;
 Another race hath been, and other palms are won.
 Thanks to the human heart by which we live, 200
 Thanks to its tenderness, its joys, and fears,
 To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears.

To the Cuckoo

O blithe New-comer! I have heard,
 I hear thee and rejoice.
 O Cuckoo! shall I call thee Bird,
 Or but a wandering Voice?

While I am lying on the grass 5
 Thy twofold shout I hear,
 From hill to hill it seems to pass,
 At once far off, and near.

Though babbling only to the Vale,
 Of sunshine and of flowers, 10
 Thou bringest unto me a tale
 Of visionary hours.

Thrice welcome, darling of the Spring!
 Even yet thou art to me
 No bird, but an invisible thing, 15
 A voice, a mystery;

The same whom in my school-boy days
 I listened to; that Cry
 Which made me look a thousand ways
 In bush, and tree, and sky. 20

To seek thee did I often rove
 Through woods and on the green;
 And thou wert still a hope, a love;
 Still longed for, never seen.

And I can listen to thee yet; 25
 Can lie upon the plain
 And listen, till I do beget
 That golden time again.

O blessed Bird! the earth we pace
 Again appears to be 30
 An unsubstantial, faery place;
 That is fit home for Thee!

She Was a Phantom of Delight

She was a phantom of delight
 When first she gleamed upon my sight;

A lovely apparition, sent
 To be a moment's ornament;
 Her eyes as stars of twilight fair; 5
 Like twilight's, too, her dusky hair;
 But all things else about her drawn
 From Maytime and the cheerful dawn;
 A dancing shape, an image gay,
 To haunt, to startle, and waylay. 10

I saw her upon nearer view,
 A spirit, yet a woman, too!
 Her household motions light and free,
 And steps of virgin liberty;
 A countenance in which did meet 15
 Sweet records, promises as sweet;
 A creature not too bright or good
 For human nature's daily food;
 For transient sorrows, simple wiles,
 Praise, blame, love, kisses, tears, and smiles. 20

And now I see with eyes serene
 The very pulse of the machine:
 A being breathing thoughtful breath,
 A traveler between life and death;
 The reason firm, the temperate will, 25
 Endurance, foresight, strength, and skill;
 A perfect woman, nobly planned,
 To warn, to comfort, and command;
 And yet a spirit still, and bright
 With something of angelic light. 30

I Wandered Lonely as a Cloud

I wandered lonely as a cloud
 That floats on high o'er vales and hills,
 When all at once I saw a crowd,
 A host of golden daffodils,
 Beside the lake, beneath the trees, 5
 Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.

Continuous as the stars that shine
 And twinkle on the milky way,
 They stretched in never-ending line
 Along the margin of a bay; 10
 Ten thousand saw I at a glance,
 Tossing their heads in sprightly dance.

The waves beside them danced, but they Outdid the sparkling waves in glee—
 A poet could not but be gay 15
 In such a jocund company.
 I gazed—and gazed—but little thought
 What wealth the show to me had brought

For oft when on my couch I lie
In vacant or in pensive mood,
They flash upon that inward eye

20

Which is the bliss of solitude,
And then my heart with pleasure fills,
And dances with the daffodils.

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE

Kubla Khan

"In the summer of the year 1797 the author, then in ill health, had retired to a lonely farmhouse between Porlock and Linton, on the Exmoor confines of Somerset and Devonshire. In consequence of a slight indisposition an anodyne had been prescribed, from the effects of which he fell asleep in his chair at the moment that he was reading the following sentence, or words of the same substance, in Purchas's Pilgrimage: 'Here the Khan Kubla commanded a palace to be built, and a stately garden thereunto. And thus ten miles of fertile ground were inclosed with a wall.' The Author continued for about three hours in a profound sleep, at least of the external senses, during which time he has the most vivid confidence that he could not have composed less than from two to three hundred lines; if that indeed can be called composition in which all the images rose up before him as things, with a parallel production of the correspondent expressions, without any sensation or consciousness of effort. On awaking he appeared to himself to have a distinct recollection of the whole, and taking his pen, ink, and paper, instantly and eagerly wrote down the lines that are here preserved. At this moment he was unfortunately called out by a person on business from Porlock, and detained by him above an hour, and on his return to his room found, to his no small surprise and mortification, that though he still retained some vague and dim recollection of the general purport of the vision, yet, with the exception of some eight or ten scattered lines and images, all the rest had passed away, like the images on the surface of a stream into which a stone has been cast, but, alas! without the after restoration of the latter.

Then all the charm

Is broken—all that phantom-world so fair
Vanishes, and a thousand circlets spread,
And each misshapes the other. Stay awhile,
Poor youth! who scarcely dar'st lift up thine eyes—
The stream will soon renew its smoothness, soon
The visions will return! And lo, he says,
And soon the fragments dim of lovely forms
Come trembling back, unite, and now once more
The pool becomes a mirror."

Yet from the still surviving recollections in his mind, the author has frequently purposed to finish for himself what had been originally, as it were, given to him. Ἀντίον ἄδων ἄδων, but the tomorrow is yet to come."

Coleridge, Kubla Khan. Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772-1834) was born in Devonshire and educated at Cambridge. In his varied life he wrote poems, and literary essays. His last years were rendered ineffective by his use of opium.

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan

A stately pleasure-dome decree;

Where Alph, the sacred river, ran

Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea. 5

So twice five miles of fertile ground

With walls and towers were girdled round;

And there were gardens bright with sinuous rills

Where blossomed many an incense-bearing tree;

And here were forests ancient as the hills, 10

Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.

But O, that deep romantic chasm which slanted

Down the green hill athwart a cedarn cover!

A savage place! as holy and enchanted

As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted 15

By woman wailing for her demon-lover!

And from this chasm, with ceaseless turmoil seething,

As if this earth in fast thick pants were breathing,

A mighty fountain momentarily was forced;

Amid whose swift, half-intermitted burst 20

Huge fragments vaulted like rebounding hail,

Or chaffy grain beneath the thresher's flail.

And 'mid these dancing rocks at once and ever

It flung up momentarily the sacred river.

Five miles meandering with a mazy motion 25

Through wood and dale the sacred river ran,

Then reached the caverns measureless to man,

And sank in tumult to a lifeless ocean;

And 'mid this tumult Kubla heard from far

Ancestral voices prophesying war! 30

The shadow of the dome of pleasure

Floated midway on the waves;

Where was heard the mingled measure

From the fountain and the caves.

It was a miracle of rare device, 35

A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!

A damsel with a dulcimer
 In a vision once I saw,
 It was an Abyssinian maid,
 And on her dulcimer she played,
 Singing of Mount Abora.
 Could I revive within me
 Her symphony and song,
 To such a deep delight 'twould win me
 That with music loud and long,
 I would build that dome in air,
 That sunny dome! those caves of ice!
 And all who heard should see them there,
 And all should cry, Beware! Beware!
 His flashing eyes, his floating hair!
 Weave a circle round him thrice,
 And close your eyes with holy dread,
 For he on honey-dew hath fed,
 And drunk the milk of Paradise.

The Rime of the Ancient Mariner

IN SEVEN PARTS

ARGUMENT

How a Ship having passed the Line was driven by storms to the cold Country toward the South Pole; and how from thence she made her course to the tropical Latitude of the Great Pacific Ocean; and of the strange things that befell; and in what manner the Ancient Mariner came back to his own Country.

PART I

An ancient Mariner meeteth three Gallants bidden to a wedding-feast, and detaineth one.

It is an ancient Mariner,
 And he stoppeth one of three.
 "By thy long gray beard and glittering eye,
 Now wherefore stopp'st thou me?"

The Bridegroom's doors are opened wide,
 And I am next of kin;
 The guests are met, the feast is set—
 May'st hear the merry din."

He holds him with his skinny hand,
 "There was a ship," quoth he.
 "Hold off! unhand me, graybeard loon!"
 Eftsoons his hand dropped he.

The Wedding-Guest is spellbound by the eye of the old seafaring man, and constrained to hear his tale.

He holds him with his glittering eye;
 The Wedding-Guest stood still,

And listens like a three years' child—
 The Mariner hath his will. 15

40 The Wedding-Guest sat on a stone—
 He cannot choose but hear;
 And thus spake on that ancient man,
 The bright-eyed Mariner: 20

45 "The ship was cheered, the harbor cleared;
 Merrily did we drop
 Below the kirk, below the hill,
 Below the lighthouse top.

50 The Mariner tells how the ship sailed southward with a good wind and fair weather till it reached the Line.

The sun came up upon the left;
 Out of the sea came he! 25
 And he shone bright, and on the right
 Went down into the sea.

Higher and higher every day,
 Till over the mast at noon—" 30
 The Wedding-Guest here beat his breast,
 For he heard the loud bassoon.

The Wedding-Guest heareth the bridal music; but the Mariner continueth his tale.

The bride hath paced into the hall,
 Red as a rose is she;
 Nodding their heads before her goes
 The merry minstrelsy. 35

The Wedding-Guest he beat his breast,
 Yet he cannot choose but hear;
 And thus spake on that ancient man,
 The bright-eyed Mariner. 40

The ship drawn by a storm toward the South Pole.

"And now the Storm-blast came, and he
 Was tyrannous and strong;
 He struck with his o'ertaking wings,
 And chased us south along.

With sloping masts and dipping prow,
 As who pursued with yell and blow
 Still treads the shadow of his foe,
 And forward bends his head, 45
 The ship drove fast, loud roared the blast,
 And southward aye we fled. 50

And now there came both mist and snow,
 And it grew wondrous cold;
 And ice, mast-high, came floating by
 As green as emerald.

The land of ice, and of fearful sounds, where no living thing was to be seen;

And through the drifts the snowy clifts 55
Did send a dismal sheen;
Nor shapes of men nor beasts we ken—
The ice was all between.

The ice was here, the ice was there,
The ice was all around; 60
It cracked and growled, and roared and howled,
Like noises in a swound!

Till a great sea-bird called the Albatross, came through the snow-fog, and was received with great joy and hospitality.

At length did cross an Albatross;
Thorough the fog it came;
As if it had been a Christian soul, 65
We hailed it in God's name.

It ate the food it ne'er had eat,
And round and round it flew.
The ice did split with a thunder-fit;
The helmsman steered us through! 70

And lo! the Albatross proveth a bird of good omen, and followeth the ship as it returned northward through fog and floating ice.

And a good south wind sprung up behind;
The Albatross did follow,
And every day, for food or play,
Came to the mariners' hollo!

In mist or cloud, on mast or shroud, 75
It perched for vespers nine;
Whiles all the night, through fog-smoke white Glimmered the white moonshine."

The ancient Mariner inhospitably killeth the pious bird of good omen.

"God save thee, ancient Mariner,
From the fiends that plague thee thus!— 80
Why look'st thou so?"—"With my crossbow
I shot the Albatross.

PART II

"The sun now rose upon the right;
Out of the sea came he,
Still hid in mist, and on the left
Went down into the sea.

And the good south wind still blew behind,
But no sweet bird did follow,
Nor any day, for food or play,
Came to the mariners' hollo! 90

His shipmates cry out against the ancient Mariner, for killing the bird of good luck.

And I had done an hellish thing,
And it would work 'em woe;
For all averred I had killed the bird
That made the breeze to blow.
'Ah, wretch!' said they, 'the bird to slay, 95
That made the breeze to blow!'

But when the fog cleared off, they justify the same, and thus make themselves accomplices in the crime.

Nor dim nor red, like God's own head,
The glorious sun uprist;
Then all averred, I had killed the bird
That brought the fog and mist. 100
'Twas right,' said they, 'such birds to slay,
That bring the fog and mist.'

The fair breeze continues; the ship enters the Pacific Ocean and sails northward, even till it reaches the Line.

The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew,
The furrow followed free;
We were the first that ever burst 105
Into that silent sea.

The ship hath been suddenly becalmed.

Down dropped the breeze, the sails dropped down,
'Twas sad as sad could be;
And we did speak only to break
The silence of the sea! 110

All in a hot and copper sky,
The bloody sun, at noon,
Right up above the mast did stand,
No bigger than the moon.

Day after day, day after day, 115
We stuck, nor breath nor motion;
As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean.

And the Albatross begins to be avenged.

Water, water, everywhere,
And all the boards did shrink; 120
Water, water, everywhere,
Nor any drop to drink.

85 The very deep did rot—O Christ!
That ever this should be!
Yea, slimy things did crawl with legs 125
Upon the slimy sea.

About, about, in reel and rout
The death-fires danced at night;

The water, like a witch's oils,
Burned green, and blue, and white. 130

A Spirit had followed them; one of the invisible inhabitants of this planet, neither departed souls nor angels; concerning whom the learned Jew Josephus and the Platonic Constantinopolitan, Michael Psellus, may be consulted. They are very numerous, and there is no climate or element without one or more.

And some in dreams assuréd were
Of the Spirit that plagued us so;
Nine fathom deep he had followed us
From the land of mist and snow.

The shipmates in their sore distress would fain throw the whole guilt on the ancient Mariner; in sign whereof they hang the dead sea-bird round his neck.

And every tongue, through utter drought, 135
Was withered at the root;
We could not speak, no more than if
We had been choked with soot.

Ah! well-a-day!—what evil looks
Had I from old and young! 140
Instead of the cross, the Albatross
About my neck was hung.

PART III

The ancient Mariner beholdeth a sign in the element afar off.

"There passed a weary time. Each throat
Was parched, and glazed each eye.
A weary time! a weary time! 145
How glazed each weary eye!
When looking westward, I beheld
A something in the sky.

At first it seemed a little speck,
And then it seemed a mist; 150
It moved, and moved, and took at last
A certain shape, I wist.

A speck, a mist, a shape, I wist!
And still it neared and neared;
As if it dodged a water-sprite, 155
It plunged and tacked and veered.

At its nearer approach, it seemeth him to be a ship; and at a dear ransom he freeth his speech from the bonds of thirst.

With throats unslaked, with black lips baked,
We could nor laugh nor wail;
Through utter drought all dumb we stood!
I bit my arm, I sucked the blood, 160
And cried, 'A sail! a sail!'

A flash of joy;

With throats unslaked, with black lips baked,
Agape they heard me call;
Gramercy! they for joy did grin,
And all at once their breath drew in, 165
As they were drinking all.

And horror follows. For can it be a ship that comes onward without wind or tide?

'See! see!' (I cried) 'She tacks no more!
Hither to work us weal;
Without a breeze, without a tide,
She steadies with upright keel!' 170

The western wave was all aflame
The day was well-nigh done!
Almost upon the western wave
Rested the broad bright sun;
When that strange shape drove suddenly 175
Betwixt us and the sun.

It seemeth him but the skeleton of a ship.

And straight the sun was flecked with bars
(Heaven's Mother send us grace!)
As if through a dungeon-grate he peered
With broad and burning face. 180

Alas! (thought I, and my heart beat loud)
How fast she nears and nears!
Are those her sails that glance in the sun,
Like restless gossameres?

And its ribs are seen as bars on the face of the setting sun. The Specter-Woman and her Death-mate, and no other on board the skeleton-ship.

Are those her ribs through which the sun 185
Did peer, as through a grate?
And is that Woman all her crew?
Is that a Death? and are there two?
Is Death that Woman's mate?

Like vessel, like crew!

Her lips were red, her looks were free, 190
Her locks were yellow as gold;
Her skin was as white as leprosy;
The Nightmare Life-in-Death was she,
Who thicks man's blood with cold.

Death and Life-in-Death have dined for the ship's crew, and she (the latter) winneth the ancient Mariner.

The naked hulk alongside came, 195
And the twain were casting dice;
'The game is done! I've won! I've won!'
Quoth she, and whistles thrice.

No twilight within the courts of the sun.

The sun's rim dips; the stars rush out;
At one stride comes the dark;
With far-heard whisper, o'er the sea,
Off shot the specter-bark.

At the rising of the moon

We listened and looked sideways up!
Fear at my heart, as at a cup,
My lifeblood seemed to sip!
The stars were dim, and thick the night;
The steersman's face by his lamp gleamed white;
From the sails the dew did drip—
Till clomb above the eastern bar
The hornéd moon, with one bright star
Within the nether tip.

One after another

One after one, by the star-dogged moon,
Too quick for groan or sigh,
Each turned his face with a ghastly pang,
And cursed me with his eye.

His shipmates drop down dead,

Four times fifty living men
(And I heard nor sigh nor groan),
With heavy thump, a lifeless lump,
They dropped down one by one.

But Life-in-Death begins her work on the ancient Mariner.

The souls did from their bodies fly—
They fled to bliss or woe!
And every soul, it passed me by,
Like the whizz of my crossbow!"

PART IV

The Wedding-Guest feareth that a spirit is talking to him;

"I fear thee, ancient Mariner!
I fear thy skinny hand!
And thou art long, and lank, and brown,
As is the ribbed sea-sand.

But the ancient Mariner assureth him of his bodily life, and proceedeth to relate his horrible penance.

I fear thee and thy glittering eye,
And thy skinny hand, so brown"—
"Fear not, fear not, thou Wedding-Guest!
This body dropped not down.

Alone, alone, all, all alone,
Alone on a wide, wide sea!

And never a saint took pity on
My soul in agony.

He despiseth the creatures of the calm,

The many men, so beautiful!
And they all dead did lie;
And a thousand thousand slimy things
Lived on; and so did I.

And envieth that they should live, and so many lie dead.

I looked upon the rotting sea,
And drew my eyes away;
I looked upon the rotting deck,
And there the dead men lay.

I looked to Heaven, and tried to pray;
But or ever a prayer had gusht,
A wicked whisper came, and made
My heart as dry as dust.

I closed my lids, and kept them close,
And the balls like pulses beat;
For the sky and the sea, and the sea and the sky
Lay like a load on my weary eye,
And the dead were at my feet.

But the curse liveth for him in the eye of the dead men.

The cold sweat melted from their limbs,
Nor rot nor reek did they;
The look with which they looked on me
Had never passed away.

An orphan's curse would drag to hell
A spirit from on high,
But oh! more horrible than that
Is a curse in a dead man's eye!
Seven days, seven nights, I saw that curse
And yet I could not die.

In his loneliness and fixedness he yearneth toward the journeying moon, and the stars that still sojourn, yet still move onward; and everywhere the blue sky belongs to them, and is their appointed rest and their native country and their own natural homes, which they enter unannounced, as lords that are certainly expected and yet there is a silent joy at their arrival.

The moving moon went up the sky,
And nowhere did abide;
Softly she was going up
And a star or two beside—

Her beams bemoaned the sultry main,
Like April hoarfrost spread;
But where the ship's huge shadow lay,
The charmed water burned alway
A still and awful red.

By the light of the moon he beholdeth God's creatures of the great calm,

Beyond the shadow of the ship,
I watched the water-snakes;
They moved in tracks of shining white,
And when they reared, the elfish light
275 Fell off in hoary flakes.

Within the shadow of the ship
I watched their rich attire;
Blue, glossy green, and velvet black
280 They coiled and swam; and every track
Was a flash of golden fire.

Their beauty and their happiness.

O happy living things! no tongue
Their beauty might declare;
A spring of love gushed from my heart,

He blesseth them in his heart.

And I blessed them unaware!
285 Sure my kind saint took pity on me,
And I blessed them unaware.

The spell begins to break.

The selfsame moment I could pray;
And from my neck so free
The Albatross fell off, and sank
290 Like lead into the sea.

PART V

"Oh sleep! it is a gentle thing,
Beloved from pole to pole!
To Mary Queen the praise be given!
She sent the gentle sleep from heaven,
295 That slid into my soul.

By grace of the holy Mother, the ancient Mariner is refreshed with rain.

The silly buckets on the deck,
That had so long remained,
I dreamt that they were filled with dew;
300 And when I awoke, it rained.

My lips were wet, my throat was cold,
My garments all were dank;
Sure I had drunken in my dreams,
And still my body drank.

I moved, and could not feel my limbs,
305 I was so light—almost
I thought that I had died in sleep,
And was a blessed ghost.

He heareth sounds, and seeth strange sights and commotions in the sky and the element.

And soon I heard a roaring wind;
It did not come anear;
310 But with its sound it shook the sails
That were so thin and sear.

The upper air burst into life!
And a hundred fire-flags sheen;
To and fro they were hurried about;
315 And to and fro, and in and out,
280 The wan stars danced between.

And the coming wind did roar more loud,
And the sails did sigh like sedge;
And the rain poured down from one black cloud;
321 The moon was at its edge.

The thick, black cloud was cleft, and still
The moon was at its side;
285 Like waters shot from some high crag,
The lightning fell with never a jag,
325 A river steep and wide.

The bodies of the ship's crew are inspired, and the ship moves on;

The loud wind never reached the ship,
Yet now the ship moved on!
290 Beneath the lightning and the moon
The dead men gave a groan.
330

They groaned, they stirred, they all uprose,
Nor spake, nor moved their eyes;
It had been strange, even in a dream,
To have seen those dead men rise.

The helmsman steered, the ship moved on;
335 Yet never a breeze up-blew.
The mariners all 'gan work the ropes,
Where they were wont to do;
They raised their limbs like lifeless tools—
340 We were a ghastly crew.

But not by the souls of the men, nor by demons of earth or middle air, but by a blessed troop of angelic spirits, sent down by the invocation of the guardian saint.

The body of my brother's son
Stood by me, knee to knee;
The body and I pulled at one rope,
But he said naught to me."

"I fear thee, ancient Mariner!"
345 "Be calm, thou Wedding-Guest!
'Twas not those souls that fled in pain,

Which to their corpses came again,
But a troop of spirits blest;

For when it dawned—they dropped their arms
And clustered round the mast; 351
Sweet sounds rose slowly through their mouths,
And from their bodies passed.

Around, around, flew each sweet sound,
Then darted to the sun; 355
Slowly the sounds came back again,
Now mixed, now one by one.

Sometimes a-dropping from the sky
I heard the skylark sing;
Sometimes all little birds that are, 360
How they seemed to fill the sea and air
With their sweet jargoning!

And now 'twas like all instruments,
Now like a lonely flute;
And now it is an angel's song,
That makes the heavens be mute.

It ceased; yet still the sails made on
A pleasant noise till noon,
A noise like of a hidden brook
In the leafy month of June,
That to the sleeping woods all night
Singeth a quiet tune.

Till noon we quietly sailed on,
Yet never a breeze did breathe;
Slowly and smoothly went the ship, 375
Moved onward from beneath.

The lonesome Spirit from the South Pole carries on the ship as far as the Line, in obedience to the angelic troop, but still requireth vengeance.

Under the keel nine fathom deep,
From the land of mist and snow,
The Spirit slid; and it was he 380
That made the ship to go.
The sails at noon left off their tune,
And the ship stood still also.

The sun, right up above the mast,
Had fixed her to the ocean;
But in a minute she 'gan stir,
With a short, uneasy motion—
Backwards and forwards half her length
With a short, uneasy motion.

Then like a pawing horse let go,
She made a sudden bound;

It flung the blood into my head,
And I fell down in a swoond.

How long in that same fit I lay,
I have not to declare;
But ere my living life returned, 395
I heard and in my soul discerned
Two voices in the air.

The Polar Spirit's fellow demons, the invisible inhabitants of the element, take part in his wrong; and two of them relate, one to the other, that penance long and heavy for the ancient Mariner hath been accorded to the Polar Spirit, who returneth southward.

'Is it he?' quoth one, 'Is this the man?'
By Him who died on cross, 360
With his cruel bow he laid full low
The harmless Albatross. 400

The Spirit who bideth by himself
In the land of mist and snow,
He loved the bird that loved the man 365
Who shot him with his bow.' 405

The other was a softer voice,
As soft as honey-dew;
Quoth he, 'The man hath penance done,
And penance more will do.' 370

PART VI

FIRST VOICE

"But tell me, tell me! speak again, 410
Thy soft response renewing—
What makes that ship drive on so fast?
What is the ocean doing?"

SECOND VOICE

'Still as a slave before his lord,
The ocean hath no blast; 415
His great bright eye most silently
Up to the moon is cast— 380

The Mariner hath been cast into a trance; for the angelic power causeth the vessel to drive northward faster than human life could endure.

If he may know which way to go;
For she guides him smooth or grim. 385
See, brother, see! how graciously
She looketh down on him.' 420

FIRST VOICE

'But why drives on that ship so fast,
Without or wave or wind?' 390

SECOND VOICE

And the ancient Mariner beholdeth his native country.

'The air is cut away before,
And closes from behind.

425

Oh! dream of joy! is this indeed
The lighthouse top I see?
Is this the hill? Is this the kirk?
Is this mine own countree?

465

Fly, brother, fly! more high, more high!
Or we shall be belated;
For slow and slow that ship will go,
When the Mariner's trance is abated.'

We drifted o'er the harbor-bar,
And I with sobs did pray—
'O let me be awake, my God!
Or let me sleep away.'

470

The supernatural motion is retarded; the Mariner awakes, and his penance begins anew.

I woke, and we were sailing on
As in a gentle weather.
'Twas night, calm night, the moon was high;
The dead men stood together.

430

The harbor-bay was clear as glass,
So smoothly it was strewn!
And on the bay the moonlight lay,
And the shadow of the moon.

475

All stood together on the deck,
For a charnel-dungeon fitter;
All fixed on me their stony eyes,
That in the moon did glitter.

435

The rock shone bright, the kirk no less,
That stands above the rock;
The moonlight steeped in silentness
The steady weathercock.

The pang, the curse, with which they died,
Had never passed away;
I could not draw my eyes from theirs,
Nor turn them up to pray.

440

The angelic spirits leave the dead bodies,
And the bay was white with silent light,
Till rising from the same,
Full many shapes, that shadows were,
In crimson colors came.

480

The curse is finally expiated.

And now this spell was snapped; once more
I viewed the ocean green,
And looked far forth, yet little saw
Of what had else been seen—

445

And appear in their own forms of light.

A little distance from the prow
Those crimson shadows were;
I turned my eyes upon the deck—
O Christ! what saw I there!

485

Like one that on a lonesome road
Doth walk in fear and dread,
And having once turned round, walks on,
And turns no more his head,
Because he knows a frightful fiend
Doth close behind him tread.

450

Each corse lay flat, lifeless and flat,
And by the holy rood!
A man all light, a seraph-man,
On every corse there stood.

490

But soon there breathed a wind on me,
Nor sound nor motion made;
Its path was not upon the sea,
In ripple or in shade.

455

This seraph-band, each waved his hand—
It was a heavenly sight!
They stood as signals to the land,
Each one a lovely light;

495

It raised my hair, it fanned my cheek
Like a meadow-gale of spring—
It mingled strangely with my fears,
Yet it felt like a welcoming.

This seraph-band, each waved his hand;
No voice did they impart—
No voice; but oh! the silence sank
Like music on my heart.

Swiftly, swiftly flew the ship,
Yet she sailed softly, too;
Sweetly, sweetly blew the breeze—
On me alone it blew.

460

But soon I heard the dash of oars,
I heard the Pilot's cheer;
My head was turned perforce away,
And I saw a boat appear.

500

The Pilot, and the Pilot's boy,
I heard them coming fast;
Dear Lord in heaven! it was a joy
The dead men could not blast.

I saw a third—I heard his voice;
It is the Hermit good!
He singeth loud his godly hymns
That he makes in the wood.
He'll shrieve my soul, he'll wash away
The Albatross's blood.

PART VII

The Hermit of the wood

"This Hermit good lives in that wood
Which slopes down to the sea;
How loudly his sweet voice he rears!
He loves to talk with marineres
That come from a far countree.

He kneels at morn, and noon, and eve—
He hath a cushion plump;
It is the moss that wholly hides
The rotted old oak-stump.

The skiff-boat neared; I heard them talk,
'Why this is strange, I trow!
Where are those lights so many and fair
That signal made but now?'

Approacheth the ship with wonder.

'Strange, by my faith!' the Hermit said—
'And they answered not our cheer!
The planks look warped! and see those sails
How thin they are and sear!
I never saw aught like to them,
Unless perchance it were

Brown skeletons of leaves that lag
My forest-brook along;
When the ivy-tod is heavy with snow,
And the owlet whoops to the wolf below
That eats the she-wolf's young.'

'Dear Lord! it hath a fiendish look'—
(The Pilot made reply)
'I am a-feared'—'Push on, push on!
Said the Hermit cheerily.

The boat came closer to the ship,
But I nor spake nor stirred;

505 The boat came close beneath the ship,
And straight a sound was heard. 545

The ship suddenly sinketh.

Under the water it rumbled on,
Still louder and more dread;
It reached the ship, it split the bay;
510 The ship went down like lead.

The ancient Mariner is saved in the Pilot's boat.

Stunned by that loud and dreadful sound, 550
Which sky and ocean smote,
Like one that hath been seven days drowned
My body lay afloat;
But swift as dreams, myself I found
Within the Pilot's boat. 555

515 Upon the whirl, where sank the ship,
The boat spun round and round;
And all was still, save that the hill
Was telling of the sound.

I moved my lips—the Pilot shrieked 560
And fell down in a fit;
The holy Hermit raised his eyes
And prayed where he did sit.

I took the oars; the Pilot's boy,
Who now doth crazy go, 565
Laughed loud and long, and all the while
His eyes went to and fro.
525 'Hal hal' quoth he, 'full plain I see,
The Devil knows how to row.'

And now, all in my own countree, 570
I stood on the firm land!
The Hermit stepped forth from the boat,
530 And scarcely he could stand.

The ancient Mariner earnestly entreateth the Hermit to shrieve him; and the penance of life falls on him,

'O shrieve me, shrieve me, holy man!'
The Hermit crossed his brow. 575
535 'Say quick,' quoth he, 'I bid thee say—
What manner of man art thou?'

Forthwith this frame of mine was wrenched
With a woeful agony,
Which forced me to begin my tale; 580
And then it left me free.

And ever and anon throughout his future life an agony constraineth him to travel from land to land,

Since then, at an uncertain hour,
That agony returns;

And till my ghastly tale is told,
This heart within me burns.

585

I pass, like night, from land to land;
I have strange power of speech;
That moment that his face I see,
I know the man that must hear me—
To him my tale I teach.

590

What loud uproar bursts from that door!
The wedding-guests are there;
But in the garden-bower the bride
And bride-maids singing are;
And hark the little vesper bell,
Which biddeth me to prayer!

O Wedding-Guest! this soul hath been
Alone on a wide, wide sea;
So lonely 'twas that God himself
Scarce seeméd there to be.

600

O sweeter than the marriage feast,
'Tis sweeter far to me,
To walk together to the kirk
With a goodly company!—

And to teach, by his own example, love and reverence to all things that God made and loveth.

To walk together to the kirk, 605

And all together pray,
While each to his great Father bends,
Old men, and babes, and loving friends,
And youths and maidens gay!

Farewell, farewell! but this I tell 610

To thee, thou Wedding-Guest!
He prayeth well, who loveth well,
Both man and bird and beast.

595

He prayeth best, who loveth best
All things both great and small;
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all." 615

The Mariner, whose eye is bright,
Whose beard with age is hoar,
Is gone; and now the Wedding-Guest
Turned from the bridegroom's door. 620

He went like one that hath been stunned,
And is of sense forlorn;
A sadder and a wiser man
He rose the morrow morn. 625

GEORGE GORDON, LORD BYRON

Maid of Athens, Ere We Part

Ζώη μου, σᾶς ἀγαπῶ.

Maid of Athens, ere we part,
Give, oh, give me back my heart!
Or, since that has left my breast,
Keep it now, and take the rest!
Hear my vow before I go,
Ζώη μου, σᾶς ἀγαπῶ.

5

By those tresses unconfinéd,
Woo'd by each Ægean wind;
By those lids whose jetty fringe
Kiss thy soft cheeks' blooming tinge; 10
By those wild eyes like the roe,
Ζώη μου, σᾶς ἀγαπῶ.

By that lip I long to taste;
By that zone-encircled waist;
By all the token-flowers that tell 15
What words can never speak so well;
By love's alternate joy and woe,
Ζώη μου, σᾶς ἀγαπῶ.

Maid of Athens! I am gone:
Think of me, sweet! when alone. 20
Though I fly to Istambol,
Athens holds my heart and soul;
Can I cease to love thee? No!
Ζώη μου, σᾶς ἀγαπῶ.

She Walks in Beauty

She walks in beauty, like the night
Of cloudless climes and starry skies;

Byron, Maid of Athens. George Noel Gordon, Lord Byron, was born in London in 1788 and died in Greece in 1824. He led a romantic career and through it and his poetry exercised an extraordinary influence on European literature.

And all that's best of dark and bright
Meet in her aspect and her eyes;
Thus mellowed to that tender light
Which heaven to gaudy day denies.

One shade the more, one ray the less,
Had half impaired the nameless grace
Which waves in every raven tress,
Or softly lightens o'er her face;
Where thoughts serenely sweet express
How pure how dear, their dwelling-place.

And on that cheek, and o'er that brow,
So soft, so calm, yet eloquent,
The smiles that win, the tints that glow,
But tell of days in goodness spent,
A mind at peace with all below,
A heart whose love is innocent!

The Destruction of Sennacherib

The Assyrian came down like the wolf on the fold,
And his cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold;
And the sheen of their spears was like stars on the sea,
When the blue wave rolls nightly on deep Galilee.

Like the leaves of the forest when Summer is green,
That host with their banners at sunset were seen:
Like the leaves of the forest when Autumn hath blown,
That host on the morrow lay wither'd and strown.

For the Angel of Death spread his wings on the blast,
And breathed in the face of the foe as he pass'd;
And the eyes of the sleepers wax'd deadly and chill,
And their hearts but once heaved, and for ever grew still!

And there lay the steed with his nostril all wide,
But through it there roll'd not the breath of his pride;
And the foam of his gasping lay white on the turf,
And cold as the spray of the rock-beating surf.

And there lay the rider distorted and pale,
With the dew on his brow, and the rust on his mail:
And the tents were all silent, the banners alone,
The lances unlifted, the trumpet unblown.

And the widows of Ashur are loud in their wail,
And the idols are broke in the temple of Baal;
And the might of the Gentile, unsmeared by the sword,
Hath melted like snow in the glance of the Lord!

Stanzas for Music

I

There's not a joy the world can give like that it takes away,
When the glow of early thought declines in feeling's dull decay;
'Tis not on youth's smooth cheek the blush alone,
which fades so fast,
But the tender bloom of heart is gone ere youth itself be past.

Then the few whose spirits float above the wreck of happiness
Are driven o'er the shoals of guilt or ocean of excess:
The magnet of their course is gone, or only points in vain
The shore to which their shivered sail shall never stretch again.

Then the mortal coldness of the soul like death itself comes down;
It cannot feel for others' woes, it dare not dream
its own;
That heavy chill has frozen o'er the fountain of our tears,
And though the eye may sparkle still, 'tis where the ice appears.

Though wit may flash from fluent lips, and mirth distract the breast,
Through midnight hours that yield no more their former hope of rest;
'Tis but as ivy-leaves around the ruined turret wreath,
All green and wildly fresh without, but worn and gray beneath.

Oh, could I feel as I have felt,—or be what I have been,
Or weep as I could once have wept, o'er many a vanished scene;

As springs in deserts found seem sweet, all brackish though they be,
So, midst the wither'd waste of life, those tears would flow to me. 20

II

There be none of Beauty's daughters
With a magic like thee;
And like music on the waters
Is thy sweet voice to me:
When, as if its sound were causing 5

The charmed ocean's pausing,
The waves lie still and gleaming,
And the lull'd winds seem dreaming;

And the midnight moon is weaving
Her bright chain o'er the deep; 10
Whose breast is gently heaving,
As an infant's asleep:
So the spirit bows before thee,
To listen and adore thee;
With a full but soft emotion, 15
Like the swell of Summer's ocean. 5

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY

Hymn to Intellectual Beauty

The awful shadow of some unseen Power
Floats though unseen amongst us—visiting
This various world with as inconstant wing
As summer winds that creep from flower to flower—
Like moonbeams that behind some piny mountain
shower, 5
It visits with inconstant glance
Each human heart and countenance;
Like hues and harmonies of evening—
Like clouds in starlight widely spread—
Like memory of music fled— 10
Like aught that for its grace may be
Dear, and yet dearer for its mystery.

Spirit of Beauty, that dost consecrate
With thine own hues all thou dost shine upon
Of human thought or form—where art thou gone? 15

Why dost thou pass away and leave our state,
This dim vast vale of tears, vacant and desolate?
Ask why the sunlight not forever
Weaves rainbows o'er yon mountain river,
Why aught should fail and fade that once is 18 shown, 20

Why fear and dream and death and birth
Cast on the daylight of this earth
Such gloom—why man has such a scope
For love and hate, despondency and hope?

No voice from some sublimer world hath ever 25
To sage or poet these responses given—
Therefore the names of Dæmon, Ghost, and
Heaven,

Remain the records of their vain endeavor,
Frail spells—whose uttered charm might not avail to sever,

From all we hear and all we see, 30
Doubt, chance, and mutability.

Thy light alone—like mist o'er mountains driven,
Or music by the night wind sent,
Through strings of some still instrument,
Or moonlight on a midnight stream, 35
Gives grace and truth to life's unquiet dream.

Love, Hope, and Self-Esteem, like clouds depart
And come, for some uncertain moments lent,
Man were immortal, and omnipotent,
Didst thou, unknown and awful as thou art, 40
Keep with thy glorious train firm state within his heart.

Thou messenger of sympathies,
That wax and wane in lovers' eyes—
Thou—that to human thought art nourishment,
Like darkness to a dying flame! 45
Depart not as thy shadow came,
Depart not—lest the grave should be,
Like life and fear, a dark reality.

While yet a boy I sought for ghosts, and sped Through many a listening chamber, cave and ruin, 50

Shelley, Hymn to Intellectual Beauty. Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792-1822) came of an upper-class family. He was educated at Oxford, from which he was expelled for his radical religious views. His poems reflect these views and his unsettled emotional life. He was drowned off the coast of Italy.

And starlight wood, with fearful steps pursuing Hopes of high talk with the departed dead.
I called on poisonous names with which our youth is fed;

I was not heard—I saw them not—
When musing deeply on the lot 55
Of life, at the sweet time when winds are wooing
All vital things that wake to bring
News of birds and blossoming—
Sudden, thy shadow fell on me;
I shrieked, and clasped my hands in ecstasy! 60

I vowed that I would dedicate my powers
To thee and thine—have I not kept the vow?
With beating heart and streaming eyes, even now

I call the phantoms of a thousand hours
Each from his voiceless grave; they have in visioned bowers 65
Of studious zeal or love's delight
Outwatched with me the envious night—
They know that never joy illumed my brow
Unlinked with hope that thou wouldst free
This world from its dark slavery, 70
That thou—O awful Loveliness,
Wouldst give whate'er these words cannot express.

The day becomes more solemn and serene
When noon is past—there is a harmony
In autumn, and a luster in its sky, 75
Which through the summer is not heard or seen,
As if it could not be, as if it had not been!
Thus let thy power, which like the truth
Of nature on my passive youth
Descended, to my onward life supply 80
Its calm—to one who worships thee,
And every form containing thee,
Whom, Spirit fair, thy spells did bind
To fear himself, and love all human kind.

Ozymandias

I met a traveler from an antique land
Who said: Two vast and trunkless legs of stone
Stand in the desert. Near them, on the sand,
Half sunk, a shattered visage lies, whose frown,
And wrinkled lip, and sneer of cold command, 5
Tell that its sculptor well those passions read
Which yet survive, stamped on these lifeless things,
The hand that mocked them and the heart that fed.

And on the pedestal these words appear:
"My name is Ozymandias, king of kings; 10
Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair!"

Nothing beside remains. Round the decay
Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare
The lone and level sands stretch far away.

Ode to the West Wind

I

O wild West Wind, thou breath of Autumn's being,
Thou, from whose unseen presence the leaves dead
Are driven, like ghosts from an enchanter fleeing,
Yellow, and black, and pale, and hectic red,
Pestilence-stricken multitudes; O thou, 5
Who chariotest to their dark wintry bed

The wingéd seeds, where they lie cold and low,
Each like a corpse within its grave, until Thine azure sister of the spring shall blow

Her clarion o'er the dreaming earth, and fill 10
(Driving sweet buds like flocks to feed in air)
With living hues and odors plain and hill—

Wild Spirit, which art moving everywhere;
Destroyer and preserver—hear, oh, hear!

II

Thou on whose stream, 'mid the steep sky's commotion, 15
Loose clouds like earth's decaying leaves are shed, Shook from the tangled boughs of heaven and
ocean,

Angels of rain and lightning—there are spread
On the blue surface of thine airy surge,
Like the bright hair uplifted from the head 20

Of some fierce Mænad, even from the dim verge
Of the horizon to the zenith's height
The locks of the approaching storm. Thou dirge

Of the dying year, to which this closing night
Will be the dome of a vast sepulcher, 25
Vaulted with all thy congregated might

Of vapors, from whose solid atmosphere
Black rain, and fire, and hail will burst—oh, hear!

III

Thou who didst waken from his summer dreams
The blue Mediterranean, where he lay, 30
Lulled by the coil of his crystalline streams,

Beside a pumice isle in Baiæ's bay,
And saw in sleep old palaces and towers
Quivering within the wave's intenser day,

All overgrown with azure moss and flowers 35
So sweet the sense faints picturing them! Thou
For whose path the Atlantic's level powers

Cleave themselves into chasms, while far below
The sea-blooms and the oozy woods which wear
The sapless foliage of the ocean, know 40

Thy voice, and suddenly grow gray with fear,
And tremble and despoil themselves—oh, hear!

IV

If I were a dead leaf thou mightest bear;
If I were a swift cloud to fly with thee;
A wave to pant beneath thy power, and share 45

The impulse of thy strength, only less free
Than thou, O uncontrollable! If even
I were as in my boyhood, and could be

The comrade of thy wanderings over heaven,
As then, when to outstrip thy skyey speed 50
Scarce seemed a vision; I would ne'er have striven

As thus with thee in prayer in my sore need.
Oh! lift me as a wave, a leaf, a cloud!
I fall upon the thorns of life! I bleed!

A heavy weight of hours has chained and bowed 55
One too like thee: tameless, and swift, and proud.

V

Make me thy lyre, even as the forest is;
What if my leaves are falling like its own!
The tumult of thy mighty harmonies

Will take from both a deep, autumnal tone, 60
Sweet though in sadness. Be thou, spirit fierce,
My spirit! Be thou me, impetuous one!

Drive my dead thoughts over the universe
Like withered leaves to quicken a new birth!
And, by the incantation of this verse, 65

Scatter, as from an unextinguished hearth
Ashes and sparks, my words among mankind!
Be through my lips to unawakened earth

The trumpet of a prophecy! O wind,
If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind? 70

The Indian Serenade

I arise from dreams of thee
In the first sweet sleep of night,
When the winds are breathing low,
And the stars are shining bright;
I arise from dreams of thee, 5
And a spirit in my feet
Hath led me—who knows how!
To thy chamber window, Sweet!

The wandering airs they faint
On the dark, the silent stream— 10
And the Champak odors fail
Like sweet thoughts in a dream;
The nightingale's complaint,
It dies upon her heart—
As I must on thine, 15
O! beloved as thou art!

Oh, lift me from the grass!
I die! I faint! I fail!
Let thy love in kisses rain
On my lips and eyelids pale. 20
My cheek is cold and white, alas!
My heart beats loud and fast—
Oh, press it to thine own again,
Where it will break at last!

The Cloud

I bring fresh showers for the thirsting flowers,
From the seas and the streams;
I bear light shade for the leaves when laid
In their noonday dreams.
From my wings are shaken the dews that 5 waken
The sweet buds every one,
When rocked to rest on their mother's breast,
As she dances about the sun.
I wield the flail of the lashing hail,
And whiten the green plains under, 10
And then again I dissolve it in rain,
And laugh as I pass in thunder.

I sift the snow on the mountains below,
And their great pines groan aghast;
And all the night 'tis my pillow white, 15
While I sleep in the arms of the blast.
Sublime on the towers of my skyey bowers,

Lightning my pilot sits;
 In a cavern under is fettered the thunder;
 It struggles and howls at fits.
 Over earth and ocean, with gentle motion,
 This pilot is guiding me,
 Lured by the love of the genii that move
 In the depths of the purple sea;
 Over the rills, and the crags, and the hills,
 Over the lakes and the plains,
 Wherever he dream, under mountain or stream,
 The Spirit he loves remains;
 And I all the while bask in heaven's blue smile,
 Whilst he is dissolving in rains.

The sanguine sunrise, with his meteor eyes,
 And his burning plumes outspread,
 Leaps on the back of my sailing rack,
 When the morning star shines dead,
 As on the jag of a mountain crag,
 Which an earthquake rocks and swings,
 An eagle alit one moment may sit
 In the light of its golden wings.
 And when sunset may breathe, from the lit sea
 beneath,

Its ardors of rest and of love,
 And the crimson pall of eve may fall
 From the depth of heaven above,
 With wings folded I rest, on mine airy nest,
 As still as a brooding dove.

That orbéd maiden, with white fire laden,
 Whom mortals call the moon,
 Glides glimmering o'er my fleece-like floor,
 By the midnight breezes strewn;
 And wherever the beat of her unseen feet,
 Which only the angels hear,
 May have broken the woof of my tent's thin roof,
 The stars peep behind her and peer;
 And I laugh to see them whirl and flee,
 Like a swarm of golden bees,
 When I widen the rent in my wind-built tent,
 Till the calm rivers, lakes, and seas,
 Like strips of the sky fallen through me on high,
 Are each paved with the moon and these.

I bind the sun's throne with a burning zone,
 And the moon's with a girdle of pearl;
 The volcanoes are dim, and the stars reel and swim,
 When the whirlwinds my banner unfurl.
 From cape to cape, with a bridge-like shape,
 Over a torrent sea,
 Sunbeam-proof, I hang like a roof,
 The mountains its columns be.

The triumphal arch through which I march
 With hurricane, fire, and snow,
 When the powers of the air are chained to my chair,
 Is the million-colored bow;
 The sphere-fire above its soft colors wove,
 While the moist earth was laughing below.

I am the daughter of earth and water,
 And the nursling of the sky;
 I pass through the pores of the ocean and shores;
 I change, but I cannot die.
 For after the rain when, with never a stain,
 The pavilion of heaven is bare,
 And the winds and sunbeams with their convex
 gleams
 Build up the blue dome of air,
 I silently laugh at my own cenotaph,
 And out of the caverns of rain,
 Like a child from the womb, like a ghost from the tomb,
 I arise and unbuild it again.

To a Skylark

Hail to thee, blithe spirit!
 Bird thou never wert,
 That from heaven, or near it,
 Pourest thy full heart
 In profuse strains of unpremeditated art.

Higher still and higher
 From the earth thou springest
 Like a cloud of fire;
 The blue deep thou wingest,
 And singing still dost soar, and soaring ever singest.

In the golden lightning
 Of the sunken sun,
 O'er which clouds are bright'ning,
 Thou dost float and run;
 Like an unbodied joy whose race is just begun.

The pale purple even Melts around thy flight;
 Like a star of heaven
 In the broad daylight
 Thou art unseen, but yet I hear thy shrill delight,

Keen as are the arrows
 Of that silver sphere,
 Whose intense lamp narrows

In the white dawn clear,
Until we hardly see, we feel that it is there. 25

All the earth and air
With thy voice is loud,
As, when night is bare,
From one lonely cloud
The moon rains out her beams, and heaven is overflowed. 30

What thou art we know not;
What is most like thee?
From rainbow clouds there flow not Drops so bright to see
As from thy presence showers a rain of melody. 35

Like a poet hidden
In the light of thought,
Singing hymns unbidden,
Till the world is wrought
To sympathy with hopes and fears it heeded
not; 40

Like a high-born maiden
In a palace tower,
Soothing her love-laden
Soul in secret hour
With music sweet as love, which overflows her bower; 45

Like a glowworm golden
In a dell of dew,
Scattering unbeholden
Its aerial hue
Among the flowers and grass which screen it from the view; 50

Like a rose embowered
In its own green leaves,
By warm winds deflowered,
Till the scent it gives Makes faint with too much sweet those heavywingéd thieves. 55

Sound of vernal showers
On the twinkling grass,
Rain-awakened flowers,
All that ever was Joyous, and clear, and fresh, thy music doth surpass. 60

Teach us, sprite or bird,
What sweet thoughts are thine;
I have never heard
Praise of love or wine
That panted forth a flood of rapture so divine: 65

Chorus Hymeneal,
Or triumphal chaunt,
Matched with thine, would be all
But an empty vaunt,
A thing wherein we feel there is some hidden want. 70

What objects are the fountains
Of thy happy strain?
What fields, or waves, or mountains?
What shapes of sky or plain?
What love of thine own kind? what ignorance of pain? 75

With thy clear keen joyance
Languor cannot be—
Shadow of annoyance
Never came near thee:
Thou lovest—but ne'er knew love's sad satiety. 80

Waking or asleep,
Thou of death must deem Things more true and deep
Than we mortals dream,
Or how could thy notes flow in such a crystal
stream? 85

We look before and after
And pine for what is not;
Our sincerest laughter
With some pain is fraught;
Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest
thought. 90

Yet if we could scorn
Hate, and pride, and fear;
If we were things born
Not to shed a tear,
I know not how thy joy we ever should come near. 95

Better than all measures
Of delightful sound—
Better than all treasures
That in books are found—Thy skill to poet were, thou scorner of the ground! 100

Teach me half the gladness
That thy brain must know,
Such harmonious madness
From my lips would flow,
The world should listen then—as I am listening
now. 105

JOHN KEATS

On the Grasshopper and Cricket

The poetry of earth is never dead:
 When all the birds are faint with the hot sun,
 And hide in cooling trees, a voice will run
 From hedge to hedge about the new-mown mead;
 That is the Grasshopper's—he takes the lead 5
 In summer luxury,—he has never done
 With his delights; for when tired out with fun
 He rests at ease beneath some pleasant weed.
 The poetry of earth is ceasing never;
 On a lone winter evening, when the frost 10
 Has wrought a silence, from the stove there shrills
 The Cricket's song, in warmth increasing ever,
 And seems to one in drowsiness half lost,
 The Grasshopper's among some grassy hills.

When I Have Fears That I May Cease to Be

When I have fears that I may cease to be
 Before my pen has glean'd my teeming brain,
 Before high pil'd books, in charact'ry,
 Hold like rich garners the full-ripen'd grain;
 When I behold, upon the night's starr'd face, 5
 Huge cloudy symbols of a high romance,
 And think that I may never live to trace
 Their shadows, with the magic hand of chance;
 And when I feel, fair creature of an hour!
 That I shall never look upon thee more, 10
 Never have relish in the faery power
 Of unreflecting love!—then on the shore
 Of the wide world I stand alone, and think
 Till Love and Fame to nothingness do sink.

Bright Star! Would I Were Steadfast as Thou Art

Bright star! would I were steadfast as thou art—
 Not in lone splendor hung aloft the night,
 And watching, with eternal lids apart,
 Like Nature's patient sleepless Eremite,
 The moving waters at their priestlike task 5
 Of pure ablation round earth's human shores,
 Or gazing on the new soft-fallen mask
 Of snow upon the mountains and the moors—

No—yet still steadfast, still unchangeable,
 Pillowed upon my fair love's ripening breast, 10
 To feel forever its soft fall and swell,
 Awake forever in a sweet unrest,
 Still, still to hear her tender-taken breath,
 And so live ever—or else swoon to death.

From Endymion

BOOK I

PROEM

A thing of beauty is a joy for ever:
 Its loveliness increases; it will never Pass into nothingness; but still will keep
 A bower quiet for us, and a sleep
 Full of sweet dreams, and health, and quiet 5 breathing.

Therefore, on every morrow, are we wreathing
 A flowery band to bind us to the earth.
 Spite of despondence, of the inhuman dearth
 Of noble natures, of the gloomy days,
 Of all the unhealthy and o'er-darkened ways 10
 Made for our searching: yes, in spite of all,
 Some shape of beauty moves away the pall
 From our dark spirits. Such the sun, the moon,
 Trees old and young, sprouting a shady boon
 For simple sheep; and such are daffodils 15
 With the green world they live in; and clear rills
 That for themselves a cooling covert make
 'Gainst the hot season; the mid-forest brake,
 Rich with a sprinkling of fair musk-rose blooms:
 And such too is the grandeur of the dooms 20
 We have imagined for the mighty dead;
 All lovely tales that we have heard or read:
 An endless fountain of immortal drink,
 Pouring unto us from the heaven's brink.

Nor do we merely feel these essences 25
 For one short hour; no, even as the trees
 That whisper round a temple become soon
 Dear as the temple's self, so does the moon,
 The passion poesy, glories infinite,
 Haunt us till they become a cheering light 30
 Unto our souls, and bound to us so fast,

Keats, On the Grasshopper and Cricket. John Keats (1795-1821) was born in London and trained as a surgeon. He wrote most of his poems between 1815 and 1821. He died in Rome, where he had gone in hopes of recovering his health.

That, whether there be shine, or gloom o'ercast,
They always must be with us, or we die.

Therefore, 'tis with full happiness that I
Will trace the story of Endymion.
The very music of the name has gone
Into my being, and each pleasant scene
Is growing fresh before me as the green
Of our own valleys: so I will begin
Now while I cannot hear the city's din;
Now while the early budders are just new,
And run in mazes of the youngest hue
About old forests; while the willow trails
Its delicate amber; and the dairy pails
Bring home increase of milk. And, as the year
Grows lush in juicy stalks, I'll smoothly steer
My little boat, for many quiet hours,
With streams that deepen freshly into bowers.
Many and many a verse I hope to write,
Before the daisies, vermeil rimm'd and white,
Hide in deep herbage; and ere yet the bees
Hum about gloves of clover and sweet peas,
I must be near the middle of my story.
O may no wintry season, bare and hoary,
See it half finished: but let Autumn bold,
With universal tinge of sober gold,
Be all about me when I make an end.
And now at once, adventuresome, I send
My herald thought into a wilderness:
There let its trumpet blow, and quickly dress
My uncertain path with green, that I may speed
Easily onward, thorough flowers and weed.

Ode on a Grecian Urn

Thou still unravished bride of quietness,
Thou foster-child of silence and slow time,
Silvan historian, who canst thus express
A flowery tale more sweetly than our rhyme:
What leaf-fringed legend haunts about thy shape
Of deities or mortals, or of both,
In Tempe or the dales of Arcady?
What men or gods are these? What maidens loath?
What mad pursuit? What struggle to escape?
What pipes and timbrels? What wild ecstasy?

Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard
Are sweeter; therefore, ye soft pipes, play on;
Not to the sensual ear, but, more endeared,
Pipe to the spirit ditties of no tone;

Fair youth, beneath the trees, thou canst not leave

Thy song, nor ever can those trees be bare;
Bold lover, never, never canst thou kiss

35 Though winning near the goal—yet, do not grieve;
She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,
Forever wilt thou love, and she be fair! 20

Ah, happy, happy boughs! that cannot shed
Your leaves, nor ever bid the Spring adieu;
And, happy melodist, unwearied,
Forever piping songs forever new;
More happy love! more happy, happy love! 25
Forever warm and still to be enjoyed,
Forever panting, and forever young,
All breathing human passion far above,
That leaves a heart high-sorrowful and cloyed,
A burning forehead, and a parching tongue. 30

Who are these coming to the sacrifice?
To what green altar, O mysterious priest,
Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the skies,
And all her silken flanks with garlands dressed?
What little town by river or sea shore, 35
Or mountain-built with peaceful citadel,
Is emptied of this folk, this pious morn?
And, little town, thy streets for evermore
Will silent be; and not a soul to tell
Why thou art desolate, can e'er return. 40

O Attic shape! Fair attitude! with brede
Of marble men and maidens overwrought,
With forest branches and the trodden weed;
Thou, silent form, dost tease us out of thought
As doth eternity. Cold Pastoral! 45
When old age shall this generation waste,
Thou shalt remain, in midst of other woe
Than ours, a friend to man, to whom thou say'st,
"Beauty is truth, truth beauty"—that is all 49
Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know.

Ode to a Nightingale

My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains
My sense, as though of hemlock I had drunk,
Or emptied some dull opiate to the drains
One minute past, and Lethe-wards had sunk.
'Tis not through envy of thy happy lot, 5
But being too happy in thine happiness—
That thou, light wingéd Dryad of the trees,
In some melodious plot
Of beechen green, and shadows numberless,
Singest of summer in full-throated ease. 10

Oh, for a draught of vintage that hath been Cooled a long age in the deep-delved earth,
 Tasting of Flora and the country green,
 Dance, and Provençal song, and sun-burnt mirth!

Oh, for a beaker full of the warm South, 15
 Full of the true, the blushful Hippocrene,
 With beaded bubbles winking at the brim,
 And purple-stained mouth;
 That I might drink, and leave the world unseen,
 And with thee fade away into the forest dim— 20

Fade far away, dissolve, and quite forget
 What thou among the leaves hast never known,
 The weariness, the fever, and the fret
 Here, where men sit and hear each other groan;
 Where palsy shakes a few, sad, last gray hairs, 25
 Where youth grows pale, and specter-thin, and dies;
 Where but to think is to be full of sorrow
 And leaden-eyed despairs,
 Where Beauty cannot keep her lustrous eyes,
 Or new Love pine at them beyond tomorrow. 30

Away! away! for I will fly to thee,
 Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards,
 But on the viewless wings of Poesy,
 Though the dull brain perplexes and retards:
 Already with thee! tender is the night, 35
 And haply the Queen-Moon is on her throne,
 Clustered around by all her starry Fays;
 But here there is no light,
 Save what from heaven is with the breezes
 blown
 Through verdurous glooms and winding,
 mossy ways. 40

I cannot see what flowers are at my feet,
 Nor what soft incense hangs upon the boughs,
 But, in embalméd darkness, guess each sweet
 Wherewith the seasonable month endows
 The grass, the thicket, and the fruit-tree wild; 45
 White hawthorn, and the pastoral eglantine;
 Fast fading violets covered up in leaves;
 And mid-May's eldest child,
 The coming musk-rose, full of dewy wine,
 The murmurous haunt of flies on summer
 eves. 50

Darkling I listen; and, for many a time
 I have been half in love with easeful Death,
 Called him soft names in many a muséd rime,

To take into the air my quiet breath;
 Now more than ever seems it rich to die, 55
 To cease upon the midnight with no pain,
 While thou art pouring forth thy soul abroad
 In such an ecstasy!
 Still wouldst thou sing, and I have ears in vain—
 To thy high requiem become a sod. 60

Thou wast not born for death, immortal Bird!
 No hungry generations tread thee down;
 The voice I hear this passing night was heard
 In ancient days by emperor and clown:
 Perhaps the self-same song that found a path 65
 Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home,
 She stood in tears amid the alien corn;
 The same that oftentimes hath
 Charmed magic casements, opening on the foam
 Of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn. 70

Forlorn! the very word is like a bell
 To toll me back from thee to my sole self!
 Adieu! the fancy cannot cheat so well
 As she is fabled to do, deceiving elf.
 Adieu! adieu! thy plaintive anthem fades 75
 Past the near meadows, over the still stream,
 Up the hillside; and now 'tis buried deep
 In the next valley-glades:
 Was it a vision, or a waking dream?
 Fled is that music—do I wake or sleep? 80

To Autumn

Season of mist and mellow fruitfulness,
 Close bosom-friend of the maturing sun;
 Conspiring with him how to load and bless
 With fruit the vines that round the thatch-eves run;
 To bend with apples the mossed cottage-trees, 5
 And fill all fruit with ripeness to the core;
 To swell the gourd, and plump the hazel shells
 With a sweet kernel; to set budding more,
 And still more, later flowers for the bees,
 Until they think warm days will never cease, 10
 For summer has o'er-brimmed their clammy cells.

Who hath not seen thee oft amid thy store?
 Sometimes whoever seeks abroad may find
 Thee sitting careless on a granary floor,
 Thy hair soft-lifted by the winnowing wind; 15
 Or on a half-reaped furrow sound asleep,

Drowsted with the fume of poppies, while thy hook
 Spares the next swath and all its twinéd flowers
 And sometimes like a gleaner thou dost keep Steady thy laden head across a brook; 20
 Or by a cider-press, with patient look,
 Thou watchest the last ooziings hours by hours.
 Where are the songs of spring? Aye, where are they?

Think not of them, thou hast thy music too—
 While barréd clouds bloom the soft-dying day, 25
 And touch the stubble-plains with rosy hue;
 Then in a wailful choir the small gnats mourn
 Among the river shallows, borne aloft
 Or sinking as the light wind lives or dies;
 And full-grown lambs loud bleat from hilly
 bourn; 30
 Hedge-crickets sing; and now with treble soft
 The redbreast whistles from a garden-croft;
 And gathering swallows twitter in the skies.

FROM LAMB TO STEVENSON

Just as the rise of the periodical essay at the beginning of the eighteenth century inaugurated a long and important series of prose writings, so the new literary magazines and critical journals which began to appear shortly after 1800 offered an avenue of publication which stimulated the efforts of an able new generation of essayists.

To most readers the pleasantest writer of essays of the early nineteenth century is Charles Lamb. He was distinctly a city man who enjoyed the companionship of many other London writers. Compelled to make a living as a clerk at the India House and resigned to bachelorhood in order to care for his brilliant, but occasionally insane, sister, he found time for extensive reading and for the writing of some of the most charmingly personal essays in the language. He had become so familiar with the prose writers of the seventeenth century that he thought of them as old friends and almost unconsciously fell into their terms of expression, so that at times his essays have a quaint, archaic flavor. Through them we become acquainted with his sister Mary (whom he speaks of as his cousin Bridget) and, above all, with himself. For Lamb is one of those writers whose personality is quite as important to the reader as anything he wrote.

Two important writers of Lamb's generation were William Hazlitt and Thomas De Quincey. Hazlitt's most important contributions were his critical studies, in which he displayed rare powers of literary judgment. Nevertheless, he is perhaps remembered best by most readers for one or two familiar essays, where we seem to become acquainted with the man himself. He has one excellent account of a prize fight and another of his first acquaintance with Wordsworth and Coleridge. A good illustration of these familiar essays is his On Going a Journey. As a master of English prose, Hazlitt has been justly admired. A half century after his death Robert Louis Stevenson was to say, "We are all mighty fine fellows, but none of us can write like Hazlitt."

De Quincey also wrote some critical prose, particularly a very able discussion of the literature of knowledge and the literature of power. His lasting reputation, however, rests on his Confessions of an English Opium Eater in which he gives a vivid account of his experiences with the drug. His style everywhere is highly rhetorical, never more so than in the eloquent periods of Levana and Our Ladies of Sorrow.

Beginning with about 1830 a new generation of authors arose in England, whom we know as Victorians. Among these were several outstanding writers of the essay. Thomas Carlyle, the first to claim our attention, began his literary work in Scotland, but after his first literary accomplishments he settled in London and wrote busily for half a century. Much of this time was spent with large works taking years of preparation, such as his History of the French Revolution and his Life of Frederick the Great. His essay, Labor, is, however, a good example of his miscellaneous social and ethical writings. Carlyle was one of the most picturesque figures of his generation, and this fact, along with his extraordinary intellectual powers and his vigorous and unconventional manner of writing, impressed his contemporaries to such an extent that he came to be looked upon as a sage or prophet.

FROM LAMB TO STEVENSON

A real history of the Victorian essay would certainly discuss the critical and controversial papers of John Henry Newman (later Cardinal Newman), the ethical and æsthetic writings of John Ruskin, and the choice prose of Walter Pater. We are representing the later Victorian period by the writings of Arnold and Stevenson. Matthew Arnold is perhaps the most penetrating literary critic who has written in English. His essays, Hebraism and Hellenism and On Celtic Literature, have already appeared at appropriate places in this book (pp. 4 and 521, above). In his religious essays he did much toward reconciling new scientific ideas with a truly religious attitude; in his social studies he was a positive force in opposition to the vulgarity of the newly enriched middle classes in England. During his forty years of writing and lecturing he never ceased to use all his efforts in the direction of what he called "sweetness and light," that is, goodwill and intelligence.

Robert Louis Stevenson is perhaps best known for his novels and short stories. His Treasure Island is beloved of every schoolboy, and such stories as "Will of the Mill" and "The Sire de Maletroit's Door" appear in many anthologies and maintain undiminished popularity. To many of his readers, however, he is first thought of as an essayist. He tells us how he trained himself as a writer of prose by imitating now one great master, now another. But at the end of all this training there remained something which was his own—a style quite as recognizable as that of any of the masters at whose feet he had sat. There is really a great variety to his productions, as anyone will see who reads his descriptive sketches in his Travels with a Donkey, his reminiscences of boyhood in Edinburgh, his literary criticism in A Gossip on Romance, his whimsical and homely wisdom in On Falling in Love, or his romanticism in Eldorado. Many of his readers feel that his greatest achievement is that seemingly pessimistic, but really optimistic, discourse on the basic nobility of man, which he calls Pulvis et Umbra. Writers of our own generation are likely to be scornful of Stevenson's elaborate rhetoric, but though it is hard to know how a future generation may judge, it seems safe to say that Stevenson's position as an English essayist is permanently established.

CHARLES LAMB

Dream-Children: A Reverie

Children love to listen to stories about their elders, when they were children; to stretch their imagination to the conception of a traditionary great-uncle or grandame, whom they never saw. It was in this spirit that my little ones crept about me the other evening to hear about their great-grandmother Field, who lived in a great house in Norfolk (a hundred times bigger than that in which they and papa lived) which had been the scene—so at least it was generally believed in that part of the country—of the tragic incidents which they had lately become familiar with from the ballad of the Children in the Wood. Certain it is that the whole story of the children and their cruel uncle was to be seen fairly carved out in wood upon the chimneypiece of the great hall, the whole story down to the Robin Redbreasts, till a foolish rich person pulled it down to set up a marble one of modern invention in its stead, with no story upon it. Here Alice put out one of her dear mother's looks, too tender to be called upbraiding. Then I went on to say how religious and how good their great-grandmother Field was, how beloved and respected by everybody, though she was not indeed the mistress of this great house, but had only the charge of it (and yet in some respects she might be said to be the mistress of it, too) committed to her by the owner, who preferred living in a newer and more fashionable mansion which he had purchased somewhere in the adjoining county; but still she lived in it in a manner as if it had been her own, and kept up the dignity of the great house in a sort while she lived, which afterwards came to decay, and was nearly pulled down, and all its old ornaments stripped and carried away to the owner's other house, where they were set up, and looked as awkward as if someone were to carry away the old tombs they had seen lately at the Abbey, and stick them up in Lady C.'s tawdry gilt drawing-room. Here John smiled, as much as to say, "That would be foolish indeed." And then I told how, when she came to die, her funeral was attended by a concourse of all the poor, and some of the gentry, too, of the neighborhood for many miles round, to show their respect for her memory, because she had been such a good and religious woman; so good indeed that she knew all the Psalter by heart, aye, and a great part of the Testament besides. Here little Alice spread her hands. Then I told what a tall, upright, graceful person their great-grandmother Field once was; and how in her youth she was esteemed the best dancer—here Alice's little right foot played an involuntary movement, till upon my looking grave, it desisted—the best dancer, I was saying, in the county, till a cruel disease, called a cancer, came, and bowed her down with pain; but it could never bend her good spirits, or make them stoop, but they were still upright, because she was so good and religious. Then I told how she was used to sleep by herself in a lone chamber of the great lone house; and how she believed that an apparition of two infants was to be seen at midnight gliding up and down the great staircase near where she slept, but she said "those innocents would do her no harm"; and how frightened I used to be, though in those days I had my maid to sleep with me, because I was never half so good or religious as she—and yet I never saw the infants. Here John expanded all his eyebrows and tried to look courageous. Then I told how good she was to all her grand-children, having us to the great house in the holidays, where I in particular used to spend many hours by myself, in gazing upon the old busts of the Twelve Cæsars, that had been Emperors of Rome, till the old marble heads would seem to live again, or I to be turned into marble with them; how I never could be tired with roaming about that huge mansion, with its vast empty rooms, with their worn-out hangings, fluttering tapestry, and carved oaken panels, with the gilding almost rubbed out—sometimes in the spacious old-fashioned gardens, which I had almost to myself, unless when now and then a solitary gardening man would cross me—and how the nectarines and peaches hung upon the walls, without my ever offering to pluck them because they were forbidden fruit, unless now and then—and because I had more pleasure in strolling about among the old melancholy-looking yew trees, or the firs, and picking up the red berries, and the fir apples, which were good for nothing but to look at—or in lying about upon the fresh grass, with all the fine garden smells around me—or basking in the orangery, till I could almost fancy myself ripening, too, along with the oranges and the limes in that grateful warmth—or in watching the dace that darted to and fro in the fishpond, at the bottom of the garden, with here and there a great sulky pike hanging midway down the water in silent state, as if it mocked at their impertinent friskings—I had more pleasure in these busy-idle diversions than in all the sweet flavors of peaches, nectarines, oranges, and such like common baits of children. Here John slyly deposited back upon the plate a bunch of grapes, which, not unobserved by Alice, ²⁰ he had meditated dividing with her, and both seemed willing to relinquish them for the present as irrelevant. Then in somewhat a more heightened tone I told how, though their great-grandmother Field loved all her grand-children, yet in an especial manner she might be said to love their uncle, John L—, because he was so handsome and spirited a youth, and a king to the rest of us; and, instead of moping about in solitary corners, like some of us, he would mount the most mettlesome horse he could get when but an imp no bigger than themselves, and make it carry him half ³⁰ over the county in a morning, and join the hunters when there were any out—and yet he loved the old great house and gardens, too, but had too much spirit to be always pent up within their boundaries—and how their uncle grew up to man's estate as brave as he was handsome, to the admiration of everybody, but of their great-grandmother Field most especially; and how he used to carry me ⁴⁰ upon his back when I was a lame-footed boy—for he was a good bit older than me—many a mile when I could not walk for pain—and how in after life he became lame-footed, too, and I did not always (I fear) make allowances enough for him when he was impatient, and in pain, nor remember sufficiently how considerate he had been to me when I was lame-footed; and how when he died, though he had not been dead an hour, it seemed as if he had died a great while ago, such a distance there is betwixt life and death; and how I bore his death as I thought pretty well at first, but afterwards it haunted and haunted me; and though I did not cry or take it to heart as some do, and as I think he would have done if I had died, yet I missed him all day long, and knew not till then how much I had loved him. I missed his kindness, and I missed his crossness, and wished him to be alive again, to be quarreling with him (for we quarreled sometimes), rather than not have him again, and was as uneasy without him as he their poor uncle must have been when the doctor took off his limb. Here the children fell a-crying, and asked if their little mourning which they had on was not for uncle John, and they looked up, and prayed me not to go on about their uncle, but to tell them some stories about their pretty dead mother. Then I told how for seven long years, in hope sometimes, sometimes in despair, yet persisting ever, I courted the fair Alice W—n; and, as much as children could understand, I explained to them what coyness, and difficulty, and denial meant in maidens—when suddenly, turning to Alice, the soul of the first Alice looked out at her eyes with such a reality of re-presentment, that I became in doubt which of them stood there before ^{me}, or whose that bright hair was; and while I stood gazing, both the children gradually grew fainter to my view, receding, and still receding till nothing at last but two mournful features were seen in the uttermost distance, which, without speech, strangely impressed upon me the effects of speech: "We are not of Alice, nor of thee, nor are we children at all. The children of Alice called Bartrum father. We are nothing; less than nothing, and dreams. We are only what might ^{have been}, and must wait upon the tedious shores of Lethe millions of ages before we have existence, and a name"—and immediately awaking, I found myself quietly seated in my bachelor armchair, where I had fallen asleep, with the faithful Bridget unchanged by my side—but John L. (or James Elia) was gone forever.

Lamb, Dream Children. Charles Lamb (1775-1834) was for most of his life a clerk in the India House. His sister Mary kept house for him and made the home a center for the leading literary men of the day.

Old China

I have an almost feminine partiality for old china. When I go to see any great house, I inquire for the china-closet, and next for the picture-gallery. I cannot defend the order of preference but by saying that we have all some taste or other, of too ancient a date to admit of our remembering distinctly that it was an acquired one. I can call to mind the first play, and the first exhibition, that I was taken to; but I am not conscious of a time when china jars and saucers were introduced into my imagination.

I had no repugnance then—why should I now have?—to those little, lawless, azure-tinctured grotesques that, under the notion of men and women, float about, uncircumscribed by any element, in that world before perspective—a china teacup.

I like to see my old friends—whom distance cannot diminish—figuring up in the air (so they appear to our optics), yet on terra firma still—for so we must in courtesy interpret that speck of deeper blue, which the decorous artist, to prevent absurdity, had made to spring up beneath their sandals.

I love the men with women's faces, and the women, if possible, with still more womanish expressions.

Here is a young and courtly Mandarin, handing tea to a lady from a salver—two miles off. See how distance seems to set off respect! And here the same lady, or another—for likeness is identity on teacups—is stepping into a little fairy boat, moored on the hither side of this calm garden river, with a dainty mincing foot, which in a right angle of incidence (as angles go in our world) must infallibly land her in the midst of a flowery mead—a furlong off on the other side of the same strange stream!

Farther on—if far or near can be predicated of their world—see horses, trees, pagodas, dancing the hays.

Here—a cow and rabbit couchant, and coextensive—so objects show, seen through the lucid atmosphere of fine Cathay.

I was pointing out to my cousin last evening, over our Hyson (which we are old-fashioned enough to drink unmixed still of an afternoon), some of these speciosa miracula upon a set of extraordinary old blue china (a recent purchase) which we were now for the first time using; and could not help remarking how favorable circumstances had been to us of late years, that we could afford to please the eye sometimes with trifles of this sort—when a passing sentiment seemed to overshadow the brows of my companion. I am quick at detecting these summer clouds in Bridget.

"I wish the good old times would come again," she said, "when we were not quite so rich. I do not mean that I want to be poor; but there was a middle state"—so she was pleased to ramble on—"in which I am sure we were a great deal happier. A purchase is but a purchase, now that you have money enough and to spare. Formerly it used to be a triumph. When we coveted a cheap luxury (and O! how much ado I had to get you to consent in those times!)—we were used to have a debate two or three days before, and to weigh the for and against, and think what we might spare it out of, and what saving we could hit upon, that should be an equivalent. A thing was worth buying then, when we felt the money that we paid for it.

"Do you remember the brown suit which you made to hang upon you till all your friends cried shame upon you, it grew so threadbare—and all because of that folio Beaumont and Fletcher, which you dragged home late at night from Barker's in Covent Garden? Do you remember how we eyed it for weeks before we could make up our minds to the purchase, and had not come to a determination till it was near ten o'clock of the Saturday night, when you set off from Islington, fearing you should be too late—and when the old bookseller with some grumbling opened his shop, and by the twinkling taper (for he was setting bedward) lighted out the relic from his dusty treasures—and when you lugged it home, wishing it were twice as cumbersome—and when you presented it to me—and when we were exploring the perfectness of it (collating, you called it)—and while I was repairing some of the loose leaves with paste, which your impatience would not suffer to be left till daybreak—was there no pleasure in being a poor man? Or can those neat black clothes which you wear now, and are so careful to keep brushed, since we have become rich and finical—give you half the honest vanity with which you flaunted it about in that overworn suit—your old corbeau—for four or five weeks longer than you should have done, to pacify your conscience for the mighty sum of fifteen—or sixteen shillings was it?—a great affair we thought it then—which you had lavished on the old folio. Now you can afford to buy any book that pleases you, but I do not see that you ever bring me home any nice old purchases now.

“When you came home with twenty apologies for laying out a less number of shillings upon that print after Lionardo, which we christened the ‘Lady Blanch’; when you looked at the purchase, and thought of the money—and thought of the money, and looked again at the picture—was there no pleasure in being a poor man? Now you have nothing to do but to walk into Colnaghi’s, and buy a wilderness of Lionardos. Yet do you?”

“Then, do you remember our pleasant walks to Enfield, and Potter’s Bar, and Waltham, when we had a holiday—holidays and all other fun are gone now we are rich—and the little hand-basket in which I used to deposit our day’s fare of savory cold lamb and salad—and how you would pry about at noontide for some decent house, where we might go in and produce our store—only paying for the ale that you must call for—and speculate upon the looks of the landlady, and whether she was likely to allow us a tablecloth—and wish for such another honest hostess as Izaak Walton has described many a one on the pleasant banks of the Lea, when he went a-fishing—and sometimes they would prove obliging enough, and sometimes they would look grudgingly upon us—³⁰ but we had cheerful looks still for one another, and would eat our plain food savorily, scarcely grudging Piscator¹ his Trout Hall? Now—when we go out a day’s pleasuring, which is seldom, moreover, we ride part of the way, and go into a fine inn, and order the best of dinners, never debating the expense—which, after all, never has half the relish of those chance country snaps, when we were at the mercy of uncertain usage, and a precarious welcome.

“You are too proud to see a play anywhere now but in the pit. Do you remember where it was we used to sit, when we saw the Battle of Hexham, and the Surrender of Calais, and Bannister and Mrs. Bland in the Children in the Wood—when we squeezed out our shillings apiece to sit three or four times in a season in the one-shilling gallery—where you felt all the time that you ought not to have brought me—and more strongly I felt obligation to you for having brought me—and the pleasure was the better for a little shame—and when the curtain drew up, what cared we for our place in the house, or what mattered it where we were sitting, when our thoughts were with Rosalind in Arden,² or with Viola at the Court of Illyria? You used to say that the gallery was the best place of all for enjoying a play socially—that the relish of such exhibitions must be in proportion to the infrequency of going—that the company we met there, not being in general readers of plays, were obliged to attend the more, and did attend, to what was going on, on the stage—because a word lost would have been a chasm, which it was impossible for them to fill up. With such reflections we consoled our pride then—and I appeal to you whether, as a woman, I met generally with less attention and accommodation than I have done since in more expensive situations in the house? The getting in, indeed, and the crowding up those inconvenient staircases, was bad enough—but there was still a law of civility to woman recognized to quite as great an extent as we ever found in the other passages—and how a little difficulty overcome heightened the snug seat and the play, afterwards! Now we can only pay our money and walk in. You cannot see, you say, in the galleries now. I am sure we saw, and heard, too, well enough then—but sight, and all, I think, is gone with our poverty.

“There was pleasure in eating strawberries, before they became quite common—in the first dish of peas, while they were yet dear—to have them for a nice supper, a treat. What treat can we have now? If we were to treat ourselves now—that is, to have dainties a little above our means, it would be selfish and wicked. It is the very little more that we allow ourselves beyond what the actual poor can get at that makes what I call a treat—when two people, living together as we have done, now and then indulge themselves in a cheap luxury, which both like; while each apologizes, and is willing to take both halves of the blame to his single share. I see no harm in people making much of themselves, in that sense of the word. It may give them a hint how to make much of others. But now—what I mean by the word—we never do make much of ourselves. None but the poor can do it. I do not mean the veriest poor of all, but persons as we were, just above poverty.

“I know what you were going to say, that it is mighty pleasant at the end of the year to make all meet—and much ado we used to have every thirty-first night of December to account for our exceedings—many a long face did you make over your puzzled accounts, and in contriving to make it out how we had spent so much—or that we had not spent so much—or that it was impossible we should spend so much next year—and still we found our slender capital decreasing—but then—betwixt ways, and projects, and compromises of one sort or another, and talk of curtailing this charge, and doing without that for the future—and the hope that youth brings, and laughing spirits (in which you were never poor till now), we pocketed up our loss, and in conclusion, with ‘lusty brimmers’ (as you used to quote it out of heartly cheerful Mr. Cotton, as you called him), we used to welcome in the ‘coming guest.’ Now we have no reckoning at all at the end of the old year—no flattering promises about the new year doing better for us.”

¹ Piscator, the fisherman in Izaak Walton’s Compleat Angler, and his favorite inn, Trout Hall.

² References to Shakespeare’s As You Like It and Twelfth Night.

Bridget is so sparing of her speech on most occasions that when she gets into a rhetorical vein, I am careful how I interrupt it. I could not help, however, smiling at the phantom of wealth which her dear imagination had conjured up out of a clear income of poor — hundred pounds a year. “It is true we were happier when we were poorer, but we were also younger, my cousin. I am afraid we must put up with the excess, for if we were to shake the superflux into the sea, we should not much mend ourselves. That we had much to struggle with, as we grew up together, we have reason to be most thankful. It strengthened and knit our compact closer. We could never have been what we have been to each other if we had always had the sufficiency which you now complain of. The resisting power—those natural dilations of the youthful spirit, which circumstances cannot straiten—with us are long since passed away. Competence to age is supplementary youth, a sorry supplement indeed, but I fear the best that is to be had. We must ride where we formerly walked; live better and lie softer—and shall be wise to do so—than we had means to do in those good old days you speak of. Yet could those days return—could you and I once more walk our thirty miles a day—could Bannister and Mrs. Bland again be young, and you and I be young to see them—could the good old one-shilling gallery days return—they are dreams, my cousin, now—but could you and I at this moment, instead of this quiet argument, by our well-carpeted fireside, sitting on this luxurious sofa—be once more struggling up those inconvenient 20 staircases, pushed about and squeezed, and elbowed by the poorest rabble of poor gallery scramblers—could I once more hear those anxious shrieks of yours—and the delicious Thank God, we are safe, which always followed when the topmost stair, conquered, let in the first light of the whole cheerful theater down beneath us—I know not the fathom line that ever touched a descent so deep as I would be willing to bury more wealth in than Cræsus had, or the great Jew R— is supposed to have, to purchase it. And now do just look at that merry little Chinese waiter holding an umbrella, big enough for a bed-tester, over the head of that pretty insipid half Madonna-ish chit of a lady in that very blue summer-house.”

WILLIAM HAZLITT

On Going a Journey

One of the pleasantest things in the world is going a journey; but I like to go by myself. I can enjoy society in a room; but out-of-doors, Nature is company enough for me. I am then never less alone than when alone.

The fields his study, Nature was his book.

I cannot see the wit of walking and talking at the same time. When I am in the country, I wish to vegetate like the country. I am not for criticizing hedgerows and black cattle. I go out of town in order to forget the town and all that is in it. There are those who for this purpose go to watering-places, and carry the metropolis with them. I Hazlitt, On Going a Journey. William Hazlitt (1778-1830) was born in Kent and lived an uneventful life as a literary critic and essay writer.

like more elbow-room, and fewer incumbrances. I like solitude, when I give myself up to it, for the sake of solitude; nor do I ask for a friend in my retreat,

Whom I may whisper, solitude is sweet.

The soul of a journey is liberty, perfect liberty, to think, feel, do just as one pleases. We go a journey chiefly to be free of all impediments and of all inconveniences; to leave ourselves behind, much more to get rid of others. It is because I want a little breathing-space to muse on indifferent matters, where Contemplation

May plume her feathers and let grow her wings,
That in the various bustle of resort
Were all too ruffled, and sometimes impaired, that I absent myself from the town for a while, without feeling at a loss the moment I am left by myself. Instead of a friend in a post-chaise or in a Tilbury, to exchange good things with and vary the same stale topics over again, for once let me have a truce with impertinence. Give me the clear blue sky over my head, and the green turf beneath my feet, a winding road before me, and a three hours' march to dinner—and then to thinking! It is hard if I cannot start some game on these lone heaths. I laugh, I run, I leap, I sing for joy. From the point of yonder rolling cloud I plunge into my past being, and revel there, as the sunburnt Indian plunges headlong into the wave that wafts him to his native shore. Then long-forgotten things, like "sunken wrack and sumless treasures," burst upon my eager sight, and I begin to feel, think, and be myself again. Instead of an awkward silence, broken by attempts at wit or dull commonplaces, mine is that undisturbed silence of the heart which alone is perfect eloquence. No one likes puns, alliterations, antitheses, argument, and analysis better than I do; but I sometimes had rather be without them. "Leave, oh, leave me to my repose!" I have just now other business in hand, which would seem idle to you, but is with me "very stuff o' the conscience." Is not this wild rose sweet without a comment? Does not this daisy leap to my heart set in its coat of emerald? Yet if I were to explain to you the circumstance that has so endeared it to me, you would only smile. Had I not better then keep it to myself, and let it serve me to brood over, from here to yonder craggy point, and from thence onward to the far-distant horizon? I should be bad company all that way, and therefore prefer being alone. I have heard it said that you may,

when the moody fit comes on, walk or ride on by yourself, and indulge your reveries. But this looks like a breach of manners, as neglect of others, and you are thinking all the time that you ought to rejoin your party. "Out upon such half-faced fellowship," say I. I like to be either entirely to myself, or entirely at the disposal of others; to talk or be silent, to walk or sit still, to be sociable or solitary. I was pleased with an observation of Mr. Cobbett's, that he thought it a bad French custom to drink our wine with our meals, and that an Englishman ought to do only one thing at a time. So I cannot talk and think, or indulge in melancholy musing and lively conversation, by fits and starts. "Let me have a companion of my way," says Sterne, "were it but to remark how the shadows lengthen as the sun declines." It is beautifully said; but in my opinion this continual comparing of notes interferes with the involuntary impression of things upon the mind, and hurts the sentiment. If you only hint what you feel in a kind of dumb show, it is insipid; if you have to explain it, it is making a toil of a pleasure. You cannot read the book of Nature without being perpetually put to the trouble of translating it for the benefit of others. I am for the synthetical method on a journey in preference to the analytical. I am content to lay in a stock of ideas then, and to examine and anatomize them afterwards. I want to see my vague notions float like the down of the thistle before the breeze, and not to have them entangled in the briars and thorns of controversy. For once, I like to have it all my own way; and this is impossible unless you are alone, or in such company as I do not covet. I have no objection to argue a point with anyone for twenty miles of measured road, but not for pleasure. If you remark the scent of a bean-field crossing the road, perhaps your fellow-traveler has no smell. If you point to a distant object, perhaps he is short-sighted, and has to take out his glass to look at it. There is a feeling in the air, a tone in the color of a cloud which hits your fancy, but the effect of which you are unable to account for. There is then no sympathy, but an uneasy craving after it, and a dissatisfaction which pursues you on the way, and in the end probably produces ill-humor. Now I never quarrel with myself, and take all my own conclusions for granted till I find it necessary to defend them against objections. It is not merely that you may not be of accord on the objects and circumstances that present themselves before you—these may recall a number of objects, and lead to associations too delicate and refined to be possibly communicated to others. Yet these I love to cherish, and sometimes still fondly clutch them, when I can escape from the throng to do so. To give way to our feelings before company seems extravagance or affectation; and on the other hand, to have to unravel this mystery of our being at every turn, and to make others take an equal interest in it—otherwise the end is not answered—is a task to which few are competent. We must “give it an understanding, but no tongue.” My old friend C—, however, could do both. He could go on in the most delightful explanatory way over hill and dale, a summer’s day, and convert a landscape into a didactic poem or a Pindaric ode. “He talked far above singing.” If I could so clothe my ideas in sounding and flowing words, I might perhaps wish to have someone with me to admire the swelling theme; or I could be more content, were it possible for me still to hear his echoing voice in the woods of All-Foxden. They had “that fine madness in them which our first poets had”; and if they could have been caught by some rare instrument, would have breathed such strains as the following:

Here be woods as green
As any, air likewise as fresh and sweet
As when smooth Zephyrus plays on the fleet
Face of the curled stream, with flowers as many
As the young spring gives, and as choice as any;
Here be all new delights, cool streams, and wells,
Arbors o’ergrown with woodbine, caves and dells;
Choose where thou wilt, while I sit by and sing,
Or gather rushes to make many a ring
For thy long fingers; tell thee tales of love—
How the pale Phœbe, hunting in a grove,
First saw the boy Endymion, from whose eyes
She took eternal fire that never dies;
How she conveyed him softly in a sleep,
His temples bound with poppy, to the steep
Head of old Latmos, where she stoops each night,
Gilding the mountain with her brother’s light,
To kiss her sweetest.

—Faithful Shepherdess.

Had I words and images at command like these, I would attempt to wake the thoughts that lie slumbering on golden ridges in the evening clouds; but at the sight of Nature my fancy, poor as it is, droops and closes up its leaves, like flowers at sunset. I can make nothing out on the spot—I must have time to collect myself.

In general, a good thing spoils out-of-door prospects; it should be reserved for table-talk. L— is for this reason, I take it, the worst company in the world out-of-doors; because he is the best within. I grant there is one subject on which it is pleasant to talk on a journey; and that is, what one shall have for supper when we get to our inn at night. The open air improves this sort of conversation or friendly altercation, by setting a keener edge on appetite. Every mile of the road heightens the flavor of the viands we expect at the end of it. How fine it is to enter some old town, walled and turreted, just at the approach of nightfall, or to come to some straggling village, with the lights streaming through the surrounding gloom; and then, after inquiring for the best entertainment that the place affords, to “take one’s ease at one’s inn”! These eventful moments in our lives’ history are too precious, too full of solid, heartfelt happiness, to be frittered and dribbled away in imperfect sympathy. I would have them all to myself, and drain them to the last drop; they will do to talk of or to write about afterwards. What a delicate speculation it is, after drinking whole goblets of tea—

The cups that cheer, but not inebriate, and letting the fumes ascend into the brain, to sit considering what we shall have for supper—eggs and a rasher, a rabbit smothered in onions, or an excellent veal cutlet! Sancho in such a situation once fixed upon cow-heel; and his choice, though he could not help it, is not to be disparaged. Then, in the intervals of pictured scenery and Shandean contemplation, to catch the preparation and the stir in the kitchen—*Procul, O procul este profani!*¹ These hours are sacred to silence and to musing, to be treasured up in the memory, and to feed the source of smiling thoughts hereafter. I would not waste them in idle talk; or if I must have the integrity of fancy broken in upon, I would rather it were by a stranger than a friend. A stranger takes his hue and character from the time and place; he is a part of the furniture and costume of an inn. If he is a Quaker or from the West Riding of Yorkshire, so much the better. I do not even try to sympathize with him, and he breaks no squares. I associate nothing with my traveling companion but present objects and passing events. In his ignorance of me and my affairs I in a manner forget myself. But a friend reminds one of other things, rips up old grievances, and destroys the abstraction of the scene. He comes in ungraciously between us and our imaginary character. Something is dropped in the course of conversation that gives a hint of your profession and pursuits; or from having someone with you that knows the less sublime portions of your history, it seems that other people do. You are no longer a citizen of the world; but your "unhoused, free condition is put into circumscription and confine." The incognito of an inn is one of its striking privileges—"lord of oneself, uncumbered with a name." Oh! it is great to shake off the trammels of the world and of public opinion—to lose our importunate, tormenting, everlasting personal identity in the elements of Nature, and become the creature of the moment, clear of all ties—to hold to the universe only by a dish of sweetbreads, and to owe nothing but the score of the evening—and no longer seeking for applause and meeting with contempt, to be known by no other title than the gentleman in the parlor! One may take one's choice of all characters in this romantic state of uncertainty as to one's real pretensions, and become indefinitely respectable and negatively right-worshipful. We baffle prejudice and disappoint conjecture; and from being so to others, begin to be objects of curiosity and wonder even to ourselves. We are no more those hackneyed commonplaces that we appear in the world; an inn restores us to the level of nature, and quits scores with society! I have certainly spent some enviable hours at inns—sometimes when I have been left entirely to myself, and have tried to solve some metaphysical problem, as once at Witham Common, where I found out the proof that likeness is not a case of the association of ideas—at other times, when there have been pictures in the room, as at St. Neot's—I think it was—where I first met with Gribelin's engravings of the Cartoons, into which I entered at once, and at a little inn on the borders of Wales, where there happened to be hanging some of Westall's drawings, which I compared triumphantly—for a theory that I had, not for the admired artist—with the figure of a girl who had ferried me over the Severn, standing up in a boat between me and the twilight—at other times I might mention luxuriating in books, with a peculiar interest in this way, as I remember sitting up half the night to read Paul and Virginia, which I picked up at an inn at Bridgewater, after being drenched in the rain all day; and at the same place I got through two volumes of Madame d'Arblay's Camilla. It was on the tenth of April, 1798, that I sat down to a volume of the New Eloise, at the inn at Llangollen, over a bottle of sherry and a cold chicken. The letter I chose was that in which St. Preux describes his feelings as he first caught a glimpse from the heights of the Jura de the Pays de Vaud, which I had brought with me as a bonne bouche to crown the evening with. It was my birthday, and I had for the first time come from a place in the neighborhood to visit this delightful spot. The road to Llangollen turns off between Chirk and Wrexham; and on passing a certain point you come all at once upon the valley, which opens like an amphitheater, broad, barren hills rising in majestic state on either side, with "green, upland swells that echo to the bleat of flocks" below, and the river Dee babbling over its stony bed in the midst of them. The valley at this time "glittered green with sunny showers," and a budding ash tree dipped its tender branches in the chiding stream. How proud, how glad I was to walk along the highroad that overlooks the delicious prospect, repeating the lines which I have just quoted from Mr. Coleridge's poems! But besides the prospect which opened beneath my feet, another also opened to my inward sight, a heavenly vision, on which were written, in letters large as Hope could make them, these four words, LIBERTY, GENIUS, LOVE, VIRTUE; which have since faded into the light of common day, or mock my idle gaze.

¹ Hence, O hence, ye profane.

The beautiful is vanished, and returns not.

Still I would return some time or other to this enchanted spot; but I would return to it alone. What other self could I find to share that influx of thoughts, of regret, and delight, the fragments of which I could hardly conjure up to myself, so much have they been broken and defaced! I could stand on some tall rock, and overlook the precipice of years that separates me from what I then was. I was at that time going shortly to visit the poet whom I have above named. Where is he now? Not only I myself have changed; the world, which was then new to me, has become old and incorrigible. Yet will I turn to thee in thought, O silvan Dee, in joy, in youth and gladness as thou wert; and thou shalt always be to me the river of Paradise, where I will drink of the waters of life freely!

There is hardly anything that shows the short-sightedness or capriciousness of the imagination more than traveling does. With change of place we change our ideas; nay, our opinions and feelings. We can by an effort indeed transport ourselves to old and long-forgotten scenes, and then the picture of the mind revives again; but we forget those that we have just left. It seems that we can think but of one place at a time. The canvas of the fancy is but of a certain extent, and if we paint one set of objects upon it, they immediately efface every other. We cannot enlarge our conceptions, we only shift our point of view. The landscape bares its bosom to the enraptured eye, we take our fill of it, and seem as if we could form no other image of beauty or grandeur. We pass on, and think no more of it; the horizon that shuts it from our sight also blots it from our memory like a dream. In traveling through a wild, barren country I can form no idea of a woody and cultivated one. It appears to me that all the world must be barren, like what I see of it. In the country we forget the town, and in town we despise the country. "Beyond Hyde Park," says Sir Fopling Flutter, "all is a desert." All that part of the map that we do not see before us is a blank. The world in our conceit of it is not much bigger than a nutshell. It is not one prospect expanded into another, county joined to county, kingdom to kingdom, lands to seas, making an image voluminous and vast; the mind can form no larger idea of space than the eye can take in at a single glance. The rest is a name written on a map, a calculation of arithmetic. For instance, what is the true signification of that immense mass of territory and population known by the name of China to us? An inch of pasteboard on a wooden globe, of no more account than a China orange! Things near us are seen of the size of life; things at a distance are diminished to the size of the understanding. We measure the universe by ourselves, and even comprehend the texture of our own being only piecemeal. In this way, however, we remember an infinity of things and places. The mind is like a mechanical instrument that plays a great variety of tunes, but it must play them in succession. One idea recalls another, but it at the same time excludes all others. In trying to renew old recollections we cannot, as it were, unfold the whole web of our existence; we must pick out the single threads. So, in coming to a place where we have formerly lived and with which we have intimate associations, everyone must have found that the feeling grows more vivid the nearer we approach the spot, from the mere anticipation of the actual impression: we remember circumstances, feelings, persons, faces, names, that we had not thought of for years; but for the time all the rest of the world is forgotten!

To return to the question I have quitted above.—I have no objection to go to see ruins, aqueducts, pictures, in company with a friend or a party, but rather the contrary, for the former reason reversed. They are intelligible matters, and will bear talking about. The sentiment here is not tacit, but communicable and overt. Salisbury Plain is barren of criticism, but Stonehenge will bear a discussion antiquarian, picturesque, and philosophical. In setting out on a party of pleasure the first consideration always is where we shall go to; in taking a solitary ramble the question is what we shall meet with by the way. "The mind is its own place"; nor are we anxious to arrive at the end of our journey. I can myself do the honors indifferently well to works of art and curiosity. I once took a party to Oxford with no mean éclat—showed them that seat of the Muses at a distance,

With glistening spires and pinnacles adorned, descanted on the learned air that breathes from the grassy quadrangles and stone walls of halls and cottages—was at home in the Bodleian; and at Blenheim quite superseded the powdered cicerone that attended us, and that pointed in vain with his wand to commonplace beauties in matchless pictures. As another exception to the above reasoning, I should not feel confident in venturing on a journey in a foreign country without a companion. I should want at intervals to hear the sound of my own language. There is an involuntary antipathy in the mind of an Englishman to foreign manners and notions that requires the assistance of social sympathy to carry it off. As the distance from home increases, this relief, which was at first a luxury, becomes a passion and an appetite. A person would almost feel stifled to find himself in the deserts of Arabia without friends and countrymen; there must be allowed to be something in the view of Athens or old Rome that claims the utterance of speech; and I own that the Pyramids are too mighty for any single contemplation. In such situations, so opposite to all one's ordinary train of ideas, one seems a species by oneself, a limb torn off from society, unless one can meet with instant fellowship and support. Yet I did not feel this want or craving very pressing once, when I first set my foot on the laughing shores of France. Calais was peopled with novelty and delight. The confused, busy murmur of the place was like oil and wine poured into my ears; nor did the mariners' hymn, which was sung from the top of an old crazy vessel in the harbor, as the sun went down, send an alien sound into my soul. I only breathed the air of general humanity. I walked over "the vine-covered hills and gay regions of France," erect and satisfied; for the image of man was not cast down and chained to the foot of arbitrary thrones. I was at no loss for language, for that of all the great schools of painting was open to me. The whole is vanished like a shade. Pictures, heroes, glory, freedom, all are fled; nothing remains but the Bourbons and the French people! —There is undoubtedly a sensation in traveling into foreign parts that is to be had nowhere else; but it is more pleasing at the time than lasting. It is too remote from our habitual associations to be a common topic of discourse or reference, and, like a dream or another state of existence, does not piece into our daily modes of life. It is an animated but a momentary hallucination. It demands an effort to exchange our actual for our ideal identity; and to feel the pulse of our old transports revive very keenly, we must "jump" all our present comforts and connections. Our romantic and itinerant character is not to be domesticated. Dr. Johnson remarked how little foreign travel added to the facilities of conversation in those who had been abroad. In fact, the time we have spent there is both delightful, and, in one sense, instructive; but it appears to be cut out of our substantial, down-right existence, and never to join kindly on to it. We are not the same, but another, and perhaps more enviable, individual, all the time we are out of our own country. We are lost to ourselves as well as our friends. So the poet somewhat quaintly sings,

Out of my country and myself I go.

Those who wish to forget painful thoughts do well to absent themselves for a while from the ties and objects that recall them; but we can be said only to fulfill our destiny in the place that gave us birth. I should on this account like well enough to spend the whole of my life in traveling abroad, if I could anywhere borrow another life to spend afterwards at home!

THOMAS DE QUINCEY

Levana and Our Ladies of Sorrow

Oftentimes at Oxford I saw Levana in my dreams. I knew her by her Roman symbols. Who is Levana? Reader, that do not pretend to have leisure for very much scholarship, you will not be angry with me for telling you. Levana was the Roman goddess that performed for the newborn infant the earliest office of ennobling kindness—typical, by its mode, of that grandeur which belongs to man everywhere, and of that benignity in powers invisible which even in pagan worlds sometimes descends to sustain it. At the very moment of birth, just as the infant tasted for the first time the atmosphere of our troubled planet, it was laid on the ground. That might bear different interpretations. But immediately, lest so grand a creature should grovel there for more than one instant, either the paternal hand, as proxy for the goddess Levana, or some near kinsman, as proxy for the father, raised it upright, bade it look erect as the king of all this world, and presented its forehead to the stars, saying, perhaps, in his heart, "Behold what is greater than yourselves!" This symbolic act represented the function of Levana. And that mysterious lady, who never revealed her face (except to me in dreams), but always acted by delegation, had her name from the Latin verb (as still it is the Italian verb) levare, to raise aloft.

This is the explanation of Levana. And hence it has arisen that some people have understood by Levana the tutelary power that controls the education of the nursery. She, that would not suffer at his birth even a prefigurative of mimic degradation for her awful ward, far less could be supposed to suffer the real degradation attaching to the non-development of his powers. She therefore watches over human education. Now the word edūco, with

De Quincey, Levana and Our Ladies of Sorrow. Thomas De Quincey was born at Manchester in 1785 and died in Edinburgh in 1859. He was educated at Oxford, lived for a time in the Lake District, and later settled in London. He made his experience as eater of opium the basis for his Confessions of an English Opium-Eater.

the penultimate short, was derived (by a process often exemplified in the crystallization of languages) from the word edūco, with the penultimate long. Whatsoever educes, or develops, educates. By the education of Levana, therefore, is meant—not the poor machinery that moves by spelling-books and grammars, but by that mighty system of central forces hidden in the deep bosom of human life, which by passion, by strife, by temptation, by the energies of resistance, works forever upon children—resting not day or night, any more than the mighty wheel of day and night themselves, whose moments, like restless spokes, are glimmering forever as they revolve.

If, then, these are the ministries by which Levana works, how profoundly must she reverence the agencies of grief! But you, reader, think that children generally are not liable to grief such as mine. There are two senses in the word generally—the sense of Euclid, where it means universally (or in the whole extent of the genus), and a foolish sense of this world, where it means usually. Now, I am far from saying that children universally are capable of grief like mine. But there are more than you ever heard of who die of grief in this island of ours. I will tell you a common case. The rules of Eton require that a boy on the foundation should be there twelve years; he is superannuated at eighteen; consequently he must come at six. Children torn away from mothers and sisters at that age not unfrequently die. I speak of what I know. The complaint is not entered by the registrar as grief; but that it is. Grief of that sort, and at that age, has killed more than ever have been counted amongst its martyrs.

Therefore it is that Levana often communes with the powers that shake man's heart; therefore it is that she dotes upon grief. "These ladies," said I softly to myself, on seeing the ministers with whom Levana was conversing, "these are the Sorrows; and they are three in number: as the Graces are three, who dress man's life with beauty; the Parcæ are three, who weave the dark arras of man's life in their mysterious loom always with colors sad in part, sometimes angry with tragic crimson and black; the Furies are three, who visit with retributions called from the other side of the grave offenses that walk upon this; and once even the Muses were but three, who fit the harp, the trumpet, or the lute, to the great burdens of man's impassioned creations. These are the Sorrows; all three of whom I know." The last words I say now; but in Oxford I said, "one of whom I know, and the others too surely I shall know." For already, in my fervent youth, I saw (dimly relieved upon the dark background of my dreams) the imperfect lineaments of the awful Sisters.

These Sisters—by what name shall we call them? If I say simply "The Sorrows," there will be a chance of mistaking the term; it might be understood of individual sorrow—separate cases of sorrow—whereas I want a term expressing the mighty abstractions that incarnate themselves in all individual sufferings of man's heart, and I wish to have these abstractions presented as impersonations—that is, as clothed with human attributes of life, and with functions pointing to flesh. Let us call them, therefore, Our Ladies of Sorrow.

I know them thoroughly, and have walked in all their kingdoms. Three sisters they are, of one mysterious household; and their paths are wide apart; but of their dominion there is no end. Them I saw often conversing with Levana, and sometimes about myself. Do they talk, then? O no! Mighty phantoms like these disdain the infirmities of language. They may utter voices through the organs of man when they dwell in human hearts, but amongst themselves is no voice nor sound; eternal silence reigns in their kingdoms. They spoke not as they talked with Levana; they whispered not; they sang not; though oftentimes methought they might have sung; for I upon earth had heard their mysteries oftentimes deciphered by harp and timbrel, by dulcimer and organ. Like God, whose servants they are, they utter their pleasure not by sounds that perish, or by words that go astray, but by signs in heaven, by changes on earth, by pulses in secret rivers, heraldries painted on darkness, and hieroglyphics written on the tablets of the brain. They wheeled in mazes; I spelled the steps. They telegraphed from afar; I read the signals. They conspired together; and on the mirrors of darkness my eye traced the plots. Theirs were the symbols; mine are the words.

What is it the Sisters are? What is it they do? Let me describe their form and their presence, if form it were that still fluctuated in its outline, or presence it were that forever advanced to the front or forever receded amongst shades.

The eldest of the three is named Mater Lachrymarum, Our Lady of Tears. She it is that night and day raves and moans, calling for vanished faces. She stood in Rama, where a voice was heard of lamentation—Rachel weeping for her children, and refusing to be comforted. She it was that stood in Bethlehem on the night when Herod's sword swept its nurseries of Innocents, and the little feet were stiffened forever which, heard at times as they trotted along floors overhead, woke pulses of love in household hearts that were not unmarked in heaven. Her eyes are sweet and subtle, wild and sleepy, by turns; oftentimes rising to the clouds, oftentimes challenging the heavens. She wears a diadem round her head. And I knew by childish memories that she could go abroad upon the winds when she heard the sobbing of litanies, or the thundering of organs, and when she beheld the mustering of summer clouds. This Sister, the elder, it is that carries keys more than papal at her girdle, which open every cottage and every palace. She, to my knowledge, sat all last summer by the bedside of the blind beggar, him that so often and so gladly I talked with, whose pious daughter, eight years old, with the sunny countenance, resisted the temptations of play and village mirth, to travel all day long on dusty roads with her afflicted father. For this did God send her a great reward. In the springtime of the year, and whilst yet her own spring was budding, He recalled her to himself. But her blind father mourns forever over her; still he dreams at midnight that the little guiding hand is locked within his own; and still he wakens to a darkness that is now within a second and a deeper darkness. This Mater Lachrymarum also has been sitting all this winter of 1844-5 within the bedchamber of the Czar, bringing before his eyes a daughter (not less pious) that vanished to God not less suddenly, and left behind her a darkness not less profound. By the power of the keys it is that Our Lady of Tears glides, a ghostly intruder, into the chambers of sleepless men, sleepless women, sleepless children, from Ganges to the Nile, from Nile to Mississippi. And her, because she is the first-born of her house, and has the widest empire, let us honor with the title of "Madonna."

The second Sister is called Mater Suspiriorum, Our Lady of Sighs. She never scales the clouds, nor walks abroad upon the winds. She wears no diadem. And her eyes, if they were ever seen, would be neither sweet nor subtle; no man could read their story; they would be found filled with perishing dreams, and with wrecks of forgotten delirium. But she raises not her eyes; her head, on which sits a dilapidated turban, droops forever, forever fastens on the dust. She weeps not. She groans not. But she sighs inaudibly at intervals. Her sister, Madonna, is oftentimes stormy and frantic, raging in the highest against heaven, and demanding back her darlings. But Our Lady of Sighs never clamors, never defies, dreams not of rebellious aspirations. She is humble to abjectness.

Hers is the meekness that belongs to the hopeless. Murmur she may, but it is in her sleep. Whisper she may, but it is to herself in the twilight. Mutter she does at times, but it is in solitary places that are desolate as she is desolate, in ruined cities, and when the sun has gone down to his rest. This Sister is the visitor of the Pariah, of the Jew, of the bondsman to the oar in the Mediterranean galleys; of the English criminal in Norfolk Island, blotted out from the books of remembrance in sweet far-off England; of the baffled penitent reverting his eyes forever upon a solitary grave, which to him seems the altar overthrown of some past and bloody sacrifice, on which altar no oblations can now be availing, whether toward pardon that he might implore, or toward reparation that he might attempt. Every slave that at noonday looks up to the tropical sun with timid reproach, as he points with one hand to the earth, our general mother, but for him a stepmother, as he points with the other hand to the Bible, our general teacher, but against him sealed and sequestered; every woman sitting in darkness, without love to shelter her head, or hope to illumine her solitude, because the heaven-born instincts kindling in her nature germs of holy affections, which God implanted in her womanly bosom, having been stifled by social necessities, now burn sullenly to waste, like sepulchral lamps amongst the ancients; every nun defrauded of her unreturning Maytime by wicked kinsman, whom God will judge; every captive in every dungeon; all that are betrayed, and all that are rejected; outcasts by traditionary law, and children of hereditary disgrace—all these walk with Our Lady of Sighs. She also carries a key; but she needs it little. For her kingdom is chiefly amongst the tents of Shem, and the houseless vagrant of every clime. Yet in the very highest ranks of man she finds chapels of her own; and even in glorious England there are some that, to the world, carry their heads as proudly as the reindeer, who yet secretly have received her mark upon their foreheads.

But the third Sister, who is also the youngest—! Hush! whisper whilst we talk of her! Her kingdom is not large, or else no flesh should live; but within that kingdom all power is hers. Her head, turreted like that of Cybele, rises almost beyond the reach of sight. She droops not; and her eyes, rising so high, might be hidden by distance. But, being what they are, they cannot be hidden. Through the treble veil of crape which she wears the fierce light of a blazing misery, that rests not for matins or for vespers, for noon of day or noon of night, for ebbing or for flowing tide, may be read from the very ground. She is the defier of God. She also is the mother of lunacies, and the suggestress of suicides. Deep lie the roots of her power; but narrow is the nation that she rules. For she can approach only those in whom a profound nature has been upheaved by central convulsions; in whom the heart trembles and the brain rocks under conspiracies of tempest from without and tempest from within. Madonna moves with uncertain steps, fast or slow, but still with tragic grace. Our Lady of Sighs creeps timidly and stealthily. But this youngest Sister moves with incalculable motions, bounding, and with tiger's leaps. She carries no key; for, though coming rarely amongst men, she storms all doors at which she is permitted to enter at all. And her name is Mater Tenebrarum—Our Lady of Darkness.

These were the Semnai Theai or Sublime Goddesses, these were the Eumenides or Gracious Ladies (so called by antiquity in shuddering propitiation), of my Oxford dreams. Madonna spoke. She spoke by her mysterious hand. Touching my head, she beckoned to Our Lady of Sighs; and what she spoke, translated out of the signs which (except in dreams) no man reads, was this:

"Lo! here is he whom in childhood I dedicated to my altars. This is he that once I made my darling. Him I led astray, him I beguiled; and from heaven I stole away his young heart to mine. Through me did he become idolatrous; and through me it was, by languishing desires, that he worshiped the worm, and prayed to the wormy grave. Holy was the grave to him; lovely was its darkness; saintly its corruption. Him, this young idolator, I have seasoned for thee, dear gentle Sister of Sighs! Do thou take him now to thy heart, and season him for our dreadful sister. And thou"—turning to the Mater Tenebrarum, she said—"wicked sister, that temptest and hatest, do thou take him from her. See that thy scepter lie heavy on his head. Suffer not woman and her tenderness to sit near him in his darkness. Banish the frailties of hope; wither the relenting of love; scorch the fountains of tears; curse him as only thou canst curse. So shall he be accomplished in the furnace; so shall he see the things that ought not to be seen, sights that are abominable, and secrets that are unutterable. So shall he read elder truths, sad truths, grand truths, fearful truths. So shall he rise again before he dies. And so shall our commission be accomplished which from God we had—to plague his heart until we had unfolded the capacities of his spirit."

THOMAS CARLYLE

Labor

There is a perennial nobleness, and even sacredness, in Work. Were he never so benighted, forgetful of his high calling, there is always hope in a man that actually and earnestly works; in Idleness alone is there perpetual despair. Work, never so Mammonish, mean, is in communication with Nature; the real desire to get Work done will itself lead one more and more to truth, to Nature's appointments and regulations, which are truth.

The latest Gospel in this world is, Know thy work and do it. "Know thyself": long enough has that poor "self" of thine tormented thee; thou wilt never get to "know" it, I believe! Think it not thy business, this of knowing thyself; thou art an unknowable individual: know what thou canst work at; and work at it, like a Hercules! That will be thy better plan.

It has been written, "an endless significance lies in Work"; a man perfects himself by working. Foul jungles are cleared away, fair seedfields rise instead, and stately cities; and withal the man himself first ceases to be a jungle and foul unwholesome desert thereby. Consider how, even in the meanest sorts of Labor, the soul of a man is composed into a kind of real harmony the instant he sets himself to work! Doubt, Desire, Sorrow,

Remorse, Indignation, Despair itself, all these, like hell-dogs, lie beleaguering the soul of the poor day-worker, as of every man; but he bends himself with free valor against his task, and all these are stilled, all these shrink murmuring far off into their caves. The man is now a man. The blessed glow of Labor in him, is it not as purifying fire, wherein all poison is burned up, and of sour smoke itself there is made bright blessed flame!

Destiny, on the whole, has no other way of cultivating us. A formless Chaos, once set it revolving, grows round and ever rounder; ranges itself, by mere force of gravity, into strata, spherical courses; is no longer a Chaos, but a round compacted world. What would become of the Earth did she cease to revolve? In the poor old Earth, so long as she revolves, all inequalities, irregularities disperse themselves; all irregularities are incessantly becoming regular. Hast thou looked on the Potter's wheel—one of the venerablest objects; old as the Prophet Ezekiel and far older? Rude lumps of clay, how they spin themselves up, by mere quick whirling, into beautiful circular dishes. And fancy the most assiduous Potter, but without his wheel; reduced to make dishes or rather amorphous botches, by mere kneading and baking! Even such a Potter were Destiny, with a human soul that would rest and lie at ease, that would not work and spin! Of an idle unrevolving man the kindest Destiny, like the most assiduous Potter without wheel, can bake and knead nothing other than a botch; let her spend on him what expensive coloring, what gilding and enameling she will, he is but a botch. Not a dish; no, a bulging, kneaded, crooked, shambling, squint-cornered, amorphous botch—a mere enameled vessel of dishonor! Let the idle think of this.

Blessed is he who has found his work; let him ask no other blessedness. He has a work, a life-purpose; he has found it, and will follow it! How, as a free-flowing channel, dug and torn by noble force through the sour mud-swamp of one's existence, like an ever-deepening river there, it runs and flows;—draining off the sour festering water gradually from the root of the remotest grassblade; making, instead of pestilential swamp, a green fruitful meadow with its clear-flowing stream. How blessed for the meadow itself, let the stream and its value be great or small! Labor is Life; from the inmost heart of the Worker rises his god-given Force, the sacred celestial Life-essence breathed into him by Almighty God; from his inmost heart awakens him to all nobleness—to all knowledge, "self-knowledge" and much else, so soon as Work fitly begins. Knowledge? The knowledge that will hold good in working, cleave thou to that; for Nature herself accredits that, says Yea to that. Properly thou hast no other knowledge but what thou hast got by working; the rest is yet all a hypothesis of knowledge; a thing to be argued of in schools, a thing floating in the clouds, in endless logic-vortices, till we try it and fix it. "Doubt, of whatever kind, can be ended by action alone."

And again, hast thou valued Patience, Courage, Perseverance, Openness to light; readiness to own thyself mistaken, to do better next time? All these, all virtues, in wrestling with the dim brute Powers of Fact, in ordering of thy fellows in such wrestle, there and elsewhere not at all, thou wilt continually learn. Set down a brave Sir Christopher¹ in the middle of black ruined Stone-heaps, of foolish unarchitectural Bishops, red-tape Officials, idle Nell Gwyn Defenders of the Faith; and see whether he will ever raise a Paul's Cathedral out of all that, yea or no! Rough, rude, contradictory are all things and persons, from the mutinous masons and Irish hodmen, up to the idle Nell Gwyn Defenders, to blustering red-tape Officials, foolish unarchitectural Bishops. All these things and persons are there not for Christopher's sake and his Cathedral's; they are there for their own sake mainly! Christopher will have to conquer and constrain all these—if he is able. All these are against him. Equitable Nature herself, who carries her mathematics and architectonics not on the face of her, but deep in the hidden heart of her—Nature herself is but partially for him; will be wholly against him, if he constrain her not! His very money, where is it to come from? The pious munificence of England lies far-scattered, distant, unable to speak, and say, "I am here,"—must be spoken to before it can speak. Pious munificence, and all help, is so silent, invisible, like the gods; impediment, contradictions manifold are so loud and near! O brave Sir Christopher, trust thou in those notwithstanding, and front all these; understand all these; by valiant patience, noble effort, insight, by man's strength, vanquish and compel all these—and, on the whole, strike down victoriously the last topstone of that Paul's Edifice; thy monument for certain centuries, the stamp

¹ Sir Christopher Wren who rebuilt St. Paul's Cathedral. Nell Gwyn, mistress of Charles II, under whom Wren began the work.

"Great Man" impressed very legibly on Portland stone there!

Yes, all manner of help, and pious response from Men or Nature, is always what we call silent; cannot speak or come to light, till it be seen, till it be spoken to. Every noble work is at first "impossible." In very truth, for every noble work the possibilities will lie diffused through Immensity; inarticulate, undiscoverable except to faith. Like Gideon thou shalt spread out thy fleece at the door ¹⁰ of thy tent; see whether under the wide arch of Heaven there be any bounteous moisture, or none. Thy heart and life-purpose shall be as a miraculous Gideon's fleece, spread out in silent appeal to Heaven; and from the kind Immensities, what from the poor unkind localities and town and country Parishes there never could, blessed dew-moisture to suffice thee shall have fallen!

Work is of a religious nature—work is of a brave nature; which it is the aim of all religion to ²⁰ be. All work of man is as the swimmer's: a waste ocean threatens to devour him; if he front it not bravely, it will keep its word. By incessant wise defiance of it, lusty rebuke and buffet of it, behold how it loyally supports him, bears him as its conqueror along. "It is so," says Goethe, "with all things that man undertakes in this world."

Brave sea-captain, Norse sea-king—Columbus, my hero, royalest sea-king of all! it is no friendly environment this of thine, in the waste deep ³⁰ waters; around thee mutinous discouraged souls, behind thee disgrace and ruin, before thee the unpenetrated veil of Night. Brother, these wild water-mountains, bounding from their deep bases (ten miles deep, I am told), are not entirely there on thy behalf! Meseems they have other work than floating thee forward—and the huge winds, that sweep from Ursa Major to the Tropics and Equators, dancing their giant-waltz through the kingdoms of Chaos and Immensity, they care little about filling rightly or filling wrongly the small shoulder-of-mutton sails in this cockle-skiff of thine! Thou art not among articulate-speaking friends, my brother; thou art among immeasurable dumb monsters, tumbling, howling wide as the world here. Secret, far off, invisible to all hearts but thine, there lies a help in them; see how thou wilt get at that. Patiently thou wilt wait till the mad southwester spends itself, saving thyself by dextrous science of defense, the while; valiantly, with swift decision, wilt thou strike in, when the favoring East, the Possible springs up. Mutiny of ⁴⁰ men thou wilt sternly repress; weakness, despondency, thou wilt cheerfully encourage: thou wilt swallow down complaint, unreason, weariness, weakness of others and thyself—how much wilt thou swallow down! There shall be a depth of Silence in thee, deeper than this Sea, which is but ten miles deep: a Silence unsoundable; known to God only. Thou shalt be a Great Man. Yes, my World-soldier, thou of the World Marine-service—thou wilt have to be greater than this tumultuous ⁵⁰ unmeasured World here round thee is; thou, in thy strong soul, as with wrestler's arms, shalt embrace it, harness it down; and make it bear thee on—to new Americas, or whither God wills!

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON

Pulvis et Umbra

We look for some reward of our endeavors and are disappointed; not success, not happiness, not even peace of conscience, crowns our ineffectual efforts to do well. Our frailties are invincible, our virtues barren; the battle goes sore against us to the going down of the sun. The canting moralist tells us of right and wrong; and we look abroad, even on the face of our small earth, and find them change with every climate, and no country where some action is not honored for a virtue and none where it is not branded for a vice; and we look in our experience, and find no vital congruity in the wisest rules, but at the best a municipal fitness. It is not strange if we are tempted to despair of good.

Stevenson, Pulvis et Umbra. Robert Louis Stevenson (1850-1894) came of a family of Scotch engineers. He was educated for law but from 1878 on devoted himself entirely to writing novels, essays, and poems. He died in Samoa, where he had gone to regain his health.

We ask too much. Our religions and moralities have been trimmed to flatter us, till they are all emasculate and sentimentalized, and only please and weaken. Truth is of a rougher strain. In the harsh face of life, faith can read a bracing gospel. The human race is a thing more ancient than the Ten Commandments; and the bones and revolutions of the Kosmos, in whose joints we are but moss and fungus, more ancient still.

I

Of the Kosmos in the last resort, science reports many doubtful things and all of them appalling. There seems no substance to this solid globe on which we stamp: nothing but symbols and ratios. Symbols and ratios carry us and bring us forth and beat us down; gravity that swings the incommensurable suns and worlds through space, is but a figment varying inversely as the squares of distances; and the suns and worlds themselves, ²⁰ imponderable figures of abstraction, NH_3 and H_2O . Consideration dares not dwell upon this view; that way madness lies; science carries us into zones of speculation, where there is no habitable city for the mind of man.

But take the Kosmos with a grosser faith, as our senses give it us. We behold space sown with rotatory islands, suns and worlds and the shards and wrecks of systems: some, like the sun, still blazing; some rotting, like the earth; others, like the ³⁰ moon, stable in desolation. All of these we take to be made of something we call matter: a thing which no analysis can help us to conceive; to whose incredible properties no familiarities can reconcile our minds. This stuff, when not purified by the lustration of fire, rots uncleanly into something we call life; seized through all its atoms with a pediculous malady; swelling in tumors that become independent, sometimes even (by an abhorrent prodigy) locomotory; one splitting into ⁴⁰ millions, millions cohering into one, as the malady proceeds through varying stages. This vital putrescence of the dust, used as we are to it, yet strikes us with occasional disgust, and the profusion of worms in a piece of ancient turf, or the air of a marsh darkened with insects, will sometimes check our breathing so that we aspire for cleaner places. But none is clean: the moving sand is infected with lice; the pure spring, where it bursts out of the mountain, is a mere issue of worms; even in ⁵⁰ the hard rock the crystal is forming.

In two main shapes this eruption covers the countenance of the earth: the animal and the vegetable: one in some degree the inversion of the other: the second rooted to the spot; the first coming detached out of its natal mud, and scurrying abroad with the myriad feet of insects or towering into the heavens on the wings of birds: a thing so incomprehensible that, if it be well considered, the heart stops. To what passes with the anchored vermin, we have little clue: doubtless they have their joys and sorrows, their delights and killing agonies: ¹⁰ it appears not how. But of the locomotory, to which we ourselves belong, we can tell more. These share with us a thousand miracles: the miracles of sight, of hearing, of the projection of sound, things that bridge space; the miracles of memory and reason, by which the present is conceived, and when it is gone, its image kept living in the brains of man and brute; the miracle of reproduction, with its imperious desires and staggering consequences. And to put the last touch upon this mountain mass of the revolting and the ²⁰ inconceivable, all these prey upon each other, lives tearing other lives in pieces, cramming them inside themselves, and by that summary process, growing fat: the vegetarian, the whale, perhaps the tree, not less than the lion of the desert; for the vegetarian is only the eater of the dumb.

Meanwhile our rotatory island loaded with predatory life, and more drenched with blood, both animal and vegetable, than ever mutinied ship, ³⁰ scuds through space with unimaginable speed, and turns alternate cheeks to the reverberation of a blazing world, ninety million miles away.

II

What a monstrous specter is this man, the disease of the agglutinated dust, lifting alternate feet or lying drugged with slumber; killing, feeding, growing, bringing forth small copies of himself; grown upon with hair like grass, fitted with eyes that move and glitter in his face; a thing to set children screaming;—and yet looked at nearer, known as his fellows know him, how surprising are his attributes! Poor soul, here for so little, cast among so many hardships, filled with desires so incommensurate and so inconsistent, savagely surrounded, savagely descended, irremediably condemned to prey upon his fellow lives: who should have blamed him had he been of a piece with his destiny and a being merely barbarous? And we look and behold ⁴⁰ him instead filled with imperfect virtues: infinitely childish, often admirably valiant, often touchingly kind; sitting down, amidst his momentary life, to debate of right and wrong and the attributes of the deity; rising up to do battle for an egg or die for an idea; singling out his friends and his mate with cordial affection; bringing forth in pain, rearing with long-suffering solicitude, his young. To touch the heart of his mystery, we find in him one thought, strange to the point of lunacy: the thought of duty; the thought of something owing to himself, to his neighbor, to his God; an ideal of decency, to which he would rise if it were possible; a limit of shame below which, if it be possible, he will not stoop. The design in most men is one of conformity; here and there, in picked natures, it transcends itself and soars on the other side, arming martyrs with independence; but in all, in their degrees, it is a bosom thought:—Not in man alone, for we trace it in dogs and cats whom we know fairly well, and doubtless some similar point of honor sways the elephant, the oyster, and the louse, of whom we know so little:—But in man, at least, it sways with so complete an empire that merely selfish things come second, even with the selfish: that appetites are starved, fears are conquered, pains supported; that almost the dullest shrinks from the reproof of a glance, although it were a child's; and all but the most cowardly stand amid the risks of war; and the more noble, having strongly conceived an act as due to their ideal, affront and embrace death. Strange enough if, with their singular origin and perverted practice, they think they are to be rewarded in some future life: stranger still, if they are persuaded of the contrary, and think this blow, which they solicit, will strike them senseless for eternity. I shall be reminded what a tragedy of misconception and misconduct man at large presents: of organized injustice, cowardly violence, and treacherous crime; and of the damning imperfections of the best. They cannot be too darkly drawn. Man is indeed marked for failure in his efforts to do right. But where the best consistently miscarry, how tenfold more remarkable that all should continue to strive; and surely we should find it both touching and inspiring, that in a field from which success is banished, our race should not cease to labor.

If the first view of this creature, stalking in his rotatory isle, be a thing to shake the courage of the stoutest, on this nearer sight, he startles us with an admiring wonder. It matters not where we look, under what climate we observe him, in what stage of society, in what depth of ignorance, burthened with what erroneous morality; by camp-fires in Assiniboia, the snow powdering his shoulders, the wind plucking his blanket, as he sits, passing the ceremonial calumet and uttering his grave opinions like a Roman senator; in ships at sea, a man inured to hardship and vile pleasures, his brightest hope a fiddle in a tavern and a bedizened trull who sells herself to rob him, and he for all that simple, innocent, cheerful, kindly like a child, constant to toil, brave to drown, for others; in the slums of cities, moving among indifferent millions to mechanical employments, without hope of change in the future, with scarce a pleasure in the present, and yet true to his virtues, honest up to his lights, kind to his neighbors, tempted perhaps in vain by the bright gin-palace, perhaps long-suffering with the drunken wife that ruins him; in India (a woman this time) kneeling with broken cries and streaming tears, as she drowns her child in the sacred river; in the brothel, the discard of society, living mainly on strong drink, fed with affronts, a fool, a thief, the comrade of thieves, and even here keeping the point of honor and the touch of pity, often repaying the world's scorn with service, often standing firm upon a scruple, and at a certain cost, rejecting riches:—everywhere some virtue cherished or affected, everywhere some decency of thought and carriage, everywhere the ensign of man's ineffectual goodness:—ah! if I could show you this! If I could show you these men and women, all the world over, in every stage of history, under every abuse of error, under every circumstance of failure, without hope, without help, without thanks, still obscurely fighting the lost fight of virtue, still clinging, in the brothel or on the scaffold, to some rag of honor, the poor jewel of their souls! They may seek to escape, and yet they cannot; it is not alone their privilege and glory, but their doom; they are condemned to some nobility; all their lives long, the desire of good is at their heels, the implacable hunter.

Of all earth's meteors, here at least is the most strange and consoling: that this ennobled lemur, this hair-crowned bubble of the dust, this inheritor of a few years and sorrows, should yet deny himself his rare delights, and add to his frequent pains, and live for an ideal, however misconceived. Nor can we stop with man. A new doctrine, received with screams a little while ago by canting moralists, and still not properly worked into the body of our thoughts, lights us a step farther into the heart of this rough but noble universe. For nowadays the pride of man denies in vain his kinship with the original dust. He stands no longer like a thing apart. Close at his heels we see the dog, prince of another genus: and in him too, we see dumbly testified the same cultus of an unattainable ideal, the same constancy in failure. Does it stop with the dog? We look at our feet where the ground is blackened with the swarming ant: a creature so small, so far from us in the hierarchy of brutes, that we can scarce trace and scarce comprehend his doings; and here also, in his ordered politics and rigorous justice, we see confessed the law of duty and the fact of individual sin. Does it stop, then, with the ant? Rather this desire of well-doing and this doom of frailty run through all the grades of life: rather is this earth, from the frosty top of Everest to the next margin of the internal fire, one stage of ineffectual virtues and one temple of pious tears and perseverance. The whole creation groaneth and travaileth together. It is the common and the god-like law of life. The browsers, the biters, the barkers, the hairy coats of field and forest, the squirrel in the oak, the thousand-footed creeper in the dust, as they share with us the gift of life, share with us the love of an ideal: strive like us—like us are tempted to grow weary of the struggle—to do well; like us receive at times unmerited refreshment, visitings of support, returns of courage; and are condemned like us to be crucified between that double law of the members and the will. Are they like us, I wonder, in the timid hope of some reward, some sugar with the drug? do they, too, stand aghast at unrewarded virtues, at the sufferings of those whom, in our partiality, we take to be just, and the prosperity of such as, in our blindness, we call wicked? It may be, and yet God knows what they should look for. Even while they look, even while they repent, the foot of man treads them by thousands in the dust, the yelping hounds burst upon their trail, the bullet speeds, the knives are heating in the den of the vivisectionist; or the dew falls, and the generation of a day is blotted out. For these are creatures, compared with whom our weakness is strength, our ignorance wisdom, our brief span eternity.

And as we dwell, we living things, in our isle of terror and under the imminent hand of death, God forbid it should be man the erected, the reasoner, the wise in his own eyes—God forbid it should be man that wearies in well-doing, that despairs of unrewarded effort, or utters the language of complaint. Let it be enough for faith, that the whole creation groans in mortal frailty, strives with unconquerable constancy: surely not all in vain.

AMERICAN ESSAYS AND ADDRESSES

Strictly speaking, American literature is three centuries old, but for practical purposes its history does not begin much before the American Revolution. The rhymed psalms, the doggerel rhymes, and the weighty sermons of the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries repose undisturbed on library shelves. Even the practical wisdom of Poor Richard's Almanack is only a far-off tradition today, and Franklin as an author is known to us only through the pages of his ever-interesting Autobiography.

The opening of the American Revolution called forth the best talent from all parts of the colonies. Not only were orators, such as Patrick Henry in Virginia and James Otis in Massachusetts, needed to appeal to their fellow men, but also volunteers for the even more difficult task of framing important political papers. Of the latter class of statesmen, Thomas Jefferson was pre-eminent. It is to him that we owe the Declaration of Independence in approximately its final form. He also had much to do with the phraseology of the United States Constitution.

Of nineteenth century oratory in America little can be said here. The great political addresses of Webster are a real part of American literature. But the two outstanding public speeches of the century were not designed as great oratory. One of them was a simple tribute to fallen soldiers and the other was a routine inaugural address as President of the United States.

Such essays as appeared in eighteenth century America were far-off echoes of Addison and Steele. It is not until we come to the Sketch Book of Washington Irving that we find that this form has any vitality. In this book, in addition to such favorite stories as "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow" he has a number of delightful sketches, mostly descriptive of his travels.

As the nineteenth century wore on, a large number of writers employed the essay form with success. From all this group we are choosing one representative of the philosophical essay and one of the nature essay. The authors of these works were neighbors in the little town of Concord, Massachusetts, and were almost the same age.

Ralph Waldo Emerson, for fifty years and more, wrote and lectured on a multitude of topics, so that he became an inestimable force in American life—a force which perhaps we do not even yet fully appreciate. He realized as did few men of his generation the vast potentialities of American life and the necessity of boldness as well as wisdom in our endeavor to develop them. Such an essay as Self-Reliance is as important today as it was a century ago when it was written.

Large philosophical concepts of this kind did not interest Emerson's neighbor, Henry David Thoreau. Though he was somewhat of a political rebel when politics affected him personally, his main interest in life was the study of the outdoors. From his camp on Walden Pond near Concord he gave close observation of the life of birds and beasts. A good example of this is his sketch, Brute Neighbors.

THOMAS JEFFERSON

Declaration of Independence

IN CONGRESS, JULY 4, 1776
THE UNANIMOUS DECLARATION OF THE THIRTEEN
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Preamble

When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident: That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence indeed will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and, accordingly, all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former systems of government.

Specific Charges against the King

The history of the present king of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world:

He has refused his assent to laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his assent should be obtained; and, when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other laws for the accommodation of large districts of people unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature, a right inestimable to them, and formidable to tyrants only.

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

Jefferson, Declaration of Independence. Thomas Jefferson (1743-1826) lived all his life in Virginia. He was active politically from 1769, drafted the Declaration of Independence, and had much to do with the writing of the American Constitution. He was President from 1801 to 1809.

He has dissolved representative houses repeatedly for opposing, with manly firmness, his invasions on the rights of the people.

He has refused for a long time after such dissolutions to cause others to be elected; whereby the legislative powers, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise; the state remaining, in the meantime, exposed to all the dangers of invasions from without and convulsions within.

He has endeavored to prevent the population of these states; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass others to encourage their migration hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.

He has obstructed the administration of justice by refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers.

He has made judges dependent on his will alone for the tenure of their offices and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out their substance.

He has kept among us in times of peace standing armies, without the consent of our legislatures.

He has affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power.

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution and unacknowledged by our laws, giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation:

For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us.

For protecting them, by a mock trial, from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these states.

For cutting off our trade with all parts of the world.

For imposing taxes on us without our consent.

For depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury.

For transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offenses.

For abolishing the free system of English laws in a neighboring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its boundaries so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these colonies.

For taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering fundamentally the forms of our governments.

For suspending our own legislatures and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

He has abdicated government here by declaring us out of his protection and waging war against us.

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is at this time transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries to complete the works of death, desolation, and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow citizens, taken captive on the high seas, to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or to fall themselves by their hands.

He has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has endeavored to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions.

In every stage of these oppressions we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms; our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

Nor have we been wanting in attentions to our British brethren. We have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them by the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations which would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They, too, have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war; in peace, friends.

Conclusion and Declaration

We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in general congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent states; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that as free and independent states they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent states may of right do. And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON

Self-Reliance

I read the other day some verses written by an eminent painter which were original and not conventional. The soul always hears an admonition in such lines, let the subject be what it may. The sentiment they instill is of more value than any thought they may contain. To believe your own thought, to believe that what is true for you in your private heart is true for all men,—that is genius. Speak your latent conviction, and it shall be the universal sense; for the inmost in due time becomes the outmost, and our first thought is rendered back to us by the trumpets of the Last Judgment. Familiar as the voice of the mind is to each, the highest merit we ascribe to Moses, Plato and Milton is that they set at naught books and traditions, and spoke not what men, but what they thought. A man should learn to detect and watch that gleam of light which flashes across his mind from within, more than the luster of the firmament of bards and sages. Yet he dismisses without notice his thought, because it is his. In every work of genius we recognize our own rejected thoughts; they come back to us with a certain alienated majesty. Great works of art have no more affecting lesson for us than this. They teach us to abide by our spontaneous impression with good-humored inflexibility then most when the whole cry of voices is on the other side. Else tomorrow a stranger will say with masterly good sense precisely what we have thought and felt all the time, and we shall be forced to take with shame our own opinion from another.

There is a time in every man's education when he arrives at the conviction that envy is ignorance; that imitation is suicide; that he must take himself for better for worse as his portion; that though the wide universe is full of good, no kernel of nourishing corn can come to him but through his toil bestowed on that plot of ground which is given to him to till. The power which resides in him is new in nature, and none but he knows what that is which he can do, nor does he know until he has tried. Not for nothing one face, one character, one fact, makes much impression on him, and another none. This sculpture in the memory is not without pre-established harmony. The eye was placed where one ray should fall, that it might testify of that particular ray. We but half express ourselves, and are ashamed of that divine idea which each of us represents. It may be safely trusted as proportionate and of good issues, so it be faithfully imparted, but God will not have his work made manifest by cowards. A man is relieved and gay when he has put his heart into his work and done his best; but what he has said or done otherwise shall give him no peace. It is a deliverance which does not deliver. In the attempt his genius deserts him; no muse befriends; no invention, no hope.

Trust thyself: every heart vibrates to that iron string. Accept the place the divine providence has found for you, the society of your contemporaries, the connection of events. Great men have always done so, and confided themselves childlike to the genius of their age, betraying their perception that the absolutely trustworthy was seated at their heart, working through their hands, predominating in all their being. And we are now men, and must accept in the highest mind the same transcendent destiny; and not minors and invalids in a protected corner, not cowards fleeing before a revolution, but guides, redeemers and benefactors, obeying the Almighty effort and advancing on Chaos and the Dark.

Emerson, Self-Reliance. Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803-1882) was born in Boston and educated at Harvard College. After resigning from the Unitarian ministry and traveling for a time, he began a long career of lecturing and essay-writing. He spent his life at Concord and Boston, Massachusetts.

What pretty oracles nature yields us on this text in the face and behavior of children, babes, and even brutes! That divided and rebel mind, that distrust of a sentiment because our arithmetic has computed the strength and means opposed to our purpose, these have not. Their mind being whole, their eye is as yet unconquered, and when we look in their faces we are disconcerted. Infancy conforms to nobody; all conform to it; so that one babe commonly makes four or five out of the adults who prattle and play to it. So God has armed youth and puberty and manhood no less with its own piquancy and charm, and made it enviable and gracious and its claims not to be put by, if it will stand by itself. Do not think the youth has no force, because he cannot speak to you and me. Hark! in the next room his voice is sufficiently clear and emphatic. It seems he knows how to speak to his contemporaries. Bashful or bold then, he will know how to make us seniors very unnecessary.

The nonchalance of boys who are sure of a dinner, and would disdain as much as a lord to do or say aught to conciliate one, is the healthy attitude of human nature. A boy is in the parlor what the pit is in the playhouse; independent, irresponsible, looking out from his corner on such people and facts as pass by, he tries and sentences them on their merits, in the swift, summary way of boys, as good, bad, interesting, silly, eloquent, troublesome. He cumbers himself never about consequences, about interests; he gives an independent, genuine verdict. You must court him; he does not court you. But the man is as it were clapped into jail by his consciousness. As soon as he has once acted or spoken with éclat he is a committed person, watched by the sympathy or the hatred of hundreds, whose affections must now enter into his account. There is no Lethe for this. Ah, that he could pass again into his neutrality! Who can thus avoid all pledges and, having observed, observe again from the same unaffected, unbiased, unbribable, unaffrighted innocence,—must always be formidable. He would utter opinions on all passing affairs, which being seen to be not private but necessary, would sink like darts into the ear of men and put them in fear.

These are the voices which we hear in solitude, but they grow faint and inaudible as we enter into the world. Society everywhere is in conspiracy against the manhood of every one of its members. Society is a joint-stock company, in which the members agree, for the better securing of his bread to each shareholder, to surrender the liberty and culture of the eater. The virtue in most request is conformity. Self-reliance is its aversion. It loves not realities and creators, but names and customs.

Whoso would be a man, must be a nonconformist. He who would gather immortal palms must not be hindered by the name of goodness, but must explore if it be goodness. Nothing is at last sacred but the integrity of your own mind. Absolve you to yourself, and you shall have the suffrage of the world. I remember an answer which when quite young I was prompted to make to a valued adviser who was wont to importune me with the dear old doctrines of the church. On my saying, "What have I to do with the sacredness of traditions, if I live wholly from within?" my friend suggested,—“But these impulses may be from below, not from above.” I replied, “They do not seem to me to be such; but if I am the Devil’s child, I will live then from the Devil.” No law can be sacred to me but that of my nature. Good and bad are but names very readily transferable to that or this; the only right is what is after my constitution; the only wrong what is against it. A man is to carry himself in the presence of all opposition as if everything were titular and ephemeral but he. I am ashamed to think how easily we capitulate to badges and names, to large societies and dead institutions. Every decent and well-spoken individual affects and sways me more than is right. I ought to go upright and vital, and speak the rude truth in all ways.

The other terror that scares us from self-trust is our consistency; a reverence for our past act or word because the eyes of others have no other data for computing our orbit than our past acts, and we are loth to disappoint them.

But why should you keep your head over your shoulder? Why drag about this corpse of your memory, lest you contradict somewhat you have stated in this or that public place? Suppose you should contradict yourself; what then? It seems to be a rule of wisdom never to rely on your memory alone, scarcely even in acts of pure memory, but to bring the past for judgment into the thousand-eyed present, and live ever in a new day. In your metaphysics you have denied personality to the Deity, yet when the devout motions of the soul come, yield to them heart and life, though they should clothe God with shape and color. Leave your theory, as Joseph his coat in the hand of the harlot, and flee.

A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines. With consistency a great soul has simply nothing to do. He may as well concern himself with his shadow on the wall. Speak what you think now in hard words and tomorrow speak what tomorrow thinks in hard words again, though it contradict every thing you said today.—“Ah, so you shall be sure to be misunderstood.”—Is it so bad then to be misunderstood? Pythagoras was misunderstood, and Socrates, and Jesus, and Luther, and Copernicus, and Galileo, and Newton, and every pure and wise spirit that ever took flesh. To be great is to be misunderstood.

I hope in these days we have heard the last of conformity and consistency. Let the words be gazetted and ridiculous henceforward. Instead of the gong for dinner, let us hear a whistle from the Spartan fife. Let us never bow and apologize more. A great man is coming to eat at my house. I do not wish to please him; I wish that he should wish to please me. I will stand here for humanity, and though I would make it kind, I would make it true. Let us affront and reprimand the smooth mediocrity and squalid contentment of the times, and hurl in the face of custom and trade and office, the fact which is the upshot of all history, that there is a great responsible Thinker and Actor working wherever a man works; that a true man belongs to no other time or place, but is the center of things. Where he is, there is Nature. He measures you and all men and all events. Ordinarily, everybody in society reminds us of somewhat else, or of some other person. Character, reality, reminds you of nothing else; it takes place of the whole creation. The man must be so much that he must make all circumstances indifferent. Every true man is a cause, a country, and an age; requires infinite spaces and numbers and time fully to accomplish his design;—and posterity seem to follow his steps as a train of clients. A man Cæsar is born, and for ages after we have a Roman Empire. Christ is born, and millions of minds so grow and cleave to his genius that he is confounded with virtue and the possible of man. An institution is the lengthened shadow of one man; as, Monachism, of the Hermit Antony; the Reformation, of Luther; Quakerism, of Fox; Methodism, of Wesley; Abolition, of Clarkson. Scipio, Milton called “the height of Rome”; and all history resolves itself very easily into the biography of a few stout and earnest persons.

Let a man then know his worth, and keep things under his feet. Let him not peep or steal, or skulk up and down with the air of a charity-boy, a bastard, or an interloper in the world which exists for him. But the man in the street, finding no worth in himself which corresponds to the force which built a tower or sculptured a marble god, feels poor when he looks on these. To him a palace, a statue, or a costly book have an alien and forbidding air, much like a gay equipage, and seem to say like that, “Who are you, Sir?” Yet they all are his, suitors for his notice, petitioners to his faculties that they will come out and take possession. The picture waits for my verdict; it is not to command me, but I am to settle its claims to praise. That popular fable of the sot who was picked up dead-drunk in the street, carried to the duke’s house, washed and dressed and laid in the duke’s bed, and, on his waking, treated with all obsequious ceremony like the duke, and assured that he had been insane, owes its popularity to the fact that it symbolizes so well the state of man, who is in the world a sort of sot, but now and then wakes up, exercises his reason and finds himself a true prince.

It is easy to see that a greater self-reliance must work a revolution in all the offices and relations of men; in their religion; in their education; in their pursuits; their modes of living; their association; in their property; in their speculative views.

1. In what prayers do men allow themselves! That which they call a holy office is not so much as brave and manly. Prayer looks abroad and asks for some foreign addition to come through some foreign virtue, and loses itself in endless mazes of natural and supernatural, and mediatorial and miraculous. Prayer that craves a particular commodity, anything less than all good, is vicious. Prayer is the contemplation of the facts of life from the highest point of view. It is the soliloquy of a beholding and jubilant soul. It is the spirit of God pronouncing his works good. But prayer as a means to effect a private end is meanness and theft. It supposes dualism and not unity in nature and consciousness. As soon as the man is at one with God, he will not beg. He will then see prayer in all action. The prayer of the farmer kneeling in his field to weed it, the prayer of the rower kneeling with the stroke of his oar, are true prayers heard throughout nature, though for cheap ends. Caratach, in Fletcher's "Bonduca," when admonished to inquire the mind of the god Audate, replies,—

His hidden meaning lies in our endeavors;
Our valors are our best gods.

Another sort of false prayers are our regrets. Discontent is the want of self-reliance: it is infirmity of will. Regret calamities if you can thereby help the sufferer; if not, attend your own work and already the evil begins to be repaired. Our sympathy is just as base. We come to them who weep foolishly and sit down and cry for company, instead of imparting to them truth and health in rough electric shocks, putting them once more in communication with their own reason. The secret of fortune is joy in our hands. Welcome evermore to gods and men is the self-helping man. For him all doors are flung wide; him all tongues greet, all honors crown, all eyes follow with desire. Our love goes out to him and embraces him because he did not need it. We solicitously and apologetically caress and celebrate him because he held on his way and scorned our disapprobation. The gods love him because men hated him. "To the persevering mortal," said Zoroaster, "the blessed Immortals are swift."

As men's prayers are a disease of the will, so are their creeds a disease of the intellect. They say with those foolish Israelites, "Let not God speak to us, lest we die. Speak thou, speak any man with us, and we will obey." Everywhere I am hindered of meeting God in my brother, because he has shut his own temple doors and recites fables merely of his brother's, or his brother's brother's God. Every new mind is a new classification. If it prove a mind of uncommon activity and power, a Locke, a Lavoisier, a Hutton, a Bentham, a Fourier, it imposes its classification on other men, and lo! a new system. In proportion to the depth of the thought, and so to the number of the objects it touches and brings within reach of the pupil, is his complacency. But chiefly is this apparent in creeds and churches, which are also classifications of some powerful mind acting on the elemental thought of duty and man's relation to the Highest. Such is Calvinism, Quakerism, Swedenborgism. The pupil takes the same delight in subordinating everything to the new terminology as a girl who has just learned botany in seeing a new earth and new seasons thereby. It will happen for a time that the pupil will find his intellectual power has grown by the study of his master's mind. But in all unbalanced minds the classification is idolized, passes for the end and not for a speedily exhaustible means, so that the walls of the system blend to their eye in the remote horizon with the walls of the universe; the luminaries of heaven seem to them hung on the arch their master built. They cannot imagine how you aliens have any right to see,—how you can see; "It must be somehow that you stole the light from us." They do not yet perceive that light, unsystematic, indomitable, will break into any cabin, even into theirs. Let them chirp awhile and call it their own. If they are honest and do well, presently their neat new pinfold will be too strait and low, will crack, will lean, will rot and vanish, and the immortal light, all young and joyful, million-orbed, million-colored, will beam over the universe as on the first morning.

2. It is for want of self-culture that the superstition of Traveling, whose idols are Italy, England, Egypt, retains its fascination for all educated Americans. They who made England, Italy, or Greece venerable in the imagination, did so by sticking fast where they were, like an axis of the earth. In manly hours we feel that duty is our place. The soul is no traveler; the wise man stays at home, and when his necessities, his duties, or any occasion call him from his house, or into foreign lands, he is at home still and shall make men sensible by the expression of his countenance that he goes, the missionary of wisdom and virtue, and visits cities and men like a sovereign and not like an interloper or a valet.

I have no churlish objection to the circumnavigation of the globe for the purposes of art, of study, and benevolence, so that the man is first domesticated, or does not go abroad with the hope of finding somewhat greater than he knows. He who travels to be amused, or to get somewhat which he does not carry, travels away from himself, and grows old even in youth among old things. In Thebes, in Palmyra, his will and mind have become old and dilapidated as they. He carries ruins to ruins.

Traveling is a fool's paradise. Our first journeys discover to us the indifference of places. At home I dream that at Naples, at Rome, I can be intoxicated with beauty and lose my sadness. I pack my trunk, embrace my friends, embark on the sea and at last wake up in Naples, and there beside me is the stern fact, the sad self, unrelenting, identical, that I fled from. I seek the Vatican and the palaces. I affect to be intoxicated with sights and suggestions, but I am not intoxicated. My giant goes with me wherever I go.

3. But the rage of traveling is a symptom of a deeper unsoundness affecting the whole intellectual action. The intellect is vagabond, and our system of education fosters restlessness. Our minds travel when our bodies are forced to stay at home. We imitate; and what is imitation but the traveling of the mind? Our houses are built with foreign taste; our shelves are garnished with foreign ornaments; our opinions, our tastes, our faculties, lean, and follow the Past and the Distant. The soul created the arts wherever they have flourished. It was in his own mind that the artist sought his model. It was an application of his own thought to the thing to be done and the conditions to be observed. And why need we copy the Doric or the Gothic model? Beauty, convenience, grandeur of thought and quaint expression are as near to us as to any, and if the American artist will study with hope and love the precise thing to be done by him, considering the climate, the soil, the length of the day, the wants of the people, the habit and form of the government, he will create a house in which all these will find themselves fitted, and taste and sentiment will be satisfied also.

Insist on yourself; never imitate. Your own gift you can present every moment with the cumulative force of a whole life's cultivation; but of the adopted talent of another you have only an extemporaneous half possession. That which each can do best, none but his Maker can teach him. No man yet knows what it is, nor can, till that person has exhibited it. Where is the master who could have taught Shakespeare? Where is the master who could have instructed Franklin, or Washington, or Bacon, or Newton? Every great man is a unique. The Scipionism of Scipio is precisely that part he could not borrow. Shakespeare will never be made by the study of Shakespeare. Do that which is assigned you, and you cannot hope too much or dare too much. There is at this moment for you an utterance brave and grand as that of the colossal chisel of Phidias, or trowel of the Egyptians, or the pen of Moses or Dante, but different from all these. Not possibly will the soul, all rich, all eloquent, with thousand-cloven tongue, deign to repeat itself; but if you can hear what these patriarchs say, surely you can reply to them in the same pitch of voice; for the ear and the tongue are two organs of one nature. Abide in the simple and noble regions of thy life, obey thy heart, and thou shalt reproduce the Foreworld again.

4. As our Religion, our Education, our Art look abroad, so does our spirit of society. All men plume themselves on the improvement of society, and no man improves.

Society never advances. It recedes as fast on one side as it gains on the other. It undergoes continual changes; it is barbarous, it is civilized, it is christianized, it is rich, it is scientific; but this change is not amelioration. For every thing that is given something is taken. Society acquires new arts and loses old instincts. What a contrast between the well-clad, reading, writing, thinking American, with a watch, a pencil and a bill of exchange in his pocket, and the naked New Zealander, whose property is a club, a spear, a mat and an undivided twentieth of a shed to sleep under! But compare the health of the two men and you shall see that the white man has lost his aboriginal strength. If the traveler tell us truly, strike the savage with a broad-ax and in a day or two the flesh shall unite and heal as if you struck the blow into soft pitch, and the same blow shall send the white to his grave.

The civilized man has built a coach, but has lost the use of his feet. He is supported on crutches, but lacks so much support of muscle. He has a fine Geneva watch, but he fails of the skill to tell the hour by the sun. A Greenwich nautical almanac he has, and so being sure of the information when he wants it, the man in the street does not know a star in the sky. The solstice he does not observe; the equinox he knows as little; and the whole bright calendar of the year is without a dial in his mind. His note-books impair his memory; his libraries overload his wit; the insurance-office increases the number of accidents; and it may be a question whether machinery does not encumber; whether we have not lost by refinement some energy, by a Christianity, entrenched in establishments and forms, some vigor of wild virtue. For every Stoic was a Stoic; but in Christendom where is the Christian?

There is no more deviation in the moral standard than in the standard of height or bulk. No greater men are now than ever were. A singular equality may be observed between the great men of the first and of the last ages; nor can all the science, art, religion, and philosophy of the nineteenth century avail to educate greater men than Plutarch's heroes, three or four and twenty centuries ago. Not in time is the race progressive. Phocion, Socrates, Anaxagoras, Diogenes, are great men, but they leave no class. He who is really of their class will not be called by their name, but will be his own man, and in his turn the founder of a sect. The arts and inventions of each period are only its costume and do not invigorate men. The harm of the improved machinery may compensate its good. Hudson and Behring accomplished so much in their fishing-boats as to astonish Parry and Franklin, whose equipment exhausted the resources of science and art. Galileo, with an opera-glass, discovered a more splendid series of celestial phenomena than anyone since. Columbus found the New World in an undecked boat. It is curious to see the periodical disuse and perishing of means and machinery which were introduced with loud laudation a few years or centuries before. The great genius returns to essential man. We reckoned the improvements of the art of war among the triumphs of science, and yet Napoleon conquered Europe by the bivouac, which consisted of falling back on naked valor and disencumbering it of all aids. The Emperor held it impossible to make a perfect army, says Las Cases, "without abolishing our arms, magazines, commissaries and carriages, until, in imitation of the Roman custom, the soldier should receive his supply of corn, grind it in his hand-mill and bake his bread himself."

Society is a wave. The wave moves onward, but the water of which it is composed does not. The same particle does not rise from the valley to the ridge. Its unity is only phenomenal. The persons who make up a nation today, next year die, and their experience dies with them.

And so the reliance on Property, including the reliance on governments which protect it, is the want of self-reliance. Men have looked away from themselves and at things so long that they have come to esteem the religious, learned and civil institutions as guards of property, and they deprecate assaults on these, because they feel them to be assaults on property. They measure their esteem of each other by what each has, and not by what each is. But a cultivated man becomes ashamed of his property, out of new respect for his nature. Especially he hates what he has if he see that it is accidental,—came to him by inheritance, or gift, or crime; then he feels that it is not having; it does not belong to him, has no root in him and merely lies there because no revolution or no robber takes it away. But that which a man is, does always by necessity acquire; and what the man acquires, is living property, which does not wait the beck of rulers, or mobs, or revolutions, or fire, or storm, or bankruptcies, but perpetually renews itself wherever the man breathes. "Thy lot or portion of life," said the Caliph Ali, "is seeking after thee; therefore be at rest from seeking after it." Our dependence on these foreign goods leads us to our slavish respect for numbers. The political parties meet in numerous conventions; the greater the concourse and with each new uproar of announcement, The delegation from Essex! The Democrats from New Hampshire! The Whigs of Maine! the young patriot feels himself stronger than before by a new thousand of eyes and arms. In like manner the reformers summon conventions and vote and resolve in multitude. Not so, O friends! will the God deign to enter and inhabit you, but by a method precisely the reverse. It is only as a man puts off all foreign support and stands alone that I see him to be strong and to prevail. He is weaker by every recruit to his banner. Is not a man better than a town? Ask nothing of men, and, in the endless mutation, thou only firm column must presently appear the upholder of all that surrounds thee. He who knows that power is inborn, that he is weak because he has looked for good out of him and elsewhere, and, so perceiving, throws himself unhesitatingly on his thought, instantly rights himself, stands in the erect position, commands his limbs, works miracles; just as a man who stands on his feet is stronger than a man who stands on his head.

So use all that is called Fortune. Most men gamble with her, and gain all, and lose all, as her wheel rolls. But do thou leave as unlawful these winnings, and deal with Cause and Effect, the chancellors of God. In the Will work and acquire, and thou hast chained the wheel of Chance, and shall sit hereafter out of fear from her rotations. A political victory, a rise of rents, the recovery of your sick or the return of your absent friend, or some other favorable event raises your spirits, and you think good days are preparing for you. Do not believe it. Nothing can bring you peace but yourself. Nothing can bring you peace but the triumph of principles.

HENRY DAVID THOREAU

Brute Neighbors

Sometimes I had a companion in my fishing, who came through the village to my house from the other side of the town, and the catching of the dinner was as much a social exercise as the eating of it.

Hermit. I wonder what the world is doing now. I have not heard so much as a locust over the sweet-fern these three hours. The pigeons are all asleep upon their roosts,—no flutter from them. Was that a farmer's noon horn which sounded from beyond the woods just now? The hands are coming in to boiled salt beef and cider and Indian bread. Why will men worry themselves so? He that does not eat need not work. I wonder how much they have reaped. Who would live there where a body can never think for the barking of Bose? And O, the housekeeping! to keep bright the devil's door-knobs, and scour his tubs this bright day! Better not keep a house. Say, some hollow tree; and then for morning calls and dinner-parties! Only a woodpecker tapping. O, they swarm; the sun is too warm there; they are born too far into life for me. I have water from the spring, and a loaf of brown bread on the shelf.—Hark! I hear a rustling of the leaves. Is it some ill-fed village hound yielding to the instinct of the chase? or the lost pig which is said to be in these woods, whose tracks I saw after the rain? It comes on apace; my sumachs and sweet-briers tremble.—Eh, Mr. Poet, is it you? How do you like the world today?

Poet. See those clouds; how they hang! That's the greatest thing I have seen today. There's nothing like it in old paintings, nothing like it in foreign lands,—unless when we were off the coast of Spain. That's a true Mediterranean Sky. I thought, as I have my living to get, and have not eaten today, that I might go a-fishing. That's the true industry for poets. It is the only trade I have learned. Come, let's along.

Hermit. I cannot resist. My brown bread will soon be gone. I will go with you gladly soon, but I am just concluding a serious meditation. I think that I am near the end of it. Leave me alone, then, for a while. But that we may not be delayed, you shall be digging the bait meanwhile. Angle worms are rarely to be met with in these parts, where the soil was never fattened with manure; the race is nearly extinct. The sport of digging the bait is nearly equal to that of catching the fish, when one's appetite is not too keen; and this you may have all to yourself today. I would advise you to set in the spade down yonder among the ground-nuts, where you see the johnswort waving. I think that I may warrant you one worm to every three sods you turn up, if you look well in among the roots of the grass, as if you were weeding. Or, if you choose to go farther, it will not be unwise, for I have found the increase of fair bait to be very nearly as the squares of the distances.

Hermit alone. Let me see; where was I? Methinks I was nearly in this frame of mind; the world lay about at this angle. Shall I go to heaven or a-fishing? If I should soon bring this meditation to an end, would another so sweet occasion be likely to offer? I was as near being resolved into the essence of things as ever I was in my life. I fear my thoughts will not come back to me. If it would do any good, I would whistle for them. When they make us an offer, is it wise to say, We will think of it? My thoughts have left no track, and I cannot find the path again. What was it that I was thinking of? It was a very hazy day. I will just try these three sentences of Con-fut-see; they may fetch that state about again. I know not whether it was the dumps or a budding ecstasy. Mem. There never is but one opportunity of a kind.

Poet. How now, Hermit, is it too soon? I have got just thirteen whole ones, besides several which are imperfect or undersized; but they will do for the smaller fry; they do not cover up the hook so much. Those village worms are quite too large; a shiner may make a meal off one without finding the skewer.

Hermit. Well, then let's be off. Shall we to the Thoreau, Brute Neighbors. Henry David Thoreau (1817-1862) passed his life at Concord, Massachusetts, where he was associated with Emerson and his literary group. He lived alone on the shore of Walden Pond near Concord from 1845 to 1847. This selection is taken from Walden.

Concord? There's good sport there if the water be not too high.

Why do precisely these objects which we behold make a world? Why has man just these species of animals for his neighbors; as if nothing but a house could have filled this crevice? I suspect that Pilpay & Co. have put animals to their best use, for they are all beasts of burden, in a sense, made to carry some portion of our thoughts.

The mice which haunted my house were not the common ones, which are said to have been introduced into the country, but a wild native kind not found in the village. I sent one to a distinguished naturalist, and it interested him much. When I was building, one of these had its nest underneath the house, and before I had laid the second floor, and swept out the shavings, would come out regularly at lunch time and pick up the crumbs at my feet. It probably had never seen a man before; and it soon became quite familiar, and would run over my shoes and up my clothes. It could readily ascend the sides of the room by short impulses, like a squirrel, which it resembled in its motions. At length, as I leaned with my elbow on the bench one day, it ran up my clothes, and along my sleeve, and round and round the paper which held my dinner, while I kept the latter close, and dodged and played at bo-peep with it; and when at last I held still a piece of cheese between my thumb and finger, it came and nibbled it, sitting in my hand, and afterward cleaned its face and paws, like a fly, and walked away.

A phœbe soon built in my shed, and a robin for protection in a pine which grew against the house. In June the partridge (Tetrao umbellus), which is so shy a bird, led her brood past my windows, from the woods in the rear to the front of my house, clucking and calling to them like a hen, and in all her behavior proving herself the hen of the woods. The young suddenly disperse on your approach, at a signal from the mother, as if a whirlwind had swept them away, and they so exactly resemble the dried leaves and twigs that many a traveler has placed his foot in the midst of a brood, and heard the whir of the old bird as she flew off, and her anxious calls and mewing, or seen her trail her wings to attract his attention, without suspecting their neighborhood. The parent will sometimes roll and spin round before you in such a dishabille, that you cannot, for a few moments, detect what kind of creature it is. The young squat still and flat, often running their heads under a leaf, and mind only their mother's directions given from a distance, nor will your approach make them run again and betray themselves. You may even tread on them, or have your eyes on them for a minute, without discovering them. I have held them in my open hand at such a time, and still their only care, obedient to their mother and their instinct, was to squat there without fear or trembling. So perfect is this instinct, that once, when I had laid them on the leaves again, and one accidentally fell on its side, it was found with the rest in exactly the same position ten minutes afterward. They are not callow like the young of most birds, but more perfectly developed and precocious even than chickens. The remarkably adult yet innocent expression of their open and serene eyes is very memorable. All intelligence seems reflected in them. They suggest not merely the purity of infancy, but a wisdom clarified by experience. Such an eye was not born when the bird was, but is coeval with the sky it reflects. The woods do not yield another such a gem. The traveler does not often look into such a limpid well. The ignorant or reckless sportsman often shoots the parent at such a time, and leaves these innocents to fall a prey to some prowling beast or bird, or gradually mingle with the decaying leaves which they so much resemble. It is said that when hatched by a hen they will directly disperse on some alarm, and so are lost, for they never hear the mother's call which gathers them again. These were my hens and chickens.

It is remarkable how many creatures live wild and free though secret in the woods, and still sustain themselves in the neighborhood of towns, suspected by hunters only. How retired the otter manages to live here! He grows to be four feet long, as big as a small boy, perhaps without any human being getting a glimpse of him. I formerly saw the raccoon in the woods behind where my house is built, and probably still heard their whinnering at night. Commonly I rested an hour or two in the shade at noon, after planting, and ate my lunch, and read a little by a spring which was the source of a swamp and of a brook, oozing from under Brister's Hill, half a mile from my field. The approach to this was through a succession of descending grassy hollows, full of young pitch-pines, into a larger wood about the swamp. There, in a very secluded and shaded spot, under a spreading white-pine, there was yet a clean firm sward to sit on. I had dug out the spring and made a well of clear gray water, where I could dip up a pailful without roiling it, and thither I went for this purpose almost every day in midsummer, when the pond was warmest. Thither too the wood-cock led her brood, to probe the mud for worms, flying but a foot above them down the bank, while they ran in a troop beneath; but at last, spying me, she would leave her young and circle round and round me, nearer and nearer till within four or five feet, pretending broken wings and legs, to attract my attention, and get off her young, who would already have taken up their march, with faint wiry peep, single file through the swamp, as she directed. Or I heard the peep of the young when I could not see the parent bird. There too the turtle-doves sat over the spring, or fluttered from bough to bough of the soft white-pines over my head; or the red squirrel, coursing down the nearest bough, was particularly familiar and inquisitive. You only need sit still long enough in some attractive spot in the woods that all its inhabitants may exhibit themselves to you by turns.

I was witness to events of a less peaceful character. One day when I went out to my wood-pile, or rather my pile of stumps, I observed two large ants, the one red, the other much larger, nearly half an inch long, and black, fiercely contending with one another. Having once got hold they never let go, but struggled and wrestled and rolled on the chips incessantly. Looking farther, I was surprised to find that the chips were covered with such combatants, that it was not a duellum, but a bellum, a war between two races of ants, the red always pitted against the black, and frequently two red ones to one black. The legions of these Myrmidons covered all the hills and vales in my wood-yard, and the ground was already strewn with the dead and dying, both red and black. It was the only battle-field which I have ever witnessed, the only battle-field I ever trod while the battle was raging; internecine war; the red republicans on the one hand, and the black imperialists on the other. On every side they were engaged in deadly combat, yet without any noise that I could hear, and human soldiers never fought so resolutely. I watched a couple that were fast locked in each other's embraces, in a little sunny valley amid the chips, now at noon-day prepared to fight till the sun went down, or life went out. The smaller red champion had fastened himself like a vice to his adversary's front, and through all the tumblings on that field never for an instant ceased to gnaw at one of his feelers near the root, having already caused the other to go by the board; while the stronger black one dashed him from side to side, and, as I saw on looking nearer, had already divested him of several of his members. They fought with more pertinacity than bull-dogs. Neither manifested the least disposition to retreat. It was evident that their battle-cry was Conquer or die. In the meanwhile there came along a single red ant on the hill-side of this valley, evidently full of excitement, who either had despatched his foe, or had not yet taken part in the battle; probably the latter, for he had lost none of his limbs; whose mother had charged him to return with his shield or upon it. Or perchance he was some Achilles, who had nourished his wrath apart, and had now come to avenge or rescue his Patroclus. He saw this unequal combat from afar,—for the blacks were nearly twice the size of the red,—he drew near with rapid pace till he stood on his guard within half an inch of the combatants; then, watching his opportunity, he sprang upon the black warrior, and commenced his operations near the root of his right fore-leg, leaving the foe to select among his own members; and so there were three united for life, as if a new kind of attraction had been invented which put all other locks and cements to shame. I should not have wondered by this time to find that they had their respective musical bands stationed on some eminent chip, and playing their national airs the while, to excite the slow and cheer the dying combatants. I was myself excited somewhat even as if they had been men. The more you think of it, the less the difference. And certainly there is not the fight recorded in Concord history, at least, if in the history of America, that will bear a moment's comparison with this, whether for the numbers engaged in it, or for the patriotism and heroism displayed. For numbers and for carnage it was an Austerlitz or Dresden. Concord Fight! Two killed on the patriots' side and Luther Blanchard wounded! Why here every ant was a Buttrick,—“Fire! for god's sake fire!”—and thousands shared the fate of Davis and Hosmer. There was not one hireling there. I have no doubt that it was a principle they fought for, as much as our ancestors, and not to avoid a three-penny tax on their tea; and the results of this battle will be as important and memorable to those whom it concerns as those of the battle of Bunker Hill at least.

I took up the chip on which the three I have particularly described were struggling, carried it into my house, and placed it under a tumbler on my window-sill, in order to see the issue. Holding a microscope to the first-mentioned red ant, I saw that, though he was assiduously gnawing at the near fore-leg of his enemy, having severed his remaining feeler, his own breast was all torn away, exposing what vitals he had there to the jaws of the black warrior, whose breastplate was apparently too thick for him to pierce; and the dark carbuncles of the sufferer's eyes shone with ferocity such as war only could excite. They struggled half an hour longer under the tumbler, and when I looked again the black soldier had severed the heads of his foes from their bodies, and the still living heads were hanging on either side of him like ghastly trophies at his saddlebow, still apparently as firmly fastened as ever, and he was endeavoring with feeble struggles, being without feelers and with only the remnant of a leg, and I know not how many other wounds, to divest himself of them; which at length, after half an hour more, he accomplished. I raised the glass, and he went off over the window-sill in that crippled state. Whether he finally survived that combat, and spent the remainder of his days in some Hotel des Invalides, I do not know; but I thought that his industry would not be worth much thereafter. I never learned which party was victorious, nor the cause of the war; but I felt for the rest of that day as if I had my feelings excited and harrowed by witnessing the struggle, the ferocity and carnage, of a human battle before my door.

Kirby and Spence tell us that the battles of ants have long been celebrated, and the date of them recorded, though they say that Huber is the only modern author who appears to have witnessed them. "Æneas Sylvius," say they, "after giving a very circumstantial account of one contested with great obstinacy by a great and small species on the trunk of a pear tree," adds that "This action was fought in the pontificate of Eugenius the Fourth, in the presence of Nicholas Pistoriensis, an eminent lawyer, who related the whole history of the battle with the greatest fidelity." A similar engagement between great and small ants is recorded by Olaus Magnus, in which the small ones, being victorious, are said to have buried the bodies of their own soldiers, but left those of their giant enemies a prey to the birds. This event happened previous to the expulsion of the tyrant Christiern the Second from Sweden." The battle which I witnessed took place in the Presidency of Polk, five years before the passage of Webster's Fugitive-Slave Bill.

Many a village Bose, fit only to course a mud-turtle in a victualing cellar, sported his heavy quarters in the woods, without the knowledge of his master, and ineffectually smelled at old fox burrows and woodchucks' holes; led perchance by some slight cur which nimbly threaded the wood, and might still inspire a natural terror in its denizens;—now far behind his guide, barking like a canine bull toward some small squirrel which had treed itself for scrutiny, then, cantering off, bending the bushes with his weight, imagining that he is on the track of some stray member of the jerbilla family. Once I was surprised to see a cat walking along the stony shore of the pond, for they rarely wander so far from home. The surprise was mutual. Nevertheless the most domestic cat, which has lain on a rug all her days, appears quite at home in the woods, and, by her sly and stealthy behavior, proves herself more native there than the regular inhabitants. Once, when berrying, I met with a cat with young kittens in the woods, quite wild, and they all like their mother, had their backs up and were fiercely spitting at me. A few years before I lived in the woods there was what was called a "winged cat" in one of the farmhouses in Lincoln nearest the pond, Mr. Gilian Baker's. When I called to see her in June, 1842, she was gone a-hunting in the woods, as was her wont (I am not sure whether it was a male or female, and so use the more common pronoun), but her mistress told me that she came into the neighborhood a little more than a year before, in April, and was finally taken into their house, that she was of a dark brownish-gray color, with a white spot on her throat, and white feet, and had a large bushy tail like a fox; that in the winter the fur grew thick and flatted out along her sides, forming strips ten or twelve inches long by two and a half wide, and under her chin like a muff, the upper side loose, the under matted like felt, and in the spring these appendages dropped off. They gave me a pair of her "wings," which I keep still. There is no appearance of a membrane about them. Some thought it was part flying-squirrel or some other wild animal, which is not impossible, for, according to naturalists, prolific hybrids have been produced by the union of the marten and domestic cat. This would have been the right kind of cat for me to keep, if I had kept any; for why should not a poet's cat be winged as well as his horse?

In the fall the loon (Colymbus glacialis) came, as usual, to molt and bathe in the pond, making the woods ring with his wild laughter before I had risen. At rumor of his arrival all the Mill-dam sportsmen are on the alert, in gigs and on foot, two by two and three by three, with patent rifles and conical balls and spy-glasses. They come rustling through the woods like autumn leaves, at least ten men to one loon. Some station themselves on this side of the pond, some on that, for the poor bird cannot be omnipresent; if he dive here he must come up there. But now the kind October wind rises, rustling the leaves and rippling the surface of the water, so that no loon can be heard or seen, though his foes sweep the pond with spy-glasses, and make the woods resound with their discharges. The waves generously rise and dash angrily, taking sides with all waterfowl, and our sportsmen must beat a retreat to town and shop and unfinished jobs. But they were too often successful. When I went to get a pail of water early in the morning I frequently saw this stately bird sailing out of my cove within a few rods. If I endeavored to overtake him in a boat, in order to see how he would maneuver, he would dive and be completely lost, so that I did not discover him again, sometimes, till the latter part of the day. But I was more than a match for him on the surface. He commonly went off in a rain.

As I was paddling along the north shore one very calm October afternoon, for such days especially they settle on to the lakes, like the milkweed down, having looked in vain over the pond for a loon, suddenly one, sailing out from the shore toward the middle a few rods in front of me, set up his wild laugh and betrayed himself. I pursued with a paddle and he dived, but when he came up I was nearer than before. He dived again, but I miscalculated the direction he would take, and we were fifty rods apart when he came to the surface this time, for I had helped to widen the interval; and again he laughed loud and long, and with more reason than before. He maneuvered so cunningly that I could not get within half a dozen rods of him. Each time, when he came to the surface, turning his head this way and that, he coolly surveyed the water and the land, and apparently chose his course so that he might come up where there was the widest expanse of water and at the greatest distance from the boat. It was surprising how quickly he made up his mind and put his resolve into execution. He led me at once to the widest part of the pond, and could not be driven from it. While he was thinking one thing in his brain, I was endeavoring to divine his thought in mine. It was a pretty game, played on the smooth surface of the pond, a man against a loon. Suddenly your adversary's checker disappears beneath the board, and the problem is to place yours nearest to where his will appear again. Sometimes he would come up unexpectedly on the opposite side of me having apparently passed directly under the boat. So long-winded was he and so unweariable, that when he had swum farthest he would immediately plunge again, nevertheless; and then no wit could divine where in the deep pond, beneath the smooth surface, he might be speeding his way like a fish, for he had time and ability to visit the bottom of the pond in its deepest part. It is said that loons have been caught in the New York lakes eighty feet beneath the surface, with hooks set for trout,—though Walden is deeper than that. How surprised must the fishes be to see this ungainly visitor from another sphere speeding his way amid their schools! Yet he appeared to know his course as surely underwater as on the surface, and swam much faster there. Once or twice I saw a ripple where he approached the surface, just put his head out to reconnoiter, and instantly dived again. I found that it was as well for me to rest on my oars and wait his reappearing as to endeavor to calculate where he would rise; for again and again, when I was straining my eyes over the surface one way, I would suddenly be startled by his unearthly laugh behind me. But why, after displaying so much cunning, did he invariably betray himself the moment he came up by that loud laugh? Did not his white breast enough betray him? He was indeed a silly loon, I thought. I could commonly hear the splash of the water when he came up, and so also detected him. But after an hour he seemed as fresh as ever, dived as willingly and swam yet farther than at first. It was surprising to see how serenely he sailed off with unruffled breast when he came to the surface, doing all the work with his webbed feet beneath. His usual note was this demoniac laughter, yet somewhat like that of a water-fowl; but occasionally, when he had balked me most successfully and come up a long way off, he uttered a long-drawn uncouthly howl, probably more like that of a wolf than any bird; as when a beast puts his muzzle to the ground and deliberately howls. This was his looning,—perhaps the wildest sound that is ever heard here, making the woods ring far and wide. I concluded that he laughed in derision of my efforts, confident of his own resources. Though the sky was by this time overcast, the pond was so smooth that I could see where he broke the surface when I did not hear him. His white breast, the stillness of the air, and the smoothness of the water were all against him. At length, having come up fifty rods off, he uttered one of those prolonged howls, as if calling on the god of loons to aid him, and immediately there came a wind from the east and rippled the surface, and filled the whole air with misty rain, and I was impressed as if it were the prayer of the loon answered, and his god was angry with me; and so I left him disappearing far away on the tumultuous surface.

For hours, in fall days, I watched the ducks cunningly tack and veer and hold the middle of the pond, far from the sportsmen; tricks which they will have less need to practice in Louisiana bayous. When compelled to rise they would sometimes circle round and round and over the pond at a considerable height, from which they could easily see to other ponds and the river, like black motes in the sky; and, when I thought they had gone off thither long since, they would settle down by a slanting flight of a quarter of a mile on to a distant part which was left free; but what beside safety they got by sailing in the middle of Walden I do not know, unless they love its water for the same reason that I do.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Address at Gettysburg

Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now, we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle field of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting-place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or to detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us; that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

Second Inaugural Address

Fellow-countrymen:—At this second appearing to take the oath of the presidential office, there is less occasion for an extended address than there was at the first. Then a statement, somewhat in detail, of a course to be pursued, seemed fitting and proper. Now, at the expiration of four years, during which public declarations have been constantly called forth on every point and phase of the great contest which still absorbs the attention and engrosses the energies of the nation, little that is new can be presented. The progress of our arms, upon which all else chiefly depends, is as well known to the public as to myself; and it is, I trust, reasonably satisfactory and encouraging to all. With high hope for the future, no prediction in regard to it is ventured.

On the occasion corresponding to this four years ago, all thoughts were anxiously directed to an impending civil war. All dreaded it—all sought to avert it. While the inaugural address was being delivered from this place, devoted altogether to saving the Union without war, insurgent agents were in the city seeking to destroy it without war

Lincoln, Address at Gettysburg. Abraham Lincoln (1809-1865) was born in Kentucky but moved to Illinois as a young man. He practiced law and held political office. He was President from 1861 to 1865, during the Civil War.

—seeking to dissolve the Union, and divide effects, by negotiation. Both parties deprecated war; but one of them would make war rather than let the nation survive; and the other would accept war rather than let it perish. And the war came.

One-eighth of the whole population were colored slaves, not distributed generally over the Union, but localized in the Southern part of it. These slaves constituted a peculiar and powerful interest. All knew that this interest was, somehow, the cause of the war. To strengthen, perpetuate, and extend this interest was the object for which the insurgents would rend the Union, even by war; while the government claimed no right to do more than to restrict the territorial enlargement of it.

Neither party expected for the war the magnitude or the duration which it has already attained. Neither anticipated that the cause of the conflict might cease with, or even before, the conflict itself should cease. Each looked for an easier triumph, and a result less fundamental and astounding. Both read the same Bible, and pray to the same God; and each invokes his aid against the other. It may seem strange that any men should dare to ask a just God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces; but let us judge not, that we be not judged. The prayers of both could not be answered—that of neither has been answered fully.

The Almighty has his own purposes. "Woe unto the world because of offenses! for it must needs be that offenses come: but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh." If we shall suppose that American slavery is one of those offenses which, in the providence of God, must needs come, but which, having continued through his appointed time, he now wills to remove, and that he gives to both North and South this terrible war, as the woe due to those by whom the offense came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a living God always ascribe to him? Fondly do we hope— fervently do we pray—that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if God wills that it shall continue until all the wealth piled by the bondman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said, "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow, and his orphan—to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves, and with all nations.

THE VICTORIAN POETS

An intelligent discussion of the English poets of the Victorian age is impossible without some consideration of the age itself and of the forces that made it what it was. By the year 1830 England had adjusted itself to the conditions brought about by the close of the Napoleonic wars. But several new elements were entering into the life of the nation that were to have a profound effect on its thinkers and writers.

With the invention of new machines and new industrial processes at the end of the eighteenth century an entirely new adjustment between laborer and employer became necessary. The establishment of large factories and the concentration of wealth caused acute distress to the lower classes. On the other hand, a new wealthy middle class emerged to challenge leadership of the nation with the older aristocracy.

The greatest advance of the Victorian age was in the field of science. During the 1830's the principles of geology came to be understood, and their implications in connection with accepted theories of the creation of the earth were realized by such thinkers as Tennyson. The most revolutionary scientific pronouncement of the century, however, was the publication of Darwin's The Origin of Species in 1859. The consideration of this book made it impossible to avoid a conflict in religious ideas between those who held for a strict interpretation of Christian dogmas as laid down in earlier centuries and those who insisted that religious beliefs must adjust themselves to advancing knowledge. This conflict has, of course, not entirely ended, but after some twenty or thirty years it ceased to have much importance for literature.

Developments of science in other fields, such as chemistry and physics, caused a transformation of the daily life of the people. Railroads and telegraphs and modern household conveniences changed the England of 1830 from an almost medieval type of existence until, by the end of the century, it was in all essentials like that of today. Contacts of all kinds became easier and, though this condition brought about a greater understanding between distant parts of the country and even of outlying parts of the Empire, it also promoted a restlessness among all classes and displayed such contrasts in living as to make for continual dissatisfaction on the part of the underprivileged.

Along with these ill-adjustments there was a serious attempt to meet problems as they arose. Throughout the century, reforms in parliamentary procedure, in the relations of employer and laborer, and in the administration of charity and of unemployment relief came slowly but surely as they were needed.

All these external aspects of Victorian life had their effect on literature. But they were hardly more important in setting the tone of the period than was the character of the royal lady who gave it her name. Queen Victoria stood as a champion for rigidity, not only in morals, but in manners as well. The license of speech, which a generation before permitted all sorts of subjects to be discussed in the drawing-room, now gave way to an extreme reticence, so that many of the works of older authors were frowned on as indecent. The range of what could be discussed in literature was greatly narrowed. This prudery was doubtless a handicap for Victorian literature—a handicap which our present generation has more than overcome.

THE VICTORIAN POETS

What with the many changes of the age, all of which seemed at least to be advances, and what with the conscious correctness in social life, the Victorian writer had a great tendency to congratulate himself and his fellows. All appeared to be well in the best of possible worlds. Though a Matthew Arnold here and there may protest, the typical feeling of the mid-nineteenth century Englishman is expressed by Tennyson as follows:

Her court was pure; her life serene;
God gave her peace; her land reposed;
A thousand claims to reverence closed
In her as Mother, Wife, and Queen;

And statesmen at her council met
Who knew the seasons when to take Occasion by the hand, and make
The bounds of freedom wider yet

By shaping some august decree
Which kept her throne unshaken still,
Broad-based upon her people's will,
And compass'd by the inviolate sea.

As we look back on it now, Tennyson seems to be the most representative Victorian. From the time when he began to write, around 1830, he had an easy command of poetic expression. At his best he has seldom been surpassed for the musical quality of his verse. It is entirely appropriate that he should have been Poet Laureate, since in his work he shows all the strength and weakness of Victorianism. In such poems as Ulysses he achieves a nobility of conception and expression seldom reached in English poetry. But he does not maintain this high level, and he wrote much that will not endure.

His great contemporary, Robert Browning, was felt in his own day to be extremely modern. His wide variety of intellectual interests, his many experiments in meter, frequently grotesque, and his awkward and deliberately obscure passages called attention to himself and made him, especially in his later days, extremely popular. Two generations have now passed and his grotesqueness and obscurity have lost their interest and seem to most critics forced and artificial. Browning also wrote far too much, so that the larger proportion of his output is utterly dead. Nevertheless, he made many permanent contributions to our literature. The most important of these are his dramatic monologues and his lyric poems.

When in 1846 Browning married Elizabeth Barrett, she was already well established as a poet. Though the romantic interest in the marriage of these two poets tends to keep her memory green, it cannot be said that any of her work has maintained vitality except the Sonnets from the Portuguese which she wrote as a wedding present for her husband.

THE VICTORIAN POETS

In another place we have remarked upon the prose works of Matthew Arnold. In many ways he was the chief literary figure of the Victorian age, for he is almost equally distinguished as essayist and as poet. More than any other poet of his generation he brought into English literature the results of his training in the Greek classics. More and more his poems are coming to be admired for their excellent balance of emotion, observation, imagination, and thought.

The middle of the nineteenth century saw the rise of a group of poets in London who were interested almost as much in art as in literature. They formed the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood and banded together to take their artistic inspiration from the simpler painters who had preceded Raphael. Typical of this group was Dante Gabriel Rossetti, who was artist as well as poet. Beauty of color and form is his interest always. Even with religious subjects he is likely to be ornate. His contemporaries called him "fleshly." Though his poems have much beauty, they have suffered in their final reputation because they have little else.

Rossetti's sister, Christina, is by many critics ranked at the head of all women poets of England. She has little, if anything, in common with her brother. She was a person of extraordinary piety, and a large proportion of her poems are devotional and utterly lacking in artistic value. In several poems she expresses with great poignancy her self-abnegation in the face of a hopeless love. She is also the author of a beautiful group of lilting songs for children.

Not all the Pre-Raphaelite poets found their artistic expression in painting. William Morris engaged in almost all other branches of art, particularly fine printing, interior decorating, and the making of beautiful furniture. He was one of the most voluminous of English poets and one of the most skillful writers of the metrical tale. In one of his poems he speaks of himself as "an idle singer of an empty day," but as a matter of fact he took great interest in the life of his time. Though he looked longingly back to the Middle Ages, or let his imagination wander with Jason or Sigurd on their marvelous adventures, he was actively engaged in trying to improve artistic taste and in forwarding the cause of socialism.

Rather more loosely associated with the group was Algernon Charles Swinburne. In his metrical virtuosity and his lusciousness of poetic phrase and imagery he resembles his friend Rossetti. Our present age has been prone to see many weaknesses in his work: the overuse of poetic devices, such as alliteration; the writing of lines that are really nonsense in the desire for a beautiful sound effect; the inability to say much in little, so that his poems repeat themselves and drag tediously on; and finally the fact that he had little to say. While most of this is true, it must not be forgotten that Swinburne expresses real social and philosophical convictions. His is the best poetic statement of the philosophy of Positivism, which to many serious thinkers of his generation seemed the proper solution of the religious conflict we have already mentioned. Swinburne was also interested in the spread of political liberty throughout the world.

As the century wore on toward its close, the forces of Victorianism gradually spent themselves. Before a discussion of two of the later poets, it must be remarked that the age of Victoria produced a number of great novelists. It is a matter of regret that an anthology such as this cannot give examples of the work of such writers of fiction as Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot, the Brontë sisters, Meredith, and Hardy, not to speak of many important novelists not quite so well known.

We are representing the last decade of the nineteenth century by the poetry of Henley and Housman. Some of Henley's poems were written twenty years earlier than this, but most of them are definitely post-Victorian in spirit. In spite of the fact that he was a cripple, Henley was one of the most robust writers of his time. His poetry ranges from the heroic expression of stoicism in his Invictus to the beautiful love lyric, A Bowl of Roses, and the calm serenity of Margaritæ Sorori.

It was, of course, in this decade that Rudyard Kipling achieved his great popularity, but just as the extravagant acclaim given his red-blooded poems in the nineties has diminished with each year, so a small volume of lyrics which came unnoticed from the press in 1896 has claimed our attention more and more until most critics are finding that Kipling must give way to A. E. Housman as the principal poet of the end of the century. A Shropshire Lad contains fewer than fifty poems, and none of them is long. They are expressed in extremely simple language and frequently in such melodious words that the reader may conclude that they are lacking in thought. On further study he will find that they are very closely packed with meaning and especially that the last two lines of many of the poems display the poem's whole philosophy. The vein of pessimism throughout the volume shows a kinship to our own day, and it is entirely possible that that quality contributes to its current popularity. Even the most conservative critic, however, must agree that English poetry was far from dead when it could produce A Shropshire Lad.

ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON

Choric Song from the Lotos-Eaters

I

There is sweet music here that softer falls
Than petals from blown roses on the grass,
Or night-dews on still waters between walls
Of shadowy granite, in a gleaming pass;
Music that gentlier on the spirit lies,
Than tired eyelids upon tired eyes;
Music that brings sweet sleep down from the blissful skies.

Here are cool mosses deep,
And through the moss the ivies creep,
And in the stream the long-leaved flowers weep,
And from the craggy ledge the poppy hangs in sleep.

II

Why are we weighed upon with heaviness,
And utterly consumed with sharp distress,

While all things else have rest from weariness?
All things have rest; why should we toil alone,
We only toil, who are the first of things,
And make perpetual moan,
Still from one sorrow to another thrown;
Nor ever fold our wings,
And cease from wanderings,
Nor steep our brows in slumber's holy balm;
Nor harken what the inner spirit sings,
"There is no joy but calm!"—
Why should we only toil, the roof and crown of things?

III

Lo! in the middle of the wood,
The folded leaf is wooed from out the bud
With winds upon the branch, and there
Grows green and broad, and takes no care,
Sun-steeped at noon, and in the moon
Nightly dew-fed; and turning yellow

Tennyson, Choric Song from the Lotos-Eaters. Alfred Tennyson (1809-1892) was born in Surrey, the son of an English clergyman. Soon after completing his university work at Cambridge he began writing poetry. Appointed Poet Laureate in 1850, he was raised to the peerage in 1884. See the account of the Lotos-Eaters in The Odyssey, p. 71 above.

Falls, and floats adown the air.
 Lol sweetened with the summer light,
 The full-juiced apple, waxing over-mellow,
 Drops in a silent autumn night.
 All its allotted length of days
 The flower ripens in its place,
 Ripens and fades, and falls, and hath no toil,
 Fast-rooted in the fruitful soil.

IV

Hateful is the dark-blue sky,
 Vaulted o'er the dark-blue sea.
 Death is the end of life; ah, why Should life all labor be?
 Let us alone. Time driveth onward fast,
 And in a little while our lips are dumb.
 Let us alone. What is it that will last?
 All things are taken from us, and become Portions and parcels of the dreadful past.
 Let us alone. What pleasure can we have To war with evil? Is there any peace
 In ever climbing up the climbing wave?
 All things have rest, and ripen toward the grave
 In silence—ripen, fall, and cease.
 Give us long rest or death, dark death, or dream-ful ease.

V

How sweet it were, hearing the downward stream,
 With half-shut eyes ever to seem
 Falling asleep in a half-dream!
 To dream and dream, like yonder amber light,
 Which will not leave the myrrh-bush on the height;

To hear each other's whispered speech;
 Eating the Lotos day by day,
 To watch the crisping ripples on the beach,
 And tender curving lines of creamy spray;
 To lend our hearts and spirits wholly
 To the influence of mild-minded melancholy;
 To muse and brood and live again in memory,
 With those old faces of our infancy
 Heaped over with a mound of grass,
 Two handfuls of white dust, shut in an urn of brass!

VI

Dear is the memory of our wedded lives,
 And dear the last embraces of our wives
 And their warm tears; but all hath suffered change;
 For surely now our household hearths are cold,
 Our sons inherit us, our looks are strange,

And we should come like ghosts to trouble joy.
 Or else the island princes over-bold
 Have eat our substance, and the minstrel sings
 Before them of the ten years' war in Troy,
 And our great deeds, as half-forgotten things.
 Is there confusion in the little isle?
 Let what is broken so remain.
 The gods are hard to reconcile;
 'Tis hard to settle order once again.
 There is confusion worse than death,
 Trouble on trouble, pain on pain,
 Long labor unto aged breath,
 Sore task to hearts worn out by many wars
 And eyes grown dim with gazing on the pilot-stars.

VII

But, propped on beds of amaranth and moly,¹
 How sweet—while warm airs lull us, blowing lowly—
 With half-dropped eyelid still,
 Beneath a heaven dark and holy,
 To watch the long bright river drawing slowly
 His waters from the purple hill—
 To hear the dewy echoes calling
 From cave to cave through the thick-twined vine—
 To watch the emerald-colored water falling
 Through many a woven acanthus-wreath divine!
 Only to hear and see the far-off sparkling brine,
 Only to hear were sweet, stretched out beneath the pine.

VIII

The Lotos blooms below the barren peak,
 The Lotos blows by every winding creek;
 All day the wind breathes low with mellower tone;
 Through every hollow cave and alley lone
 Round and round the spicy downs the yellow
 Lotos-dust is blown.
 We have had enough of action, and of motion
 we,
 Rolled to starboard, rolled to larboard, when the surge was seething free,
 Where the wallowing monster spouted his foam-fountains in the sea.
 Let us swear an oath, and keep it with an equal
 mind,
 In the hollow Lotos-land to live and lie reclined
 On the hills like gods together, careless of mankind.

¹ Moly was a magic plant mentioned in The Odyssey.

For they lie beside their nectar, and the bolts are hurled Far below them in the valleys, and the clouds are lightly curled Round their golden houses, girdled with the gleaming world;
Where they smile in secret, looking over wasted lands,
Blight and famine, plague and earthquake, roaring deeps and fiery sands, 115
Clanging fights, and flaming towns, and sinking ships, and praying hands.
But they smile, they find a music centered in a doleful song
Steaming up, a lamentation and an ancient tale of wrong,
Like a tale of little meaning though the words are strong;
Chanted from an ill-used race of men that cleave
the soil, 120
Sow the seed, and reap the harvest with enduring toil,
Storing yearly little dues of wheat, and wine and oil;
Till they perish and they suffer—some, 'tis whispered—down in hell
Suffer endless anguish, others in Elysian valleys dwell,
Resting weary limbs at last on beds of asphodel.
Surely, surely, slumber is more sweet than toil, the shore 126
Than labor in the deep mid-ocean, wind and wave
and oar;
Oh, rest ye, brother mariners, we will not wander
more.

Ulysses

It little profits that an idle king,
By this still hearth, among these barren crags,
Matched with an aged wife, I mete and dole
Unequal laws unto a savage race,
That hoard, and sleep, and feed, and know not
me. 5
I cannot rest from travel. I will drink
Life to the lees. All times I have enjoyed Greatly, have suffered greatly, both with those
That loved me, and alone; on shore, and when Through scudding drifts the rainy Hyades 10
Vexed the dim sea. I am become a name;
For always roaming with a hungry heart
Much have I seen and known; cities of men,
And manners, climates, councils, governments,

Myself not least, but honored of them all; 15
And drunk delight of battle with my peers,
Far on the ringing plains of windy Troy.
I am a part of all that I have met.
Yet all experience is an arch wherethrough Gleams that untraveled world, whose margin fades 20
Forever and forever when I move.
How dull it is to pause, to make an end,
To rust unburnished, not to shine in use!
As though to breathe were life. Life piled on life
Were all too little, and of one to me 25
Little remains. But every hour is saved
From that eternal silence, something more,
A bringer of new things; and vile it were
For some three suns to store and hoard myself,
And this gray spirit yearning in desire 30
To follow knowledge like a sinking star,
Beyond the utmost bound of human thought.
This is my son, mine own Telemachus,
To whom I leave the scepter and the isle—
Well-loved of me, discerning to fulfill 35
This labor, by slow prudence to make mild
A rugged people, and through soft degrees
Subdue them to the useful and the good.
Most blameless is he, centered in the sphere
Of common duties, decent not to fail 40
In offices of tenderness, and pay
Meet adoration to my household gods,
When I am gone. He works his work, I mine.
There lies the port; the vessel puffs her sail;
There gloom the dark broad seas. My mariners, Souls that have toiled, and wrought, and thought with me— 46
That ever with a frolic welcome took
The thunder and the sunshine, and opposed
Free hearts, free foreheads—you and I are old;
Old age hath yet his honor and his toil; 50
Death closes all. But something ere the end,
Some work of noble note, may yet be done,
Not unbecoming men that strove with gods.
The lights begin to twinkle from the rocks;
The long day wanes; the slow moon climbs; the
deep 55
Moans round with many voices. Come, my friends,
'Tis not too late to seek a newer world.
Push off, and sitting well in order smite
The sounding furrows; for my purpose holds
To sail beyond the sunset, and the baths 60
Of all the western stars, until I die.
It may be that the gulfs will wash us down;
It may be we shall touch the Happy Isles,

And see the great Achilles, whom we knew. 64
 Though much is taken, much abides; and though
 We are not now that strength which in old days Moved earth and heaven, that which we are, we are;

One equal temper of heroic hearts,
 Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will
 To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield. 70

Break, Break, Break

Break, break, break,
 On thy cold gray stones, O Sea!
 And I would that my tongue could utter
 The thoughts that arise in me.

O, well for the fisherman's boy, 5
 That he shouts with his sister at play!
 O, well for the sailor lad,
 That he sings in his boat on the bay!

And the stately ships go on
 To their haven under the hill; 10
 But O for the touch of a vanish'd hand,
 And the sound of a voice that is still!

Break, break, break,
 At the foot of thy crags, O Sea!
 But the tender grace of a day that is dead 15
 Will never come back to me.

Lyrics from The Princess

Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean,
 Tears from the depth of some divine despair
 Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,
 In looking on the happy autumn-fields,
 And thinking of the days that are no more. 5

Fresh as the first beam glittering on a sail,
 That brings our friends up from the underworld,
 Sad as the last which reddens over one
 That sinks with all we love below the verge;
 So sad, so fresh, the days that are no more. 10

Ah, sad and strange as in dark summer dawns
 The earliest pipe of half-awaken'd birds
 To dying ears, when unto dying eyes
 The casement slowly grows a glimmering square;
 So sad, so strange, the days that are no more. 15

Dear as remember'd kisses after death,
 And sweet as those by hopeless fancy feign'd
 On lips that are for others; deep as love,
 Deep as first love, and wild with all regret;
 O Death in Life, the days that are no more! 20

Sweet and low, sweet and low,
 Wind of the western sea,
 Low, low, breathe and blow,
 Wind of the western sea!
 Over the rolling waters go, 5
 Come from the dying moon, and blow,
 Blow him again to me:
 While my little one, while my pretty one, sleeps.

Sleep and rest, sleep and rest,
 Father will come to thee soon; 10
 Rest, rest, on mother's breast,
 Father will come to thee soon;
 Father will come to his babe in the nest,
 Silver sails all out of the west
 Under the silver moon; 15
 Sleep, my little one, sleep, my pretty one, sleep.

The splendor falls on castle walls
 And snowy summits old in story;
 The long light shakes across the lakes,
 And the wild cataract leaps in glory.
 Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying, 5
 Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

Oh, hark, oh, hear! how thin and clear,
 And thinner, clearer, farther going!
 Oh, sweet and far from cliff and scar
 The horns of Elfland faintly blowing! 10
 Blow, let us hear the purple glens replying,
 Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O love, they die in yon rich sky,
 They faint on hill or field or river;
 Our echoes roll from soul to soul, 15
 And grow forever and forever.
 Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying.
 And answer, echoes, answer, dying, dying, dying.

Home they brought her warrior dead;
 She nor swoon'd nor utter'd cry.
 All her maidens, watching, said,
 "She must weep or she will die."

Then they praised him, soft and low, 5
 Call'd him worthy to be loved,
 Truest friend and noblest foe;
 Yet she neither spoke nor moved.

Stole a maiden from her place,
 Lightly to the warrior stepped, 10
 Took the face-cloth from the face;
 Yet she neither moved nor wept.

Rose a nurse of ninety years,
 Set his child upon her knee—
 Like summer tempest came her tears— 15
 "Sweet my child, I live for thee."

In Memoriam A. H. H.

PROEM

Strong Son of God, immortal Love,
 Whom we, that have not seen thy face,
 By faith, and faith alone, embrace,
 Believing where we cannot prove;

Thine are these orbs of light and shade; 5
 Thou madest Life in man and brute;
 Thou madest Death; and lo, thy foot
 Is on the skull which thou hast made.

Thou wilt not leave us in the dust:
 Thou madest man, he knows not why, 10
 He thinks he was not made to die;
 And thou hast made him; thou art just.

Thou seemest human and divine,
 The highest, holiest manhood, thou.
 Our wills are ours, we know not how; 15
 Our wills are ours, to make them thine.

Our little systems have their day;
 They have their day and cease to be;
 They are but broken lights of thee, 20
 And thou, O Lord, art more than they.

We have but faith; we cannot know,
 For knowledge is of things we see;
 And yet we trust it comes from thee,
 A beam in darkness; let it grow.

Let knowledge grow from more to more, 25
 But more of reverence in us dwell;
 That mind and soul, according well,
 May make one music as before,

But vaster. We are fools and slight;
 We mock thee when we do not fear. 30
 But help thy foolish ones to bear;
 Help thy vain worlds to bear thy light.

Forgive what seemed my sin in me,
 What seemed my worth since I began;
 For merit lives from man to man, 35
 And not from man, O Lord, to thee.

Forgive my grief for one removed,
 Thy creature, whom I found so fair.
 I trust he lives in thee, and there 40
 I find him worthier to be loved.

Forgive these wild and wandering cries,
 Confusions of a wasted youth;
 Forgive them where they fail in truth,
 And in thy wisdom make me wise.

v

I sometimes hold it half a sin
 To put in words the grief I feel;
 For words, like Nature, half reveal
 And half conceal the Soul within.

But, for the unquiet heart and brain, 5
 A use in measured language lies;
 The sad mechanic exercise,
 Like dull narcotics, numbing pain.

In words, like weeds, I'll wrap me o'er
 Like coarsest clothes against the cold; 10
 But that large grief which these enfold
 Is given in outline and no more.

xxvii

I envy not in any moods
 The captive void of noble rage,
 The linnet born within the cage,
 That never knew the summer woods;

I envy not the beast that takes 5
 His license in the field of time,
 Unfetter'd by the sense of crime,
 To whom a conscience never wakes;

Nor, what may count itself as blest,
 The heart that never plighted troth 10
 But stagnates in the weeds of sloth;
 Nor any want-begotten rest.

I hold it true, whate'er befall;
 I feel it, when I sorrow most;
 'Tis better to have loved and lost
 Than never to have loved at all. 15

LIV

O, yet we trust that somehow good
 Will be the final goal of ill,
 To pangs of nature, sins of will,
 Defects of doubt, and taints of blood;

That nothing walks with aimless feet;
 That not one life shall be destroy'd,
 Or cast as rubbish to the void,
 When God hath made the pile complete; 5

That not a worm is cloven in vain;
 That not a moth with vain desire 10
 Is shrivel'd in a fruitless fire,
 Or but subserves another's gain.

Behold, we know not anything;
 I can but trust that good shall fall
 At last—far off—at last, to all, 15
 And every winter change to spring.

So runs my dream; but what am I?
 An infant crying in the night;
 An infant crying for the light,
 And with no language but a cry. 20

LV

The wish, that of the living whole
 No life may fail beyond the grave,
 Derives it not from what we have
 The likest God within the soul?

Are God and Nature then at strife,
 That Nature lends such evil dreams? 5
 So careful of the type she seems,
 So careless of the single life,

That I, considering everywhere
 Her secret meaning in her deeds, 10
 And finding that of fifty seeds
 She often brings but one to bear,

I falter where I firmly trod,
 And falling with my weight of cares
 Upon the great world's altar-stairs 15
 That slope thro' darkness up to God,

I stretch lame hands of faith, and grope,
 And gather dust and chaff, and call
 To what I feel is Lord of all,
 And faintly trust the larger hope. 20

LVI

"So careful of the type?" but no.
 From scarp'd cliff and quarried stone
 She cries, "A thousand types are gone;
 I care for nothing, all shall go.

"Thou makest thine appeal to me:
 I bring to life, I bring to death;
 The spirit does but mean the breath:
 I know no more." And he, shall he, 5

Man, her last work, who seem'd so fair,
 Such splendid purpose in his eyes, 10
 Who roll'd the psalm to wintry skies,
 Who built him fanes of fruitless prayer,

Who trusted God was love indeed
 And love Creation's final law—
 Tho' Nature, red in tooth and claw 15
 With ravine, shriek'd against his creed—

Who loved, who suffer'd countless ills
 Who battled for the True, the Just
 Be blown about the desert dust,
 Or seal'd within the iron hills? 20

No more? A monster then, a dream,
 A discord. Dragons of the prime,
 That tear each other in their slime,
 Were mellow music match'd with him.

O life as futile, then, as frail! 25
 O for thy voice to soothe and bless!
 What hope of answer, or redress?
 Behind the veil, behind the veil.

CXXIII

There rolls the deep where grew the tree.
 O earth, what changes hast thou seen!
 There where the long street roars hath been
 The stillness of the central sea.

The hills are shadows, and they flow 1
 From form to form, and nothing stands;
 They melt like mist, the solid lands,
 Like clouds they shape themselves and go.

But in my spirit will I dwell,
 And dream my dream, and hold it true; 10
 For tho' my lips may breathe adieu,
 I cannot think the thing farewell.

Flower in the Crannied Wall

Flower in the crannied wall,
 I pluck you out of the crannies,
 I hold you here, root and all, in my hand,
 Little flower—but if I could understand
 What you are, root and all, and all in all,
 I should know what God and man is.

Crossing the Bar

Sunset and evening star,
 And one clear call for me!

And may there be no moaning of the bar,
 When I put out to sea,

But such a tide as moving seems asleep, 5
 Too full for sound and foam,
 When that which drew from out the boundless deep
 Turns again home.

Twilight and evening bell,
 And after that the dark! 10
 And may there be no sadness of farewell,
 When I embark;

For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place
 The flood may bear me far,
 I hope to see my Pilot face to face 15
 When I have crossed the bar.

ROBERT BROWNING

Porphyria's Lover

The rain set early in tonight,
 The sullen wind was soon awake,
 It tore the elm-tops down for spite,
 And did its worst to vex the lake:
 I listened with heart fit to break. 5
 When glided in Porphyria; straight
 She shut the cold out and the storm,
 And kneeled and made the cheerless grate
 Blaze up, and all the cottage warm;
 Which done, she rose, and from her form 10
 Withdrew the dripping cloak and shawl,
 And laid her soiled gloves by, untied
 Her hat and let the damp hair fall,
 And, last, she sat down by my side
 And called me. When no voice replied, 15
 She put my arm about her waist,
 And made her smooth white shoulder bare
 And all her yellow hair displaced,
 And, stooping, made my cheek lie there,
 And spread, o'er all, her yellow hair, 20
 Murmuring how she loved me—she Too weak, for all her heart's endeavor,

To set its struggling passion free
 From pride, and vainer ties dissever, 25
 And give herself to me forever.
 But passion sometimes would prevail,
 Nor could tonight's gay feast restrain
 A sudden thought of one so pale
 For love of her, and all in vain:
 So, she was come through wind and rain. 30
 Be sure I looked up at her eyes
 Happy and proud; at last I knew
 Porphyria worshiped me; surprise
 Made my heart swell, and still it grew 35
 While I debated what to do.
 That moment she was mine, mine, fair,
 Perfectly pure and good: I found
 A thing to do, and all her hair
 In one long yellow string I wound
 Three times her little throat around, 40
 And strangled her. No pain felt she;
 I am quite sure she felt no pain.
 As a shut bud that holds a bee,
 I warily oped her lids; again
 Laughed the blue eyes without a stain. 45
 And I untightened next the tress

Browning, Porphyria's Lover. Robert Browning (1812-1889) was the son of a London banker. He married Elizabeth Barrett in 1846, after which he lived some years in Italy. His poetic career extends over nearly sixty years.

About her neck; her cheek once more
Blushed bright beneath my burning kiss:

I propped her head up as before,
Only, this time my shoulder bore
Her head, which droops upon it still:

The smiling rosy little head,
So glad it has its utmost will,
That all it scorned at once is fled,

And I, its love, am gained instead!
Porphyria's love: she guessed not how

Her darling one wish would be heard.
And thus we sit together now,

And all night long we have not stirred,
And yet God has not said a word!

My Last Duchess

That's my last Duchess painted on the wall,
Looking as if she were alive. I call
That piece a wonder, now. Fra Pandolf's hands
Worked busily a day, and there she stands.

Will't please you sit and look at her? I said
"Fra Pandolf" by design, for never read
Strangers like you that pictured countenance,

The depth and passion of its earnest glance,
But to myself they turned—since none puts by
The curtain I have drawn for you, but I—

And seemed as they would ask me, if they durst,
How such a glance came there; so, not the first
Are you to turn and ask thus. Sir, 'twas not
Her husband's presence only called that spot

Of joy into the Duchess' cheek. Perhaps Fra Pandolf chanced to say, "Her mantle laps
Over my lady's wrist too much," or "Paint
Must never hope to reproduce the faint
Half-flush that dies along her throat"; such stuff
Was courtesy, she thought, and cause enough
For calling up that spot of joy. She had A heart—how shall I say?—too soon made glad,
Too easily impressed; she liked whate'er
She looked on, and her looks went everywhere.

Sir, 'twas all one! My favor at her breast,
The dropping of the daylight in the west,
The bough of cherries some officious fool
Broke in the orchard for her, the white mule
She rode with round the terrace—all and each
Would draw from her alike the approving speech,

Or blush, at least. She thanked men—good! but thanked

Somehow—I know not how—as if she ranked
My gift of a nine-hundred-years-old name
With anybody's gift. Who'd stoop to blame

50
This sort of trifling? Even had you skill
In speech—which I have not—to make your will Quite clear to such an one, and say, "Just this
Or that in you disgusts me; here you miss,
Or there exceed, the mark"—and if she let
Herself be lessoned so, nor plainly set
Her wits to yours, forsooth, and made excuse,
—E'en then would be some stooping; and I choose
Never to stoop. Oh, sir, she smiled, no doubt,
Whene'er I passed her; but who passed without Much the same smile? This grew; I gave commands;

45
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

5
55 60

10 15 20 25

30

35

40

45

50

55

60

35
In speech—which I have not—to make your will Quite clear to such an one, and say, "Just this
Or that in you disgusts me; here you miss,
Or there exceed, the mark"—and if she let
Herself be lessoned so, nor plainly set
Her wits to yours, forsooth, and made excuse,
—E'en then would be some stooping; and I choose
Never to stoop. Oh, sir, she smiled, no doubt,
Whene'er I passed her; but who passed without Much the same smile? This grew; I gave commands;

40
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

45
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

50
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

55
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

60
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

65
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

70
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

75
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

80
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

85
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

90
Then all smiles stopped together. There she stands
As if alive. Will't please you rise? We'll meet
The company below then. I repeat,
The Count your master's known munificence
Is ample warrant that no just pretense
Of mine for dowry will be disallowed;
Though his fair daughter's self, as I avowed
At starting, is my object. Nay, we'll go
Together down, sir. Notice Neptune, though,
Taming a sea-horse, thought a rarity,
Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me!

Evelyn Hope

Beautiful Evelyn Hope is dead!

Sit and watch by her side an hour.

That is her book-shelf, this her bed;

She plucked that piece of geranium-flower,

Beginning to die too, in the glass;

Little has yet been changed, I think:

The shutters are shut, no light may pass

Save two long rays through the hinge's chink.

Sixteen years old when she died!

Perhaps she had scarcely heard my name;

It was not her time to love; beside,

Her life had many a hope and aim,

Duties enough and little cares,

And now was quiet, now astir,

Till God's hand beckoned unawares,—

And the sweet white brow is all of her.

Is it too late then, Evelyn Hope?

What, your soul was pure and true,

The good stars met in your horoscope,

Made you of spirit, fire and dew—

And, just because I was thrice as old

And our paths in the world diverged so wide,

Each was naught to each, must I be told?

We were fellow mortals, naught beside?

No, indeed! for God above
 Is great to grant, as mighty to make,
 And creates the love to reward the love:
 I claim you still, for my own love's sake!
 Delayed it may be for more lives yet,
 Through worlds I shall traverse, not a few: 30
 Much is to learn, much to forget
 Ere the time be come for taking you.

But the time will come—at last it will,
 When, Evelyn Hope, what meant (I shall say)
 In the lower earth, in the years long still, 35
 That body and soul so pure and gay?
 Why your hair was amber, I shall divine,
 And your mouth of your own geranium's red—
 And what you would do with me, in fine,
 In the new life come in the old life's stead. 40

I have lived (I shall say) so much since then,
 Given up myself so many times,
 Gained me the gains of various men,
 Ransacked the ages, spoiled the climes;
 Yet one thing, one, in my soul's full scope, 45
 Either I missed or itself missed me:
 And I want and find you, Evelyn Hope!
 What is the issue? Let us see!

I loved you, Evelyn, all the while!
 My heart seemed full as it could hold; 50
 There was place and to spare for the frank young smile,
 And the red young mouth, and the hair's young
 gold.
 So, hush,—I will give you this leaf to keep:
 See, I shut it inside the sweet cold hand!
 There, that is our secret: go to sleep! 55
 You will wake, and remember, and understand.

My Star

All that I know
 Of a certain star
 Is, it can throw
 (Like the angled spar)
 Now a dart of red, 5
 Now a dart of blue;
 Till my friends have said
 They would fain see, too,
 My star that dartles the red and the blue!
 Then it stops like a bird; like a flower, hangs furled: 10
 They must solace themselves with the Saturn above it.

25 What matter to me if their star is a world?
 Mine has opened its soul to me; therefore I love it.

The Last Ride Together

I said—Then, dearest, since 'tis so,
 Since now at length my fate I know,
 Since nothing all my love avails,
 Since all, my life seemed meant for, fails,
 Since this was written and needs must be— 5
 My whole heart rises up to bless
 Your name in pride and thankfulness!
 Take back the hope you gave,—I claim
 Only a memory of the same,
 —And this beside, if you will not blame, 10
 Your leave for one more last ride with me.

My mistress bent that brow of hers;
 Those deep dark eyes where pride demurs
 When pity would be softening through,
 Fixed me a breathing-while or two 15
 With life or death in the balance: right!
 The blood replenished me again;
 My last thought was at least not vain:
 I and my mistress, side by side
 Shall be together, breathe and ride, 20
 So, one day more am I deified.
 Who knows but the world may end tonight?

Hush! if you saw some western cloud
 All billowy-bosomed, over-bowed
 By many benedictions—sun's 25
 And moon's and evening-star's at once—
 And so, you, looking and loving best,
 Conscious grew, your passion drew
 Cloud, sunset, moonrise, star-shine too,
 Down on you, near and yet more near, 30
 Till flesh must fade for heaven was here!—
 Thus leant she and lingered—joy and fear!
 Thus lay she a moment on my breast.

Then we began to ride. My soul
 Smoothed itself out, a long-cramped scroll 35
 Freshening and fluttering in the wind.
 Past hopes already lay behind.
 What need to strive with a life awry?
 Had I said that, had I done this?
 So might I gain, so might I miss. 40
 Might she have loved me? just as well
 She might have hated, who can tell!
 Where had I been now if the worst befell?
 And here we are riding, she and I.

Fail I alone, in words and deeds?
 Why, all men strive, and who succeeds?
 We rode; it seemed, my spirit flew,
 Saw other regions, cities new,
 As the world rushed by on either side.
 I thought,—All labor, yet no less
 Bear up beneath their unsuccess,
 Look at the end of work, contrast
 The petty done, the undone vast,
 This present of theirs with the hopeful past!
 I hoped she would love me; here we ride.

What hand and brain went ever paired?
 What heart alike conceived and dared?
 What act proved all its thought had been?
 What will but felt the fleshly screen?
 We ride and I see her bosom heave.
 There's many a crown for us who can reach.
 Ten lines, a statesman's life in each!
 The flag stuck on a heap of bones,
 A soldier's doing! what atones?
 They scratch his name on the Abbey-stones.
 My riding is better, by their leave.

What does it all mean, poet? Well.
 Your brains beat into rhythm, you tell
 What we felt only; you expressed
 You hold things beautiful the best,
 And place them in rhyme so, side by side.
 'Tis something, nay 'tis much: but then,
 Have you yourself what's best for men?
 Are you—poor, sick, old ere your time—
 Nearer one whit your own sublime
 Than we who never have turned a rhyme?
 Sing, riding's a joy. For me, I ride.

And you, great sculptor—so, you gave
 A score of years to Art, her slave,
 And that's your Venus, whence we turn
 To yonder girl that fords the burn!
 You acquiesce, and shall I repine?
 What, man of music, you grown gray
 With notes and nothing else to say,
 Is this your sole praise from a friend,
 "Greatly his opera's strains intend,
 But in music we know how fashions end!"
 I gave my youth; but we ride, in fine.

Who knows what's fit for us? Had fate
 Proposed bliss here should sublimate
 My being—had I signed the bond—
 Still one must lead some life beyond,
 Have a bliss to die with, dim-described.

45 This foot once planted on the goal,
 This glory-garland round my soul,
 Could I descry such? Try and test!
 I sink back shuddering from the quest.
 Earth being so good, would heaven seem best?
 50 Now, heaven and she are beyond this ride.

And yet—she has not spoke so long!
 What if heaven be that, fair and strong
 At life's best, with our eyes upturned
 55 Whither life's flower is first discerned,
 We, fixed so, ever should so abide?
 What if we still ride on, we two,
 105 With life forever old yet new,
 Changed not in kind but in degree,
 The instant made eternity,— 60 And heaven just prove that I and she Ride, ride together, forever ride? 110

Rabbi Ben Ezra

Grow old along with me!
 The best is yet to be,
 The last of life, for which the first was made.
 Our times are in his hand
 Who saith, "A whole I planned; 70 Youth shows but half. Trust God; see all, nor be afraid!"

Not that, amassing flowers,
 Youth sighed, "Which rose make ours,
 75 Which lily leave and then as best recall?"
 Not that, admiring stars,
 10 It yearned, "Nor Jove, nor Mars; Mine be some figured flame which blends, transcends them all!"

80 Not for such hopes and fears
 Annulling youth's brief years,
 Do I remonstrate; folly wide the mark!
 15 Rather I prize the doubt
 85 Low kinds exist without,
 Finished and finite clods, untroubled by a spark.

Poor vaunt of life indeed,
 Were man but formed to feed
 20 On joy, to solely seek and find and feast.
 90 Such feasting ended, then
 As sure an end to men;
 Irks care the crop-full bird? Frets doubt the maw-crammed beast?

Rejoice we are allied
 To that which doth provide
 And not partake, effect and not receive!
 A spark disturbs our clod;
 Nearer we hold of God
 Who gives, than of his tribes that take, I must believe.

Then, welcome each rebuff
 That turns earth's smoothness rough,
 Each sting that bids nor sit nor stand but go!
 Be our joys three-parts pain!
 Strive, and hold cheap the strain;
 Learn, nor account the pang; dare, never grudge
 the throe!

For thence—a paradox
 Which comforts while it mocks—
 Shall life succeed in that it seems to fail.
 What I aspired to be,
 And was not, comforts me;
 A brute I might have been, but would not sink i'
 the scale.

What is he but a brute
 Whose flesh has soul to suit,
 Whose spirit works lest arms and legs want play?
 To man, propose this test—
 Thy body at its best,
 How far can that project thy soul on its lone way?

Yet gifts should prove their use.
 I own the Past profuse
 Of power each side, perfection every turn;
 Eyes, ears took in their dole,
 Brain treasured up the whole;
 Should not the heart beat once "How good to live and learn!"

Not once beat "Praise be thine!
 I see the whole design,
 I, who saw power, see now love perfect too.
 Perfect I call thy plan;
 Thanks that I was a man!
 Maker, remake, complete—I trust what thou shalt
 do"?

For pleasant is this flesh;
 Our soul, in its rose-mesh
 Pulled ever to the earth, still yearns for rest.
 Would we some prize might hold
 To match those manifold Possessions of the brute—gain most, as we did best!

25 Let us not always say,
 "Spite of this flesh today
 I strove, made head, gained ground upon the whole!"
 As the bird wings and sings,
 Let us cry, "All good things
 Are ours, nor soul helps flesh more, now, than flesh helps soul!"

Therefore I summon age
 To grant youth's heritage,
 Life's struggle having so far reached its term.
 Thence shall I pass, approved
 A man, for aye removed From the developed brute; a god, though in the germ.

And I shall thereupon
 Take rest, ere I be gone
 Once more on my adventure brave and new;
 Fearless and unperplexed,
 When I wage battle next,
 What weapons to select, what armor to indue.

Youth ended, I shall try
 My gain or loss thereby;
 Leave the fire ashes, what survives is gold.
 And I shall weigh the same,
 Give life its praise or blame.
 Young, all lay in dispute; I shall know, being old.

For, note, when evening shuts,
 A certain moment cuts
 The deed off, calls the glory from the gray.
 A whisper from the west
 Shoots—"Add this to the rest,
 Take it and try its worth. Here dies another day."

So, still within this life,
 Though lifted o'er its strife,
 Let me discern, compare, pronounce at last,
 "This rage was right i' the main,
 That acquiescence vain;
 The Future I may face now I have proved the Past."

For more is not reserved
 To man, with soul just nerved
 To act tomorrow what he learns today.
 Here, work enough to watch
 The Master work, and catch Hints of the proper craft, tricks of the tool's true play.

As it was better, youth
Should strive, through acts uncouth, 110
Toward making, than repose on aught found
made:

So, better, age, exempt
From strife, should know, than tempt Further. Thou waitedst age; wait death nor be afraid!

Enough now, if the Right 115
And Good and Infinite
Be named here, as thou callest thy hand thine own,
With knowledge absolute,
Subject to no dispute
From fools that crowded youth, nor let thee feel alone. 120

Be there, for once and all,
Severed great minds from small,
Announced to each his station in the Past!
Was I, the world arraigned,
Were they, my soul disdained, 125
Right? Let age speak the truth and give us peace at last!

Now, who shall arbitrate?
Ten men love what I hate,
Shun what I follow, slight what I receive;
Ten, who in ears and eyes 130
Match me. We all surmise,
They this thing, and I that; whom shall my soul believe?

Not on the vulgar mass
Called "work," must sentence pass,
Things done, that took the eye and had the price;
O'er which, from level stand, 136
The low world laid its hand,
Found straightway to its mind, could value in a trice.

But all, the world's coarse thumb
And finger failed to plumb, 140
So passed in making up the main account;
All instincts immature,
All purposes unsure,
That weighed not as his work, yet swelled the man's amount:

Thoughts hardly to be packed 145
Into a narrow act,
Fancies that broke through language and escaped;

All I could never be,
All, men ignored in me,
This I was worth to God, whose wheel the pitcher shaped. 150

Aye, note that Potter's wheel,
That metaphor! and feel
Why time spins fast, why passive lies our clay—
Thou, to whom fools propound,
When the wine makes its round, 155
"Since life fleets, all is change; the Past gone, seize today!"

Fool! All that is, at all,
Lasts ever, past recall;
Earth changes, but thy soul and God stand sure.
What entered into thee, 160
That was, is, and shall be.
Time's wheel runs back or stops; Potter and clay endure.

He fixed thee 'mid this dance
Of plastic circumstance;
This Present, thou, forsooth, wouldst fain arrest;
Machinery just meant 166
To give thy soul its bent,
Try thee and turn thee forth, sufficiently impressed.

What though the earlier grooves,
Which ran the laughing loves 170
Around thy base, no longer pause and press?
What though, about thy rim,
Skull-things in order grim
Grow out, in graver mood, obey the sterner stress?

Look not thou down but up! 175
To uses of a cup,
The festal board, lamp's flash, and trumpet's peal,
The new wine's foaming flow,
The Master's lips aglow!
Thou, heaven's consummate cup, what needst thou with earth's wheel? 180

But I need, now as then,
Thee, God, who moldest men;
And since, not even while the whirl was worst,
Did I—to the wheel of life
With shapes and colors rife, 185
Bound dizzily—mistake my end, to slake thy thirst.

So, take and use thy work;
 Amend what flaws may lurk,
 What strain o' the stuff, what warpings past the aim!
 My times be in thy hand! 190
 Perfect the cup as planned!
 Let age approve of youth, and death complete the same!

*Prospice*¹

Fear death?—to feel the fog in my throat,
 The mist in my face,
 When the snows begin, and the blasts denote
 I am nearing the place,
 The power of the night, the press of the storm,
 The post of the foe; 6
 Where he stands, the Arch Fear in a visible form,
 Yet the strong man must go;
 For the journey is done and the summit attained,
 And the barriers fall, 10
 Though a battle's to fight ere the guerdon be gained,
 The reward of it all.
 I was ever a fighter, so—one fight more,
 The best and the last!
 I would hate that death bandaged my eyes, and forbore, 15
 And bade me creep past.
 No! let me taste the whole of it, fare like my peers,
 The heroes of old,
 Bear the brunt, in a minute pay glad life's arrears
 Of pain, darkness, and cold. 20
 For sudden the worst turns the best to the brave,
 The black minute's at end,
 And the clement's rage, the fiend-voices that rave,
 Shall dwindle, shall blend,

Shall change, shall become first a peace out of pain,
 Then a light, then thy breast, 26
 O thou soul of my soul! I shall clasp thee again,
 And with God be the rest!

Epilogue to Asolando

At the midnight in the silence of the sleep-time,
 When you set your fancies free,
 Will they pass to where—by death, fools think,
 imprisoned—
 Low he lies who once so loved you, whom you loved so,
 —Pity me? 5

Oh, to love so, be so loved, yet so mistaken!
 What had I on earth to do
 With the slothful, with the mawkish, the unmanly?
 Like the aimless, helpless, hopeless, did I drivell
 —Being—who? 10

One who never turned his back but marched breast forward,
 Never doubted clouds would break,
 Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong
 would triumph,
 Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
 Sleep to wake. 15

No, at noonday in the bustle of man's work-time
 Greet the unseen with a cheer!
 Bid him forward, breast and back as either should
 be,
 "Strive and thrive!" cry "Speed—fight on, fare ever
 There as here!" 20

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING

Sonnets from the Portuguese

I

I thought once how Theocritus had sung
 Of the sweet years, the dear and wished-for years,

Who each one in a gracious hand appears
 To bear a gift for mortals, old or young.
 And, as I mused it in his antique tongue, 5
 I saw, in gradual vision through my tears,
 The sweet, sad years, the melancholy years,

¹ Latin for "look forward."

Browning, Elizabeth Barrett, Sonnets from the Portuguese. Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1806-1861) was already a noted English poet when she married Robert Browning in 1846. See p. 261 for her translation of Theocritus' The Cyclops.

Those of my own life, who by turns had flung
A shadow across me. Straightway I was 'ware,
So weeping, how a mystic Shape did move¹⁰
Behind me, and drew me backward by the hair;
And a voice said in mastery, while I strove—
"Guess now who holds thee?"—"Death," I said.

But, there,
The silver answer rang—"Not Death, but Love."

VII

The face of all the world is changed, I think,
Since first I heard the footsteps of thy soul
Move still, oh, still, beside me, as they stole
Betwixt me and the dreadful outer brink
Of obvious death, where I, who thought to sink,⁵
Was caught up into love, and taught the whole
Of life in a new rhythm. The cup of dole
God gave for baptism, I am fain to drink,
And praise its sweetness, Sweet, with thee anear.
The names of country, heaven, are changed away
For where thou art or shalt be, there or here;¹¹

And this . . . this lute and song . . . loved yester day,
(The singing angels know) are only dear
Because thy name moves right in what they say.

XLIII

How do I love thee? Let me count the ways.
I love thee to the depth and breadth and height
My soul can reach, when feeling out of sight
For the ends of Being and ideal Grace.
I love thee to the level of every day's⁵
Most quiet need, by sun and candlelight.
I love thee freely, as men strive for Right;
I love thee purely, as they turn from Praise.
I love thee with the passion put to use
In my old griefs, and with my childhood's faith.
I love thee with a love I seemed to lose¹¹
With my lost saints—I love thee with the breath,
Smiles, tears, of all my life!—and, if God choose,
I shall but love thee better after death.

MATTHEW ARNOLD

Shakespeare

Others abide our question. Thou art free.
We ask and ask—thou smilest and art still,
Out-topping knowledge. For the loftiest hill,
Who to the stars uncrowns his majesty,
Planting his steadfast footsteps in the sea,⁵
Making the heaven of heavens his dwelling-place,
Spares but the cloudy border of his base
To the foiled searching of mortality;
And thou, who didst the stars and sunbeams know,
Self-schooled, self-scanned, self-honored, self-secure,
Didst tread on earth unguessed at.—Better so!¹¹
All pains the immortal spirit must endure,
All weakness which impairs, all griefs which bow,
Find their sole speech in that victorious brow.

The Forsaken Merman

Come, dear children, let us away,
Down and away below.

Now my brothers call from the bay;
Now the great winds shoreward blow;
Now the salt tides seaward flow;⁵
Now the wild white horses play,
Champ and chafe and toss in the spray.
Children dear, let us away,
This way, this way!

Call her once before you go,¹⁰
Call once yet,
In a voice that she will know:
"Margaret! Margaret!"
Children's voices should be dear
(Call once more) to a mother's ear,¹⁵
Children's voices, wild with pain.
Surely she will come again!
Call her once and come away;
This way, this way!
"Mother dear, we cannot stay."²⁰
The wild white horses foam and fret.
Margaret! Margaret!

Arnold, Shakespeare. Matthew Arnold (1822-1888) was the son of Dr. Thomas Arnold, the famous master of Rugby School. He is almost equally important as poet, essayist, and educational reformer. For other works of Matthew Arnold see his essays on Hebraism and Hellenism, p. 4, and On Celtic Literature, p. 521.

Arnold, The Forsaken Merman. This poem is based on a Scandinavian legend of the mortal woman married to the merman. If she goes to church, the merman loses his power over her.

Come, dear children, come away down;
 Call no more.
 One last look at the white-walled town, 25
 And the little gray church on the windy shore;
 Then come down.
 She will not come though you call all day.
 Come away, come away.

Children dear, was it yesterday
 We heard the sweet bells over the bay?
 In the caverns where we lay,
 Through the surf and through the swell,
 The far-off sound of a silver bell?
 Sand-strewn caverns, cool and deep,
 Where the winds are all asleep;
 Where the spent lights quiver and gleam;
 Where the salt weed sways in the stream;
 Where the sea-beasts, ranged all round,
 Feed in the ooze of their pasture-ground;
 Where the sea-snakes coil and twine,
 Dry their mail, and bask in the brine;
 Where great whales come sailing by,
 Sail and sail, with unshut eye,
 Round the world forever and aye?
 When did music come this way?
 Children dear, was it yesterday?

Children dear, was it yesterday
 (Call yet once) that she went away?
 Once she sate with you and me, 50
 On a red-gold throne in the heart of the sea,
 And the youngest sate on her knee.
 She combed its bright hair, and she tended it well,
 When down swung the sound of a far-off bell.
 She sighed, she looked up through the clear green
 sea, 55
 She said, "I must go, for my kinsfolk pray
 In the little gray church on the shore today.
 'Twill be Easter-time in the world—ah, me!
 And I lose my poor soul, Merman, here with thee."
 I said, "Go up, dear heart, through the waves; 60
 Say thy prayer, and come back to the kind sea-caves."
 She smiled, she went up through the surf in the bay.
 Children dear, was it yesterday?

Children dear, were we long alone?
 "The sea grows stormy, the little ones moan. 65
 Long prayers," I said, "in the world they say; Come," I said, and we rose through the surf in the bay.
 We went up the beach, by the sandy down
 Where the sea-stocks bloom, to the white-walled town.

Through the narrow paved streets, where all was still, 70
 To the little gray church on the windy hill.
 From the church came a murmur of folk at their prayers,
 But we stood without in the cold-blowing airs.
 We climbed on the graves, on the stones worn with rains,
 And we gazed up the aisle through the small leaded panes. 75
 She sate by the pillar; we saw her clear:
 "Margaret, hist! come quick, we are here.
 Dear heart," I said, "we are long alone.
 The sea grows stormy, the little ones moan." 80
 But, ah! she gave me never a look,
 For her eyes were sealed to the holy book.
 Loud prays the priest; shut stands the door.
 Come away, children, call no more.
 Come away, come down, call no more.

Down, down, down; 85
 Down to the depths of the sea.
 She sits at her wheel in the humming town,
 Singing most joyfully. 45
 Hark what she sings: "O joy, O joy,
 For the humming street, and the child with its
 toy. 90
 For the priest, and the bell, and the holy well.
 For the wheel where I spun,
 And the blessed light of the sun."
 And so she sings her fill,
 Singing most joyfully, 95
 Till the spindle drops from her hand,
 And the whizzing wheel stands still.
 She steals to the window, and looks at the sand.
 And over the sand at the sea;
 And her eyes are set in a stare; 100
 And anon there breaks a sigh,
 And anon there drops a tear,
 From a sorrow-clouded eye,
 And a heart sorrow-laden,
 A long, long sigh 105
 For the cold strange eyes of a little mermaiden,
 And the gleam of her golden hair.

Come away, away, children,
 Come, children, come down. 110
 The hoarse wind blows colder;
 Lights shine in the town.
 She will start from her slumber
 When gusts shake the door;
 She will hear the winds howling,
 Will hear the waves roar. 115

We shall see, while above us
The waves roar and whirl,
A ceiling of amber,
A pavement of pearl.
Singing, "Here came a mortal,
But faithless was she;
And alone dwell forever
The kings of the sea."

But, children, at midnight,
When soft the winds blow,
When clear falls the moonlight,
When spring-tides are low,
When sweet airs come seaward
From heaths starred with broom,
And high rocks throw mildly
On the blanched sands a gloom—
Up the still, glistening beaches,
Up the creeks we will hie,
Over banks of bright seaweed
The ebb-tide leaves dry.
We will gaze, from the sand-hills,
At the white, sleeping town;
At the church on the hillside—
And then come back down,
Singing, "There dwells a loved one,
But cruel is she.
She left lonely forever
The kings of the sea."

The Buried Life

Light flows our war of mocking words, and yet,
Behold, with tears mine eyes are wet!
I feel a nameless sadness o'er me roll.
Yes, yes, we know that we can jest,
We know, we know that we can smile!
But there's a something in this breast,
To which thy light words bring no rest,
And thy gay smiles no anodyne.
Give me thy hand, and hush awhile,
And turn those limpid eyes on mine,
And let me read there, love! thy inmost soul.

Alas! is even love too weak
To unlock the heart, and let it speak?
Are even lovers powerless to reveal
To one another what indeed they feel?
I knew the mass of men concealed
Their thoughts, for fear that if revealed
They would by other men be met
With blank indifference, or with blame reproved;

I knew they lived and moved 20
Tricked in disguises, alien to the rest
Of men, and alien to themselves—and yet
The same heart beats in every human breast!
120 But we, my love!—doth a like spell benumb
Our hearts, our voices?—must we, too, be dumb?

Ah! well for us, if even we, 26
Even for a moment, can get free
Our heart, and have our lips unchained;
125 For that which seals them hath been deep-ordained!

Fate, which foresaw 30
How frivolous a baby man would be—
By what distractions he would be possessed,
130 How he would pour himself in every strife,
And well nigh change his own identity—
That it might keep from his capricious play 35
His genuine self, and force him to obey
Even in his own despite his being's law,
135 Bade through the deep recesses of our breast
The unregarded river of our life
Pursue with indiscernible flow its way; 40
And that we should not see
The buried stream, and seem to be 140 Eddying at large in blind uncertainty,
Though driving on with it eternally.

But often, in the world's most crowded streets, 45
But often, in the din of strife,
There rises an unspeakable desire
After the knowledge of our buried life;
A thirst to spend our fire and restless force
In tracking out our true, original course; 50
A longing to inquire
Into the mystery of this heart which beats
So wild, so deep in us—to know
5 Whence our lives come and where they go.
And many a man in his own breast then delves,
But deep enough, alas! none ever mines. 56
And we have been on many thousand lines,
And we have shown, on each, spirit and power;
10 But hardly have we, for one little hour,
Been on our own line, have we been ourselves— 60
Hardly had skill to utter one of all
The nameless feelings that course through our breast,
But they course on forever unexpressed,
And long we try in vain to speak and act
15 Our hidden self, and what we say and do 65
Is eloquent, is well—but 'tis not true!
And then we will no more be racked
With inward striving, and demand

Of all the thousand nothings of the hour
 Their stupefying power; 70
 Ah, yes, and they benumb us at our call!
 Yet still, from time to time, vague and forlorn,
 From the soul's subterranean depth upborne
 As from an infinitely distant land,
 Come airs, and floating echoes, and convey 75
 A melancholy into all our day.

Only—but this is rare—
 When a beloved hand is laid in ours,
 When, jaded with the rush and glare
 Of the interminable hours, 80
 Our eyes can in another's eyes read clear,
 When our world-deafened ear
 Is by the tones of a loved voice caressed—
 A bolt is shot back somewhere in our breast,
 And a lost pulse of feeling stirs again. 85
 The eye sinks inward, and the heart lies plain,
 And what we mean, we say, and what we would,
 we know.

A man becomes aware of his life's flow,
 And hears its winding murmur; and he sees
 The meadows where it glides, the sun, the breeze.

And there arrives a lull in the hot race 91
 Wherein he doth forever chase
 That flying and elusive shadow, rest.
 An air of coolness plays upon his face,
 And an unwonted calm pervades his breast. 95
 And then he thinks he knows—
 The hills where his life rose,
 And the sea where it goes.

Requiescat

Strew on her roses, roses,
 And never a spray of yew!
 In quiet she reposes;
 Ah, would that I did too!

Her mirth the world required;
 She bathed it in smiles of glee.
 But her heart was tired, tired,
 And now they let her be.

Her life was turning, turning,
 In mazes of heat and sound. 10
 But for peace her soul was yearning,
 And now peace laps her round.

Her cabin'd, ample spirit,
 It flutter'd and fail'd for breath.

Tonight it doth inherit 15
 The vasty hall of death.

Dover Beach

The sea is calm tonight,
 The tide is full, the moon lies fair
 Upon the straits—on the French coast the light
 Gleams and is gone; the cliffs of England stand,
 Glimmering and vast, out in the tranquil bay. 5
 Come to the window; sweet is the night-air!
 Only, from the long line of spray
 Where the sea meets the moon-blanch'd land, 80
 Listen! you hear the grating roar
 Of pebbles which the waves draw back, and fling,
 At their return, up the high strand, 11
 Begin, and cease, and then again begin,
 With tremulous cadence slow, and bring
 The eternal note of sadness in.

Sophocles long ago 15
 Heard it on the Ægean, and it brought Into his mind the turbid ebb and flow
 Of human misery; we Find also in the sound a thought,
 Hearing it by this distant northern sea. 20

The Sea of Faith
 Was once, too, at the full, and round earth's shore
 Lay like the folds of a bright girdle furled, 95
 But now I only hear
 Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar, 25
 Retreating, to the breath
 Of the night-wind, down the vast edges drear
 And naked shingles of the world.

Ah, love, let us be true
 To one another! for the world, which seems 30
 To lie before us like a land of dreams,
 So various, so beautiful, so new,
 Hath really neither joy, nor love, nor light,
 Nor certitude, nor peace, nor help for pain; 5
 And we are here as on a darkling plain 35
 Swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight,
 Where ignorant armies clash by night.

Growing Old

What is it to grow old?
 Is it to lose the glory of the form,
 The luster of the eye?
 Is it for beauty to forego her wreath?
 —Yes, but not this alone. 5

Is it to feel our strength—
 Not our bloom only, but our strength—decay?
 Is it to feel each limb
 Grow stiffer, every function less exact,
 Each nerve more loosely strung?

10

It is to spend long days
 And not once feel that we were ever young;
 It is to add, immured
 In the hot prison of the present, month
 To month with weary pain.

25

Yes, this, and more; but not
 Ah, 'tis not what in youth we dreamed 'twould be!
 'Tis not to have our life
 Mellowed and softened as with sunset-glow,
 A golden day's decline.

15

It is to suffer this,
 And feel but half, and feebly, what we feel.
 Deep in our hidden heart
 Festers the dull remembrance of a change,
 But no emotion—none.

30

'Tis not to see the world
 As from a height, with rapt prophetic eyes,
 And heart profoundly stirred;
 And weep, and feel the fullness of the past,
 The years that are no more.

20

It is—last stage of all—
 When we are frozen up within, and quite
 The phantom of ourselves,
 To hear the world applaud the hollow ghost
 Which blamed the living man.

35

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI

The Blessed Damozel

The blessed damozel leaned out
 From the gold bar of heaven;
 Her eyes were deeper than the depth
 Of waters stilled at even;
 She had three lilies in her hand,
 And the stars in her hair were seven.

5

Her robe, ungirt from clasp to hem,
 No wrought flowers did adorn,
 But a white rose of Mary's gift,
 For service meetly worn;
 Her hair that lay along her back
 Was yellow like ripe corn.

10

Her seemed she scarce had been a day
 One of God's choristers;
 The wonder was not yet quite gone
 From that still look of hers;
 Albeit, to them she left, her day
 Had counted as ten years.

15

(To one, it is ten years of years.
 . . . Yet now, and in this place,

20

Surely she leaned o'er me—her hair
 Fell all about my face . . .
 Nothing; the autumn fall of leaves.
 The whole year sets apace.)

It was the rampart of God's house
 That she was standing on;
 By God built over the sheer depth
 The which is space begun;
 So high, that looking downward thence
 She scarce could see the sun.

25

30

It lies in heaven, across the flood
 Of ether, as a bridge.
 Beneath, the tides of day and night
 With flame and darkness ridge
 The void, as low as where this earth
 Spins like a fretful midge.

35

Around her, lovers, newly met
 'Mid deathless love's acclaims,
 Spoke evermore among themselves
 Their heart-remembered names;
 And the souls mounting up to God
 Went by her like thin flames.

40

Dante Gabriel Rossetti, The Blessed Damozel. Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1828-1882) was both painter and poet. He helped form the Pre-Raphaelite brotherhood, which exerted much influence on Victorian art and literature. He was the son of an Italian poet and the brother of Christina and William Michael Rossetti, who were also poets.

- And still she bowed herself and stooped
 Out of the circling charm;
 Until her bosom must have made 45
 The bar she leaned on warm,
 And the lilies lay as if asleep
 Along her bended arm.
- From the fixed place of heaven she saw
 Time like a pulse shake fierce 50
 Through all the worlds. Her gaze still strove
 Within the gulf to pierce
 Its path; and now she spoke as when
 The stars sang in their spheres.
- The sun was gone now; the curled moon 55
 Was like a little feather
 Fluttering far down the gulf; and now
 She spoke through the still weather.
 Her voice was like the voice the stars
 Had when they sang together. 60
- (Ah sweet! Even now, in that bird's song,
 Strove not her accents there,
 Fain to be hearkened? When those bells
 Possessed the mid-day air,
 Strove not her steps to reach my side 65
 Down all the echoing stair?)
- "I wish that he were come to me,
 For he will come," she said.
 "Have I not prayed in heaven?—on earth,
 Lord, Lord, has he not prayed? 70
 Are not two prayers a perfect strength?
 And shall I feel afraid?"
- "When round his head the aureole clings,
 And he is clothed in white,
 I'll take his hand and go with him 75
 To the deep wells of light;
 As unto a stream we will step down,
 And bathe there in God's sight.
- "We two will stand beside that shrine,
 Occult, withheld, untrod, 80
 Whose lamps are stirred continually
 With prayers sent up to God;
 And see our old prayers, granted, melt
 Each like a little cloud.
- "We two will lie i' the shadow of 85
 That living, mystic tree
 Within whose secret growth the Dove
- Is sometimes felt to be,
 While every leaf that His plumes touch
 Saith His Name audibly. 90
- "And I myself will teach to him,
 I myself, lying so,
 The songs I sing here; which his voice
 Shall pause in, hushed and slow,
 And find some knowledge at each pause, 95
 Or some new thing to know."
- (Alas! We two, we two, thou say'st!
 Yea, one wast thou with me
 That once of old. But shall God lift
 To endless unity 100
 The soul whose likeness with thy soul
 Was but its love for thee?)
- "We two," she said, "will seek the groves
 Where the lady Mary is,
 With her five handmaidens, whose names 105
 Are five sweet symphonies,
 Cecily, Gertrude, Magdalen,
 Margaret, and Rosalys.
- "Circlewise sit they, with bound locks
 And foreheads garlanded; 110
 Into the fine cloth, white like flame,
 Weaving the golden thread,
 To fashion the birth-robcs for them
 Who are just born, being dead.
- "He shall fear, haply, and be dumb; 115
 Then will I lay my cheek
 To his, and tell about our love,
 Not once abashed or weak;
 And the dear Mother will approve
 My pride, and let me speak. 120
- "Herself shall bring us, hand in hand,
 To Him round whom all souls
 Kneel, the clear-ranged unnumbered heads
 Bowed with their aureoles;
 And angels meeting us shall sing, 125
 To their citherns and citoles.
- "There will I ask of Christ the Lord
 Thus much for him and me—
 Only to live as once on earth
 With Love, only to be, 130
 As then awhile, forever now
 Together, I and he."

She gazed and listened and then said,
 Less sad of speech than mild—
 "All this is when he comes." She ceased. 135
 The light thrilled toward her, filled
 With angels in strong, level flight.
 Her eyes prayed, and she smiled.

(I saw her smile.) But soon their path
 Was vague in distant spheres; 140
 And then she cast her arms along
 The golden barriers,
 And laid her face between her hands,
 And wept. (I heard her tears.)

CHRISTINA ROSSETTI

Song

When I am dead, my dearest,
 Sing no sad songs for me;
 Plant thou no roses at my head,
 Nor shady cypress tree:
 Be the green grass above me 5
 With showers and dewdrops wet:
 And if thou wilt, remember,
 And if thou wilt, forget.

I shall not see the shadows,
 I shall not feel the rain; 10
 I shall not hear the nightingale
 Sing on as if in pain:
 And dreaming through the twilight
 That doth not rise nor set,
 Haply I may remember, 15
 And haply may forget.

Remember

Remember me when I am gone away,
 Gone far away into the silent land;
 When you can no more hold me by the hand,
 Nor I half turn to go, yet turning stay.
 Remember me when no more day by day, 5
 You tell me of our future that you planned:
 Only remember me; you understand
 It will be late to counsel then or pray.
 Yet if you should forget me for a while
 And afterwards remember, do not grieve: 10
 For if the darkness and corruption leave
 A vestige of the thoughts that once I had,
 Better by far you should forget and smile
 Than that you should remember and be sad.

A Birthday

My heart is like a singing bird
 Whose nest is in a watered shoot:
 My heart is like an apple-tree
 Whose boughs are bent with thickset fruit; 5
 My heart is like a rainbow shell
 That paddles in a halcyon sea;
 My heart is gladder than all these
 Because my love is come to me.

Raise me a dais of silk and down;
 Hang it with vair and purple dyes; 10
 Carve it in doves and pomegranates,
 And peacocks with a hundred eyes;
 Work it in gold and silver grapes,
 In leaves and silver fleur-de-lys;
 Because the birthday of my life 15
 Is come, my love is come to me.

Sing-Song

Who has seen the wind?
 Neither I nor you:
 But when the leaves hang trembling
 The wind is passing thro'.
 Who has seen the wind?
 Neither you nor I:
 But when the trees bow down their heads
 The wind is passing by.

—
 The lily has a smooth stalk,
 Will never hurt your hand;

But the rose upon her briar
Is lady of the land.

There's sweetness in an apple tree, 5
And profit in the corn;
But lady of all beauty
Is a rose upon a thorn.

When with moss and honey 10
She tips her bending briar,
And half unfolds her glowing heart,
She sets the world on fire.

De Profundis

Oh why is heaven built so far,
Oh why is earth set so remote?

I cannot reach the nearest star
That hangs afloat.

I would not care to reach the moon, ?
One round monotonous of change;
Yet even she repeats her tune
Beyond my range.

I never watch the scattered fire 10
Of stars, or sun's far-trailing train,
But all my heart is one desire,
And all in vain:

For I am bound with fleshly bands,
Joy, beauty, lie beyond my scope;
I strain my heart, I stretch my hands, 15
And catch at hope.

WILLIAM MORRIS

The Haystack in the Floods

Had she come all the way for this,
To part at last without a kiss?
Yea, had she borne the dirt and rain
That her own eyes might see him slain
Beside the haystack in the floods? 5

Along the dripping leafless woods,
The stirrup touching either shoe,
She rode astride as troopers do;
With kirtle kilted to her knee,
To which the mud splash'd wretchedly; 10
And the wet dripp'd from every tree
Upon her head and heavy hair,
And on her eyelids broad and fair;
The tears and rain ran down her face.

By fits and starts they rode apace, 15
And very often was his place
Far off from her; he had to ride
Ahead, to see what might betide
When the roads cross'd; and sometimes, when 20
There rose a murmuring from his men,
Had to turn back with promises.
Ah me! she had but little ease;

And often for pure doubt and dread
She sobb'd, made giddy in the head
By the swift riding; while, for cold, 25
Her slender fingers scarce could hold
The wet reins; yea, and scarcely, too,
She felt the foot within her shoe
Against the stirrup: all for this,
To part at last without a kiss 30
Beside the haystack in the floods.

For when they near'd that old soak'd hay,
They saw across the only way
That Judas, Godmar, and the three
Red running lions dismally 35
Grinn'd from his pennon, under which
In one straight line along the ditch,
They counted thirty heads.

So then
While Robert turn'd round to his men,
She saw at once the wretched end, 40
And, stooping down, tried hard to rend
Her coif the wrong way from her head,
And hid her eyes; while Robert said:
"Nay, love, 'tis scarcely two to one;
At Poitiers where we made them run 45

Morris, The Haystack in the Floods. William Morris (1834-1896) was artist and decorator as well as poet. He is associated with the Pre-Raphaelite group. He passed his life in London.

So fast—why, sweet my love, good cheer,
The Gascon frontier is so near,
Nought after us."

But: "O!" she said,
"My God! my God! I have to tread
The long way back without you; then
The court at Paris; those six men;
The gratings of the Chatelet;
The swift Seine on some rainy day
Like this, and people standing by,
And laughing, while my weak hands try
To recollect how strong men swim.
All this, or else a life with him,
For which I should be damned at last,
Would God that this next hour were past!"

He answer'd not, but cried his cry,
"St. George for Marny!" cheerily;
And laid his hand upon her rein.
Alas! no man of all his train
Gave back that cheery cry again;
And, while for rage his thumb beat fast
Upon his sword-hilt, someone cast
About his neck a kerchief long,
And bound him.

Then they went along
To Godmar; who said: "Now, Jehane,
Your lover's life is on the wane
So fast, that, if this very hour
You yield not as my paramour,
He will not see the rain leave off:
Nay, keep your tongue from gibe and scoff
Sir Robert, or I slay you now."

She laid her hand upon her brow,
Then gazed upon the palm, as though
She thought her forehead bled, and: "No!"
She said, and turn'd her head away,
As there was nothing else to say,
And everything was settled: red
Grew Godmar's face from chin to head:
"Jehane, on yonder hill there stands
My castle, guarding well my lands;
What hinders me from taking you,
And doing that I list to do
To your fair willful body, while
Your knight lies dead?"

A wicked smile
Wrinkled her face, her lips grew thin,
A long way out she thrust her chin:
"You know that I should strangle you
While you were sleeping; or bite through

Your throat, by God's help: ah!" she said,
"Lord Jesus, pity your poor maid!
For in such wise they hem me in, 95
I cannot choose but sin and sin,
Whatever happens: yet I think
They could not make me eat or drink, 50
And so should I just reach my rest."
"Nay, if you do not my behest, 100
O Jehane! though I love you well,"
Said Godmar, "would I fail to tell
All that I know?" "Foul lies," she said. 55
"Eh? lies, my Jehane? by God's head,
At Paris folks would deem them true! 105
Do you know, Jehane, they cry for you:
'Jehane the brown! Jehane the brown!
Give us Jehane to burn or drown!'
Eh!—gag me Robert!—sweet my friend, 60
This were indeed a piteous end 110
For those long fingers, and long feet,
And long neck, and smooth shoulders sweet;
An end that few men would forget
That saw it. So, an hour yet: 65
Consider, Jehane, which to take 115
Of life or death!"

So, scarce awake,
Dismounting, did she leave that place,
And totter some yards: with her face
Turn'd upward to the sky she lay, 70
Her head on a wet heap of hay, 120
And fell asleep: and while she slept,
And did not dream, the minutes crept
Round to the twelve again; but she,
Being waked at last, sigh'd quietly, 75
And strangely childlike came, and said: 125
"I will not." Straightway Godmar's head,
As though it hung on strong wires, turn'd
Most sharply round, and his face burn'd.

For Robert, both his eyes were dry,
He could not weep, but gloomily 80
He seem'd to watch the rain; yea, too, 130
His lips were firm; he tried once more
To touch her lips; she reach'd out, sore
And vain desire so tortured them, 85
The poor gray lips, and now the hem 135
Of his sleeve brush'd them.

With a start
Up Godmar rose, thrust them apart;
From Robert's throat he loosed the bands 90
Of silk and mail; with empty hands
Held out, she stood and gazed, and saw, 140
The long bright blade without a flaw

Glide out from Godmar's sheath, his hand
 In Robert's hair; she saw him bend Back Robert's head; she saw him send
 The thin steel down; the blow told well,
 Right backward the knight Robert fell,
 And moaned as dogs do, being half dead,
 Unwitting, as I deem: so then
 Godmar turn'd grinning to his men,
 Who ran, some five or six, and beat
 His head to pieces at their feet.

Then Godmar turn'd again and said:
 "So, Jehane, the first fitte is read!
 Take note, my lady, that your way
 Lies backward to the Chatelet!"
 She shook her head and gazed awhile
 At her cold hands with a rueful smile,
 As though this thing had made her mad.
 This was the parting that they had
 Beside the haystack in the floods.

ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE

Chorus

FROM Atalanta in Calydon

When the hounds of spring are on winter's traces,
 The mother of months in meadow or plain
 Fills the shadows and windy places
 With lisp of leaves and ripple of rain;
 And the brown bright nightingale amorous
 Is half assuaged for Itylus,
 For the Thracian ships and the foreign faces,
 The tongueless vigil, and all the pain.

Come with bows bent and with emptying of quivers,
 Maiden most perfect, lady of light,
 With a noise of winds and many rivers,
 With a clamor of waters, and with might;
 Bind on thy sandals, O thou most fleet,
 Over the splendor and speed of thy feet;
 For the faint east quickens, the wan west shivers, Round the feet of the day and the feet of the night.

Where shall we find her, how shall we sing to her,
 Fold our hands round her knees, and cling?
 O that man's heart were as fire and could spring to her,
 Fire, or the strength of the streams that spring!
 For the stars and the winds are unto her
 As raiment, as songs of the harp-player;
 For the risen stars and the fallen cling to her,
 And the southwest-wind, and the west-wind sing.

For winter's rains and ruins are over,
 And all the season of snows and sins;
 The days dividing lover and lover,
 The light that loses, the night that wins;
 And time remembered is grief forgotten,
 And frosts are slain and flowers begotten,
 And in green underwood and cover
 Blossom by blossom the spring begins.

The full streams feed on flower of rushes,
 Ripe grasses trammel a traveling foot,
 The faint fresh flame of the young year flushes
 From leaf to flower and flower to fruit;
 And fruit and leaf are as gold and fire,
 And the oat is heard above the lyre,
 And the hoofèd heel of a satyr crushes
 The chestnut-husk at the chestnut-root.

And Pan by noon and Bacchus by night,
 Fleeter of foot than the fleet-foot kid,
 Follows with dancing and fills with delight
 The Mænad and the Bassarid;
 And soft as lips that laugh and hide
 The laughing leaves of the trees divide,
 And screen from seeing and leave in sight
 The god pursuing, the maiden hid.

The ivy falls with the Bacchanal's hair
 Over her eyebrows hiding her eyes;
 The wild vine slipping down leaves bare
 Her bright breast shortening into sighs;

Swinburne, Chorus from Atalanta in Calydon. Algernon Charles Swinburne (1837-1909) came of an upper-class family and was educated in France and at Oxford. For nearly fifty years he produced poems, plays, and works of criticism. He never married, but maintained a home with Theodore Watts-Dunton, the literary critic.

The wild vine slips with the weight of its leaves,
 But the berried ivy catches and cleaves
 To the limbs that glitter, the feet that scare 55
 The wolf that follows, the fawn that flies.

The Garden of Proserpine

Here, where the world is quiet,
 Here, where all trouble seems
 Dead winds' and spent waves' riot
 In doubtful dreams of dreams,
 I watch the green field growing 5
 For reaping folk and sowing,
 For harvest-time and mowing,
 A sleepy world of streams.

I am tired of tears and laughter,
 And men that laugh and weep; 10
 Of what may come hereafter
 For men that sow to reap.
 I am weary of days and hours,
 Blown buds of barren flowers,
 Desires and dreams and powers 15
 And everything but sleep.

Here life has death for neighbor,
 And far from eye or ear
 Wan waves and wet winds labor,
 Weak ships and spirits steer; 20
 They drive adrift, and whither
 They wot not who make thither;
 But no such winds blow hither,
 And no such things grow here.

No growth of moor or coppice, 25
 No heather-flower or vine,
 But bloomless buds of poppies,
 Green grapes of Proserpine,
 Pale beds of blowing rushes,
 Where no leaf blooms or blushes 30
 Save this whereout she crushes
 For dead men deadly wine.

Pale, without name or number,
 In fruitless fields of corn,
 They bow themselves and slumber 35
 All night till light is born;
 And like a soul belated,
 In hell and heaven unmated,
 By cloud and mist abated
 Comes out of darkness morn. 40

Though one were strong as seven,
 He too with death shall dwell,
 Nor wake with wings in heaven,
 Nor weep for pains in hell;
 Though one were fair as roses, 45
 His beauty clouds and closes;
 And well though love reposes,
 In the end it is not well.

Pale, beyond porch and portal,
 Crowned with calm leaves, she stands 50
 Who gathers all things mortal
 With cold, immortal hands;
 Her languid lips are sweeter
 Than love's who fears to greet her,
 To men that mix and meet her 55
 From many times and lands.

She waits for each and other,
 She waits for all men born;
 Forgets the earth her mother,
 The life of fruits and corn; 60
 And spring and seed and swallow
 Take wing for her and follow
 Where summer song rings hollow
 And flowers are put to scorn.

There go the loves that wither, 65
 The old loves with wearier wings;
 And all dead years draw thither,
 And all disastrous things;
 Dead dreams of days forsaken,
 Blind buds that snows have shaken, 70
 Wild leaves that winds have taken,
 Red strays of ruined springs.

We are not sure of sorrow;
 And joy was never sure;
 Today will die tomorrow; 75
 Time stoops to no man's lure;
 And love, grown faint and fretful,
 With lips but half regretful
 Sighs, and with eyes forgetful
 Weeps that no loves endure. 80

From too much love of living,
 From hope and fear set free,
 We thank with brief thanksgiving
 Whatever gods may be 85
 That no life lives forever;
 That dead men rise up never;

That even the weariest river
Winds somewhere safe to sea.

Then star nor sun shall waken,
Nor any change of light;
Nor sound of waters shaken,
Nor any sound or sight;
Nor wintry leaves nor vernal,
Nor days nor things diurnal—
Only the sleep eternal
In an eternal night.

Étude Réaliste

I

A baby's feet, like sea-shells pink,
Might tempt, should Heaven see meet,
An angel's lips to kiss, we think,
A baby's feet.

Like rose-hued sea-flowers toward the heat
They stretch and spread and wink
Their ten soft buds that part and meet.

No flower-bells that expand and shrink
Gleam half so heavenly sweet
As shine on life's untrodden brink
A baby's feet.

II

A baby's hands, like rosebuds furl'd,
Whence yet no leaf expands,
Ope if you touch, though close upcurl'd
A baby's hands.

Then, even as warriors grip their brands
When battle's bolt is hurl'd,
They close, clench'd hard like tightening bands.

No rosebuds yet by dawn impearl'd
Match, even 'in loveliest lands,
The sweetest flowers in all the world—
A baby's hands.

III

A baby's eyes, ere speech begin,
Ere lips learn words or sighs,
Bless all things bright enough to win
A baby's eyes.

Love, while the sweet thing laughs and lies,
And sleep flows out and in,
Lies perfect in them Paradise.

Their glance might cast out pain and sin,
Their speech make dumb the wise,
By mute glad godhead felt within
A baby's eyes.

WILLIAM ERNEST HENLEY

Before

Behold me waiting—waiting for the knife.
A little while, and at a leap I storm
The thick, sweet mystery of chloroform,
The drunken dark, the little death-in-life.
The gods are good to me: I have no wife,
No innocent child, to think of as I near
The fateful minute; nothing all-too dear
Unmans me for my bout of passive strife.
Yet am I tremulous and a trifle sick,
And, face to face with chance, I shrink a little:

My hopes are strong, my will is something weak.
Here comes the basket? Thank you. I am ready.
But, gentlemen my porters, life is brittle:
You carry Cæsar and his fortunes—steady!

Invictus

Out of the night that covers me,
Black as the pit from pole to pole,
I thank whatever gods may be
For my unconquerable soul.

Henley, Before. He is waiting in the hospital in Edinburgh for the surgeons. William Ernest Henley (1849-1903) was born at Gloucester. In spite of his crippled condition caused by the amputation of a foot, he became one of the most influential editors of his day. His poetry is slight in bulk, since his main energies were devoted to journalism.

In the fell clutch of circumstance 5
 I have not winced nor cried aloud.
 Under the bludgeonings of chance
 My head is bloody, but unbowed.

Beyond this place of wrath and tears
 Looms but the horror of the shade, 10
 And yet the menace of the years
 Finds and shall find me unafraid.

It matters not how strait the gate,
 How charged with punishments the scroll,
 I am the master of my fate: 15
 I am the captain of my soul.

To A. D.

The nightingale has a lyre of gold,
 The lark's is a clarion call,
 And the blackbird plays but a boxwood flute,
 But I love him best of all.

For his song is all of the joy of life,
 And we in the mad, spring weather,
 We two have listened till he sang
 Our hearts and lips together.

Margaritæ Sorori

A late lark twitters from the quiet skies;
 And from the west,
 Where the sun, his day's work ended,
 Lingers as in content,
 There falls on the old, gray city 5
 An influence luminous and serene,
 A shining peace.

The smoke ascends
 In a rosy-and-golden haze. The spires
 Shine and are changed. In the valley 10
 Shadows rise. The lark sings on. The sun,
 Closing his benediction,
 Sinks, and the darkening air
 Thrills with a sense of the triumphing night—
 Night with her train of stars 15
 And her great gift of sleep.

So be my passing!
 My task accomplished and the long day done,

My wages taken, and in my heart
 Some late lark singing, 20
 Let me be gathered to the quiet west,
 The sundown splendid and serene,
 Death.

To W. A.

Or ever the knightly years were gone
 With the old world to the grave,
 I was a King in Babylon
 And you were a Christian Slave.

I saw, I took, I cast you by, 5
 I bent and broke your pride.
 You loved me well, or I heard them lie,
 But your longing was denied.
 Surely I knew that by and by
 You cursed your gods and died. 10

And a myriad suns have set and shone
 Since then upon the grave
 Decreed by the King of Babylon
 To her that had been his Slave.

The pride I trampled is now my scathe, 15
 For it tramples me again.
 The old resentment lasts like death,
 For you love, yet you refrain.
 I break my heart on your hard unfaith,
 And I break my heart in vain. 20

Yet not for an hour do I wish undone
 The deed beyond the grave,
 When I was a King in Babylon
 And you were a Virgin Slave.

A Bowl of Roses

It was a bowl of roses:
 There in the light they lay,
 Languishing, glorying, glowing
 Their life away.

And the soul of them rose like a presence,
 Into me crept and grew,
 And filled me with something—someone—
 O, was it you?

A. E. HOUSMAN

Reveille

Wake: the silver dusk returning
 Up the beach of darkness brims,
 And the ship of sunrise burning
 Strands upon the eastern rims.

Wake: the vaulted shadow shatters, 5
 Trampled to the floor it spanned,
 And the tent of night in tatters
 Straws the sky-pavilioned land.

Up, lad, up, 'tis late for lying:
 Hear the drums of morning play; 10
 Hark, the empty highways crying
 "Who'll beyond the hills away?"

Towns and countries woo together,
 Forelands beacon, belfries call;
 Never lad that trod on leather 15
 Lived to feast his heart with all.

Up, lad: thews that lie and cumber
 Sunlit pallets never thrive;
 Morns abed and daylight slumber
 Were not meant for man alive. 20

Clay lies still, but blood's a rover;
 Breath's a ware that will not keep.
 Up, lad: when the journey's over
 There'll be time enough to sleep.

When I Was One-and-Twenty

When I was one-and-twenty
 I heard a wise man say,
 "Give crowns and pounds and guineas
 But not your heart away;
 Give pearls away and rubies 5
 But keep your fancy free."
 But I was one-and-twenty,
 No use to talk to me.

When I was one-and-twenty 10
 I heard him say again,
 "The heart out of the bosom
 Was never given in vain;

'Tis paid with sighs a-plenty
 And sold for endless rue."
 And I am two-and-twenty, 15
 And oh, 'tis true, 'tis true.

With Rue My Heart Is Laden

With rue my heart is laden
 For golden friends I had,
 For many a rose-lipt maiden
 And many a lightfoot lad.

By brooks too broad for leaping
 The lightfoot boys are laid;
 The rose-lipt girls are sleeping
 In fields where roses fade.

Loveliest of Trees

Loveliest of trees, the cherry now
 Is hung with bloom along the bough,
 And stands about the woodland ride
 Wearing white for Eastertide.

Now, of my threescore years and ten, 5
 Twenty will not come again,
 And take from seventy springs a score,
 It only leaves me fifty more.

And since to look at things in bloom
 Fifty springs are little room, 10
 About the woodlands I will go
 To see the cherry hung with snow.

Is My Team Plowing?

"Is my team plowing,
 That I used to drive
 And hear the harness jingle
 When I was man alive?"

Aye, the horses trample, 5
 The harness jingles now;
 No change though you lie under
 The land you used to plow.

Housman, Reveille. A. E. Housman (1859-1936) spent most of his life as a student of the Latin classics. His poetic output consists mainly of two volumes published thirty years apart.

"Is football playing
Along the river shore,
With lads to chase the leather,
Now I stand up no more?"

Aye, the ball is flying,
The lads play heart and soul;
The goal stands up, the keeper
Stands up to keep the goal.

"Is my girl happy,
That I thought hard to leave,
And has she tired of weeping
As she lies down at eve?"

Aye, she lies down lightly,
She lies not down to weep:
Your girl is well contented.
Be still, my lad, and sleep.

"Is my friend hearty,
Now I am thin and pine;
And has he found to sleep in
A better bed than mine?"

Aye, lad, I lie easy,
I lie as lads would choose;
I cheer a dead man's sweetheart.
Never ask me whose.

When Smoke Stood Up from Ludlow

When smoke stood up from Ludlow,
And mist blew off from Teme,
And blithe afield to plowing
Against the morning beam
I strode beside my team,

The blackbird in the coppice
Looked out to see me stride,
And hearkened as I whistled
The trampling team beside,
And fluted and replied:

"Lie down, lie down, young yeoman;
What use to rise and rise?
Rise man a thousand mornings
Yet down at last he lies,
And then the man is wise."

I heard the tune he sang me,
And spied his yellow bill;
I picked a stone and aimed it
And threw it with a will:
And then the bird was still.

10 Then my soul within me
Took up the blackbird's strain,
And still beside the horses
Along the dewy lane
It sang the song again: 25

15 "Lie down, lie down, young yeoman;
The sun moves always west;
The road one treads to labor
Will lead one home to rest,
And that will be the best." 30

On Wenlock Edge

On Wenlock Edge the wood's in trouble;
His forest fleece the Wrekin heaves;
The gale, it plies the saplings double,
And thick on Severn snow the leaves.

25 'Twould blow like this through hold and hangar
When Uricon the city stood: 6
'Tis the old wind in the old anger,
But then it threshed another wood.

30 Then, 'twas before my time, the Roman
At yonder heaving hill would stare: 10
The blood that warms an English yeoman,
The thoughts that hurt him, they were there.

There, like the wind through woods in riot,
Through him the gale of life blew high;
The tree of man was never quiet: 15
Then 'twas the Roman, now 'tis I.

5 The gale, it plies the saplings double,
It blows so hard, 'twill soon be gone:
Today the Roman and his trouble
Are ashes under Uricon. 20

On the Idle Hill of Summer

On the idle hill of summer,
Sleepy with the flow of streams,
Far I hear the steady drummer
Drumming like a noise in dreams.

5 Far and near and low and louder
On the roads of earth go by,
Dear to friends and food for powder,
Soldiers marching, all to die.

10 East and west on fields forgotten
Bleach the bones of comrades slain,
Lovely lads and dead and rotten;
None that go return again.

Far the calling bugles hollo,
 High the screaming fife replies,
 Gay the files of scarlet follow:
 Woman bore me, I will rise.

Epilogue

"Terence, this is stupid stuff;
 You eat your victuals fast enough;
 There can't be much amiss, 'tis clear,
 To see the rate you drink your beer.
 But oh, good Lord, the verse you make,
 It gives a chap the belly-ache.
 The cow, the old cow, she is dead;
 It sleeps well, the horned head:
 We poor lads, 'tis our turn now
 To hear such tunes as killed the cow.
 Pretty friendship 'tis to rhyme
 Your friends to death before their time
 Moping melancholy mad:
 Come, pipe a tune to dance to, lad."

Why, if 'tis dancing you would be,
 There's brisker pipes than poetry.
 Say, for what were hop-yards meant,
 Or why was Burton built on Trent?
 Oh, many a peer of England brews
 Livelier liquor than the Muse,
 And malt does more than Milton can
 To justify God's ways to man.
 Ale, man, ale's the stuff to drink
 For fellows whom it hurts to think:
 Look into the pewter pot
 To see the world as the world's not.
 And faith, 'tis pleasant till 'tis past:
 The mischief is that 'twill not last.
 Oh, I have been to Ludlow fair
 And left my necktie God knows where,
 And carried half way home, or near,
 Pints and quarts of Ludlow beer:
 Then the world seemed none so bad,
 And I myself a sterling lad;

And down in lovely muck I've lain,
 Happy till I woke again.
 Then I saw the morning sky:
 Heigho, the tale was all a lie;
 The world, it was the old world yet,
 I was I, my things were wet,
 And nothing now remained to do
 But begin the game anew.

Therefore, since the world has still Much good, but much less good than ill,
 And while the sun and moon endure
 Luck's a chance, but trouble's sure,
 I'd face it as a wise man would,
 And train for ill and not for good.
 'Tis true, the stuff I bring for sale
 Is not so brisk a brew as ale:
 Out of a stem that scored the hand
 I wrung it in a weary land.
 But take it: if the smack is sour,
 The better for the embittered hour;
 It should do good to heart and head
 When your soul is in my soul's stead;
 And I will friend you, if I may,
 In the dark and cloudy day.

There was a king reigned in the East:
 There, when kings will sit to feast,
 They get their fill before they think
 With poisoned meat and poisoned drink.
 He gathered all that springs to birth
 From the many-venomed earth;
 First a little, thence to more,
 He sampled all her killing store;
 And easy, smiling, seasoned sound,
 Sate the king when healths went round.
 They put arsenic in his meat
 And stared aghast to watch him eat;
 They poured strychnine in his cup
 And shook to see him drink it up:
 They shook, they stared as white's their shirt:
 Them it was their poison hurt.
 —I tell the tale that I heard told.
 Mithridates, he died old.

NINETEENTH CENTURY AMERICAN POETS

American poetry was even later in development than American prose. The first poet whose work seems destined to live was William Cullen Bryant (1794-1878), who at an unusually early age was producing blank verse of high quality. His Thanatopsis is justly regarded as the first important American poem. Throughout his long career he maintained a remarkable uniformity. At his best, in such poems as To a Waterfowl and A Forest Hymn, he ranks as one of the masters of English verse.

For several decades near the middle of the nineteenth century the focus of poetic production was New England. Although his most important productions were his essays, Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803-1882) wrote a few poems which adequately express his keen mind and sensitive feeling. In a period when most poets were discursive and ornamental, his verse is compact and even overcharged with meaning. These qualities can be seen in such a poem as Days.

His contemporary, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (1807-1882), was much more facile. He wrote a large volume of melodious verse, but much of his poetry shows little depth of thought. A later generation tends to think of him merely as a rhymers of platitudes and an easy-going teller of old tales. The reaction against Longfellow has undoubtedly gone too far. His enormous popularity was not wholly without just cause. Among other things, he was one of the ablest sonnet writers we have had.

A New England poet of great importance in his own day was John Greenleaf Whittier (1807-1892). Much that he wrote has lost interest with the passage of time, but he will continue to be valued for his simple and realistic descriptions of New England farm life. His poetry is not difficult, so that most Americans make their acquaintance with Whittier in childhood and never go further.

In moments of leisure between his work as eminent physician and Professor of Medicine at Harvard and his writing of novels and essays, Oliver Wendell Holmes (1809-1894) composed many poems. Most of them were hurriedly prepared for class reunions and the like and have, of course, been forgotten. But Holmes was a man of great wit and deep feeling and on several occasions displayed these qualities in outstanding poems. The rare combination of humor and pathos in The Last Leaf, the rich imagination of The Chambered Nautilus, and the ringing passion of Old Ironsides, entitle him to a place among the greater American poets.

James Russell Lowell (1819-1891), like Holmes and Longfellow, lived in Cambridge and taught in Harvard College. He wrote much critical prose and took a prominent part in public affairs. Much of his poetry has the same fault as Longfellow's and seems to us now either sentimental or merely rhetorical. It will probably be agreed that his most lasting works are those in which he displays his humor and his homely wisdom, such as his Biglow Papers and his Fable for Critics.

NINETEENTH CENTURY AMERICAN POETS

Outside of New England and New York only one man was producing lasting poetry during the first half of the century. Edgar Allan Poe (1809-1849) achieved considerable distinction as a literary critic, and he wrote short stories which permanently affected that literary form. It is through his poems, however, that he has been of greatest influence on world literature. His mastery of the melodies and harmonies of English verse permitted him to express his emotions and moods so skillfully that he became a model for a whole generation of French poets. These French poets, in turn, are now exerting their influence on American poetry, so that the work of Poe becomes of increasing importance.

The American Civil War marks the beginning of a new era in our poetry. From then on, the whole nation, and not merely the East Coast, was to find poetic expression. The greatest force in this direction was Walt Whitman (1819-1892), whose Leaves of Grass had appeared just before the war. Abandoning all conventional metrical forms and also refusing to be limited by the bounds of so-called good taste, Whitman expanded the field of poetic expression until it embraced the whole country, if not the world itself, all men and animals, and all physical qualities or sensations. He preached the gospel of equality and democracy. Whitman had the weaknesses inherent in all pioneer work. His revolt against form caused him to work without plan, so that many of his poems ramble along interminably. In his desire to be all-inclusive he resorts to tedious catalogues in which he feels called on to list all the rivers or all the states, so that we may realize how many there are. But in spite of these failings, Whitman has been the most powerful influence on American poetry of the last half century.

Though we have had an important period of poetic expression recently, it cannot be said to have got under way until the beginning of the twentieth century. During the last decades of the nineteenth century some very musical verse was written by Sidney Lanier (1842-1881), and during those same years a quiet New England lady, Emily Dickinson (1830-1886), was writing some memorable lyrics expressive of her daily life and thought. Lanier's work was enthusiastically greeted in his own time, but most of it seems destined to oblivion. On the other hand, Emily Dickinson's popularity has increased yearly. Though her work was written in the nineteenth century, it seems to belong in spirit to our own generation.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON

The Problem

I like a church; I like a cowl,
 I love a prophet of the soul;
 And on my heart monastic aisles
 Fall like sweet strains, or pensive smiles:
 Yet not for all his faith can see 5
 Would I that cowlèd churchman be.

Why should the vest on him allure,
 Which I could not on me endure?

Not from a vain or shallow thought
 His awful Jove young Phidias brought; 10
 Never from lips of cunning fell
 The thrilling Delphic oracle;
 Out from the heart of nature rolled
 The burdens of the Bible old;
 The litanies of nations came, 15
 Like the volcano's tongue of flame,
 Up from the burning core below,—
 The canticles of love and woe:
 The hand that rounded Peter's dome
 And groined the aisles of Christian Rome 20
 Wrought in a sad sincerity;
 Himself from God he could not free;
 He builded better than he knew;—
 The conscious stone to beauty grew.

Know'st thou what wove you woodbird's nest
 Of leaves, and feathers from her breast? 26
 Or how the fish outbuilt her shell,
 Painting with morn each annual cell?
 Or how the sacred pine-tree adds
 To her old leaves new myriads? 30
 Such and so grew these holy piles,
 Whilst love and terror laid the tiles.
 Earth proudly wears the Parthenon,
 As the best gem upon her zone,
 And Morning opes with haste her lids 35
 To gaze upon the Pyramids;
 O'er England's abbey bends the sky,
 As on its friends, with kindred eye;
 For out of Thought's interior sphere
 These wonders rose to upper air; 40
 And Nature gladly gave them place,
 Adopted them into her race,
 And granted them an equal date
 With Andes and with Ararat.

These temples grew as grows the grass; 45
 Art might obey, but not surpass.
 The passive Master lent his hand
 To the vast soul that o'er him planned;
 And the same power that reared the shrine
 Bestrode the tribes that knelt within. 50
 Ever the fiery Pentecost
 Girds with one flame the countless host,
 Trances the heart through chanting choirs,
 And through the priest the mind inspires.
 The word unto the prophet spoken 55
 Was writ on tables yet unbroken;
 The word by seers or sibyls told,
 In groves of oak, or fanes of gold,
 Still floats upon the morning wind,
 Still whispers to the willing mind. 60
 One accent of the Holy Ghost
 The heedless world hath never lost.

I know what say the fathers wise,—
 The Book itself before me lies,
 Old Chrysostom, best Augustine, 65
 And he who blent both in his line,
 The younger Golden Lips or mines,
 Taylor, the Shakspeare of divines,
 His words are music in my ear,
 I see his cowlèd portrait dear; 70
 And yet, for all his faith could see,
 I would not the good bishop be.

The Snow-storm

Announced by all the trumpets of the sky,
 Arrives the snow, and, driving o'er the fields,
 Seems nowhere to alight: the whited air
 Hides hills and woods, the river, and the heaven,
 And veils the farm-house at the garden's end. 5
 The sled and traveler stopped, the courier's feet
 Delayed, all friends shut out, the housemates sit Around the radiant fireplace, enclosed
 In a tumultuous privacy of storm.

Come see the north wind's masonry. 10
 Out of an unseen quarry evermore
 Furnished with tile, the fierce artificer
 Curves his white bastions with projected roof
 Round every windward stake, or tree, or door.

Speeding, the myriad-handed, his wild work 15
 So fanciful, so savage, nought cares he
 For number or proportion. Mockingly,
 On coop or kennel he hangs Parian wreaths;
 A swan-like form invests the hidden thorn;
 Fills up the farmer's lane from wall to wall, 20
 Maugre the farmer's sighs; and at the gate
 A tapering turret overtops the work.
 And when his hours are numbered, and the world
 Is all his own, retiring, as he were not,
 Leaves, when the sun appears, astonished Art 25
 To mimic in slow structures, stone by stone,
 Built in an age, the mad wind's night-work,
 The frolic architecture of the snow.

Concord Hymn

SUNG AT THE COMPLETION OF THE BATTLE MONUMENT,
 APRIL 19, 1836

By the rude bridge that arched the flood,
 Their flag to April's breeze unfurled,
 Here once the embattled farmers stood,
 And fired the shot heard round the world.

The foe long since in silence slept; 5
 Alike the conqueror silent sleeps;
 And Time the ruined bridge has swept
 Down the dark stream which seaward creeps.

On this green bank, by this soft stream, 10
 We set today a votive stone;
 That memory may their deed redeem,
 When, like our sires, our sons are gone.

Spirit, that made those heroes dare 15
 To die, and leave their children free,
 Bid Time and Nature gently spare
 The shaft we raise to them and thee.

Days

Daughters of Time, the hypocritic Days,
 Muffled and dumb like barefoot dervishes,
 And marching single in an endless file,
 Bring diadems and fagots in their hands.
 To each they offer gifts after his will, 5
 Bread, kingdoms, stars, and sky that holds them all.
 I, in my pleaded garden, watched the pomp,

Forgot my morning wishes, hastily
 Took a few herbs and apples, and the Day
 Turned and departed silent. I, too late, 10
 Under her solemn fillet saw the scorn.

Terminus

It is time to be old,
 To take in sail:—
 The god of bounds,
 Who sets to seas a shore,
 Came to me in his fatal rounds, 5
 And said: "No more!
 No farther shoot
 Thy broad ambitious branches, and thy root.
 Fancy departs: no more invent;
 Contract thy firmament 10
 To compass of a tent.
 There's not enough for this and that,
 Make thy option which of two;
 Economize the failing river,
 Not the less revere the Giver, 15
 Leave the many and hold the few.
 Timely wise accept the terms,
 Soften the fall with wary foot;
 A little while Still plan and smile, 20
 And,—fault of novel germs,—
 Mature the unfallen fruit.
 Curse, if thou wilt, thy sires,
 Bad husbands of their fires,
 Who, when they gave thee breath, 25
 Failed to bequeath
 The needful sinew stark as once,
 The Baresark marrow to thy bones,
 But left a legacy of ebbing veins,
 Inconstant heat and nerveless reins,— 30
 Amid the Muses, left thee deaf and dumb,
 Amid the gladiators, halt and numb."

As the bird trims her to the gale,
 I trim myself to the storm of time,
 I man the rudder, reef the sail, 35
 Obey the voice at eve obeyed at prime:
 "Lowly faithful, banish fear,
 Right onward drive unharmed;
 The port, well worth the cruise, is near,
 And every wave is charmed." 40

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW

Hymn to the Night

I heard the trailing garments of the Night
 Sweep through her marble halls!
 I saw her sable skirts all fringed with light
 From the celestial walls!

I felt her presence, by its spell of might, 5
 Stoop o'er me from above;
 The calm, majestic presence of the Night,
 As of the one I love.

I heard the sounds of sorrow and delight,
 The manifold, soft chimes, 10
 That fill the haunted chambers of the Night,
 Like some old poet's rimes.

From the cool cisterns of the midnight air
 My spirit drank repose;
 The fountain of perpetual peace flows there,— 15
 From those deep cisterns flows.

O holy Night! from thee I learn to bear
 What man has borne before!
 Thou layest thy finger on the lips of Care,
 And they complain no more. 20

Peace! Peace! Orestes-like I breathe this prayer!
 Descend with broad-winged flight,
 The welcome, the trice-prayed for, the most fair,
 The best-belovèd Night!

Serenade

Stars of the summer night!
 Far in yon azure deeps,
 Hide, hide your golden light!
 She sleeps!
 My lady sleeps! 5
 Sleeps!

Moon of the summer night!
 Far down yon western steeps,
 Sink, sink in silver light!
 She sleeps! 10
 My lady sleeps!
 Sleeps!

Wind of the summer night!
 Where yonder woodbine creeps,
 Fold, fold thy pinions light! 15
 She sleeps!
 My lady sleeps!
 Sleeps!

Dreams of the summer night!
 Tell her, her lover keeps 20
 Watch! while in slumbers light
 She sleeps!
 My lady sleeps!
 Sleeps!

The Day Is Done

The day is done, and the darkness
 Falls from the wings of Night,
 As a feather is wafted downward
 From an eagle in his flight.

I see the lights of the village 5
 Glean through the rain and the mist,
 And a feeling of sadness comes o'er me,
 That my soul cannot resist:

A feeling of sadness and longing,
 That is not akin to pain, 10
 And resembles sorrow only
 As the mist resembles the rain.

Come, read to me some poem,
 Some simple and heartfelt lay,
 That shall soothe this restless feeling, 15
 And banish the thoughts of day.

Not from the grand old masters,
 Not from the bards sublime,
 Whose distant footsteps echo
 Through the corridors of Time. 20

For, like strains of martial music,
 Their mighty thoughts suggest
 Life's endless toil and endeavor;
 And tonight I long for rest.

Read from some humbler poet, 25
 Whose songs gushed from his heart,

As showers from the clouds of summer,
Or tears from the eyelids start;

Who, through long days of labor,
And nights devoid of ease, 30
Still heard in his soul the music
Of wonderful melodies.

Such songs have power to quiet
The restless pulse of care,
And come like the benediction 35
That follows after prayer.

Then read from the treasured volume
The poem of thy choice,
And lend to the rhyme of the poet
The beauty of thy voice. 40

And the night shall be filled with music,
And the cares that infest the day,
Shall fold their tents, like the Arabs,
And as silently, steal away.

On Translating the Divina Commedia

Oft have I seen at some cathedral door
A laborer, pausing in the dust and heat,
Lay down his burden, and with reverent feet
Enter, and cross himself, and on the floor
Kneel to repeat his paternoster o'er; 5
Far off the noises of the world retreat;
The loud vociferations of the street
Become an undistinguishable roar.
So, as I enter here from day to day,
And leave my burden at this minster-gate, 10
Kneeling in prayer, and not ashamed to pray,
The tumult of the time disconsolate
To inarticulate murmurs dies away,
While the eternal ages watch and wait.

I enter, and I see thee in the gloom 15
Of the long aisles, O poet saturnine!
And strive to make my steps keep pace with thine.

The air is filled with some unknown perfume;
The congregation of the dead make room
For thee to pass; the votive tapers shine; 20
Like rooks that haunt Ravenna's groves of pine
The hovering echoes fly from tomb to tomb.
From the confessionals I hear arise
Rehearsals of forgotten tragedies
And lamentations from the crypts below; 25
And then a voice celestial that begins
With the pathetic words, "Although your sins
As scarlet be," and ends with "as the snow."

I lift mine eyes, and all the windows blaze
With forms of Saints and holy men who died,
Here martyred and hereafter glorified; 31
And the great Rose upon its leaves displays
Christ's Triumph, and the angelic roundelays,
With splendor upon splendor multiplied;
And Beatrice again at Dante's side 35
No more rebukes, but smiles her words of praise.
And then the organ sounds, and unseen choirs
Sing the old Latin hymns of peace and love
And benedictions of the Holy Ghost;
And the melodious bells among the spires 40
O'er all the house-tops and through heaven above
Proclaim the elevation of the Host!

How strange the sculptures that adorn these
towers;
This crowd of statues, in whose folded sleeves Birds build their nests; while canopied with leaves 45
Parvis and portal bloom like trellised bowers,
And the vast minster seems a cross of flowers!
But fiends and dragons on the gargoyled eaves
Watch the dead Christ between the living thieves,
And, underneath, the traitor Judas lowers! 50
Ah! from what agonies of heart and brain,
What exultations trampling on despair,
What tenderness, what tears, what hate of wrong,
What passionate outcry of a soul in pain,
Uprose this poem of the earth and air, 55
This medieval miracle of song!

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES

Old Ironsides

Aye, tear her tattered ensign down!
 Long has it waved on high,
 And many an eye has danced to see
 That banner in the sky;
 Beneath it rung the battle shout, 5
 And burst the cannon's roar;—
 The meteor of the ocean air
 Shall sweep the clouds no more!

Her deck, once red with heroes' blood,
 Where knelt the vanquished foe, 10
 When winds were hurrying o'er the flood
 And waves were white below,
 No more shall feel the victor's tread,
 Or know the conquered knee;—
 The harpies of the shore shall pluck 15
 The eagle of the seal

O better that her shattered hulk
 Should sink beneath the wave;
 Her thunders shook the mighty deep,
 And there should be her grave; 20
 Nail to the mast her holy flag,
 Set every threadbare sail,
 And give her to the god of storms,—
 The lightning and the gale!

The Last Leaf

I saw him once before,
 As he passed by the door,
 And again
 The pavement stones resound,
 As he totters o'er the ground 5
 With his cane.

They say that in his prime,
 Ere the pruning-knife of Time
 Cut him down,
 Not a better man was found 10
 By the Crier on his round
 Through the town.

But now he walks the streets,
 And he looks at all he meets
 Sad and wan,

And he shakes his feeble head,
 That it seems as if he said,
 "They are gone."

The mossy marbles rest
 On the lips that he has prest 20
 In their bloom,
 And the names he loved to hear
 Have been carved for many a year
 On the tomb.

My grandmamma has said— 25
 Poor old lady, she is dead
 Long ago—
 That he had a Roman nose,
 And his cheek was like a rose
 In the snow; 30

But now his nose is thin,
 And it rests upon his chin
 Like a staff,
 And a crook is in his back,
 And a melancholy crack 35
 In his laugh.

I know it is a sin
 For me to sit and grin
 At him here;
 But the old three-cornered hat, 40
 And the breeches, and all that,
 Are so queer!

And if I should live to be
 The last leaf upon the tree
 In the spring, 45
 Let them smile, as I do now,
 At the old forsaken bough
 Where I cling.

The Chambered Nautilus

This is the ship of pearl, which poets feign,
 Sails the unshadowed main,—
 The venturous bark that flings
 15 On the sweet summer wind its purpled wings

Holmes, Old Ironsides. Oliver Wendell Holmes (1809-1894) was a professor of medicine in Harvard University and one of the most distinguished physicians of his time. In his leisure he wrote both poetry and essays.

- In gulfs enchanted, where the Siren sings, 5 Stretched in his last-found home, and knew the old
And coral reefs lie bare, no more.
Where the cold sea-maids rise to sun their streaming hair.
- Its webs of living gauze no more unfurl;
Wrecked is the ship of pearl!
And every chambered cell, 10
Where its dim dreaming life was wont to dwell,
As the frail tenant shaped his growing shell,
Before thee lies revealed,—
Its irised ceiling rent, its sunless crypt unsealed!
- Year after year beheld the silent toil 15
That spread his lustrous coil;
Still, as the spiral grew,
He left the past year's dwelling for the new,
Stole with soft step its shining archway through,
Built up its idle door, 20
- Thanks for the heavenly message brought by thee,
Child of the wandering sea,
Cast from her lap, forlorn!
From thy dead lips a clearer note is born 25
Then ever Triton blew from wreathed horn!
While on mine ear it rings,
Through the deep caves of thought I hear a voice that sings:—
Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll! 30
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting 35 seal

EDGAR ALLAN POE

To Helen

Helen, thy beauty is to me
Like those Nicæan barks of yore,
That gently, o'er a perfumed sea,
The weary, wayworn wanderer bore
To his own native shore.

On desperate seas long wont to roam,
Thy hyacinth hair, thy classic face,
Thy Naiad airs, have brought me home
To the glory that was Greece
And the grandeur that was Rome.

Lo! in yon brilliant window-niche
How statue-like I see thee stand,
The agate lamp within thy hand!
Ah, Psyche, from the regions which Are Holy Land!

The leaves they were withering and sere;
It was night in the lonesome October
Of my most immemorial year; 5
It was hard by the dim lake of Auber,
In the misty mid region of Weir:
It was down by the dank tarn of Auber,
In the ghoul-haunted woodland of Weir.

Here once, through an alley Titanic 10
Of cypress, I roamed with my Soul—
Of cypress, with Psyche, my Soul.
These were days when my heart was volcanic
As the scoriac rivers that roll, 15
As the lavas that restlessly roll
Their sulphurous currents down Yaanek
In the ultimate climes of the pole,
That groan as they roll down Mount Yaanek
In the realms of the boreal pole.

Ulalume

The skies they were ashen and sober;
The leaves they were crisped and sere,

Our talk had been serious and sober, 20
But our thoughts they were palsied and sere,
Our memories were treacherous and sere,
For we knew not the month was October,

Poe, To Helen. Edgar Allan Poe (1809-1849), though born of a family of actors, was adopted by a wealthy Virginia gentleman and well educated. In the course of his irregular and distressing life he produced a number of outstanding poems and short stories, besides writing voluminous literary criticism. See his story The Cask of Amontillado, p. 1373.

And we marked not the night of the year,
 (Ah, night of all nights in the year!)
 We noted not the dim lake of Auber
 (Though once we had journeyed down here),
 Remembered not the dank tarn of Auber
 Nor the ghoulish-woodland of Weir.

And now, as the night was senescent
 And star-dials pointed to morn,
 As the star-dials hinted of morn,
 At the end of our path a liquescent
 And nebulous luster was born,
 Out of which a miraculous crescent
 Arose, with a duplicate horn,
 Astarte's bediamonded crescent
 Distinct with its duplicate horn.

And I said—"She is warmer than Dian:
 She rolls through an ether of sighs,
 She revels in a region of sighs:
 She has seen that the tears are not dry on
 These cheeks, where the worm never dies,
 And has come past the stars of the Lion
 To point us the path to the skies,
 To the Lethæan peace of the skies:
 Come up, in despite of the Lion,
 To shine on us with her bright eyes:
 Come up through the lair of the Lion,
 With love in her luminous eyes."

But Psyche, uplifting her finger,
 Said—"Sadly this star I mistrust,
 Her pallor I strangely mistrust:
 Oh, hasten!—oh, let us not linger!
 Oh, fly!—let us fly!—for we must."
 In terror she spoke, letting sink her
 Wings until they trailed in the dust;
 In agony sobbed, letting sink her
 Plumes till they trailed in the dust,
 Till they sorrowfully trailed in the dust.

I replied—"This is nothing but dreaming:
 Let us on by this tremulous light!
 Let us bathe in this crystalline light!
 Its sibyllic splendor is beaming
 With hope and in beauty tonight:
 See, it flickers up the sky through the night!
 Ah, we safely may trust to its gleaming,
 And be sure it will lead us aright:
 We safely may trust to a gleaming
 That cannot but guide us aright,
 Since it flickers up to Heaven through the night."

Thus I pacified Psyche and kissed her,
 And tempted her out of her gloom,

And conquered her scruples and gloom;
 And we passed to the end of the vista,
 But were stopped by the door of a tomb,
 By the door of a legended tomb;
 And I said—"What is written, sweet sister,
 On the door of this legended tomb?"
 She replied—"Ulalume—Ulalume—
 'Tis the vault of thy lost Ulalume!"

Then my heart it grew ashen and sober
 As the leaves that were crisped and sere,
 As the leaves that were withering and sere,
 And I cried—"It was surely October
 On this very night of last year
 That I journeyed—I journeyed down here,
 That I brought a dread burden down here:
 On this night of all nights in the year,
 Ah, what demon has tempted me here?
 Well I know, now, this dim lake of Auber,
 This misty mid region of Weir:
 Well I know, now, this dank tarn of Auber,
 This ghoulish-woodland of Weir."

Annabel Lee

It was many and many a year ago,
 In a kingdom by the sea,
 That a maiden there lived, whom you may know
 By the name of Annabel Lee;—
 And this maiden she lived with no other thought
 Than to love, and be loved by me.

She was a child and I was a child,
 In this kingdom by the sea;
 But we loved with a love that was more than love,
 I and my Annabel Lee—
 With a love that the winged seraphs of heaven
 Coveted her and me.

And this was the reason that, long ago,
 In this kingdom by the sea,
 A wind blew out of a cloud by night
 Chilling my Annabel Lee;
 So that her highborn kinsmen came
 And bore her away from me,
 To shut her up in a sepulcher
 In this kingdom by the sea.

The angels, not half so happy in heaven,
 Went envying her and me;
 Yes! that was the reason (as all men know,
 In this kingdom by the sea)

That the wind came out of the cloud chilling, 25
And killing my Annabel Lee.

But our love it was stronger by far than the love
Of those who were older than we,
Of many far wiser than we;
And neither the angels in heaven above, 30
Nor the demons down under the sea,
Can ever dissever my soul from the soul
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee:

For the moon never beams, without bringing me dreams

Of the beautiful Annabel Lee, 35
And the stars never rise, but I feel the bright eyes
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee;
And so, all the night-tide, I lie down by the side
Of my darling—my darling—my life and my bride,
In her sepulchre there by the sea, 40
In her tomb by the side of the sea.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL

A Fable for Critics

[This poem is filled with a great deal of foolery which is concerned with persons who have long been forgotten. But in the part here selected Lowell treats some of his contemporaries whom we all know.]

There comes Emerson first, whose rich words,
every one,
Are like gold nails in temples to hang trophies on,
Whose prose is grand verse, while his verse, the Lord knows,
Is some of it pr— No, 'tis not even prose;
I'm speaking of meters; some poems have welled
From those rare depths of soul that have ne'er been excelled; 6
They're not epics, but that doesn't matter a pin,
In creating, the only hard thing's to begin;
A grass-blade's no easier to make than an oak;
If you've once found the way, you've achieved the grand stroke; 10
In the worst of his poems are mines of rich matter,
But thrown in a heap with a crush and a clatter;
Now it is not one thing nor another alone
Makes a poem, but rather the general tone,
The something pervading, uniting the whole, 15
The before unconceived, unconceivable soul,
So that just in removing this trifle or that, you
Take away, as it were, a chief limb of the statue;
Roots, wood, bark, and leaves singly perfect may be,
But, clapt hodge-podge together, they don't make a tree. 20

But, to come back to Emerson (whom, by the
way,

I believe we left waiting),—his is, we may say,
A Greek head on right Yankee shoulders, whose range

Has Olympus for one pole, for t'other the Exchange;

He seems, to my thinking (although I'm afraid 25
The comparison must, long ere this, have been made),

A Plotinus-Montaigne, where the Egyptian's gold mist

And the Gascon's shrewd wit cheek-by-jowl coexist,

All admire, and yet scarcely six converts he's got
To I don't (nor they either) exactly know what;
For though he builds glorious temples, 'tis odd 31
He leaves never a doorway to get in a god.

'Tis refreshing to old-fashioned people like me
To meet such a primitive Pagan as he,

In whose mind all creation is duly respected 35
As parts of himself—just a little projected;

And who's willing to worship the stars and the sun,

A convert to—nothing but Emerson.

So perfect a balance there is in his head,
That he talks of things sometimes as if they were dead; 40

Life, nature, love, God, and affairs of that sort,
He looks at as merely ideas; in short,
As if they were fossils stuck round in a cabinet,
Of such vast extent that our earth's a mere dab
in it;

Lowell, A Fable for Critics, selections. James Russell Lowell (1819-1891) was not only a distinguished poet and essayist but a successful diplomat and literary scholar. He succeeded Longfellow as Professor of Modern Languages at Harvard.

Composed just as he is inclined to conjecture her,
Namely, one part pure earth, ninety-nine parts pure lecturer; 46

You are filled with delight at his clear demonstration,

Each figure, word, gesture, just fits the occasion,
With the quiet precision of science he'll sort 'em
But you can't help suspecting the whole a post mortem. 50

There are persons, mole-blind to the soul's make and style,

Who insist on a likeness 'twixt him and Carlyle;
To compare him with Plato would be vastly fairer,
Carlyle's the more burly, but E. is the rarer;

He sees fewer objects, but clearer, truelier, 55
If C.'s as original, E.'s more peculiar;

That he's more of a man you might say of the one,
Of the other he's more of an Emerson;

C.'s the Titan, as shaggy of mind as of limb,—
E. the clear-eyed Olympian, rapid and slim; 60

The one's two thirds Norseman, the other half Greek,

Where the one's most abounding, the other's to seek;

C.'s generals require to be seen in the mass,—
E.'s specialties gain if enlarged by the glass;

C. gives nature and God his own fits of the blues,
And rims common-sense things with mystical hues,— 66

E. sits in a mystery calm and intense,
And looks coolly around him with sharp common-
sense;

C. shows you how every-day matters unite
With the dim transdiurnal recesses of night,— 70

While E., in a plain, preternatural way,
Makes mysteries matters of mere every day;

C. draws all his characters quite à la Fuseli,—
He don't sketch their bundles of muscles and thews
ilily,

But he paints with a brush so untamed and profuse, 75

They seem nothing but bundles of muscles and thews;

E. is rather like Flaxman, lines strait and severe,
And a colorless outline, but full, round, and clear;—

To the men he thinks worthy he frankly accords
The design of a white marble statue in words. 80

C. labors to get at the center, and then Take a reckoning from there of his actions and
men;

E. calmly assumes the said center as granted,

And, given himself, has whatever is wanted.

He has imitators in scores, who omit 85

No part of the man but his wisdom and wit,—

Who go carefully o'er the sky-blue of his brain,

And when he has skimmed it once, skim it again;

If at all they resemble him, you may be sure it is Because their shoals mirror his mists and obscurities, 90

As a mud-puddle seems deep as heaven for a minute,

While a cloud that floats o'er is reflected within it.

There is Bryant, as quiet, as cool, and as dignified,

As a smooth, silent iceberg, that never is ignifed,

Save when by reflection 'tis kindled o' nights 95

With a semblance of flame by the chill Northern Lights.

He may rank (Griswold says so) first bard of your nation

(There's no doubt that he stands in supreme iceolation),

Your topmost Parnassus he may set his heel on,
But no warm applauses come, peal following peal

on,— 100

He's too smooth and too polished to hang any zeal on:

Unqualified merits, I'll grant, if you choose, he has 'em,

But he lacks the one merit of kindling enthusiasm;
If he stir you at all, it is just, on my soul, 104

Like being stirred up with the very North Pole.

He is very nice reading in summer, but inter

Nos, we don't want extra freezing in winter;

Take him up in the depth of July, my advice is,

When you feel an Egyptian devotion to ices.

But, deduct all you can, there's enough that's right good in him, 110

He has a true soul for field, river, and wood in
him;

And his heart, in the midst of brick walls, or where'er it is,

Glow, softens, and thrills with the tenderest charities—

To you mortals that delve in this trade-ridden planet?

No, to old Berkshire's hills, with their limestone and granite. 115

If you're one who in loco (add foco here) desipis,

You will get of his outermost heart (as I guess) a piece;

But you'd get deeper down if you came as a precipice,

And would break the last seal of its inwardest fountain,

If you only could palm yourself off for a mountain. 120

Mr. Quivis, or somebody quite as discerning,
Some scholar who's hourly expecting his learning,
Calls B. The American Wordsworth; but Wordsworth

Is worth near as much as your whole tuneful herd's worth.

No, don't be absurd, he's an excellent Bryant; 125

But, my friends, you'll endanger the life of your client,

By attempting to stretch him up into a giant:

If you choose to compare him, I think there are two persons fit for a parallel—Thomson and Cowper; ¹

I don't mean exactly,—there's something of each,

There's T.'s love of nature, C.'s penchant to preach; 131

Just mix up their minds so that C.'s spice of craziness

Shall balance and neutralize T.'s turn for laziness,

And it gives you a brain cool, quite frictionless, quiet,

Whose internal police nips the buds of all riot,—

A brain like a permanent strait-jacket put on 136

The heart that strives vainly to burst off a button,—

A brain which, without being slow or mechanic,

Does more than a larger less drilled, more volcanic;

He's a Cowper condensed, with no craziness bitten, 140

And the advantage that Wordsworth before him had written.

But, my dear little bardlings, don't prick up your ears

Nor suppose I would rank you and Bryant as peers;

If I call him an iceberg, I don't mean to say

There is nothing in that which is grand in its way; 145

He is almost the one of your poets that knows

How much grace, strength, and dignity lie in Repose;

If he sometimes fall short, he is too wise to mar

His thought's modest fullness by going too far;

'Twould be well if your authors should all make a trial 150

Of what virtue there is in severe self-denial,
And measure their writings by Hesiod's staff,
Which teaches that all has less value than half.

There is Whittier, whose swelling and vehement heart

Strains the strait-breasted drab of the Quaker apart, 155

And reveals the live Man, still supreme and erect,
Underneath the bemummifying wrappers of sect;

There was ne'er a man born who had more of the swing

Of the true lyric bard and all that kind of thing;
And his failures arise (though perhaps he don't know it) 160

From the very same cause that has made him a poet,—

A fervor of mind which knows no separation

'Twixt simple excitement and pure inspiration,

As my Pythoness erst sometimes erred from not knowing

If't were I or mere wind through her tripod was blowing; 165

Let his mind once get head in its favorite direction

And the torrent of verse bursts the dams of reflection,

While, borne with the rush of the meter along,

The poet may chance to go right or go wrong,

Content with the whirl and delirium of song; 170

Then his grammar's not always correct, not his rhymes,

And he's prone to repeat his own lyrics sometimes,
Not his best, though, for those are struck off at white-heats

When the heart in his breast like a trip-hammer beats,

And can ne'er be repeated again any more 175

Than they could have been carefully plotted before:

Like old what's-his-name there at the battle of Hastings

(Who, however, gave more than mere rhythmical bastings),

Our Quaker leads off metaphorical fights 179

For reform and whatever they call human rights,

Both singing and striking in front of the war,

And hitting his foes with the mallet of Thor;

¹ To demonstrate quickly and easily how perversely absurd 'tis to sound this name Cowper,
As people in general call him named super,
I remark that he rhymes it himself with horse-trooper.

Anne hæc, one exclaims, on beholding his knocks,
Vestis filii tui,² O leather-clad Fox?

Can that be thy son, in the battle's mid din, 185
 Preaching brotherly love and then driving it in
 To the brain of the tough old Goliath of sin,
 With the smoothest of pebbles from Castaly's spring

Impressed on his hard moral sense with a sling?

All honor and praise to the right-hearted bard
 Who was true to The Voice when such service was hard, 191

Who himself was so free he dared sing for the slave

When to look but a protest in silence was brave;
 All honor and praise to the women and men

Who spoke out for the dumb and the down-trodden then! 195

I need not to name them, already for each

I see History preparing the statue and niche;

They were harsh, but shall you be so shocked at hard words

Who have beaten your pruning-hooks up into swords, 199

Whose rewards and hurrahs men are surer to gain
 By the reaping of men and of women than grain?

Why should you stand aghast at their fierce wordy war, if

You scalp one another for Bank or for Tariff?

Your calling them cut-throats and knaves all day long

Doesn't prove that the use of hard language is wrong; 205

While the World's heart beats quicker to think of such men

As signed Tyranny's doom with a bloody steel-pen, While on Fourth-of-Julys beardless orators fright
 one

With hints at Harmodius and Aristogeiton,

You need not look shy at your sisters and brothers Who stab with sharp words for the freedom of others;— 211

No, a wreath, twine a wreath for the loyal and true

Who, for sake of the many, dared stand with the few,

Not of blood-spattered laurel for enemies braved,
 But of broad, peaceful oak-leaves for citizens
 saved! 215

There is Hawthorne, with genius so shrinking and rare

That you hardly at first see the strength that is there;

A frame so robust, with a nature so sweet,
 So earnest, so graceful, so solid, so fleet,
 Is worth a descent from Olympus to meet; 220

'Tis as if a rough oak that for ages had stood,
 With his gnarled bony branches like ribs of the wood,

Should bloom, after cycles of struggle and scathe,
 With a single anemone trembly and rathe;

His strength is so tender, his wildness so meek,
 That a suitable parallel sets one to seek,— 226

He's a John Bunyan Fouqué, a Puritan Tieck;
 When Nature was shaping him, clay was not granted

For making so full-sized a man as she wanted,
 So, to fill out her model, a little she spared 230

From some finer-grained stuff for a woman prepared,

And she could not have hit a more excellent plan
 For making him fully and perfectly man.

The success of her scheme gave her so much delight,

That she tried it again, shortly after, in Dwight;
 Only, while she was kneading and shaping the clay, 236

She sang to her work in her sweet childish way,
 And found, when she'd put the last touch to his soul,

That the music had somehow got mixed with the whole.

Here's Cooper, who's written six volumes to show 240

He's as good as a lord: well, let's grant that he's so;

If a person prefer that description of praise,

Why, a coronet's certainly cheaper than bays;

But he need take no pains to convince us he's not
 (As his enemies say) the American Scott. 245

Choose any twelve men, and let C. read aloud

That one of his novels of which he's most proud,
 And I'd lay any bet that, without ever quitting

Their box, they'd be all, to a man, for acquitting.
 He has drawn you one character, though, that is new, 250

One wildflower he's plucked that is wet with the dew

Of this fresh Western world, and, the thing not to mince,

He has done naught but copy it ill ever since;

² Are these the garments of your son?

His Indians, with proper respect be it said,
Are just Natty Bumpo, daubed over with red, 255
And his very Long Toms are the same useful Nat,
Rigged up in duck pants and a sou'-wester hat (Though once in a Coffin, a good chance was found

To have slipped the old fellow away underground).

All his other men-figures are clothes upon sticks,
The *dernière chemise*³ of a man in a fix 261
(As a captain besieged, when his garrison's small, Sets up caps upon poles to be seen o'er the wall);
And the women he draws from one model don't vary,

All sappy as maples and flat as a prairie. 265

When a character's wanted, he goes to the task
As a cooper would do in composing a cask;
He picks out the staves, of their qualities heedful,
Just hoops them together as tight as is needful,
And, if the best fortune should crown the attempt,
he 270

Has made at the most something wooden and empty.

Don't suppose I would underrate Cooper's abilities;

If I thought you'd do that, I should feel very ill at ease;

The men who have given to one character life
And objective existence are not very rife; 275
You may number them all, both prose-writers and singers,

Without overrunning the bounds of your fingers,
And Natty won't go to oblivion quicker
Than Adams the parson or Primrose the vicar.

There is one thing in Cooper I like, too, and that is 280

That on manners he lectures his countrymen gratis;

Not precisely so either, because, for a rarity,
He is paid for his tickets in unpopularity.
Now he may overcharge his American pictures,
But you'll grant there's a good deal of truth in his strictures; 285

And I honor the man who is willing to sink
Half his present repute for the freedom to think,
And, when he has thought, be his cause strong or weak,

Will risk t'other half for the freedom to speak, Caring naught for what vengeance the mob has in store, 290

Let that mob be the upper ten thousand or lower.
There are truths you Americans need to be told,

And it never'll refute them to swagger and scold;
John Bull, looking o'er the Atlantic, in choler
At your aptness for trade, says you worship the dollar; 295

But to scorn such eye-dollar-try's what very few
do,

And John goes to that church as often as you do.
No matter what John says, don't try to outcrow
him,

'Tis enough to go quietly on and outgrow him;
Like most fathers, Bull hates to see Number One Displacing himself in the mind of his son, 301
And detests the same faults in himself he'd neglected

When he sees them again in his child's glass reflected;

To love one another you're too like by half;
If he is a bull, you're a pretty stout calf, 305
And tear your own pasture for naught but to show
What a nice pair of horns you're beginning to grow.

There are one or two things I should just like to hint,

For you don't often get the truth told you in print;
The most of you (this is what strikes all behold-ers) 310

Have a mental and physical stoop in the shoulders;
Though you ought to be free as the winds and the waves,

You've the gait and the manners of runaway slaves;

Though you brag of your New World, you don't half believe in it;

And as much of the Old as is possible weave in it;
Your goddess of freedom, a tight, buxom girl, 316

With lips like a cherry and teeth like a pearl,
With eyes bold as Herë's, and hair floating free,

And full of the sun as the spray of the sea,
Who can sing at a husking or romp at a shearing,
Who can trip through the forests alone without fearing, 321

Who can drive home the cows with a song
through the grass,

Keeps glancing aside into Europe's cracked glass,
Hides her red hands in gloves, pinches up her lithe waist,

And makes herself wretched with transmarine taste; 325

She loses her fresh country charm when she takes
Any mirror except her own rivers and lakes.

You steal Englishmen's books and think Englishmen's thought,

³ Last shirt.

- With their salt on her tail your wild eagle is caught;
 Your literature suits its each whisper and motion
 To what will be thought of it over the ocean; 331
 The cast clothes of Europe your statesmanship tries
 And mumbles again the old blarneys and lies;—
 Forget Europe wholly, your veins throb with blood,
 To which the dull current in hers is but mud; 335
 Let her sneer, let her say your experiment fails,
 In her voice there's a tremble e'en now while she rails,
 And your shore will soon be in the nature of things
 Covered thick with gilt drift-wood of runaway kings,
 Where alone, as it were in a Longfellow's Waif,
 Her fugitive pieces will find themselves safe. 341
 O my friends, thank your God, if you have one, that he
 'Twixt the Old World and you set the gulf of a sea;
 Be strong-backed, brown-handed, upright as your pines, 344
 By the scale of a hemisphere shape your designs,
 Be true to yourselves and this new nineteenth age,
 As a statue by Powers, or a picture by Page,
 Plow, sail, forge, build, carve, paint, all things make new,
 To your own New-World instincts contrive to be true, 349
 Keep your ears open wide to the Future's first call,
 Be whatever you will, but yourselves first of all,
 Stand fronting the dawn on Toil's heaven-scaling peaks,
 And become my new race of more practical Greeks.—
 Hem! your likeness at present, I shudder to tell o't,
 Is that you have your slaves, and the Greek had his helot. 355
-
- There comes Poe, with his raven, like Barnaby Rudge,
 Three fifths of him genius and two fifths sheer fudge,
 Who talks like a book of iambs and pentameters,
 In a way to make people of common sense damn meters,
 Who has written some things quite the best of their kind, 360
- But the heart somehow seems all squeezed out by the mind,
 Who— But hey-day! What's this? Messieurs Mathews and Poe,
 You mustn't fling mud-balls at Longfellow so,
 Does it make a man worse that his character's such
 As to make his friends love him (as you think) too much? 365
 Why, there is not a bard at this moment alive
 More willing than he that his fellows should thrive;
 While you are abusing him thus, even now,
 He would help either one of you out of a slough;
 You may say that he's smooth and all that till you're hoarse, 370
 But remember that elegance also is force;
 After polishing granite as much as you will,
 The heart keeps its tough old persistency still;
 Deduct all you can, that still keeps you at bay;
 Why, he'll live till men weary of Collins and Gray. 375
- I'm not over-fond of Greek meters in English,
 To me rhyme's a gain, so it be not too jinglish,
 And your modern hexameter verses are no more
 Like Greek ones than sleek Mr. Pope is like Homer; 379
 As the roar of the sea to the coo of a pigeon is,
 So, compared to your moderns, sounds old Melesigenes;
 I may be too partial, the reason, perhaps, o't is
 That I've heard the old blind man recite his own rhapsodies,
 And my ear with that music impregnate may be,
 Like the poor exiled shell with the soul of the sea,
 Or as one can't bear Strauss when his nature is cloven 386
 To its deeps within deeps by the stroke of Beethoven;
 But, set that aside, and 'tis truth that I speak,
 Had Theocritus written in English, not Greek,
 I believe that his exquisite sense would scarce change a line 390
 In that rare, tender, virgin-like pastoral Evangeline.
 That's not ancient nor modern, its place is apart
 Where time has no sway, in the realm of pure Art,
 'Tis a shrine of retreat from Earth's hubbub and strife
 As quiet and chaste as the author's own life. 395
-
- What! Irving? thrice welcome, warm heart and fine brain,

You bring back the happiest spirit from Spain,
And the gravest sweet humor, that ever were there
Since Cervantes met death in his gentle despair;
Nay, don't be embarrassed, nor look so beseech-
ing,— 400

I sha'n't run directly against my own preaching,
And, having just laughed at their Raphaels and Dantes,

Go to setting you up beside matchless Cervantes;
But allow me to speak what I honestly feel,—

To a true poet-heart add the fun of Dick Steele,
Throw in all of Addison, minus the chill, 406
With the whole of that partnership's stock and good-will,

Mix well, and while stirring, hum o'er, as a spell,
The fine old English Gentleman, simmer it well, Sweeten just to your own private liking, then strain, 410

That only the finest and clearest remain,
Let it stand out of doors till a soul it receives
From the warm lazy sun loitering down through green leaves,

And you'll find a choice nature, not wholly deserv-
ing

A name either English or Yankee,—just Irving.

There's Holmes, who is matchless among you for wit; 416

A Leyden-jar always full-charged, from which flit
The electrical tingles of hit after hit;

In long poems 'tis painful sometimes, and invites
A thought of the way the new Telegraph writes,
Which pricks down its little sharp sentences spitefully 421

As if you got more than you'd title to rightfully,
And you find yourself hoping its wild father
Lightning

Would flame in for a second and give you a fright-
'ning.

He has perfect sway of what I call a sham meter,

But many admire it, the English pentameter, 426
And Campbell, I think, wrote most commonly worse,

With less nerve, swing, and fire in the same kind of verse,

Nor e'er achieved aught in't so worthy of praise
As the tribute of Holmes to the grand Marseillaise.
You went crazy last year over Bulwer's New Timon;— 431

Why, if B., to the day of his dying, should rhyme
on,

Heaping verses on verses and tomes upon tomes,
He could ne'er reach the best point and vigor of Holmes.

His are just the fine hands, too, to weave you a lyric 435

Full of fancy, fun, feeling, or spiced with satyric
In a measure so kindly, you doubt if the toes
That are trodden upon are your own or your foes'.

There is Lowell, who's striving Parnassus to climb

With a whole bale of isms tied together with rhyme, 440

He might get on alone, spite of brambles and boulders,

But he can't with that buncle he has on his shoulders,

The top of the hill he will ne'er come nigh reaching

Till he learns the distinction 'twixt singing and preaching;

His lyre has some chords that would ring pretty well, 445

But he'd rather by half make a drum of the shell,
And rattle away till he's old as Methusalem,
At the head of a march to the last new Jerusalem.

WALT WHITMAN

Come Up from the Fields, Father

Come up from the fields, father, here's a letter from our Pete,
And come to the front door, mother, here's a letter from thy dear son.

Lo, 'tis autumn,
Lo, where the trees, deeper green, yellower and redder,
Cool! and sweeten Ohio's villages with leaves fluttering in the moderate wind, 5
Where apples ripe in the orchards hang and grapes on the trellis'd vines, (Smell you the smell of the grapes on the vines?
Smell you the buckwheat where the bees were lately buzzing?)
Above all, lo, the sky so calm, so transparent after the rain, and with wondrous clouds, Below too, all calm, all vital and beautiful, and the farm prospers well. 10

Down in the fields all prospers well,
But now from the fields come, father, come at the daughter's call,
And come to the entry, mother, to the front door
come right away.

Fast as she can she hurries, something ominous,
her steps trembling,
She does not tarry to smooth her hair nor adjust her cap. 15

Open the envelope quickly,
O this is not our son's writing, yet his name is sign'd,
O a strange hand writes for our dear son, O stricken mother's soul!
All swims before her eyes, flashes with black, she catches the main words only,
Sentence broken, gunshot wound in the breast,
cavalry skirmish, taken to hospital, 20
At present low, but will soon be better.

Ah now the single figure to me,
Amid all teeming and wealthy Ohio with all its cities and farms,

Sickly white in the face and dull in the head, very faint,
By the jamb of a door leans. 25

Grieve not so, dear mother (the just-grown daughter speaks through her sobs,
The little sisters huddle around speechless and dismay'd),
See, dearest mother, the letter says Pete will soon be better.

Alas poor boy, he will never be better (nor may-be needs to be better, that brave and simple soul), While they stand at home at the door he is dead already, 30
The only son is dead.

But the mother needs to be better,
She with thin form presently drest in black,
By day her meals untouched, then at night fitfully sleeping, often waking,
In the midnight waking, weeping, longing with one deep longing, 35
O that she might withdraw unnoticed, silent from life escape and withdraw,
To follow, to seek, to be with her dear dead son.

O Captain! My Captain!

O Captain! my Captain! our fearful trip is done,
The ship has weather'd every rack, the prize we sought is won,
The port is near, the bells I hear, the people all exulting,
While follow eyes the steady keel, the vessel grim and daring;
But O heart! heart! heart! 5
O the bleeding drops of red,
Where on the deck my Captain lies,
Fallen cold and dead.

O Captain! my Captain! rise up and hear the bells; Rise up—for you the flag is flung—for you the bugle trills, 10
For you bouquets and ribbon'd wreaths—for you
the shores a-crowding,

Whitman, Come Up from the Fields, Father. Walt Whitman (1819-1892) was born on Long Island and trained as a journalist. He held various government positions in Washington during and after the Civil War. Though his Leaves of Grass appeared in 1855, he continued to add poems to it throughout his life.

For you they call, the swaying mass, their eager faces turning;

Here Captain! dear father!

This arm beneath your head!

It is some dream that on the deck, 15

You've fallen cold and dead.

My Captain does not answer, his lips are pale and still,

My father does not feel my arm, he has no pulse nor will,

The ship is anchor'd safe and sound, its voyage closed and done,

From fearful trip the victor ship comes in with object won; 20

Exult O shores, and ring O bells!

But I with mournful tread,

Walk the deck my Captain lies,

Fallen cold and dead.

Mannahatta

I was asking for something specific and perfect for my city,

Whereupon lo! upsprang the aboriginal name.

Now I see what there is in a name, a word, liquid, sane, unruly, musical, self-sufficient,

I see that the word of my city is that word from of
old,

Because I see that word nested in nests of water-bays, superb, 5

Rich, hemm'd thick all around with sailships and steamships, an island sixteen miles long, solid-founded,

Numberless crowded streets, high growths of iron, slender, strong, light. splendidly uprising toward clear skies,

Tides swift and ample, well-loved by me, toward sundown,

The flowing sea-currents, the little islands, larger adjoining islands, the heights, the villas,

The countless masts, the white shore-steamers, the lighters, the ferry-boats, the black sea-steamers well-model'd, 10

The down-town streets, the jobbers' houses of business, the houses of business of the ship-merchants and money-brokers, the river-streets,

Immigrants arriving, fifteen or twenty thousand in a week,

The carts hauling goods, the manly race of drivers of horses, the brown-faced sailors,

The summer air, the bright sun shining, and the sailing clouds aloft,

The winter snows, the sleigh-bells, the broken ice in the river, passing along up or down with the flood-tide or ebb-tide, 15

The mechanics of the city, the masters, well-form'd, beautiful-faced, looking you straight in the eyes,

Trottoirs throng'd, vehicles, Broadway, the woman, the shops and shows,

A million people—manners free and superb—open voices—hospitality—the most courageous and friendly young men,

City of hurried and sparkling waters! city of spires and masts!

City nested in bays! my city! 20

When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloomed

I

When lilacs last in the dooryard bloomed,
And the great star early drooped in the western sky in the night,

I mourned, and yet shall mourn with ever-returning spring.

Ever-returning spring, trinity sure to me you
bring,

Lilac blooming perennial and drooping star in the west, 5

And thought of him I love.

2

O powerful western fallen star!

O shades of night—O moody, tearful night!

O great star disappeared—O the black murk that hides the star!

O cruel hands that hold me powerless—O helpless soul of me! 10

O harsh surrounding cloud that will not free my soul.

3

In the dooryard fronting an old farmhouse near the whitewashed palings,

Stands the lilac-bush tall-growing with heart-shaped leaves of rich green,

With many a pointed blossom rising delicate, with the perfume strong I love,

With every leaf a miracle—and from this bush in the dooryard, 15

Whitman, When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloomed. Written on the death of Lincoln, as was also O Captain! My Captain!

With delicate-colored blossoms and heart-shaped leaves of rich green,
A sprig with its flower I break.

4

In the swamp in secluded recesses,
A shy and hidden bird is warbling a song.

Solitary the thrush, 20
The hermit withdrawn to himself, avoiding the settlements,
Sings by himself a song.

Song of the bleeding throat,
Death's outlet song of life (for well, dear brother,
I know,
If thou wast not granted to sing thou would'st surely die). 25

5

Over the breast of the spring, the land, amid cities,
Amid lanes and through old woods, where lately the violets peeped from the ground, spotting
the gray debris,
Amid the grass in the fields each side of the lanes,
passing the endless grass,
Passing the yellow-speared wheat, every grain from its shroud in the dark-brown fields up-risen,
Passing the apple-tree blows of white and pink in the orchards, 30
Carrying a corpse to where it shall rest in the grave,
Night and day journeys a coffin.

6

Coffin that passes through lanes and streets,
Through day and night with the great cloud darkening the land,
With the pomp of the inlooped flags with the cities
draped in black, 35
With the show of the States themselves as of crape-veiled women standing,
With processions long and winding and the flambeaus of the night,
With the countless torches lit, with the silent sea of faces and the unbared heads,
With the waiting depot, the arriving coffin, and the somber faces,
With dirges through the night, with the thousand voices rising strong and solemn, 40
With all the mournful voices of the dirges poured around the coffin,

The dim-lit churches and the shuddering organs—
where amid these you journey,
With the tolling, tolling bells' perpetual clang,
Here, coffin that slowly passes,
I give you my sprig of lilac. 45

7

(Nor for you, for one alone,
Blossoms and branches green to coffins all I bring,
For fresh as the morning, thus would I chant a song for you, O sane and sacred death.

All over bouquets of roses,
O death, I cover you over with roses and early lilies, 50
But mostly and now the lilac that blooms the first,
Copious I break, I break the sprigs from the bushes,
With loaded arms I come, pouring for you,
For you and the coffins all of you, O death.)

8

O western orb sailing the heaven, 55
Now I know what you must have meant as a month since I walked,
As I walked in silence the transparent shadowy
night,
As I saw you had something to tell as you bent to me night after night,
As you drooped from the sky low down as if to my side (while the other stars all looked on),
As we wandered together the solemn night (for something I know not what kept me from sleep), 60
As the night advanced, and I saw on the rim of the west how full you were of woe,
As I stood on the rising ground in the breeze in the cool, transparent night,
As I watched where you passed, and was lost in the netherward black of the night,
As my soul in its trouble dissatisfied sank, as where you, sad orb, 64
Concluded, dropped in the night, and was gone.

9

Sing on there in the swamp,
O singer bashful and tender, I hear your notes, I hear your call,
I hear, I come presently, I understand you;
But a moment I linger, for the lustrous star has detained me,
The star my departing comrade holds and detains
me. 70

10

O how shall I warble myself for the dead one there
I loved?

And how shall I deck my song for the large sweet soul that has gone?

And what shall my perfume be for the grave of him I love?

Sea-winds blown from east and west, 74
Blown from the Eastern sea and blown from the Western sea, till there on the prairies meeting,
These and with these and the breath of my chant,
I'll perfume the grave of him I love.

11

O what shall I hang on the chamber walls?
And what shall the pictures be that I hang on the walls,

To adorn the burial-house of him I love? 80

Pictures of growing spring and farms and homes, With the fourth-month eve at sundown, and the gray smoke lucid and bright,
With floods of the yellow gold of the gorgeous, indolent, sinking sun, burning, expanding the
air,
With the fresh sweet herbage under foot, and the pale green leaves of the trees prolific,
In the distance the flowing glaze, the breast of the river, with a wind-dapple here and there, 85
With ranging hills on the banks, with many a line against the sky, and shadows,
And the city at hand with dwellings so dense, and stacks of chimneys,
And all the scenes of life and the workshops, and the workmen homeward returning.

12

Lo, body and soul—this land,
My own Manhattan with spires, and the sparkling and hurrying tides, and the ships, 90
The varied and ample land, the South and the North in the light, Ohio's shores and flashing
Missouri,
And ever the far-spreading prairies covered with grass and corn.

Lo, the most excellent sun so calm and haughty,
The violet and purple morn with just-felt breezes,
The gentle soft-born measureless light, 95
The miracle spreading bathing all, the fulfilled
noon,

The coming eve delicious, the welcome night and the stars,
Over my cities shining all, enveloping man and land.

13

Sing on, sing on, you gray-brown bird, Sing from the swamps, the recesses, pour your chant from the bushes, 100
Limitless out of the dusk, out of the cedars and pines.

Sing on, dearest brother, warble your reedy song,
Loud human song, with voice of uttermost woe.

O liquid and free and tender!
O wild and loose to my soul—O wondrous singer!
You only I hear—yet the star holds me (but will soon depart), 106
Yet the lilac with mastering odor holds me.

14

Now while I sat in the day and looked forth,
In the close of the day with its light and the fields of spring, and the farmers preparing their crops,
In the large unconscious scenery of my land with its lakes and forests, 110
In the heavenly aerial beauty (after the perturbed winds and the storms),
Under the arching heavens of the afternoon swift passing, and the voices of children and women,
The many-moving sea-tides, and I saw the ships
how they sailed,
And the summer approaching with richness, and the fields all busy with labor,
And the infinite separate houses, how they all went on, each with its meals and minutia of daily usages, 115
And the streets how their throbbings throbbed, and the cities pent—lo, then and there,
Falling upon them all and among them all, enveloping me with the rest,
Appeared the cloud, appeared the long black trail,
And I knew death, its thought, and the sacred knowledge of death.

Then with the knowledge of death as walking one side of me, 120

And the thought of death close-walking the other side of me,

And I in the middle as with companions, and as holding the hands of companions,
I fled forth to the hiding receiving night that talks
not,

Down to the shores of the water, the path by the swamp in the dimness,
To the solemn shadowy cedars and ghostly pines
so still. 125

And the singer so shy to the rest received me,
The gray-brown bird I know received us comrades three,
And he sang the carol of death, and a verse for him I love.
From deep secluded recesses,
From the fragrant cedars and the ghostly pines so
still, 130
Came the carol of the bird.

And the charm of the carol rapt me,
As I held as if by their hands my comrades in the
night,
And the voice of my spirit tallied the song of the bird.

Come, lovely and soothing death, 135
Undulate round the world, serenely arriving, ar-iving,
In the day, in the night, to all, to each,
Sooner or later delicate death.

Praised be the fathomless universe,
For life and joy, and for objects and knowledge curious, 140
And for love, sweet love—but praise! praise!
praise!
For the sure-enwinding arms of cool-enfolding
death.

Dark mother always gliding near with soft feet,
Have none chanted for thee a chant of fullest welcome?
Then I chant it for thee, I glorify thee above all,
I bring thee a song that when thou must indeed come, come unflatteringly. 146

Approach, strong deliveress,
When it is so, when thou hast taken them, I joy-
ously sing the dead,
Lost in the loving floating ocean of thee,
Laved in the flood of thy bliss, O death. 150

From me to thee glad serenades,
Dances for thee I propose saluting thee, adornments and feastings for thee,
And the sights of the open landscape and the high-spread sky are fitting,

And life and the fields, and the huge and thoughtful night.

The night in silence under many a star, 155
The ocean shore and the husky whispering wave whose voice I know,
And the soul turning to thee, O vast and well-
veiled death,
And the body gratefully nestling close to thee.

Over the tree-tops I float thee a song,
Over the rising and sinking waves, over the myrriad fields and the prairies wide, 160
Over the dense-packed cities all and the teeming wharves and ways,
I float this carol with joy, with joy to thee, O death.

15

To the tally of my soul,
Loud and strong kept up the gray-brown bird,
With pure deliberate notes spreading, filling the
night. 165

Loud in the pines and cedars dim, Clear in the freshness moist and the swamp-perfume,
And I with my comrades there in the night.

While my sight that was bound in my eyes unclosed,
As to long panoramas of visions. 170

And I saw askant the armies,
I saw as in noiseless dreams hundreds of battle-flags,
Borne through the smoke of the battles and pierced with missiles I saw them,
And carried hither and yon through the smoke,
and torn and bloody,
And at last but a few shreds left on the staffs (and all in silence), 175
And the staffs all splintered and broken.

I saw battle-corpses, myriads of them,
And the white skeletons of young men, I saw
them,
I saw the débris and débris of all the slain soldiers of the war,
But I saw they were not as was thought; 180
They themselves were fully at rest, they suffered
not,
The living remained and suffered, the mother suffered,

And the wife and the child and the musing comrade suffered,
And the armies that remained suffered.

16

Passing the visions, passing the night, 185
Passing, unloosing the hold of my comrades'
hands,
Passing the song of the hermit bird and the tallying song of my soul,
Victorious song, death's outlet song, yet varying ever-altering song,
As low and wailing, yet clear the notes, rising and falling, flooding the night,
Sadly sinking and fainting, as warning and warning, and yet again bursting with joy, 190

Covering the earth and filling the spread of the
heaven,
As that powerful psalm in the night I heard from recesses,
Passing, I leave thee, lilac with heart-shaped leaves,
I leave thee there in the dooryard, blooming, returning with spring.

I cease from my song for thee, 195
From my gaze on thee in the west, fronting the west, communing with thee,
O comrade lustrous with silver face in the night.
Yet each to keep and all, retrievements out of the
night,
The song, the wondrous chant of the gray-brown
bird,

And the tallying chant, the echo aroused in my soul, 200
With the lustrous and drooping star with the countenance full of woe,
With the holders holding my hand nearing the call of the bird,
Comrades mine and I in the midst, and their memory ever to keep, for the dead I loved so well,
For the sweetest, wisest soul of all my days and lands—and this for his dear sake, Lilac and star and bird twined with the chant of my soul, 205
There in the fragrant pines and the cedars dusk and dim.

When I Heard the Learn'd Astronomer

When I heard the learn'd astronomer;
When the proofs, the figures were ranged in columns before me;
When I was shown the charts and the diagrams,
to add, divide, and measure them;
When I, sitting, heard the astronomer, where he lectured with much applause in the lecture-
room,
How, soon, unaccountable, I became tired and sick;
Till rising and gliding out, I wander'd off by myself,
In the mystical moist night-air, and from time to time,
Look'd up in perfect silence to the stars.

THE SHORT STORY

The short prose narrative is the most nearly universal of all literary forms. We have observed it in the Egyptian tale of The Two Brothers, in the Book of Ruth, and in the story of Cupid and Psyche. In the later stage we have seen it in Defoe's The Apparition of Mrs. Veal. During the nineteenth century, however, the special form known as "the short story" was perfected. Such tales are highly unified and are told with great concentration. Their purpose is usually to present a character, to depict a setting, or to work out a plot.

In its modern form, the short story was first developed in America. Edgar Allan Poe, in the 1830's and 1840's, wrote a series of stories which fascinated his generation and which served as models for many followers. Some of these, such as The Gold Bug and The Murders in Rue Morgue, involve the solution of a mystery and were forerunners of the modern detective story. In other tales he bent all his efforts to produce an effect of horror. In all these stories he uses the greatest economy of expression.

At his best Nathaniel Hawthorne (1804-1864) was as great a master of the short story as Poe. Hawthorne's most distinguished work was done in the longer form of the novel. But although The Scarlet Letter and The House of Seven Gables are among the permanent achievements of American literature, Hawthorne devoted much of his time and thought to the short story. He was especially interested in tales that were based on the history of New England or that give us a picture of some aspect of rural New England life. The combination of the forces of nature and traits of character is handled with great artistic skill, as they lead to the catastrophe in The Ambitious Guest.

Among practitioners of the short story form in the second half of the nineteenth century was Herman Melville (1819-1891), the author of Moby Dick, one of the greatest American novels. Melville's narrative skill is perhaps best represented by a vivid chapter from this novel, though several of his short stories are well worth reading. Later in the century this form was successfully cultivated by Samuel Langhorne Clemens (Mark Twain), Bret Harte, Henry James, and Hamlin Garland. Beside these a considerable group wrote stories of "local color." Thus New England appeared in the tales of Sarah Orne Jewett, Margaret Deland, Joseph C. Lincoln, and Mary E. Wilkins Freeman; Kentucky, in the works of James Lane Allen; the Tennessee mountains, in the stories of Mary N. Murfree; and the Louisiana French life, in George W. Cable's Old Creole Days.

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE

The Ambitious Guest

One September night a family had gathered round their hearth and piled it high with the driftwood of mountain streams, the dry cones of the pine, and the splintered ruins of great trees, that had come crashing down the precipice. Up the chimney roared the fire, and brightened the room with its broad blaze. The faces of the father and mother had a sober gladness; the children laughed. The eldest daughter was the image of Happiness at seventeen, and the aged grandmother, who sat knitting in the warmest place, was the image of Happiness grown old. They had found the "herb heart's-ease" in the bleakest spot of all New England. This family were situated in the Notch of the White Hills, where the wind was sharp throughout the year and piteously cold in the winter, giving their cottage all its fresh inclemency before it descended on the valley of the Saco. They dwelt in a cold spot and a dangerous one, for a mountain towered above their heads so steep that the stones would often rumble down its sides and startle them at midnight.

The daughter had just uttered some simple jest that filled them all with mirth, when the wind came through the Notch and seemed to pause before their cottage, rattling the door with a sound of wailing and lamentation before it passed into the valley. For a moment it saddened them, though there was nothing unusual in the tones. But the family were glad again when they perceived that the latch was lifted by some traveler whose footsteps had been unheard amid the dreary blast which heralded his approach and wailed as he was entering, and went moaning away from the door.

Though they dwelt in such a solitude, these people held daily converse with the world. The romantic pass of the Notch is a great artery through which the life-blood of internal commerce is continually throbbing between Maine on one side and the Green Mountains and the shores of the St. Lawrence on the other. The stage coach always drew up before the door of the cottage. The wayfarer with no companion but his staff paused here to exchange a word, that the sense of loneliness might not utterly overcome him ere he could pass through the cleft of the mountain or reach the first house in the valley. And here the teamster on his way to Portland market would put up for the night, and, if a bachelor, might sit an hour beyond the usual bedtime and steal a kiss from the mountain maid at parting. It was one of those primitive taverns where the traveler pays only for food and lodging, but meets with a homely kindness beyond all price. When the footsteps were heard, therefore, between the outer door and the inner one, the whole family rose up, grandmother, children, and all as if about to welcome someone who belonged to them, and whose fate was linked with theirs.

The door was opened by a young man. His face at first wore the melancholy expression, almost despondency, of one who travels a wild and bleak road at nightfall and alone, but soon brightened up when he saw the kindly warmth of his reception. He felt his heart spring forward to meet them all, from the old woman who wiped the chair with her apron to the little child that held out its arms to him. One glance and smile placed the stranger on a footing of innocent familiarity with the eldest daughter.

"Ah! this fire is the right thing," cried he, "especially when there is such a pleasant circle round it. I am quite benumbed, for the Notch is just like the pipe of a great pair of bellows; it has blown a terrible blast in my face all the way from Bartlett."

"Then you are going toward Vermont?" said the master of the house as he helped to take a light knapsack off the young man's shoulders.

"Yes, to Burlington, and far enough beyond," replied he. "I meant to have been at Ethan Crawford's tonight, but a pedestrian lingers along such a road as this. It is no matter; for when I saw this good fire and all your cheerful faces, I felt as if you had kindled it on purpose for me and were waiting my arrival. So I shall sit down among you and make myself at home."

The frank-hearted stranger had just drawn his chair to the fire when something like a heavy footstep was heard without, rushing down the steep side of the mountain as with long and rapid strides, and taking such a leap in passing the cottage as to strike the opposite precipice. The family held their breath, because they knew the sound, and their guest held his by instinct.

"The old mountain has thrown a stone at us for fear we should forget him," said the landlord, recovering himself. "He sometimes nods his head and threatens to come down, but we are old neighbors, and agree together pretty well upon the whole. Besides, we have a sure place of refuge hard by if he should be coming in good earnest."

Let us now suppose the stranger to have finished his supper of bear's meat, and by his natural felicity of manner to have placed himself on a footing of kindness with the whole family; so that they talked as freely together as if he belonged to their mountain brood. He was of a proud yet gentle spirit, haughty and reserved among the rich and great, but ever ready to stoop his head to the lowly cottage door and be like a brother or a son at the poor man's fireside. In the household of the Notch he found warmth and simplicity of feeling, the pervading intelligence of New England, and a poetry of native growth which they had gathered when they little thought of it from the mountain-peaks and chasms, and at the very threshold of their romantic and dangerous abode. He had traveled far and alone; his whole life, indeed, had been a solitary path, for, with the lofty caution of his nature, he had kept himself apart from those who might otherwise have been his companions. The family, too, though so kind and hospitable, had that consciousness of unity among themselves and separation from the world at large which in every domestic circle should still keep a holy place where no stranger may intrude. But this evening a prophetic sympathy impelled the refined and educated youth to pour out his heart before the simple mountaineers, and constrained them to answer him with the same free confidence. And thus it should have been. Is not the kindred of a common fate a closer tie than that of birth?

The secret of the young man's character was a high and abstracted ambition. He could have borne to live an undistinguished life, but not to be forgotten in the grave. Yearning desire had been transformed to hope, and hope, long cherished, had become like certainty that, obscurely as he journeyed now, a glory was to beam on all his pathway, though not, perhaps, while he was treading it. But when posterity should gaze back into the gloom of what was now the present, they would trace the brightness of his footsteps, brightening as meaner glories faded, and confess that a gifted one had passed from his cradle to his tomb with none to recognize him.

"As yet," cried the stranger, his cheek glowing and his eye flashing with enthusiasm—"as yet I have done nothing. Were I to vanish from the earth tomorrow, none would know so much of me as you—that a nameless youth came up at nightfall from the valley of the Saco, and opened his heart to you in the evening, and passed through the Notch by sunrise, and was seen no more. Not a soul would ask, 'Who was he? Whither did the wanderer go?' But I cannot die till I have achieved my destiny. Then let Death come; I shall have built my monument."

There was a continual flow of natural emotion gushing forth amid abstracted reverie which enabled the family to understand this young man's sentiments, though so foreign from their own. With quick sensibility of the ludicrous, he blushed at the ardor into which he had been betrayed.

"You laugh at me," said he, taking the eldest daughter's hand and laughing himself. "You think my ambition as nonsensical as if I were to freeze myself to death on the top of Mount Washington only that people might spy at me from the country roundabout. And truly that would be a noble pedestal for a man's statue."

"It is better to sit here by this fire," answered the girl, blushing, "and be comfortable and contented, though nobody thinks about us."

"I suppose," said her father, after a fit of musing, "there is something natural in what the young man says; and if my mind had been turned that way, I might have felt just the same. It is strange, wife, how his talk has set my head running on things that are pretty certain never to come to pass."

"Perhaps they may," observed the wife. "Is the man thinking what he will do when he is a widower?"

"No, no!" cried he, repelling the idea with reproachful kindness. "When I think of your death, Esther, I think of mine, too. But I was wishing we had a good farm in Bartlett or Bethlehem or Littleton, or some other township round the White Mountains, but not where they could tumble on our heads. I should want to stand well with my neighbors and be called squire and sent to General Court for a term or two; for a plain, honest man may do as much good there as a lawyer. And when I should be grown quite an old man, and you an old woman, so as not to be long apart, I might die happy enough in my bed, and leave you all crying around me. A slate gravestone would suit me as well as a marble one, with just my name and age, and a verse of a hymn, and something to let people know that I lived an honest man and died a Christian."

"There, now!" exclaimed the stranger; "it is our nature to desire a monument, be it slate or marble, or a pillar of granite, or a glorious memory in the universal heart of man."

"We're in a strange way tonight," said the wife, with tears in her eyes. "They say it's a sign of something when folks' minds go a-wandering so. Hark to the children!"

They listened accordingly. The younger children had been put to bed in another room, but with an open door between; so that they could be heard talking busily among themselves. One and all seemed to have caught the infection from the fire-side circle, and were outvying each other in wild wishes and childish projects of what they would do when they came to be men and women. At length a little boy, instead of addressing his brothers and sisters, called out to his mother:

"I'll tell you what I wish, mother," cried he: "I want you and father and grandma'm, and all of us, and the stranger, too, to start right away and go and take a drink out of the basin of the Flume."

Nobody could help laughing at the child's notion of leaving a warm bed and dragging them from a cheerful fire to visit the basin of the Flume—a brook which tumbles over the precipice deep within the Notch.

The boy had hardly spoken, when a wagon rattled along the road and stopped a moment before the door. It appeared to contain two or three men who were cheering their hearts with the rough chorus of a song which resounded in broken notes between the cliffs, while the singers hesitated whether to continue their journey or put up here for the night.

"Father," said the girl, "they are calling you by name."

But the good man doubted whether they had really called him, and was unwilling to show himself too solicitous of gain by inviting people to patronize his house. He therefore did not hurry to the door, and, the lash being soon applied, the travelers plunged into the Notch, still singing and laughing, though their music and mirth came back drearily from the heart of the mountain.

"There, mother!" cried the boy again; "they'd have given us a ride to the Flume."

Again they laughed at the child's pertinacious fancy for a night ramble. But it happened that a light cloud passed over the daughter's spirit; she looked gravely into the fire and drew a breath that was almost a sigh. It forced its way, in spite of a little struggle to repress it. Then, starting and blushing, she looked quickly around the circle, as if they had caught a glimpse into her bosom. The stranger asked what she had been thinking of.

"Nothing," answered she, with a downcast smile; "only I felt lonesome just then."

"Oh, I have always had a gift of feeling what is in other people's hearts," said he, half seriously. "Shall I tell the secrets of yours? For I know what to think when a young girl shivers by a warm hearth and complains of lonesomeness at her mother's side. Shall I put these feelings into words?"

"They would not be a girl's feelings any longer if they could be put into words," replied the mountain nymph, laughing, but avoiding his eye.

All this was said apart. Perhaps a germ of love was springing in their hearts so pure that it might blossom in Paradise, since it could not be matured on earth; for women worship such gentle dignity as his, and the proud, contemplative, yet kindly, soul is oftenest captivated by simplicity like hers. But while they spoke softly, and he was watching the happy sadness, the lightsome shadows, the shy yearnings of a maiden's nature, the wind through the Notch took a deeper and drearier sound. It seemed, as the fanciful stranger said, like the choral strain of the spirits of the blast who in old Indian times had their dwelling among these mountains, and made their heights and recesses a sacred region. There was a wail along the road as if a funeral were passing. To chase away the gloom, the family threw pine-branches on their fire till the dry leaves cracked and the flame arose, discovering once again a scene of peace and humble happiness. The light hovered about them fondly and caressed them all. There were the little faces of the children peeping from their bed apart, and here the father's frame of strength, the mother's subdued and careful mien, the high-browed youth, the budding girl, and the good old grandam still knitting in the warmest place.

The aged woman looked up from her task, and with fingers ever busy was the next to speak.

"Old folks have their notions," said she, "as well as young ones. You've been wishing and planning and letting your heads run on one thing and another till you've set my mind a-wandering too. Now, what should an old woman wish for when she can go but a step or two before she comes to her grave? Children, it will haunt me night and day till I tell you."

"What is it, mother?" cried the husband and wife, at once.

Then the old woman, with an air of mystery which drew the circle closer round the fire, informed them that she had provided her grave-clothes some years before—a nice linen shroud, a cap with a muslin ruff, and everything of a finer sort than she had worn since her wedding day. But this evening an old superstition had strangely recurred to her. It used to be said in her younger days that if anything were amiss with a corpse, if only the ruff were not smooth or the cap did not set right, the corpse, in the coffin and beneath the clods, would strive to put up its cold hands and arrange it. The bare thought made her nervous.

"Don't talk so, grandmother," said the girl, shuddering.

"Now," continued the old woman with singular earnestness, yet smiling strangely at her own folly, "I want one of you, my children, when your mother is dressed and in the coffin,—I want one of you to hold a looking-glass over my face. Who knows but I may take a glimpse at myself, and see whether all's right."

"Old and young, we dream of graves and monuments," murmured the stranger youth. "I wonder how mariners feel when the ship is sinking and they, unknown and undistinguished, are to be buried together in the ocean, that wide and nameless sepulcher?"

For a moment the old woman's ghastly conception so engrossed the minds of her hearers that a sound abroad in the night, rising like the roar of a blast, had grown broad, deep and terrible before the fated group were conscious of it. The house and all within it trembled; the foundations of the earth seemed to be shaken, as if this awful sound were the peal of the last trump. Young and old exchanged one wild glance and remained an instant pale, affrighted, without utterance or power to move. Then the same shriek burst simultaneously from all their lips:

"The slide! The slide!"

The simplest words must intimate, but not portray, the unutterable horror of the catastrophe. The victims rushed from their cottage, and sought refuge in what they deemed a safer spot, where, in contemplation of such an emergency, a sort of barrier had been reared. Alas! they had quitted their security and fled right into the pathway of destruction. Down came the whole side of the mountain in a cataract of ruin. Just before it reached the house the stream broke into two branches, shivered not a window there, but overwhelmed the whole vicinity, blocked up the road and annihilated everything in its dreadful course. Long ere the thunder of that great slide had ceased to roar among the mountains the mortal agony had been endured and the victims were at peace. Their bodies were never found.

The next morning the light smoke was seen stealing from the cottage chimney, up the mountain-side. Within, the fire was yet smoldering on the hearth, and the chairs in a circle round it, as if the inhabitants had but gone forth to view the devastation of the slide, and would shortly return to thank Heaven for their miraculous escape. All had left separate tokens by which those who had known the family were made to shed a tear for each. Who has not heard their name? The story has been told far and wide, and will forever be a legend of these mountains. Poets have sung their fate.

There were circumstances which led some to suppose that a stranger had been received into the cottage on this awful night, and had shared the catastrophe of all its inmates; others denied that there were sufficient grounds for such a conjecture. Woe for the high-souled youth with his dream of earthly immortality! His name and person utterly unknown, his history, his way of life, his plans, a mystery never to be solved, his death and his existence equally a doubt,—whose was the agony of that death moment?

EDGAR ALLAN POE

The Cask of Amontillado

The thousand injuries of Fortunato I had borne as I best could, but when he ventured upon insult, I vowed revenge. You, who so well know the nature of my soul, will not suppose, however, that I gave utterance to a threat. At length I would be avenged; this was a point definitively settled—but the very definitiveness with which it was resolved precluded the idea of risk. I must not only punish, but punish with impunity. A wrong is unredressed when retribution overtakes its redresser. It is equally unredressed when the avenger fails to make himself felt as such to him who has done the wrong.

It must be understood that neither by word nor deed had I given Fortunato cause to doubt my good-will. I continued, as was my wont, to smile in his face, and he did not perceive that my smile now was at the thought of his immolation.

He had a weak point—this Fortunato—although in other regards he was a man to be respected and even feared. He prided himself on his connoisseurship in wine. Few Italians have the true virtuoso spirit. For the most part their enthusiasm is adopted to suit the time and opportunity to practice imposture upon the British and Austrian millionaires. In painting and gemmary Fortunato, like his countrymen, was a quack, but in the matter of old wines he was sincere. In this respect I did not differ from him materially; I was skillful in the Italian vintages myself, and bought largely whenever I could.

It was about dusk, one evening during the supreme madness of the carnival season, that I encountered my friend. He accosted me with excessive warmth, for he had been drinking much. The man wore motley. He had on a tight-fitting parti-striped dress, and his head was surmounted by the conical cap and bells. I was so pleased to see him, that I thought I should never have done wringing his hand.

I said to him—"My dear Fortunato, you are luckily met. How remarkably well you are looking today! But I have received a pipe of what passes for Amontillado, and I have my doubts."

"How?" said he, "Amontillado? A pipe? Impossible? And in the middle of the carnival?"

"I have my doubts," I replied; "and I was silly enough to pay the full Amontillado price without consulting you in the matter. You were not to be found, and I was fearful of losing a bargain."

"Amontillado!"

"I have my doubts."

"Amontillado!"

"And I must satisfy them."

"Amontillado!"

"As you are engaged, I am on my way to Luchesi. If anyone has a critical turn, it is he. He will tell me—"

"Luchesi cannot tell Amontillado from Sherry."

"And yet some fools will have it that his taste is a match for your own."

"Come, let us go."

"Whither?"

"To your vaults."

"My friend, no; I will not impose upon your good nature. I perceive you have an engagement. Luchesi—"

"I have no engagement; come."

"My friend, no. It is not the engagement, but the severe cold with which I perceive you are afflicted. The vaults are insufferably damp. They are encrusted with niter."

"Let us go, nevertheless. The cold is merely nothing. Amontillado! You have been imposed upon; and as for Luchesi, he cannot distinguish Sherry from Amontillado."

Thus speaking, Fortunato possessed himself of my arm. Putting on a mask of black silk, and drawing a roquelaure closely about my person, I suffered him to hurry me to my palazzo.

There were no attendants at home; they had absconded to make merry in honor of the time. I had told them that I should not return until the morning, and had given them explicit orders not to stir from the house. These orders were sufficient, I well knew, to insure their immediate disappearance, one and all, as soon as my back was turned.

I took from their sconces two flambeaux, and giving one to Fortunato, bowed him through several suites of rooms to the archway that led into the vaults. I passed down a long and winding staircase, requesting him to be cautious as he followed. We came at length to the foot of the descent, and stood together on the damp ground of the catacombs of the Montresors.

The gait of my friend was unsteady, and the bells upon his cap jingled as he strode.

"The pipe," he said.

"It is farther on," said I; "but observe the white web-work which gleams from these cavern walls."

He turned towards me, and looked into my eyes¹⁰ with two filmy orbs that distilled the rheum of intoxication.

"Niter?" he asked, at length.

"Niter," I replied. "How long have you had that cough!"

"Ugh! ugh! ugh!—ugh! ugh! ugh!—ugh! ugh! ugh!—ugh! ugh! ugh!—ugh! ugh! ugh!"

My poor friend found it impossible to reply for many minutes.

"It is nothing," he said, at last.

"Come," I said, with decision, "we will go back; your health is precious. You are rich, respected, admired, beloved; you are happy, as once I was. You are a man to be missed. For me it is no matter. We will go back; you will be ill, and I cannot be responsible. Besides, there is Luchesi—"

"Enough," he said; "the cough is a mere nothing; it will not kill me. I shall not die of a cough."

"True—true," I replied; "and, indeed, I had no intention of alarming you unnecessarily—but you³⁰ should use all proper caution. A draught of this Medoc will defend us from the damps."

Here I knocked off the neck of a bottle which I drew from a long row of its fellows that lay upon the mold.

"Drink," I said, presenting him the wine.

He raised it to his lips with a leer. He paused and nodded to me familiarly, while his bells jingled.

"I drink," he said, "to the buried that repose⁴⁰ around us."

"And I to your long life."

He again took my arm, and we proceeded.

"These vaults," he said, "are extensive."

"The Montresors," I replied, "were a great and numerous family."

"I forgot your arms."

"A huge human foot d'or,¹ in a field azure; the foot crushes a serpent rampant whose fangs are imbedded in the heel."

"And the motto?"

"Nemo me impune lacessit."²

"Good!" he said.

The wine sparkled in his eyes and the bells jingled. My own fancy grew warm with the Medoc. We had passed through walls of piled bones, with casks and puncheons intermingling, into the inmost recesses of the catacombs. I paused again, and this time I made bold to seize Fortunato by an arm above the elbow.

"The niter!" I said; "see, it increases. It hangs like moss upon the vaults. We are below the river's bed. The drops of moisture trickle among the bones. Come, we will go back ere it is too late. Your cough—"

"It is nothing," he said; "let us go on. But first, another draught of the Medoc."

I broke and reached him a flask of De Grave. He emptied it at a breath. His eyes flashed with²⁰ a fierce light. He laughed and threw the bottle upwards with a gesticulation I did not understand.

I looked at him in surprise. He repeated the movement—a grotesque one.

"You do not comprehend?" he said.

"Not I," I replied.

"Then you are not of the brotherhood."

"How?"

"You are not of the masons."

"Yes, yes," I said, "yes, yes."

"You? Impossible! A mason?"

"A mason," I replied.

"A sign," he said.

"It is this," I answered, producing a trowel from beneath the folds of my roquelaure.

"You jest," he exclaimed, recoiling a few paces. "But let us proceed to the Amontillado."

"Be it so," I said, replacing the tool beneath the cloak, and again offering him my arm. He leaned upon it heavily. We continued our route in search of the Amontillado. We passed through a range of low arches, descended, passed on, and descended again, arrived at a deep crypt, in which the foulness of the air caused our flambeaux rather to glow than flame.

At the most remote end of the crypt there appeared another less spacious. Its walls had been lined with human remains piled to the vault overhead, in the fashion of the great catacombs of⁵⁰ Paris. Three sides of this interior crypt were still ornamented in this manner. From the fourth the bones had been thrown down, and lay promiscuously upon the earth, forming at one point a mound of some size. Within the wall thus exposed by the displacing of the bones, we perceived a still inferior recess, in depth about four feet, in width three, in height six or seven. It seemed to have been constructed for no especial use within itself, but formed merely the interval between two of the colossal supports of the roof of the catacombs, and was backed by one of their circumscribing walls of solid granite.

¹ This is a description of a coat of arms in technical heraldic terms. A human foot of gold on a field of blue.

² No one strikes me with impunity. This is also the motto of Scotland.

It was in vain that Fortunato, uplifting his dull torch, endeavored to pry into the depths of the recess. Its termination the feeble light did not enable us to see.

"Proceed," I said; "herein is the Amontillado. As for Luchesi—"

"He is an ignoramus," interrupted my friend, as he stepped unsteadily forward, while I followed immediately at his heels. In an instant he had reached the extremity of the niche, and finding his progress arrested by the rock, stood stupidly bewildered. A moment more and I had fettered him to the granite. In its surface were two iron staples, distant from each other about two feet, horizontally. From one of these depended a short chain, from the other a padlock. Throwing the links about his waist, it was but the work of a few seconds to secure it. He was too much astounded to resist. ³⁰ Withdrawing the key, I stepped back from the recess.

"Pass your hand," I said, "over the wall; you cannot help feeling the niter. Indeed it is very damp. Once more let me implore you to return. No? Then I must positively leave you. But I must first render you all the little attentions in my power."

"The Amontillado!" ejaculated my friend, not yet recovered from his astonishment.

"True," I replied; "the Amontillado."

As I said these words I busied myself among the pile of bones of which I have before spoken. Throwing them aside, I soon uncovered a quantity of building stone and mortar. With these materials and with the aid of my trowel, I began vigorously to wall up the entrance of the niche.

I had scarcely laid the first tier of the masonry when I discovered that the intoxication of Fortunato had in a great measure worn off. The earliest indication I had of this was a low moaning cry from the depth of the recess. It was not the cry of a drunken man. There was then a long and obstinate silence. I laid the second tier, and the third, and the fourth; and then I heard the furious vibrations of the chain. The noise lasted for several minutes, during which, that I might hearken to it with the more satisfaction, I ceased my labors and sat down upon the bones. When at last the clanking subsided, I resumed the trowel, and finished without interruption the fifth, the sixth, and the seventh tier. The wall was now nearly upon a level with my breast. I again paused, and holding the flambeaux over the mason-work, threw a few feeble rays upon the figure within.

A succession of loud and shrill screams, bursting suddenly from the throat of the chained form, seemed to thrust me violently back. For a brief moment I hesitated—I trembled. Unsheathing my rapier, I began to grope with it about the recess; but the thought of an instant reassured me. I placed my hand upon the solid fabric of the catacombs, and felt satisfied. I reapproached the wall. I replied to the yells of him who clamored. I re-echoed—I aided—I surpassed them in volume and in strength. I did this, and the clamor grew still.

It was now midnight, and my task was drawing to a close. I had completed the eighth, the ninth, and the tenth tier. I had finished a portion of the last and the eleventh; there remained but a single stone to be fitted and plastered in. I struggled with its weight; I placed it partially in its destined position. But now there came from out the niche a low laugh that erected the hairs upon my head. It was succeeded by a sad voice, which I had difficulty in recognizing as that of the noble Fortunato. The voice said—

"Ha! ha! ha!—he! he!—a very good joke indeed—an excellent jest. We will have many a rich laugh about it at the palazzo—he! he! he!—over our wine—he! he! he!"

"The Amontillado!" I said.

⁴⁰ "He! he! he!—he! he! he!—yes, the Amontillado. But is it not getting late? Will not they be awaiting us at the palazzo, the Lady Fortunato and the rest? Let us be gone."

"Yes," I said, "let us be gone."

"For the love of God, Montresor!"

"Yes," I said, "for the love of God!"

But to these words I hearkened in vain for a reply. I grew impatient. I called aloud—

"Fortunato!"

No answer. I called again—

"Fortunato!"

No answer still. I thrust a torch through the remaining aperture and let it fall within. There came forth in return only a jingling of the bells. My heart grew sick—on account of the dampness of the catacombs. I hastened to make an end of my labor. I forced the last stone into its position; I plastered it up. Against the new masonry I re-erected the old rampart of bones. For the half of a century no mortal has disturbed them. *In pace requiescat!*²

HERMAN MELVILLE

Moby Dick

The Chase—Third Day

The morning of the third day dawned fair and fresh, and once more the solitary night-man at the foremast-head was relieved by crowds of the daylight look-outs, who dotted every mast and almost every spar.

"D'y'e see him?" cried Ahab; but the whale was not yet in sight.

"In his infallible wake, though; but follow that wake, that's all. Helm there; steady, as thou goest, and hast been going. What a lovely day again! Were it a new-made world, and made for a summer-house to the angels, and this morning the first of its throwing open to them, a fairer day could not dawn upon that world. . . . These warm Trade Winds, at least, that in the clear heavens blow straight on, in strong and steadfast, vigorous mildness; and veer not from their mark, however the baser currents of the sea may turn and tack, and mightiest Mississippis of the land shift and swerve about, uncertain where to go at last. And by the eternal Poles! these same Trades that so directly blow my good ship on; these Trades, or something like them—something so unchangeable, and full as strong, blow my keeled soul along! To it! Aloft there! What d'y'e see?"

"Nothing, sir."

"Nothing! and noon at hand! The doubloon goes a-begging! See the sun! Aye, aye, it must be so. I've oversailed him. How, got the start? Aye, he's chasing me now; not I, him—that's bad; I might have known it, too. Fool! the lines—the harpoons he's towing. Aye, aye, I have run him by last night. About! About! Come down, all of ye, but the regular look-outs! Man the braces!"

Steering as she had done, the wind had been somewhat on the Pequod's quarter, so that now being pointed in the reverse direction, the braced ship sailed hard upon the breeze as she recharged the cream in her own white wake.

"Against the wind he now steers for the open jaw," murmured Starbuck to himself, as he coiled the new-hauled main-brace upon the rail. "God keep us, but already my bones feel damp within me, and from the inside wet my flesh. I misdoubt me that I disobey my God in obeying him!"

"Stand by to sway me up!" cried Ahab, advancing to the hempen basket. "We should meet him soon."

"Aye, aye, sir," and straightway Starbuck did Ahab's bidding, and once more Ahab swung on high.

A whole hour now passed; goldbeaten out to ages. Time itself now held long breaths with keen suspense. But at last, some three points off the weather bow, Ahab descried the spout again, and instantly from the three mast-heads three shrieks went up as if the tongues of fire had voiced it.

"Forehead to forehead I meet thee, this third time, Moby Dick! On deck there!—brace sharper up; crowd her into the wind's eye. He's too far off to lower yet, Mr. Starbuck. The sails shake! Stand over that helmsman with a top-maul! So, so; he travels fast, and I must down. But let me have one more good round look aloft here at the sea; there's time for that. An old, old sight, and yet somehow so young; aye, and not changed a wink since I first saw it, a boy, from the sandhills of Nantucket! The same!—the same!—the same to Noah as to me. There's a soft shower to leeward. Such lovely leewardings! They must lead some-

² May he rest in peace.

Melville, Moby Dick. Concluding two chapters. Herman Melville (1819-1891) was born and died in New York City. His sea-stories are based upon first-hand adventures.

where—to something else than common land, more palmy than the palms. Leeward! the white whale goes that way; look to windward, then; the better if the bitterer quarter. But good-by, good-by, old mast-head—keep a good eye upon the whale, the while I'm gone. We'll talk tomorrow, nay, tonight, when the white whale lies down there, tied by head and tail."

He gave the word; and still gazing round him, was steadily lowered through the cloven blue air to the deck.

In due time the boats were lowered; but as standing in his shallop's stern, Ahab just hovered upon the point of the descent, he waved to the mate,—who held one of the tackle-ropes on deck—and bade him pause.

"Starbuck!"

"Sir?"

"For the third time my soul's ship starts upon this voyage, Starbuck."

"Aye, sir, thou wilt have it so."

"Some ships sail from their ports, and ever afterwards are missing, Starbuck!"

"Truth, sir: saddest truth."

"Some men die at ebb tide; some at low water; some at the full of the flood;—and I feel now like a billow that's all one crested comb, Starbuck. I am old;—shake hands with me, man."

Their hands met; their eyes fastened; Starbuck's tears the glue.

"Oh, my captain, my captain!—noble heart—go not—go not!—see, it's a brave man that weeps; how great the agony of the persuasion then!"

"Lower away!"—cried Ahab, tossing the mate's arm from him. "Stand by the crew!"

In an instant the boat was pulling round close under the stern.

"The sharks! the sharks!" cried a voice from the low cabin-window there; "O master, my master, come back!"

But Ahab heard nothing; for his own voice was high-lifted then; and the boat leaped on.

Yet the voice spake true; for scarce had he pushed from the ship, when numbers of sharks, seemingly rising from out the dark waters beneath the hull, maliciously snapped at the blades of the oars, every time they dipped in the water; and in this way accompanied the boat with their bites. It is a thing not uncommonly happening to the whale-boats in those swarming seas; the sharks at times apparently following them in the same prescient way that vultures hover over the banners of marching regiments in the east. But these were the first sharks that had been observed by the Pequod since the White Whale had been first described; and whether it was that Ahab's crew were all such tiger-yellow barbarians, and therefore their flesh more musky to the senses of the sharks—a matter sometimes well known to affect them—however it was, they seemed to follow that one boat without molesting the others.

"Heart of wrought steel!" murmured Starbuck, gazing over the side, and following with his eyes the receding boat—"canst thou yet ring boldly to that sight?—lowering thy keel among ravening sharks, and followed by them, open-mouthed to the chase; and this the critical third day?—For when three days flow together in one continuous intense pursuit, be sure the first is the morning, the second the noon, and the third the evening and the end of that thing—be that end what it may. Oh! my God! what is this that shoots through me, and leaves me so deadly calm, yet expectant,—fixed at the top of a shudder! Future things swim before me, as in empty outlines and skeletons; all the past is somehow grown dim. Mary, girl! thou fadest in pale glories behind me; boy! I seem to see but thy eyes grown wondrous blue. Strangest problems of life seem clearing; but clouds sweep between—Is my journey's end coming? My legs feel faint; like his who has footed it all day. Feel thy heart,—beats it yet?—Stir thyself, Starbuck!—stave it off—move, move! speak aloud!—Mast-head there! See ye my boy's hand on the hill? Crazed;—aloft there! keep thy keenest eye upon the boats;—mark well the whale!—Ho! again!—drive off that hawk! seel he pecks—he tears the vane"—pointing to the red flag flying at the main-truck—"Ha! he soars away with it!—Where's the old man now? sees't thou that sight, oh, Ahab!—shudder, shudder!"

The boats had not gone very far, when by a signal from the mast-heads—a downward pointed arm, Ahab knew that the whale had sounded; but intending to be near him at the next rising; he held on his way a little sideways from the vessel; the becharmed crew maintaining the profoundest silence, as the head-beat waves hammered and hammered against the opposing bow.

"Drive, drive in your nails, oh ye waves! to their uttermost heads drive them in! ye but strike a thing without a lid; and no coffin and no hearse can be mine:—and hemp only can kill me! Ha! ha!"

Suddenly the waters around them slowly swelled in broad circles; then quickly upheaved, as if sideways sliding from a submerged berg of ice, swiftly rising to the surface. A low rumbling sound was heard; a subterraneous hum; and then all held their breaths; as, bedraggled with trailing ropes, and harpoons, and lances, a vast form shot lengthwise, but obliquely from the sea. Shrouded in a thin dropping veil of mist, it hovered for a moment in the rainbowed air; and then fell swamping back into the deep. Crushed thirty feet upwards, the waters flashed for an instant like heaps of fountains, then brokenly sank in a shower of flakes, leaving the circling surface creamed like new milk round the marble trunk of the whale.

"Give away!" cried Ahab to the oarsmen, and the boats darted forward to the attack; but maddened by yesterday's fresh irons that corroded in him, Moby Dick seemed combinedly possessed by all the angels that fell from heaven. The wide tiers of welded tendons overspreading his broad white forehead, beneath the transparent skin, looked knitted together; as head on he came, churning his tail among the boats; and once more flailed them apart; spilling out the irons and lances from the two mates' boats, and dashing in one side of the upper part of their bows, but leaving Ahab's almost without a scar.

While Daggoo and Queequeg were stopping the strained planks, and as the whale swimming out from them, turned, and showed one entire flank as he shot by them again, at that moment a quick cry went up. Lashed round and round to the fish's back; pinioned in the turns upon turns in which, during the past night, the whale had reeled the involutions of the lines around him, the half torn body of the Parsee was seen; his sable raiment frayed to shreds; his distended eyes turned full upon old Ahab.

The harpoon dropped from his hand.

"Befooled, befooled!"—drawing in a long lean breath—"Aye, Parsee! I see thee again.—Aye, and thou goest before; and this, this then is the hearse that thou didst promise. But I hold thee to the last letter of thy word. Where is the second hearse? Away, mates, to the ship! those boats are useless now; repair them if ye can in time, and return to me; if not, Ahab is enough to die—Down, men! the first thing that but offers to jump from this boat I stand in, that thing I harpoon. Ye are not other men, but my arms and my legs; and so obey me.—Where's the whale? gone down again?"

But he looked too nigh the boat; for as if bent upon escaping with the corpse he bore, and as if the particular place of the last encounter had been but a stage in his leeward voyage, Moby Dick was now again steadily swimming forward; and had almost passed the ship,—which thus far had been sailing in the contrary direction to him, though for the present her headway had been stopped. He seemed swimming with his utmost velocity, and now only intent upon pursuing his own straight path in the sea.

"Oh! Ahab," cried Starbuck, "not too late is it, even now, the third day, to desist. See! Moby Dick seeks thee not. It is thou, thou, that madly seekest him!"

Setting sail to the rising wind, the lonely boat was swiftly impelled to leeward, by both oars and canvas. And at last when Ahab was sliding by the vessel, so near as plainly to distinguish Starbuck's face as he leaned over the rail, he hailed him to turn the vessel about, and follow him, not too swiftly, at a judicious interval. Glancing upwards, he saw Tashtego, Queequeg, and Daggoo, eagerly mounting to the three mast-heads; while the oarsmen were rocking in the two staved boats which had but just been hoisted to the side, and were busily at work in repairing them. One after the other, through the port-holes, as he sped, he also caught flying glimpses of Stubb and Flask, busying themselves on deck among bundles of new irons and lances. As he saw all this, as he heard the hammers in the broken boats, far other hammers seemed driving a nail into his heart. But he rallied. And now marking that the vane or flag was gone from the mainmast-head, he shouted to Tashtego, who had just gained that perch, to descend again for another flag, and a hammer and nails, and so nail it to the mast.

Whether fagged by the three days' running chase, and the resistance to his swimming in the knotted hamper he bore; or whether it was some latent deceitfulness and malice in him: whichever was true, the White Whale's way now began to abate, as it seemed, from the boat so rapidly nearing him once more; though indeed the whale's last start had not been so long a one as before. And still as Ahab glided over the waves the un pitying sharks accompanied him; and so pertinaciously stuck to the boat, and so continually bit at the plying oars, that the blades became jagged and crunched, and left small splinters in the sea, at almost every dip.

"Heed them not! those teeth but give new rowlocks to your oars. Pull on! 'tis the better rest, the shark's jaw than the yielding water."

"But at every bite, sir, the thin blades grow smaller and smaller!"

"They will last long enough! pull on!—But who can tell"—he muttered—"whether these sharks swim to feast on the whale or on Ahab?—But pull on! Aye, all alive, now—we near him. The helm! take the helm; let me pass,"—and so saying, two of the oarsmen helped him forward to the bows of the still flying boat.

At length as the craft was cast to one side, and ran ranging along with the white Whale's flank, he seemed strangely oblivious of its advance—as the whale sometimes will—and Ahab was fairly within the smoky mountain mist, which, thrown off from the whale's spout, curled round his great, Monadnock hump; he was even thus close to him; when, with body arched back, and both arms lengthwise highlifted to the poise, he darted his fierce iron, and his far fiercer curse into the hated whale. As both steel and curse sank to the socket, as if sucked into a morass, Moby Dick sideways writhed; spasmodically rolled his nigh flank against the bow, and without staving a hole in it, so suddenly canted the boat over, that had it not been for the elevated part of the gunwale to which he then clung, Ahab would once more have been tossed into the sea. As it was, three of the oarsmen—who foreknew not the precise instant of the dart, and were therefore unprepared for its effects—these were flung out; but so fell, that, in an instant two of them clutched the gunwale again, and rising to its level on a combing wave, hurled themselves bodily inboard again; the third man helplessly dropping astern, but still afloat and swimming.

Almost simultaneously, with a mighty volition of ungraduated, instantaneous swiftness, the White Whale darted through the weltering sea. But when Ahab cried out to the steersman to take new turns with the line, and hold it so; and commanded the crew to turn round on their seats, and tow the boat up to the mark; the moment the treacherous line felt that double strain and tug, it snapped in the empty air!

"What breaks in me? Some sinew cracks!—'tis whole again; oars! oars! Burst in upon him!"

Hearing the tremendous rush of the sea-crashing boat, the whale wheeled round to present his blank forehead at bay; but in that evolution, catching sight of the nearing black hull of the ship; seemingly seeing in it the source of all his persecutions; bethinking it—it may be—a larger and nobler foe; so of a sudden, he bore down upon its advancing prow, smiting his jaws amid fiery showers of foam.

Ahab staggered; his hand smote his forehead. "I grow blind; hands! stretch out before me that I may yet grope my way. Is't night?"

"The whale! The ship!" cried the cringing oarsmen.

"Oars! oars! Slope downwards to thy depths, O sea, that ere it be for ever too late, Ahab may slide this last, last time upon his mark! I see: the ship! the ship! Dash on, my men! Will you not save my ship?"

But as the oarsmen violently forced their boat through the sledge-hammering seas, the before whale-smitten bow-ends of two planks burst through, and in an instant almost, the temporarily disabled boat lay nearly level with the waves; its half-wading, splashing crew, trying hard to stop the gap and bale out the pouring water.

Meantime, for that one beholding instant, Tash-tego's mast-head hammer remained suspended in his hand; and the red flag, half-wrapping him as with a plaid, then streamed itself straight out from him, as his own forward-flowing heart; while Starbuck and Stubb, standing upon the bowsprit beneath, caught sight of the down-coming monster just as soon as he.

"The whale, the whale! Up helm, up helm! Oh, all ye sweet powers of air, now hug me close. Let not Starbuck die, if die he must, in a woman's fainting fit. Up helm, I say—ye fools, the jaw! the jaw! Is this the end of all my bursting prayers? all my life-long fidelities? Oh, Ahab, Ahab, lo, thy work. Steady! helmsman, steady. Nay, nay! Up helm again! He turns to meet us! Oh, his unappeasable brow drives on towards one, whose duty tells him he cannot depart. My God, stand by me now!"

"Stand not by me, but stand under me, whoever you are that will now help Stubb; for Stubb, too, sticks here. I grin at thee, thou grinning whale! Who ever helped Stubb, or kept Stubb awake, but Stubb's own unwinking eye? And now poor Stubb goes to bed upon a mattress that is all too soft; would it were stuffed with brushwood! I grin at thee, thou grinning whale! Look ye, sun, moon, and stars! I call ye assassins of as good a fellow as ever spouted up his ghost. For all that, I would yet ring glasses with ye, would ye but hand the cup! Oh! oh! oh! oh! thou grinning whale, but there'll be plenty of gulping soon! Why fly ye not, O Ahab! For me, off shoes and jacket to it; let Stubb die in his drawers! A most moldy and over-salted death, though;—cherries! cherries! cherries! Oh, Flask, for one red cherry ere we die!"

"Cherries? I only wish that we were where they grow. Oh, Stubb, I hope my poor mother's drawn my part-pay ere this; if not, few coppers will now come to her, for the voyage is up."

From the ship's bows, nearly all the seamen now hung inactive; hammers, bits of plank, lances, and harpoons, mechanically retained in their hands, just as they had darted from their various employments; all their enchanted eyes intent upon the whale, which from side to side strangely vibrating his predestinating head, sent a broad band of overspreading semi-circular foam before him as he rushed. Retribution, swift vengeance, eternal malice were in his whole aspect, and spite of all that mortal man could do, the solid white buttress of his forehead smote the ship's starboard bow, till men and timbers reeled. Some fell flat upon their faces. Like dislodged trucks, the heads of the harpooners aloft shook on their bull-like necks. Through the breach, they heard the waters pour, as mountain torrents down a flume.

"The ship! The hearse!—the second hearse!" cried Ahab from the boat; "its wood could only be American!"

Diving beneath the settling ship, the whale ran quivering along its keel; but turning under water, swiftly shot to the surface again, far off the other bow, but within a few yards of Ahab's boat, where, for a time, he lay quiescent.

"I turn my body from the sun. What ho, Tash-tego! let me hear thy hammer. Ah! ye three unsundered spires of mine; thou uncracked keel; and only god-bullied hull; thou firm deck, and haughty helm, and Pole-pointed prow,—death-glorious ship! must ye then perish, and without me? Am I cut off from the last fond pride of meanest shipwrecked captains? Oh, lonely death on lonely life! Oh, now I feel my topmost greatness lies in my topmost grief. Ho, ho! from all your furthest bounds, pour ye now in, ye bold billows of my whole foregone life, and top this one piled comber of my death! Towards thee I roll, thou all-destroying but unconquering whale; to the last I grapple with thee; from hell's heart I stab at thee; for hate's sake I spit my last breath at thee. Sink all coffins and all hearses to one common pool! and since neither can be mine, let me then tow to pieces, while still chasing thee, though tied to thee, thou damned whale! Thus, I give up the spear!"

The harpoon was darted; the stricken whale flew forward; with igniting velocity the line ran through the groove;—ran foul. Ahab stooped to clear it; he did clear it; but the flying turn caught him round the neck, and voicelessly as Turkish mutes bowstring their victim, he was shot out of the boat, ere the crew knew he was gone. Next instant, the heavy eye-splice in the rope's final end flew out of the stark-empty tub, knocked down an oarsman, and smiting the sea, disappeared in its depths.

For an instant, the tranced boat's crew stood still; then turned. "The ship? Great God, where is the ship?" Soon they through dim, bewildering mediums saw her sidelong fading phantom, as in the gaseous Fata Morgana; only the uppermost masts out of water; while fixed by infatuation, or fidelity, or fate, to their once lofty perches, the pagan harpooners still maintained their sinking lookouts on the sea. And now, concentric circles seized the lone boat itself, and all its crew, and each floating oar, and every lance-pole, and spinning, animate and inanimate, all round and round in one vortex, carried the smallest chip of the Pequod out of sight.

But as the last whelmings intermixingly poured themselves over the sunken head of the Indian at the mainmast, leaving a few inches of the erect spar yet visible, together with long streaming yards of the flag, which calmly undulated, with ironical coincidings, over the destroying billows they almost touched;—at that instant, a red arm and a hammer hovered backwardly uplifted in the open air, in the act of nailing the flag faster and yet faster to the subsiding spar. A skyhawk that tauntingly had followed the main-truck downwards from its natural home among the stars, pecking at the flag, and incommoding Tashtego there; this bird now chanced to intercept its broad fluttering wing between the hammer and the wood; and simultaneously feeling that ethereal thrill, the submerged savage beneath, in his death-gasp, kept his hammer frozen there; and so the bird of heaven, with archangelic shrieks, and his imperial beak thrust upwards, and his whole captive form folded in the flag of Ahab, went down with his ship, which, like Satan, would not sink to hell till she had dragged a living part of heaven along with her, and helmeted herself with it.

Now small fowls flew screaming over the yet yawning gulf; a sullen white surf beat against its steep sides; then all collapsed, and the great shroud of the sea rolled on as it rolled five thousand years ago.

Epilogue

"And I Only Am Escaped Alone to Tell Thee." Job.

The drama's done. Why then here does anyone step forth?—Because one did survive the wreck.

It so chanced, that after the Parsee's disappearance, I was he whom the Fates ordained to take the place of Ahab's bowsman, when that bowsman assumed the vacant post; the same, who, when on the last day the three men were tossed from out the rocking boat, was dropped astern. So, floating on the margin of the ensuing scene, and in full sight of it, when the half-spent suction of the sunk ship reached me, I was then but slowly drawn towards the closing vortex. When I reached it, it had subsided to a creamy pool. Round and round, then, and ever contracting towards the button-like black bubble at the axis of that slowly wheeling circle, like another Ixion I did revolve. Till, gaining that vital center, the black bubble upward burst; and now, liberated by reason of its cunning spring, and, owing to its great buoyancy, rising with great force, the coffin life-buoy shot lengthwise from the sea, fell over, and floated by my side. Buoyed up by that coffin, for almost one whole day and night, I floated on a soft and dirge-like main. The unharming sharks, they glided by as if with padlocks on their mouths; the savage sea-hawks sailed with sheathed beaks. On the second day, a sail drew near, nearer, and picked me up at last. It was the devious-cruising Rachel, that in her retracing search after her missing children, only found another orphan.

HENRY JAMES

Paste

"I've found a lot more things," her cousin said to her the day after the second funeral; "they're up in her room—but they're things I wish you'd look at."

The pair of mourners, sufficiently stricken, were in the garden of the vicarage together, before luncheon, waiting to be summoned to that meal, and Arthur Prime had still in his face the intention, she was moved to call it rather than the expression, of feeling something or other. Some such appearance was in itself of course natural within a week of his stepmother's death, within three of his father's; but what was most present to the girl, herself sensitive and shrewd, was that he seemed somehow to brood without sorrow, to suffer without what she in her own case would have called pain. He turned away from her after this last speech—it was a good deal his habit to drop an observation and leave her to pick it up without assistance. If the vicar's widow, now in her turn finally translated, had not really belonged to him it was not for want of her giving herself, so far as he ever would take her; and she had lain for three days all alone at the end of the passage, in the great cold chamber of hospitality, the dampish greenish room where visitors slept and where several of the ladies of the parish had, without effect, offered, in pairs and successions, piously to watch with her. His personal connection with the parish was now slighter than ever, and he had really not waited for this opportunity to show the ladies what he thought of them. She felt that she herself had, during her doleful month's leave from Bleet, where she was governess, rather taken her place in the same snubbed order; but it was presently, none the less, with a better little hope of coming in for some remembrance, some relic, that she went up to look at the things he had spoken of, the identity of which, as a confused cluster of bright objects on a table in the darkened room, shimmered at her as soon as she had opened the door.

They met her eyes for the first time, but in a moment, before touching them, she knew them as things of the theater, as very much too fine to have been with any verisimilitude things of the vicarage. They were too dreadfully good to be true, for her aunt had had no jewels to speak of, and these were coronets and girdles, diamonds, rubies and sapphires. Flagrant tinsel and glass, they looked strangely vulgar, but if after the first queer shock of them she found herself taking them up it was for the very proof, never yet so distinct to her, of a far-off faded story. An honest widowed cleric

James, Paste. Henry James (1843-1916) was the son of a cultivated Boston family and brother of William James, the philosopher. He lived abroad most of his life and eventually became a British citizen.

with a small son and a large sense of Shakespeare had, on a brave latitude of habit as well as of taste—since it implied his having in very fact dropped deep into the “pit”—conceived for an obscure actress several years older than himself an admiration of which the prompt offer of his reverend name and hortatory hand was the sufficiently candid sign. The response had perhaps in those dim years, so far as eccentricity was concerned, even bettered the proposal, and Charlotte, turning the tale over, had long since drawn from it a measure of the career renounced by the undistinguished comédienne—doubtless also tragic, or perhaps pantomimic, at a pinch—of her late uncle’s dreams. This career couldn’t have been eminent and must much more probably have been comfortless.

“You see what it is—old stuff of the time she never liked to mention.”

Our young woman gave a start; her companion had after all rejoined her and had apparently watched a moment her slightly scared recognition. “So I said to myself,” she replied. Then to show intelligence, yet keep clear of twaddle: “How peculiar they look!”

“They look awful,” said Arthur Prime. “Cheap gilt, diamonds as big as potatoes. These are trappings of a ruder age than ours. Actors do themselves better now.”

“Oh, now,” said Charlotte, not to be less knowing, “actresses have real diamonds.”

“Some of them.” Arthur spoke dryly.

“I mean the bad ones—the nobodies too.”

“Oh, some of the nobodies have the biggest. But mamma wasn’t of that sort.”

“A nobody?” Charlotte risked.

“Not a nobody to whom somebody—well, not a nobody with diamonds. It isn’t all worth, this trash, five pounds.”

There was something in the old gewgaws that spoke to her, and she continued to turn them over. “They’re relics. I think they have their melancholy and even their dignity.”

Arthur observed another pause. “Do you care for them?” he then asked. “I mean,” he promptly added, “as a souvenir.”

“Of you?” Charlotte threw off.

“Of me? What have I to do with it? Of your poor dead aunt who was so kind to you,” he said with virtuous sternness.

“Well, I’d rather have them than nothing.”

“Then please take them,” he returned in a tone of relief which expressed somehow more of the eager than of the gracious.

“Thank you.” Charlotte lifted two or three objects up and set them down again. Though they were lighter than the materials they imitated they were so much more extravagant that they struck her in truth as rather an awkward heritage, to which she might have preferred even a matchbox or a penwiper. They were indeed shameless pinchbeck. “Had you any idea she had kept them?”

“I don’t at all believe she had kept them or knew they were there, and I’m very sure my father didn’t. They had quite equally worked off any tenderness for the connection. These odds and ends, which she thought had been given away or destroyed, had simply got thrust into a dark corner and been forgotten.”

Charlotte wondered. “Where then did you find them?”

“In that old tin box”—and the young man pointed to the receptacle from which he had dislodged them and which stood on a neighboring chair. “It’s rather a good box still, but I’m afraid I can’t give you that.”

The girl took no heed of the box; she continued only to look at the trinkets. “What corner had she found?”

“She hadn’t ‘found’ it,” her companion sharply insisted; “she had simply lost it. The whole thing had passed from her mind. The box was on the top shelf of the old schoolroom closet, which, until one put one’s head into it from a step-ladder, looked, from below, quite cleared out. The door’s narrow and the part of the closet to the left goes well into the wall. The box had stuck there for years.”

Charlotte was conscious of a mind divided and a vision vaguely troubled, and once more she took up two or three of the subjects of this revelation; a big bracelet in the form of a gilt serpent with many twists and beady eyes, a brazen belt studded with emeralds and rubies, a chain, of flamboyant architecture, to which, at the Theater Royal Little Peddlington, Hamlet’s mother must have been concerned to attach the portrait of the successor to Hamlet’s father. “Are you very sure they’re not really worth something? Their mere weight alone—!” she vaguely observed, balancing a moment a royal diadem that might have crowned one of the creations of the famous Mrs. Jarley.

But Arthur Prime, it was clear, had already thought the question over and found the answer easy. “If they had been worth anything to speak of she would long ago have sold them. My father and she had unfortunately never been in a position to keep any considerable value locked up." And while his companion took in the obvious force of this he went on with a flourish just marked enough not to escape her: "If they're worth anything at all—why you're only the more welcome to them."

Charlotte had now in her hand a small bag of faded figured silk—one of those antique conveniences that speak to us, in terms of evaporated camphor and lavender, of the part they have played in some personal history; but though she had for the first time drawn the string she looked much more at the young man than at the questionable treasure it appeared to contain. "I shall like them. They're all I have."

"All you have—?"

"That belonged to her."

He swelled a little, then looked about him as if to appeal—as against her avidity—to the whole poor place. "Well, what else do you want?"

"Nothing. Thank you very much." With which she bent her eyes on the article wrapped, and now only exposed, in her superannuated satchel—a string of large pearls, such a shining circle as might once have graced the neck of a provincial Ophelia and borne company to a flaxen wig. "This perhaps is worth something. Feel it." And she passed him the necklace, the weight of which she had gathered for a moment into her hand.

He measured it in the same way with his own, but remained quite detached. "Worth at most thirty shillings."

"Not more?"

"Surely not if it's paste?"

"But is it paste?"

He gave a small sniff of impatience. "Pearls nearly as big as filberts?"

"But they're heavy," Charlotte declared.

"No heavier than anything else." And he gave them back with an allowance for her simplicity. "Do you imagine for a moment they're real?"

She studied them a little, feeling them, turning them round. "Mightn't they possibly be?"

"Of that size—stuck away with that trash?"

"I admit it isn't likely," Charlotte presently said. "And pearls are so easily imitated."

"That's just what—to a person who knows—they're not. These have no luster, no play."

"No—they are dull. They're opaque."

"Besides," he lucidly enquired, "how could she ever have come by them?"

"Mightn't they have been a present?"

Arthur stared at the question as if it were almost improper. "Because actresses are exposed—?"

He pulled up, however, not saying to what, and before she could supply the deficiency had, with the sharp ejaculation of "No, they mightn't!" turned his back on her and walked away. His manner made her feel she had probably been wanting in tact, and before he returned to the subject, the last thing that evening, she had satisfied herself of the ground of his resentment. They had been talking of her departure the next morning, the hour of her train and the fly that would come for her, and it was precisely these things that gave him his effective chance. "I really can't allow you to leave the house under the impression that my stepmother was at any time of her life the sort of person to allow herself to be approached—"

"With pearl necklaces and that sort of thing?" Arthur had made for her somehow the difficulty that she couldn't show him she understood him without seeming pert.

It at any rate only added to his own gravity. "That sort of thing, exactly."

"I didn't think when I spoke this morning—but I see what you mean."

"I mean that she was beyond reproach," said Arthur Prime.

"A hundred times yes."

"Therefore if she couldn't, out of her slender gains, ever have paid for a row of pearls—"

"She couldn't, in that atmosphere, ever properly have had one? Of course she couldn't. I've seen perfectly since our talk," Charlotte went on, "that that string of beads isn't even an imitation very good. The little clasp itself doesn't seem even gold. With false pearls, I suppose," the girl mused, "it naturally wouldn't be."

"The whole thing's rotten paste," her companion returned as if to have done with it. "If it were not, and she had kept it all these years hidden—"

"Yes?" Charlotte sounded as he paused.

"Why, I shouldn't know what to think!"

"Oh, I see." She had met him with a certain blankness, but adequately enough, it seemed, for him to regard the subject as dismissed; and there was no reversion to it between them before, on the morrow, when she had with difficulty made a place for them in her trunk, she carried off these flrid survivals.

At Bleet she found small occasion to revert to them and, in an air charged with such quite other references, even felt, after she had laid them away, much enshrouded, beneath various piles of clothing, that they formed a collection not wholly without its note of the ridiculous. Yet she was never, for the joke, tempted to show them to her pupils, though Gwendolen and Blanche in particular always wanted, on her return, to know what she had brought back; so that without an accident by which the case was quite changed they might have appeared to enter on a new phase of interment. The essence of the accident was the sudden illness, at the last moment, of Lady Bobby, whose advent had been so much counted on to spice the five days' feast laid out for the coming of age of the eldest son of the house; and its equally marked effect was the dispatch of a pressing message, in quite another direction, to Mrs. Guy, who, could she by a miracle be secured—she was always engaged ten parties deep—might be trusted to supply, it was believed, an element of exuberance scarcely less potent. Mrs. Guy was already known to several of the visitors already on the scene, but she wasn't yet known to our young lady, who found her, after many wires and counter-wires had at last determined the triumph of her arrival, a strange charming little red-haired black-dressed woman, a person with the face of a baby and the authority of a commodore. She took on the spot the discreet, the exceptional young governess into the confidence of her designs and, still more, of her doubts; intimating that it was a policy she almost always promptly pursued.

"Tomorrow and Thursday are all right," she said frankly to Charlotte on the second day, "but I'm not half-satisfied with Friday."

"What improvement then do you suggest?"

"Well, my strong point, you know, is tableaux vivants."

"Charming. And what is your favorite character?"

"Boss!" said Mrs. Guy with decision; and it was very markedly under that ensign that she had, within a few hours, completely planned her campaign and recruited her troop. Every word she uttered was to the point, but none more so than, after a general survey of their equipment, her final enquiry of Charlotte. She had been looking about, but half-appeased, at the muster of decoration and drapery. "We shall be dull. We shall want more color. You've nothing else?"

Charlotte had a thought. "No—I've some things."

"Then why don't you bring them?"

The girl weighed it. "Would you come to my room?"

"No," said Mrs. Guy—"bring them tonight to mine."

So Charlotte, at the evening's end, after candlesticks had flickered through brown old passages bedward, arrived at her friend's door with the burden of her aunt's relics. But she promptly expressed a fear. "Are they too garish?"

When she had poured them out on the sofa Mrs. Guy was but a minute, before the glass, in clapping on the diadem. "Awfully jolly—we can do Ivanhoe!"

"But they're only glass and tin."

"Larger than life they are, rather!—which is exactly what's wanted for tableaux. Our jewels, for historic scenes, don't tell—the real thing falls short. Rowena must have rubies as big as eggs. Leave them with me," Mrs. Guy continued—"they'll inspire me. Good-night."

The next morning she was in fact—yet very strangely—inspired. "Yes, I'll do Rowena. But I don't, my dear, understand."

"Understand what?"

Mrs. Guy gave a very lighted stare. "How you come to have such things."

Poor Charlotte smiled. "By inheritance."

"Family jewels?"

"They belonged to my aunt, who died some months ago. She was on the stage a few years in early life, and these are a part of her trappings."

"She left them to you?"

"No; my cousin, her stepson, who naturally has no use for them, gave them to me for remembrance of her. She was a dear kind thing, always so nice to me, and I was fond of her."

Mrs. Guy had listened with frank interest. "But it's he who must be a dear kind thing!"

Charlotte wondered. "You think so?"

"Is he," her friend went on, "also 'always so nice' to you?"

The girl, at this, face to face there with the brilliant visitor in the deserted breakfast-room, took a deeper sounding. "What is it?"

"Don't you know?"

Something came over her. "The pearls—?" But the question fainted on her lips.

"Doesn't he know?"

Charlotte found herself flushing. "They're not paste?"

"Haven't you looked at them?"

She was conscious of two kinds of embarrassment. "You have?"

"Very carefully."

"And they're real?"

Mrs. Guy became slightly mystifying and returned for an answer: "Come again, when you've done with the children, to my room."

Our young woman found she had done with the children that morning so promptly as to reveal to them a new joy, and when she reappeared before Mrs. Guy this lady had already encircled a plump white throat with the only ornament, surely, in all the late Mrs. Prime's—the effaced Miss Bradshaw's—collection, in the least qualified to raise a question. If Charlotte had never yet once, before the glass, tied the string of pearls about her own neck, this was because she had been capable of no such stoop to approved "imitation"; but she had now only to look at Mrs. Guy to see that, so disposed, the ambiguous objects might have passed for frank originals. "What in the world have you done to them?"

"Only handled them, understood them, admired them and put them on. That's what pearls want; they want to be worn—it wakes them up. They're alive, don't you see? How have these been treated? They must have been buried, ignored, despised. They were half-dead. Don't you know about pearls?" Mrs. Guy threw off as she fondly fingered the necklace.

"How should I? Do you?"

"Everything. These were simply asleep, and from the moment I really touched them—well," said their wearer lovingly, "it only took one's eye!"

"It took more than mine—though I did just wonder; and than Arthur's," Charlotte brooded. She found herself almost panting. "Then their value—?"

"Oh, their value's excellent."

The girl, for a deep contemplative moment, took another plunge into the wonder, the beauty and the mystery. "Are you sure?"

Her companion wheeled round for impatience. "Sure? For what kind of an idiot, my dear, do you take me?"

It was beyond Charlotte Prime to say. "For the same kind as Arthur—and as myself," she could only suggest. "But my cousin didn't know. He thinks they're worthless."

"Because of the rest of the lot? Then your cousin's an ass. But what—if, as I understood you, he gave them to you—has he to do with it?"

"Why, if he gave them to me as worthless and they turn out precious—!"

"You must give them back? I don't see that—if he was such a noodle. He took the risk."

Charlotte fed, in fancy, on the pearls, which decidedly were exquisite, but which at the present moment somehow presented themselves much more as Mrs. Guy's than either as Arthur's or as her own. "Yes—he did take it; even after I had distinctly hinted to him that they looked to me different from the other pieces."

"Well then!" said Mrs. Guy with something more than triumph—with a positive odd relief.

But it had the effect of making our young woman think with more intensity. "Ah, you see he thought they couldn't be different, because—so peculiarly—they shouldn't be."

"Shouldn't? I don't understand."

"Why, how would she have got them?"—so Charlotte candidly put it.

"She? Who?" There was a capacity in Mrs. Guy's tone for a sinking of persons—!

"Why, the person I told you of: his stepmother, my uncle's wife—among whose poor old things, extraordinarily thrust away and out of sight, he happened to find them."

Mrs. Guy came a step nearer to the effaced Miss Bradshaw. "Do you mean she may have stolen them?"

"No. But she had been an actress."

"Oh, well then," cried Mrs. Guy, "wouldn't that be just how?"

"Yes, except that she wasn't at all a brilliant one, nor in receipt of large pay." The girl even threw off a nervous joke. "I'm afraid she couldn't have been our Rowena."

Mrs. Guy took it up. "Was she very ugly?"

"No. She may very well, when young, have looked rather nice."

"Well then!" was Mrs. Guy's sharp comment and fresh triumph.

"You mean it was a present? That's just what he so dislikes the idea of her having received—a present from an admirer capable of going such lengths."

"Because she wouldn't have taken it for nothing? Speriamo—that she wasn't a brute. The 'length' her admirer went was the length of a whole row. Let us hope she was just a little kind!"

"Well," Charlotte went on, "that she was 'kind' might seem to be shown by the fact that neither her husband, nor his son, nor I, his niece, knew or dreamed of her possessing anything so precious; by her having kept the gift all the rest of her life beyond discovery—out of sight and protected from suspicion."

"As if, you mean"—Mrs. Guy was quick—"she had been wedded to it and yet was ashamed of it? Fancy," she laughed while she manipulated the rare beads, "being ashamed of these!"

"But you see she had married a clergyman."

"Yes, she must have been 'rum.' But at any rate he had married her. What did he suppose?"

"Why, that she had never been of the sort by whom such offerings are encouraged."

"Ah, my dear, the sort by whom they're not—!" But Mrs. Guy caught herself up. "And her stepson thought the same?"

"Overwhelmingly."

"Was he then, if only her stepson—"

"So fond of her as that comes to? Yes; he had never known, consciously, his real mother, and, without children of her own, she was very patient and nice with him. And I liked her so," the girl pursued, "that at the end of ten years, in so strange a manner, to 'give her away'—"

"Is impossible to you? Then don't!" said Mrs. Guy with decision.

"Ah, but if they're real I can't keep them!" Charlotte, with her eyes on them, moaned in her impatience. "It's too difficult."

"Where's the difficulty, if he has such sentiments that he'd rather sacrifice the necklace than admit it, with the presumption it carries with it, to be genuine? You've only to be silent."

"And keep it? How can I ever wear it?"

"You'd have to hide it, like your aunt?" Mrs. Guy was amused. "You can easily sell it."

Her companion walked round her for a look at the affair from behind. The clasp was certainly, doubtless intentionally, misleading, but everything else was indeed lovely. "Well, I must think. Why didn't she sell them?" Charlotte broke out in her trouble.

Mrs. Guy had an instant answer. "Doesn't that prove what they secretly recalled to her? You've only to be silent!" she ardently repeated.

"I must think—I must think!"

Mrs. Guy stood with her hands attached but motionless. "Then you want them back?"

As if with the dread of touching them Charlotte retreated to the door. "I'll tell you tonight."

"But may I wear them?"

"Meanwhile?"

"This evening—at dinner."

It was the sharp selfish pressure of this that really, on the spot, determined the girl; but for the moment, before closing the door on the question, she only said: "As you like!"

They were busy much of the day with preparation and rehearsal, and at dinner that evening the concourse of guests was such that a place among them for Miss Prime failed to find itself marked. At the time the company rose she was therefore alone in the school-room, where, towards eleven o'clock, she received a visit from Mrs. Guy. This lady's white shoulders heaved, under the pearls, with an emotion that the very red lips which formed, as if for the full effect, the happiest opposition of color, were not slow to translate. "My dear, you should have seen the sensation—they've had a success!"

Charlotte, dumb a moment, took it all in. "It is as if they knew it—they're more and more alive. But so much the worse for both of us! I can't," she brought out with an effort, "be silent."

"You mean to return them?"

"If I don't I'm a thief."

Mrs. Guy gave her a long hard look: what was decidedly not of the baby in Mrs. Guy's face was a certain air of established habit in the eyes. Then, with a sharp little jerk of her head and a backward reach of her bare beautiful arms, she undid the clasp and, taking off the necklace, laid it on the table. "If you do you're a goose."

"Well, of the two—!" said our young lady, gathering it up with a sigh. And as if to get it, for the pang it gave, out of sight as soon as possible, she shut it up, clicking the lock, in the drawer of her own little table; after which, when she turned again, her companion looked naked and plain without it. "But what will you say?" it then occurred to her to demand.

"Downstairs—to explain?" Mrs. Guy was after all trying at least to keep her temper. "Oh, I'll put on something else and say the clasp's broken. And you won't of course name me to him," she added.

"As having undeceived me? No—I'll say that, looking at the thing more carefully, it's my own private idea."

"And does he know how little you really know?"

"As an expert—surely. And he has always much the conceit of his own opinion."

"Then he won't believe you—as he so hates to. He'll stick to his judgment and maintain his gift, and we shall have the darlings back!" With which reviving assurance Mrs. Guy kissed her young friend for good-night.

She was not, however, to be gratified or justified by any prompt event, for, whether or no paste entered into the composition of the ornament in question, Charlotte shrank from the temerity of dispatching it to town by post. Mrs. Guy was thus disappointed of the hope of seeing the business settled—"by return," she had seemed to expect—before the end of the revels. The revels, moreover, rising to a frantic pitch, pressed for all her attention, and it was at last only in the general confusion of leave-taking that she made, parenthetically, a dash at the person in the whole company with whom her contact had been most interesting.

"Come, what will you take for them?"

"The pearls? Ah, you'll have to treat with my cousin."

Mrs. Guy, with quick intensity, lent herself. "Where then does he live?"

"In chambers in the Temple. You can find him."

"But what's the use, if you do neither one thing nor the other?"

"Oh, I shall do the 'other,'" Charlotte said: "I'm only waiting till I go up. You want them so awfully?" She curiously, solemnly again, sounded her.

"I'm dying for them. There's a special charm in them—I don't know what it is: they tell so their history."

"But what do you know of that?"

"Just what they themselves say. It's all in them—and it comes out. They breathe a tenderness—they have the white glow of it. My dear," hissed Mrs. Guy in supreme confidence and as she buttoned her glove—"they're things of love!"

"Oh!" our young woman vaguely exclaimed.

"They're things of passion!"

"Mercy!" she gasped, turning short off. But ³⁰ these words remained, though indeed their help was scarce needed, Charlotte being in private face to face with a new light, as she by this time felt she must call it, on the dear kind colorless lady whose career had turned so sharp a corner in the middle. The pearls had quite taken their place as a revelation. She might have received them for nothing—admit that; but she couldn't have kept them so long and so unprofitably hidden, couldn't have enjoyed them only in secret, for nothing; and ⁴⁰ she had mixed them in her reliquary with false things in order to put curiosity and detection off the scent. Over this strange fact poor Charlotte interminably mused: it became more touching, more attaching for her than she could now confide to any ear. How bad or how happy—in the sophisticated sense of Mrs. Guy and the young man at the Temple—the effaced Miss Bradshaw must have been to have had to be so mute! The little governess at Bleet put on the necklace now in secret sessions; she wore it sometimes under her dress; she came to feel verily a haunting passion for it. Yet in her penniless state she would have parted with it for money; she gave herself also to dreams of what in this direction it would do for her. The sophistry of her so often saying to herself that Arthur had after all definitely pronounced her welcome to any gain from this gift that might accrue—this trick remained innocent, as she perfectly knew it for what it was. Then there was always the possibility of his—as she could only picture it—rising to the occasion.

¹⁰ Mightn't he have a grand magnanimous moment?—mightn't he just say, "Oh, I couldn't of course have afforded to let you have it if I had known; but since you have got it, and have made out the truth by your own wit, I really can't screw myself down to the shabbiness of taking it back"?

She had, as it proved, to wait a long time—to wait till, at the end of several months, the great house of Bleet had, with due deliberation, for the season, transferred itself to town; after which, however, she fairly snatched at her first freedom to knock, dressed in her best and armed with her disclosure, at the door of her doubting kinsman. It was still with doubt and not quite with the face she had hoped that he listened to her story. He had turned pale, she thought, as she produced the necklace, and he appeared above all disagreeably affected. Well, perhaps there was reason, she more than ever remembered; but what on earth was one, in close touch with the fact, to do? She had laid the pearls on his table, where, without his having at first put so much as a finger to them, they met his hard cold stare.

"I don't believe in them," he simply said at last.

"That's exactly then," she returned with some spirit, "what I wanted to hear!"

She fancied that at this his color changed; it was indeed vivid to her afterwards—for she was to have a long recall of the scene—that she had made him quite angrily flush. "It's a beastly unpleasant imputation, you know!"—and he walked away from her as he had always walked at the vicarage.

"It's none of my making, I'm sure," said Charlotte Prime. "If you're afraid to believe they're real—"

"Well?"—and he turned, across the room, sharp round at her.

"Why, it's not my fault."

He said nothing more, for a moment, on this; he only came back to the table. "They're what I originally said they were. They're rotten paste."

"Then I may keep them?"

"No. I want a better opinion."

"Than your own?"

"Than your own." He dropped on the pearls another queer stare; then, after a moment, bringing himself to touch them, did exactly what she had herself done in the presence of Mrs. Guy at Bleet—gathered them together, marched off with them to a drawer, put them in and clicked the key. "You say I'm afraid," he went on as he again met her; "but I shan't be afraid to take them to Bond Street."

"And if the people say they're real—?"

He had a pause and then his strangest manner. "They won't say it! They shan't!"

There was something in the way he brought it out that deprived poor Charlotte, as she was perfectly aware, of any manner at all. "Oh!" she simply sounded, as she had sounded for her last word to Mrs. Guy; and within a minute, without more conversation, she had taken her departure.

A fortnight later she received a communication from him, and toward the end of the season one of the entertainments in Eaton Square was graced by the presence of Mrs. Guy. Charlotte was not at dinner, but came down afterwards, and this guest, on seeing her, abandoned a very beautiful young man on purpose to cross and speak to her. The guest displayed a lovely necklace and had apparently not lost her habit of overflowing with the pride of such ornaments.

"Do you see?" She was in high joy.

They were indeed splendid pearls—so far as poor Charlotte could feel she knew, after what had come and gone, about such mysteries. The poor girl had a sickly smile. "They're almost as fine as Arthur's."

"Almost? Where, my dear, are your eyes? They are 'Arthur's'!" After which, to meet the flood of crimson that accompanied her young friend's start: "I tracked them—after your folly, and, by miraculous luck, recognized them in the Bond Street window to which he had disposed of them."

10 "Disposed of them?" Charlotte gasped. "He wrote me that I had insulted his mother and that the people had shown him he was right—had pronounced them utter paste."

Mrs. Guy gave a stare. "Ah, I told you he wouldn't bear it! No. But I had, I assure you," she wound up, "to drive my bargain!"

Charlotte scarce heard or saw; she was full of her private wrong. "He wrote me," she panted, "that he had smashed them."

20 Mrs. Guy could only wonder and pity. "He's really morbid!" But it wasn't quite clear which of the pair she pitied; though the young person employed in Eaton Square felt really morbid too after they had separated and she found herself full of thought. She even went the length of asking herself what sort of a bargain Mrs. Guy had driven and whether the marvel of the recognition in Bond Street had been a veracious account of the matter. Hadn't she perhaps in truth dealt with Arthur directly? It came back to Charlotte almost luridly that she had had his address.

THE NEW ENGLISH DRAMA

In our earlier discussions of English drama we showed how the great dramatic achievement of Shakespeare and his contemporaries gave way to a rapid decline and how, with the closing of the theaters in 1642, the writing of plays came to a temporary end.

With the restoration of Charles II in 1660 the theaters were reopened. The king and his court returned from their long sojourn in France and brought many innovations to the stage. They opened up elaborate theaters and introduced women actors for the first time. A new generation of playwrights began to write. In catering to a corrupt court they wrote plays that were frequently clever and usually highly immoral. These "Comedies of Manners" held the stage for some forty years until the beginning of the eighteenth century. During this Restoration Period there also appeared a series of heroic tragedies with highly exaggerated situations and characters. From these two types of seventeenth century drama, only two plays seem to have permanent vitality, Dryden's handling of the story of Antony and Cleopatra in his All for Love and Congreve's great comedy of manners, The Way of the World.

From the appearance of this latter play in the year 1700 until about 1890 British and American drama is an entirely unworthy successor of the great work of Shakespeare and his fellow dramatists. This desert of mediocrity is only broken by an occasional oasis. We still produce and applaud John Gay's The Beggar's Opera from the early eighteenth, and Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer and Sheridan's The Rivals and The School for Scandal from the later eighteenth century. Some of the great poets of the nineteenth century wrote in dramatic form, but their plays were not meant for the theater. During much of the nineteenth century both English and American theaters were filled with adaptations from the French, Shakespearean revivals, or the cheapest melodrama. The brilliant comic operas of Gilbert and Sullivan, with their clever satire, serve to lighten the melancholy picture of dramatic ineffectiveness.

Such was the condition of the drama in the English-speaking world when, about 1890, the plays of Henrik Ibsen began to exert their influence on the London stage. In our discussion of Ibsen (pp. 810 ff., above) we have seen how he revolutionized the whole of European drama, not only in its technique but also in its subject matter. The stage became a place for conversation, rather than declamation, and serious questions of social and personal ethics were discussed on it.

The first product of the "theater of ideas" in England was Sir Arthur W. Pinero's The Second Mrs. Tanqueray. This play has perhaps been overpraised, but there is no doubt that it inaugurated a new era in British and American drama. Aside from a very important series of plays by Pinero himself, the theaters were soon filled with first-rate dramas by George Bernard Shaw, Henry Arthur Jones, and Oscar Wilde. If it were the purpose of this volume to go beyond the nineteenth century, we should have to record the very notable series of plays written for the Irish players, as well as the works of such men as Stephen Phillips, Granville Barker, John Galsworthy, Sir James M. Barrie, and, in America, Eugene O'Neill.

OSCAR WILDE

The Importance of Being Earnest

CHARACTERS

JOHN WORTHING, J.P.
ALGERNON MONCRIEFF
REV. CANON CHASUBLE, D.D.
MERRIMAN (Butler)
LANE (Manservant)
LADY BRACKNELL
HON. GWENDOLEN FAIRFAX
CECILY CARDEW
MISS PRISM (Governess)

THE SCENES OF THE PLAY

- ACT I. Algernon Moncrieff's Flat in Half-Moon Street, W.
ACT II. The Garden at the Manor House, Woolton.
ACT III. Drawing-room of the Manor House, Woolton.

Time—The Present.
Place—London.

ACT I

SCENE:—Morning-room in Algernon's flat in Half-Moon Street. The room is luxuriously and artistically furnished. The sound of a piano is heard in the adjoining room.

LANE is arranging afternoon tea on the table, and after the music has ceased, ALGERNON enters.

ALGER. Did you hear what I was playing, Lane?

LANE. I didn't think it polite to listen, sir.

ALGER. I'm sorry for that, for your sake. I don't play accurately—anyone can play accurately—but I play with wonderful expression. As far as the piano is concerned, sentiment is my forte. I keep science for Life.

LANE. Yes, sir.

ALGER. And, speaking of the science of Life, have you got the cucumber sandwiches cut for Lady Bracknell?

LANE. Yes, sir. [Hands them on a salver.]

ALGER. [Inspects them, takes two, and sits down on the sofa]. Oh! . . . by the way, Lane, I see from your book that on Thursday night, when Lord Shoreman and Mr. Worthing were dining with me, eight bottles of champagne are entered as having been consumed.

LANE. Yes, sir; eight bottles and a pint.

ALGER. Why is it that at a bachelor's establishment the servants invariably drink the champagne? I ask merely for information.

LANE. I attribute it to the superior quality of the wine, sir. I have often observed that in married households the champagne is rarely of a first-rate brand.

ALGER. Good heavens! Is marriage so demoralizing as that?

LANE. I believe it is a very pleasant state, sir. I have had very little experience of it myself up to the present. I have only been married once. That was in consequence of a misunderstanding between myself and a young person.

Wilde, The Importance of Being Earnest. Oscar Wilde (1856-1900) was born in Dublin. He was leader of the "Æsthetic" movement of the 1890's.

ALGER. [languidly]. I don't know that I am much interested in your family life, Lane.

LANE. No, sir; it is not a very interesting subject. I never think of it myself.

ALGER. Very natural, I am sure. That will do, Lane, thank you.

LANE. Thank you, sir. [LANE goes out.]

ALGER. Lane's views on marriage seem somewhat lax. Really, if the lower orders don't set us a good example, what on earth is the use of them? They seem, as a class, to have absolutely no sense of moral responsibility.

Enter LANE.

LANE. Mr. Ernest Worthing.

Enter JACK. LANE goes out.

ALGER. How are you, my dear Ernest? What brings you up to town?

JACK. Oh, pleasure, pleasure! What else should bring one anywhere? Eating as usual, I see, Algy!

ALGER. [stiffly]. I believe it is customary in good society to take some slight refreshment at five o'clock. Where have you been since last Thursday?

JACK [sitting down on the sofa]. In the country.

ALGER. What on earth do you do there?

JACK [pulling off his gloves]. When one is in town one amuses oneself. When one is in the country one amuses other people. It is excessively boring.

ALGER. And who are the people you amuse?

JACK [airily]. Oh, neighbors, neighbors.

ALGER. Got nice neighbors in your part of Shropshire?

JACK. Perfectly horrid! Never speak to one of them.

ALGER. How immensely you must amuse them! [Goes over and takes sandwich.] By the way, Shropshire is your county, is it not?

JACK. Eh? Shropshire? Yes, of course. Hallo! Why all these cups? Why cucumber sandwiches? Why such reckless extravagance in one so young? Who is coming to tea?

ALGER. Oh! merely Aunt Augusta and Gwendolen.

JACK. How perfectly delightful!

ALGER. Yes, that is all very well; but I am afraid Aunt Augusta won't quite approve of your being here.

JACK. May I ask why?

ALGER. My dear fellow, the way you flirt with Gwendolen is perfectly disgraceful. It is almost as bad as the way Gwendolen flirts with you.

JACK. I am in love with Gwendolen. I have come up to town expressly to propose to her.

ALGER. I thought you had come up for pleasure? . . . I call that business.

JACK. How utterly unromantic you are!

ALGER. I really don't see anything romantic in proposing. It is very romantic to be in love. But there is nothing romantic about a definite proposal. Why, one may be accepted. One usually is, I believe. Then the excitement is all over. The very essence of romance is uncertainty. If ever I get married, I'll certainly try to forget the fact.

JACK. I have no doubt about that, dear Algy. The Divorce Court was specially invented for people whose memories are so curiously constituted.

ALGER. Oh! there is no use speculating on that subject. Divorces are made in Heaven— [JACK puts out his hand to take a sandwich. ALGERNON at once interferes.] Please don't touch the cucumber sandwiches. They are ordered specially for Aunt Augusta. [Takes one and eats it.]

JACK. Well, you have been eating them all the time.

ALGER. That is quite a different matter. She is my aunt. [Takes plate from below.] Have some bread and butter. The bread and butter is for Gwendolen. Gwendolen is devoted to bread and butter.

JACK [advancing to table and helping himself]. And very good bread and butter it is, too.

ALGER. Well, my dear fellow, you need not eat as if you were going to eat it all. You behave as if you were married to her already. You are not married to her already, and I don't think you ever will be.

JACK. Why on earth do you say that?

ALGER. Well, in the first place girls never marry the men they flirt with. Girls don't think it right.

JACK. Oh, that is nonsense!

ALGER. It isn't. It is a great truth. It accounts for the extraordinary number of bachelors that one sees all over the place. In the second place, I don't give my consent.

JACK. Your consent!

ALGER. My dear fellow, Gwendolen is my first cousin. And before I allow you to marry her, you will have to clear up the whole question of Cecily. [Rings bell.]

JACK. Cecily! What on earth do you mean? What do you mean, Algy, by Cecily? I don't know anyone of the name of Cecily.

Enter LANE.

ALGER. Bring me that cigarette case Mr. Worthing left in the smoking-room the last time he dined here.

LANE. Yes, sir.

[LANE goes out.]

JACK. Do you mean to say you have had my cigarette case all this time? I wish to goodness you had let me know. I have been writing frantic letters to Scotland Yard about it. I was very nearly offering a large reward.

ALGER. Well, I wish you would offer one. I happen to be more than usually hard up.

JACK. There is no good offering a large reward now that the thing is found.

Enter LANE with the cigarette case on a salver.

ALGERNON takes it at once. LANE goes out.

ALGER. I think that is rather mean of you, Ernest, I must say. [Opens case and examines it.] However, it makes no matter, for, now that I look at the inscription, I find that the thing isn't yours after all.

JACK. Of course it's mine. [Moving to him.] You have seen me with it a hundred times, and you have no right whatsoever to read what is written inside. It is a very ungentlemanly thing to read a private cigarette case.

ALGER. Oh! it is absurd to have a hard-and-fast rule about what one should read and what one shouldn't. More than half of modern culture depends on what one shouldn't read.

JACK. I am quite aware of the fact, and I don't propose to discuss modern culture. It isn't the sort of thing one should talk of in private. I simply want my cigarette case back.

ALGER. Yes; but this isn't your cigarette case. This cigarette case is a present from someone of the name of Cecily, and you said you didn't know anyone by that name.

JACK. Well, if you want to know, Cecily happens to be my aunt.

ALGER. Your aunt!

JACK. Yes. Charming old lady she is, too. Lives at Tunbridge Wells. Just give it back to me, Algy.

ALGER. [retreating to back of sofa]. But why does she call herself little Cecily if she is your aunt and lives at Tunbridge Wells? [Reading.] "From little Cecily with her fondest love."

JACK [moving to sofa and kneeling upon it]. My dear fellow, what on earth is there in that? Some aunts are tall, some aunts are not tall. That is a matter that surely an aunt may be allowed to decide for herself. You seem to think that every aunt should be exactly like your aunt! That is absurd! For heaven's sake give me back my cigarette case. [Follows ALGY round the room.]

ALGER. Yes. But why does your aunt call you her uncle? "From little Cecily, with her fondest love to her dear Uncle Jack." There is no objection, I admit, to an aunt being a small aunt, but why an aunt, no matter what her size may be, should call her own nephew her uncle, I can't quite make out. Besides, your name isn't Jack at all; it is Ernest.

JACK. It isn't Ernest; it's Jack.

ALGER. You have always told me it was Ernest. I have introduced you to everyone as Ernest. You answer to the name of Ernest. You look as if your name was Ernest. You are the most earnest-looking person I ever saw in my life. It is perfectly absurd your saying that your name isn't Ernest. It's on your cards. Here is one of them. [Taking it from case.] "Mr. Ernest Worthing, B. 4, The Albany." I'll keep this as a proof your name is Ernest if ever you attempt to deny it to me, or to Gwendolen, or to anyone else. [Puts the card in his pocket.]

JACK. Well, my name is Ernest in town and Jack in the country, and the cigarette case was given to me in the country.

ALGER. Yes, but that does not account for the fact that your small Aunt Cecily, who lives at Tunbridge Wells, calls you her dear uncle. Come, old boy, you had much better have the thing out at once.

JACK. My dear Algy, you talk exactly as if you were a dentist. It is very vulgar to talk like a dentist when one isn't a dentist. It produces a false impression.

ALGER. Well, that is exactly what dentists always do. Now, go on! Tell me the whole thing. I may mention that I have always suspected you of being a confirmed and secret Bunburyist; and I am quite sure of it now.

JACK. Bunburyist? What on earth do you mean by a Bunburyist?

ALGER. I'll reveal to you the meaning of that incomparable expression as soon as you are kind enough to inform me why you are Ernest in town and Jack in the country.

JACK. Well, produce my cigarette case first.

ALGER. Here it is. [Hands cigarette case.] Now produce your explanation, and pray make it improbable. [Sits on sofa.]

JACK. My dear fellow, there is nothing improbable about my explanation at all. In fact it's perfectly ordinary. Old Mr. Thomas Cardew, who adopted me when I was a boy, made me in his will guardian to his grand-daughter, Miss Cecily Cardew. Cecily, who addresses me as her uncle from motives of respect that you could not possibly appreciate, lives at my place in the country under the charge of her admirable governess, Miss Prism.

ALGER. Where is that place in the country, by the way?

JACK. That is nothing to you, dear boy. You are not going to be invited. . . . I may tell you candidly that the place is not in Shropshire.

ALGER. I suspected that, my dear fellow! I have Bunburied all over Shropshire on two separate occasions. Now, go on. Why are you Ernest in town and Jack in the country?

JACK. My dear Algy, I don't know whether you will be able to understand my real motives. You are hardly serious enough. When one is placed in the position of guardian, one has to adopt a very high moral tone on all subjects. It's one's duty to do so. And as a high moral tone can hardly be said to conduce very much to either one's health or one's happiness, in order to get up to town I have always pretended to have a younger brother of the name of Ernest, who lives in the Albany, and gets into the most dreadful scrapes. That, my dear Algy, is the whole truth pure and simple.

ALGER. The truth is rarely pure and never simple. Modern life would be very tedious if it were either, and modern literature a complete impossibility!

JACK. That wouldn't be at all a bad thing.

ALGER. Literary criticism is not your forte, my dear fellow. Don't try it. You should leave that to people who haven't been at a University. They do it so well in the daily papers. What you really are is a Bunburyist. I was quite right in saying you were a Bunburyist. You are one of the most advanced Bunburyists I know.

JACK. What on earth do you mean?

ALGER. You have invented a very useful young brother called Ernest, in order that you may be able to come up to town as often as you like. I have invented an invaluable permanent invalid called Bunbury, in order that I may be able to go down into the country whenever I choose. Bunbury is perfectly invaluable. If it wasn't for Bunbury's extraordinary bad health, for instance, I wouldn't be able to dine with you at Willis's tonight, for I have been really engaged to Aunt Augusta for more than a week.

JACK. I haven't asked you to dine with me anywhere tonight.

ALGER. I know. You are absurdly careless about sending out invitations. It is very foolish of you. Nothing annoys people so much as not receiving invitations.

JACK. You had much better dine with your Aunt Augusta.

ALGER. I haven't the smallest intention of doing anything of the kind. To begin with, I dined there on Monday, and once a week is quite enough to dine with one's own relations. In the second place, whenever I do dine there I am always treated as a member of the family, and sent down with either no woman at all, or two. In the third place, I know perfectly well whom she will place me next to, tonight. She will place me next Mary Farquhar, who always flirts with her own husband across the dinner-table. That is not very pleasant. Indeed, it is not even decent . . . and that sort of thing is enormously on the increase. The amount of women in London who flirt with their own husbands is perfectly scandalous. It looks so bad. It is simply washing one's clean linen in public. Besides, now that I know you to be a confirmed Bunburyist, I naturally want to talk to you about Bunburying. I want to tell you the rules.

JACK. I'm not a Bunburyist at all. If Gwendolen accepts me, I am going to kill my brother, indeed I think I'll kill him in any case. Cecily is a little too much interested in him. It is rather a bore. So I am going to get rid of Ernest. And I strongly advise you to do the same with Mr. . . . with your invalid friend who has the absurd name.

ALGER. Nothing will induce me to part with Bunbury, and if you ever get married, which seems to me extremely problematic, you will be very glad to know Bunbury. A man who marries without knowing Bunbury has a very tedious time of it.

JACK. That is nonsense. If I marry a charming girl like Gwendolen, and she is the only girl I ever saw in my life that I would marry, I certainly won't want to know Bunbury.

ALGER. Then your wife will. You don't seem to realize, that in married life three is company and two is none.

JACK [sententiously]. That, my dear young friend, is the theory that the corrupt French Drama has been propounding for the last fifty years.

ALGER. Yes; and that the happy English home has proved in half the time.

JACK. For heaven's sake, don't try to be cynical. It's perfectly easy to be cynical.

ALGER. My dear fellow, it isn't easy to be anything now-a-days. There's such a lot of beastly competition about. [The sound of an electric bell is heard.] Ah! that must be Aunt Augusta. Only relatives, or creditors, ever ring in that Wagnerian manner. Now, if I get her out of the way for ten minutes, so that you can have an opportunity for proposing to Gwendolen, may I dine with you tonight at Willis's?

JACK. I suppose so, if you want to.

ALGER. Yes, but you must be serious about it. I hate people who are not serious about meals. It is so shallow of them.

Enter LANE.

LANE. Lady Bracknell and Miss Fairfax. [ALGERNON goes forward to meet them. Enter LADY BRACKNELL and GWENDOLEN.]

LADY B. Good afternoon, dear Algernon, I hope you are behaving very well.

ALGER. I'm feeling very well, Aunt Augusta.

LADY B. That's not quite the same thing. In fact the two things rarely go together. [Sees JACK and bows to him with icy coldness.]

ALGER. [to GWENDOLEN]. Dear me, you are smart!

GWEND. I am always smart! Aren't I, Mr. Worthing?

JACK. You're quite perfect, Miss Fairfax.

GWEND. Oh! I hope I am not that. It would leave no room for developments and I intend to develop in many directions. [GWENDOLEN and JACK sit down together in the corner.]

LADY B. I'm sorry if we are a little late, Algernon, but I was obliged to call on dear Lady Harbury. I hadn't been there since her poor husband's death. I never saw a woman so altered; she looks quite twenty years younger. And now I'll have a cup of tea, and one of those nice cucumber sandwiches you promised me.

ALGER. Certainly, Aunt Augusta. [Goes over to tea-table.]

LADY B. Won't you come and sit here, Gwendolen?

GWEND. Thanks, mamma, I'm quite comfortable where I am.

ALGER. [picking up empty plate in horror]. Good heavens! Lane! Why are there no cucumber sandwiches? I ordered them specially.

LANE [gravely]. There were no cucumbers in the market this morning, sir. I went down twice.

ALGER. No cucumbers!

LANE. No, sir. Not even for ready money.

ALGER. That will do, Lane, thank you.

LANE. Thank you, sir.

[Goes out.]

ALGER. I am greatly distressed, Aunt Augusta, about there being no cucumbers, not even for ready money.

LADY B. It really makes no matter, Algernon. I had some crumpets with Lady Harbury, who seems to me to be living entirely for pleasure now.

ALGER. I hear her hair has turned quite gold from grief.

LADY B. It certainly has changed its color. From what cause I, of course, cannot say. [ALGERNON crosses and hands tea.] Thank you. I've quite a treat for you tonight, Algernon. I am going to send you down with Mary Farquhar. She is such a nice woman, and so attentive to her husband. It's delightful to watch them.

ALGER. I am afraid, Aunt Augusta, I shall have to give up the pleasure of dining with you tonight after all.

LADY B. [frowning]. I hope not, Algernon. It would put my table completely out. Your uncle would have to dine upstairs. Fortunately he is accustomed to that.

ALGER. It is a great bore, and, I need hardly say, a terrible disappointment to me, but the fact is I have just had a telegram to say that my poor friend Bunbury is very ill again. [Exchanges glances with JACK.] They seem to think I should be with him.

LADY B. It is very strange. This Mr. Bunbury seems to suffer from curiously bad health.

ALGER. Yes; poor Bunbury is a dreadful invalid.

LADY B. Well, I must say, Algernon, that I think it is high time that Mr. Bunbury made up his mind whether he was going to live or to die. This shilly-shallying with the question is absurd. Nor do I in any way approve of the modern sympathy with invalids. I consider it morbid. Illness of any kind is hardly a thing to be encouraged in others. Health is the primary duty of life. I am always telling that to your poor uncle, but he never seems to take much notice . . . as far as any improvement in his ailments goes. I should be obliged if you would ask Mr. Bunbury, from me, to be kind enough not to have a relapse on Saturday, for I rely on you to arrange my music for me. It is my last reception, and one wants something that will encourage conversation, particularly at the end of the season when everyone has practically said whatever they had to say, which, in most cases, was probably not much.

ALGER. I'll speak to Bunbury, Aunt Augusta, if he is still conscious, and I think I can promise you he'll be all right by Saturday. Of course, the music is a great difficulty. You see, if one plays good music, people don't listen, and if one plays bad music, people don't talk. But I'll run over the program I've drawn out, if you will kindly come into the next room for a moment.

LADY B. Thank you, Algernon. It is very thoughtful of you. [Rising, and following ALGERNON.] I'm sure the program will be delightful, after a few expurgations. French songs I cannot possibly allow. People always seem to think that they are improper, and either look shocked, which is vulgar, or laugh, which is worse. But German sounds a thoroughly respectable language, and indeed, I believe is so. Gwendolen, you will accompany me.

GWEND. Certainly, mamma. [LADY BRACKNELL and ALGERNON go into the music-room, GWENDOLEN remains behind.]

JACK. Charming day it has been, Miss Fairfax.

GWEND. Pray don't talk to me about the weather, Mr. Worthing. Whenever people talk to me about the weather, I always feel quite certain that they mean something else. And that makes me so nervous.

JACK. I do mean something else.

GWEND. I thought so. In fact, I am never wrong.

JACK. And I would like to be allowed to take advantage of Lady Bracknell's temporary absence. . . .

GWEND. I would certainly advise you to do so. Mamma has a way of coming back suddenly into a room that I have often had to speak to her about.

JACK [nervously]. Miss Fairfax, ever since I met you I have admired you more than any girl . . . I have ever met since . . . I met you.

GWEND. Yes, I am quite aware of the fact. And I often wish that in public, at any rate, you had been more demonstrative. For me you have always had an irresistible fascination. Even before I met you I was far from indifferent to you. [JACK looks at her in amazement.] We live, as I hope you know, Mr. Worthing, in an age of ideals. The fact is constantly mentioned in the more expensive monthly magazines, and has reached the provincial pulpits I am told; and my ideal has always been to love someone of the name of Ernest. There is something in that name that inspires absolute confidence. The moment Algernon first mentioned to me that he had a friend called Ernest, I knew I was destined to love you.

JACK. You really love me, Gwendolen?

GWEND. Passionately!

JACK. Darling! You don't know how happy you've made me.

GWEND. My own Ernest!

JACK. But you don't really mean to say that you couldn't love me if my name wasn't Ernest?

GWEND. But your name is Ernest.

JACK. Yes, I know it is. But supposing it was something else? Do you mean to say you couldn't love me, then?

GWEND. [glibly]. Ah! that is clearly a metaphysical speculation, and like most metaphysical speculations has very little reference at all to the actual facts of real life, as we know them.

JACK. Personally, darling, to speak quite candidly, I don't much care about the name of Ernest . . . I don't think the name suits me at all.

GWEND. It suits you perfectly. It is a divine name. It has a music of its own. It produces vibrations.

JACK. Well, really, Gwendolen, I must say that I think there are lots of other much nicer names. I think Jack, for instance, a charming name.

GWEND. Jack? . . . No, there is very little music in the name Jack, if any at all, indeed. It does not thrill. It produces absolutely no vibrations . . . I have known several Jacks, and they all, without exception, were more than usually plain. Besides, Jack is a notorious domesticity for John! And I pity any woman who is married to a man called John. She would probably never be allowed to know the entrancing pleasure of a single moment's solitude. The only really safe name is Ernest.

JACK. Gwendolen, I must get christened at once—30 I mean we must get married at once. There is no time to be lost.

GWEND. Married, Mr. Worthing?

JACK [astounded]. Well . . . surely. You know that I love you, and you led me to believe, Miss Fairfax, that you were not absolutely indifferent to me.

GWEND. I adore you. But you haven't proposed to me yet. Nothing has been said at all about marriage. The subject has not even been touched 40 on.

JACK. Well . . . may I propose to you now?

GWEND. I think it would be an admirable opportunity. And to spare you any possible disappointment, Mr. Worthing, I think it only fair to tell you quite frankly beforehand that I am fully determined to accept you.

JACK. Gwendolen!

GWEND. Yes, Mr. Worthing, what have you got to say to me?

50 JACK. You know what I have got to say to you.

GWEND. Yes, but you don't say it.

JACK. Gwendolen, will you marry me? [Goes down on his knees.]

GWEND. Of course, I will, darling. How long you have been about it! I am afraid you have had very little experience in how to propose.

JACK. My own one, I have never loved anyone in the world but you.

GWEND. Yes, but men often propose for practice. I know my brother Gerald does. All my girl-friends tell me so. What wonderfully blue eyes you have, Ernest! They are quite, quite, blue. I hope you will always look at me just like that, especially ¹⁰ when there are other people present.

Enter LADY BRACKNELL.

LADY B. Mr. Worthing! Rise, sir, from this semi-recumbent posture. It is most indecorous.

GWEND. Mamma! [He tries to rise; she restrains him.] I must beg you to retire. This is no place for you. Besides, Mr. Worthing has not quite finished yet.

LADY B. Finished what, may I ask?

GWEND. I am engaged to Mr. Worthing, mamma. [They rise together.]

LADY B. Pardon me, you are not engaged to anyone. When you do become engaged to someone, I, or your father, should his health permit him, will inform you of the fact. An engagement should come on a young girl as a surprise, pleasant or unpleasant, as the case may be. It is hardly a matter that she could be allowed to arrange for herself. . . . And now I have a few questions to put to ³⁰ you, Mr. Worthing. While I am making these inquiries, you, Gwendolen, will wait for me below in the carriage.

GWEND. [reproachfully]. Mamma!

LADY B. In the carriage, Gwendolen! [GWENDOLEN goes to the door. She and JACK blow kisses to each other behind Lady Bracknell's back. LADY BRACKNELL looks vaguely about as if she could not understand what the noise was. Finally turns round.] Gwendolen, the carriage!

GWEND. Yes, mamma. [Goes out, looking back at JACK.]

LADY B. [sitting down]. You can take a seat, Mr. Worthing. [Looks in her pocket for note-book and pencil.]

JACK. Thank you, Lady Bracknell, I prefer standing.

LADY B. [pencil and note-book in hand]. I feel bound to tell you that you are not down on my list of eligible young men, although I have the ⁵⁰ same list as the dear Duchess of Bolton has. We work together, in fact. However, I am quite ready to enter your name, should your answers be what a really affectionate mother requires. Do you smoke?

JACK. Well, yes, I must admit I smoke.

LADY B. I am glad to hear it. A man should always have an occupation of some kind. There are far too many idle men in London as it is. How old are you?

JACK. Twenty-nine.

LADY B. A very good age to be married at. I have always been of opinion that a man who desires to be married should know either everything or nothing. Which do you know?

JACK [after some hesitation]. I know nothing, Lady Bracknell.

LADY B. I am pleased to hear it. I do not approve of anything that tampers with natural ignorance. Ignorance is like a delicate exotic fruit; touch it and the bloom is gone. The whole theory of modern education is radically unsound. Fortunately ⁴⁰ in England, at any rate, education produces no effect whatsoever. If it did, it would prove a serious danger to the upper classes, and probably lead to acts of violence in Grosvenor Square. What is your income?

JACK. Between seven and eight thousand a year.

LADY B. [makes a note in her book]. In land, or in investments?

JACK. In investments, chiefly.

LADY B. That is satisfactory. What between the duties expected of one during one's life-time, and the duties exacted from one after one's death, land has ceased to be either a profit or a pleasure. It gives one position, and prevents one from keeping it up. That's all that can be said about land.

JACK. I have a country house with some land, of course, attached to it, about fifteen hundred acres, I believe; but I don't depend on that for my real income. In fact, as far as I can make out, the poachers are the only people who make any- ⁴⁰ thing out of it.

LADY B. A country house! How many bedrooms? Well, that point can be cleared up afterwards. You have a town house, I hope? A girl with a simple, unspoiled nature, like Gwendolen, could hardly be expected to reside in the country.

JACK. Well, I own a house in Belgrave Square, but it is let by the year to Lady Bloxham. Of course, I can get it back whenever I like, at six months' notice.

LADY B. Lady Bloxham? I don't know her.

JACK. Oh, she goes about very little. She is a lady considerably advanced in years.

LADY B. Ah, now-a-days that is no guarantee of respectability of character. What number in Belgrave Square?

JACK. 149.

LADY B. [shaking her head]. The unfashionable side. I thought there was something. However, that could easily be altered.

JACK. Do you mean the fashion, or the side?

LADY B. [sternly]. Both, if necessary, I presume. What are your politics?

JACK. Well, I am afraid I really have none. I am a Liberal Unionist.

LADY B. Oh, they count as Tories. They dine with us. Or come in the evening, at any rate. Now to minor matters. Are your parents living?

JACK. I have lost both my parents.

LADY B. Both? . . . That seems like carelessness. Who was your father? He was evidently a man of some wealth. Was he born in what the Radical papers call the purple of commerce, or did he rise from the ranks of the aristocracy?

JACK. I am afraid I really don't know. The fact is, Lady Bracknell, I said I had lost my parents. It would be nearer the truth to say that my parents seem to have lost me. . . . I don't actually know who I am by birth. I was . . . well, I was found.

LADY B. Found!

JACK. The late Mr. Thomas Cardew, an old gentleman of a very charitable and kindly disposition, found me, and gave me the name of Worthing, because he happened to have a first-class ticket for Worthing in his pocket at the time. Worthing is a place in Sussex. It is a seaside resort.

LADY B. Where did the charitable gentleman who had a first-class ticket for this seaside resort find you?

JACK [gravely]. In a hand-bag.

LADY B. A hand-bag?

JACK [very seriously]. Yes, Lady Bracknell. I was in a hand-bag—a somewhat large, black leather hand-bag, with handles to it—an ordinary hand-bag, in fact.

LADY B. In what locality did this Mr. James, or Thomas, Cardew come across this ordinary hand-bag?

JACK. In the cloak-room at Victoria Station. It was given to him in mistake for his own.

LADY B. The cloak-room at Victoria Station?

JACK. Yes. The Brighton line.

LADY B. The line is immaterial. Mr. Worthing, I confess I feel somewhat bewildered by what you have just told me. To be born, or at any rate, bred, in a hand-bag, whether it had handles or not, seems to me to display a contempt for the ordinary decencies of family life that remind one of the worst excesses of the French Revolution. And I presume you know what that unfortunate movement led to? As for the particular locality in which the hand-bag was found, a cloak-room at a railway station might serve to conceal a social indiscretion—has probably, indeed, been used for that purpose before now—but it could hardly be regarded as an assured basis for a recognized position in good society.

JACK. May I ask you then what you would advise me to do? I need hardly say I would do anything in the world to ensure Gwendolen's happiness.

LADY B. I would strongly advise you, Mr. Worthing, to try and acquire some relations as soon as possible, and to make a definite effort to produce at any rate one parent, of either sex, before the season is quite over.

JACK. Well, I don't see how I could possibly manage to do that. I can produce the hand-bag at any moment. It is in my dressing-room at home. I really think that should satisfy you, Lady Bracknell.

LADY B. Me, sir! What has it to do with me? You can hardly imagine that I and Lord Bracknell would dream of allowing our only daughter—a girl brought up with the utmost care—to marry into a cloak-room, and form an alliance with a parcel? Good morning, Mr. Worthing! [LADY BRACKNELL sweeps out in majestic indignation.]

JACK. Good morning! [ALGERNON, from the other room, strikes up the Wedding March. JACK looks perfectly furious, and goes to the door.] For heaven's sake don't play that ghastly tune, Algy! How idiotic you are! [The music stops, and ALGERNON enters cheerily.]

ALGER. Didn't it go off all right, old boy? You don't mean to say Gwendolen refused you? I know it is a way she has. She is always refusing people. I think it is most ill-natured of her.

JACK. Oh, Gwendolen is as right as a trivet. As far as she is concerned, we are engaged. Her mother is perfectly unbearable. Never met such a Gorgon . . . I don't really know what a Gorgon is like, but I am quite sure that Lady Bracknell is one. In any case, she is a monster, without being a myth, which is rather unfair. . . . I beg your pardon, Algy, I suppose I shouldn't talk about your own aunt in that way before you.

ALGER. My dear boy, I love hearing my relations abused. It is the only thing that makes me put up with them at all. Relations are simply a tedious pack of people who haven't got the remotest knowledge of how to live, nor the smallest instinct about when to die.

JACK. Oh, that is nonsense!

ALGER. It isn't!

JACK. Well, I won't argue about the matter. You always want to argue about things.

ALGER. That is exactly what things were originally made for.

JACK. Upon my word, if I thought that, I'd shoot myself. . . . [A pause.] You don't think there is any chance of Gwendolen becoming like her mother in about a hundred and fifty years, do you, Algy?

ALGER. All women become like their mothers. That is their tragedy. No man does. That's his.

JACK. Is that clever?

ALGER. It is perfectly phrased! and quite as true as any observation in civilized life should be.

JACK. I am sick to death of cleverness. Every-body is clever now-a-days. You can't go anywhere without meeting clever people. The thing has become an absolute public nuisance. I wish to goodness we had a few fools left.

ALGER. We have.

JACK. I should extremely like to meet them. What do they talk about?

ALGER. The fools? Oh! about the clever people, of course.

JACK. What fools!

ALGER. By the way, did you tell Gwendolen the truth about your being Ernest in town, and Jack in the country?

JACK [in a very patronizing manner]. My dear fellow, the truth isn't quite the sort of thing one tells to a nice sweet refined girl. What extraordinary ideas you have about the way to behave to a woman!

ALGER. The only way to behave to a woman is to make love to her, if she is pretty, and to someone else if she is plain.

JACK. Oh, that is nonsense.

ALGER. What about your brother? What about the profligate Ernest?

JACK. Oh, before the end of the week I shall have got rid of him. I'll say he died in Paris of apoplexy. Lots of people die of apoplexy, quite suddenly, don't they?

ALGER. Yes, but it's hereditary, my dear fellow. It's a sort of thing that runs in families. You had so much better say a severe chill.

JACK. You are sure a severe chill isn't hereditary, or anything of that kind?

ALGER. Of course it isn't!

JACK. Very well, then. My poor brother Ernest is carried off suddenly in Paris, by a severe chill. That gets rid of him.

ALGER. But I thought you said that . . . Miss Cardew was a little too much interested in your poor brother Ernest? Won't she feel his loss a good deal?

JACK. Oh, that is all right. Cecily is not a silly, romantic girl, I am glad to say. She has a capital appetite, goes for long walks, and pays no attention at all to her lessons.

ALGER. I would rather like to see Cecily.

JACK. I will take very good care you never do. She is excessively pretty, and she is only just eighteen.

ALGER. Have you told Gwendolen yet that you have an excessively pretty ward who is only just eighteen?

JACK. Oh! one doesn't blurt these things out to people. Cecily and Gwendolen are perfectly certain to be extremely great friends. I'll bet you anything you like that half an hour after they have met, they will be calling each other sister.

ALGER. Women only do that when they have called each other a lot of other things first. Now, my dear boy, if we want to get a good table at Willis's, we really must go and dress. Do you know it is nearly seven?

JACK. Oh! it always is nearly seven.

ALGER. Well, I'm hungry.

JACK. I never knew you when you weren't. . . .

ALGER. What shall we do after dinner? Go to a theater?

JACK. Oh, no! I loathe listening.

ALGER. Well, let us go to the Club?

JACK. Oh, no! I hate talking.

ALGER. Well, we might trot round to the Empire at ten?

JACK. Oh, no! I can't bear looking at things. It is so silly.

ALGER. Well, what shall we do?

JACK. Nothing!

ALGER. It is awfully hard work doing nothing. However, I don't mind hard work where there is no definite object of any kind.

Enter LANE.

LANE. Miss Fairfax.

Enter GWENDOLEN. LANE goes out.

ALGER. Gwendolen, upon my word!

GWEND. Algy, kindly turn your back. I have something very particular to say to Mr. Worthing.

ALGER. Really, Gwendolen, I don't think I can allow this at all.

GWEND. Algy, you always adopt a strictly immoral attitude towards life. You are not quite old enough to do that. [ALGERNON retires to the fireplace.]

JACK. My own darling.

GWEND. Ernest, we may never be married. From the expression on mamma's face I fear we never shall. Few parents now-a-days pay any regard to what their children say to them. The old-fashioned respect for the young is fast dying out. Whatever influence I ever had over mamma, I lost at the age of three. But although she may prevent us from becoming man and wife, and I may marry someone else, and marry often, nothing that she can possibly do can alter my eternal devotion to you.

JACK. Dear Gwendolen!

GWEND. The story of your romantic origin, as related to me by mamma with unpleasing comments, has naturally stirred the deeper fibers of my nature. Your Christian name has an irresistible fascination. The simplicity of your character makes you exquisitely incomprehensible to me. Your town address at the Albany I have. What is your address in the country?

JACK. The Manor House, Woolton, Hertfordshire. [ALGERNON, who has been carefully listening, smiles to himself, and writes the address on his shirt-cuff. Then picks up the Railway Guide.]

GWEND. There is a good postal service, I suppose? It may be necessary to do something desperate. That, of course, will require serious consideration. I will communicate with you daily.

JACK. My own one!

GWEND. How long do you remain in town?

JACK. Till Monday.

GWEND. Good! Algy, you may turn round now.

ALGER. Thanks, I've turned round already.

GWEND. You may also ring the bell.

JACK. You will let me see you to your carriage, my own darling?

GWEND. Certainly.

JACK [to LANE, who now enters]. I will see Miss Fairfax out.

LANE. Yes, sir. [JACK and GWENDOLEN go off. LANE presents several letters on a salver to ALGERNON. It is to be surmised that they are bills, as ALGERNON, after looking at the envelopes, tears them up.]

ALGER. A glass of sherry, Lane.

LANE. Yes, sir.

ALGER. Tomorrow, Lane, I'm going Bunburying.

LANE. Yes, sir.

ALGER. I shall probably not be back till Monday. You can put up my dress clothes, my smoking jacket and all the Bunbury suits. . . .

LANE. Yes, sir. [Handing sherry.]

ALGER. I hope tomorrow will be a fine day, Lane.

LANE. It never is, sir.

ALGER. Lane, you're a perfect pessimist.

LANE. I do my best to give satisfaction, sir.

Enter JACK. LANE goes off.

JACK. There's a sensible, intellectual girl! The only girl I ever cared for in my life. [ALGERNON is laughing immoderately.] What on earth are you so amused at?

ALGER. Oh, I'm a little anxious about poor Bunbury, that's all.

JACK. If you don't take care, your friend Bunbury will get you into a serious scrape some day.

ALGER. I love scrapes. They are the only things that are never serious.

JACK. Oh, that's nonsense, Algy. You never talk anything but nonsense.

ALGER. Nobody ever does. [JACK looks indignantly at him, and leaves the room. ALGERNON lights a cigarette, reads his shirt-cuff, and smiles.]

CURTAIN

ACT II

SCENE:—Garden at the Manor House. A flight of gray stone steps leads up to the house. The garden, an old-fashioned one, full of roses. Time of year, July. Basket chairs, and a table covered with books, are set under a large yew tree.

MISS PRISM discovered seated at the table. CECILY is at the back watering flowers.

PRISM [calling]. Cecily, Cecily! Surely such a utilitarian occupation as the watering of flowers is rather Moulton's duty than yours? Especially at a moment when intellectual pleasures await you. Your German grammar is on the table. Pray open it at page fifteen. We will repeat yesterday's lesson.

CECIL. [coming over very slowly]. But I don't like German. It isn't at all a becoming language. I know perfectly well that I look quite plain after my German lesson.

PRISM. Child, you know how anxious your guardian is that you should improve yourself in every way. He laid particular stress on your German, as he was leaving for town yesterday. Indeed, he always lays stress on your German when he is leaving for town.

CECIL. Dear Uncle Jack is so very serious! Sometimes he is so serious that I think he cannot be quite well.

PRISM [drawing herself up]. Your guardian enjoys the best of health, and his gravity of demeanor is especially to be commended in one so comparatively young as he is. I know no one who has a higher sense of duty and responsibility.

CECIL. I suppose that is why he often looks a little bored when we three are together.

PRISM. Cecily! I am surprised at you. Mr. Worthing has many troubles in his life. Idle merriment and triviality would be out of place in his conversation. You must remember his constant anxiety about that unfortunate young man, his brother.

CECIL. I wish Uncle Jack would allow that unfortunate young man, his brother, to come down here sometimes. We might have a good influence over him, Miss Prism. I am sure you certainly would. You know German, and geology, and things of that kind influence a man very much. [CECILY begins to write in her diary.]

PRISM [shaking her head]. I do not think that even I could produce any effect on a character that according to his own brother's admission is irretrievably weak and vacillating. Indeed, I am not sure that I would desire to reclaim him. I am not in favor of this modern mania for turning bad people into good people at a moment's notice. As a man sows so let him reap. You must put away your diary, Cecily. I really don't see why you should keep a diary at all.

CECIL. I keep a diary in order to enter the wonderful secrets of my life. If I didn't write them down I should probably forget all about them.

PRISM. Memory, my dear Cecily, is the diary that we all carry about with us.

CECIL. Yes, but it usually chronicles the things that have never happened, and couldn't possibly have happened. I believe that Memory is responsible for nearly all the three-volume novels that Mudie sends us.

PRISM. Do not speak slightly of the three-volume novel, Cecily. I wrote one myself in earlier days.

CECIL. Did you really, Miss Prism? How wonderfully clever you are! I hope it did not end happily? I don't like novels that end happily. They depress me so much.

PRISM. The good ended happily, and the bad unhappily. That is what Fiction means.

CECIL. I suppose so. But it seems very unfair. And was your novel ever published?

PRISM. Alas! no. The manuscript unfortunately was abandoned. I use the word in the sense of lost or mislaid. To your work, child, these speculations are profitless.

CECIL. [smiling]. But I see dear Dr. Chasuble coming up through the garden.

PRISM [rising and advancing]. Dr. Chasuble! This is indeed a pleasure.

Enter CANON CHASUBLE.

CHAS. And how are we this morning? Miss Prism, you are, I trust, well?

CECIL. Miss Prism has just been complaining of a slight headache. I think it would do her so much good to have a short stroll with you in the park, Dr. Chasuble.

PRISM. Cecily, I have not mentioned anything about a headache.

CECIL. No, dear Miss Prism, I know that, but I felt instinctively that you had a headache. Indeed I was thinking about that, and not about my German lesson, when the Rector came in.

CHAS. I hope, Cecily, you are not inattentive.

CECIL. Oh, I am afraid I am.

CHAS. That is strange. Were I fortunate enough to be Miss Prism's pupil, I would hang upon her lips. [Miss Prism glares.] I spoke metaphorically.—My metaphor was drawn from bees. Ahem! Mr. Worthing, I suppose, has not returned from town yet?

PRISM. We do not expect him till Monday afternoon.

CHAS. Ah, yes, he usually likes to spend his Sunday in London. He is not one of those whose sole aim is enjoyment, as, by all accounts, that unfortunate young man his brother seems to be. But I must not disturb Egeria and her pupil any longer.

PRISM. Egeria? My name is Lætitia, Doctor.

CHAS. [bowing]. A classical allusion merely, drawn from the Pagan authors. I shall see you both no doubt at Evensong?

PRISM. I think, dear Doctor, I will have a stroll with you. I find I have a headache after all, and a walk might do it good.

CHAS. With pleasure, Miss Prism, with pleasure. We might go as far as the schools and back.

PRISM. That would be delightful. Cecily, you will read your Political Economy in my absence.

The chapter on the Fall of the Rupee you may omit. It is somewhat too sensational. Even these metallic problems have their melodramatic side. [Goes down the garden with Dr. CHASUBLE.]

CECIL. [picks up books and throws them back on table]. Horrid Political Economy! Horrid Geography! Horrid, horrid German!

Enter MERRIMAN with a card on a salver.

MERRI. Mr. Ernest Worthing has just driven over ¹⁰ from the station. He has brought his luggage with him.

CECIL. [takes the card and reads it]. "Mr. Ernest Worthing, B. 4, The Albany, W." Uncle Jack's brother! Did you tell him Mr. Worthing was in town?

MERRI. Yes, Miss. He seemed very much disappointed. I mentioned that you and Miss Prism were in the garden. He said he was anxious to speak to you privately for a moment.

CECIL. Ask Mr. Ernest Worthing to come here. I suppose you had better talk to the housekeeper about a room for him.

MERRI. Yes, Miss. [MERRIMAN goes off.]

CECIL. I have never met any really wicked person before. I feel rather frightened. I am so afraid he will look just like everyone else. [Enter ALGERNON, very gay and debonair.] He does!

ALGER. [raising his hat]. You are my little cousin Cecily, I'm sure.

CECIL. You are under some strange mistake. I am not little. In fact, I believe I am more than usually tall for my age. [ALGERNON is rather taken aback.] But I am your cousin Cecily. You, I see from your card, are Uncle Jack's brother, my cousin Ernest, my wicked cousin Ernest.

ALGER. Oh! I am not really wicked at all, cousin Cecily. You mustn't think that I am wicked.

CECIL. If you are not, then you have certainly been deceiving us all in a very excusable manner. ⁴⁰ I hope you have not been leading a double life, pretending to be wicked and being really good all the time. That would be hypocrisy.

ALGER. [looks at her in amazement]. Oh! of course I have been rather reckless.

CECIL. I am glad to hear it.

ALGER. In fact, now you mention the subject, I have been very bad in my own small way.

CECIL. I don't think you should be so proud of that, though I am sure it must have been very ⁵⁰ pleasant.

ALGER. It is much pleasanter being here with you.

CECIL. I can't understand how you are here at all. Uncle Jack won't be back till Monday afternoon.

ALGER. That is a great disappointment. I am obliged to go up by the first train on Monday morning. I have a business appointment that I am anxious . . . to miss.

CECIL. Couldn't you miss it anywhere but in London?

ALGER. No; the appointment is in London.

CECIL. Well, I know, of course, how important it is not to keep a business engagement, if one wants to retain any sense of the beauty of life, but still I think you had better wait till Uncle Jack arrives. I know he wants to speak to you about your emigrating.

ALGER. About my what?

CECIL. Your emigrating. He has gone up to buy your outfit.

²⁰ ALGER. I certainly wouldn't let Jack buy my outfit. He has no taste in neckties at all.

CECIL. I don't think you will require neckties. Uncle Jack is sending you to Australia.

ALGER. Australia! I'd sooner die.

CECIL. Well, he said at dinner on Wednesday night, that you would have to choose between this world, the next world, and Australia.

ALGER. Oh, well! The accounts I have received of Australia and the next world are not particularly ³⁰ encouraging. This world is good enough for me, cousin Cecily.

CECIL. Yes, but are you good enough for it?

ALGER. I'm afraid I'm not that. That is why I want you to reform me. You might make that your mission, if you don't mind, cousin Cecily.

CECIL. I'm afraid I've no time, this afternoon.

ALGER. Well, would you mind my reforming myself this afternoon?

CECIL. It is rather Quixotic of you. But I think ⁴⁰ you should try.

ALGER. I will. I feel better already.

CECIL. You are looking a little worse.

ALGER. That is because I am hungry.

CECIL. How thoughtless of me. I should have remembered that when one is going to lead an entirely new life, one requires regular and wholesome meals. Won't you come in?

ALGER. Thank you. Might I have a button-hole first? I never have any appetite unless I have a ⁵⁰ button-hole first.

CECIL. A Maréchal Niel? [Picks up scissors.]

ALGER. No, I'd sooner have a pink rose.

CECIL. Why? [Cuts a flower.]

ALGER. Because you are like a pink rose, cousin Cecily.

CECIL. I don't think it can be right for you to talk to me like that. Miss Prism never says such things to me.

ALGER. Then Miss Prism is a short-sighted old lady. [CECILY puts the rose in his button-hole.] You are the prettiest girl I ever saw.

CECIL. Miss Prism says that all good looks are a snare. ALGER. They are a snare that every sensible man would like to be caught in.

CECIL. Oh! I don't think I would care to catch a sensible man. I shouldn't know what to talk to him about.

They pass into the house. Miss PRISM and Dr. CHASUBLE return.

PRISM. You are too much alone, dear Dr. Chasuble. You should get married. A misanthrope I can understand—a womanthrope, never!

CHAS. [with a scholar's shudder]. Believe me, I do not deserve so neologistic a phrase. The precept as well as the practice of the Primitive Church was distinctly against matrimony.

PRISM [sententiously]. That is obviously the reason why the Primitive Church has not lasted up to the present day. And you do not seem to realize, dear Doctor, that by persistently remaining single, a man converts himself into a permanent public temptation. Men should be more careful; this very celibacy leads weaker vessels astray.

CHAS. But is a man not equally attractive when married?

PRISM. No married man is ever attractive except to his wife.

CHAS. And often, I've been told, not even to her.

PRISM. That depends on the intellectual sympathies of the woman. Maturity can always be depended on. Ripeness can be trusted. Young women are green. [DR. CHASUBLE starts.] I spoke horticulturally. My metaphor was drawn from fruits. But where is Cecily?

CHAS. Perhaps she followed us to the schools.

Enter JACK slowly from the back of the garden. He is dressed in the deepest mourning, with crape hat-band and black gloves.

PRISM. Mr. Worthing!

CHAS. Mr. Worthing?

PRISM. This is indeed a surprise. We did not look for you till Monday afternoon.

JACK [shakes Miss Prism's hand in a tragic manner]. I have returned sooner than I expected. Dr. Chasuble, I hope you are well?

CHAS. Dear Mr. Worthing, I trust this garb of woe does not betoken some terrible calamity?

JACK. My brother.

PRISM. More shameful debts and extravagance?

CHAS. Still leading his life of pleasure?

JACK [shaking his head]. Dead!

CHAS. Your brother Ernest dead?

JACK. Quite dead.

PRISM. What a lesson for him! I trust he will profit by it.

CHAS. Mr. Worthing, I offer you my sincere condolence. You have at least the consolation of knowing that you were always the most generous and forgiving of brothers.

JACK. Poor Ernest! He had many faults, but it is a sad, sad blow.

CHAS. Very sad indeed. Were you with him at the end?

JACK. No. He died abroad; in Paris, in fact. I had a telegram last night from the manager of the Grand Hotel.

CHAS. Was the cause of death mentioned?

JACK. A severe chill, it seems.

PRISM. As a man sows, so shall he reap.

CHAS. [raising his hand]. Charity, dear Miss Prism, charity! None of us are perfect. I myself am peculiarly susceptible to draughts. Will the interment take place here?

JACK. No. He seems to have expressed a desire to be buried in Paris.

CHAS. In Paris! [Shakes his head.] I fear that hardly points to any very serious state of mind at the last. You would no doubt wish me to make some slight allusion to this tragic domestic affliction next Sunday. [JACK presses his hand convulsively.] My sermon on the meaning of the manna in the wilderness can be adapted to almost any occasion, joyful, or, as in the present case, distressing. [All sigh.] I have preached it at harvest celebrations, christenings, confirmations, on days of humiliation and festal days. The last time I delivered it was in the Cathedral, as a charity sermon on behalf of the Society for the Prevention of Discontent among the Upper Orders. The Bishop, who was present, was much struck by some of the analogies I drew.

JACK. Ah! that reminds me, you mentioned so christenings I think, Dr. Chasuble? I suppose you know how to christen all right? [DR. CHASUBLE looks astounded.] I mean, of course, you are continually christening, aren't you?

PRISM. It is, I regret to say, one of the Rector's most constant duties in this parish. I have often spoken to the poorer classes on the subject. But they don't seem to know what thrift is.

CHAS. But is there any particular infant in whom you are interested, Mr. Worthing? Your brother was, I believe, unmarried, was he not?

JACK. Oh, yes.

PRISM [bitterly]. People who live entirely for pleasure usually are.

JACK. But it is not for any child, dear Doctor. I am very fond of children. No! the fact is, I would like to be christened myself, this afternoon, if you have nothing better to do.

CHAS. But surely, Mr. Worthing, you have been christened already?

JACK. I don't remember anything about it.

CHAS. But have you any grave doubts on the subject?

JACK. I certainly intend to have. Of course, I don't know if the thing would bother you in any way, or if you think I am a little too old now.

CHAS. Not at all. The sprinkling, and, indeed, the immersion of adults is a perfectly canonical practice.

JACK. Immersion!

CHAS. You need have no apprehensions. Sprinkling is all that is necessary, or indeed I think advisable. Our weather is so changeable. At what hour would you wish the ceremony performed?

JACK. Oh, I might trot around about five if that would suit you.

CHAS. Perfectly, perfectly! In fact I have two similar ceremonies to perform at that time. A case of twins that occurred recently in one of the outlying cottages on your own estate. Poor Jenkins the carter, a most hard-working man.

JACK. Oh! I don't see much fun in being christened along with other babies. It would be childish. Would half-past five do?

CHAS. Admirably! Admirably! [Takes out watch.] And now, dear Mr. Worthing, I will not intrude any longer into a house of sorrow. I would merely beg you not to be too much bowed down by grief. What seem to us bitter trials at the moment are often blessings in disguise.

PRISM. This seems to me a blessing of an extremely obvious kind.

Enter CECILY from the house.

CECIL. Uncle Jack! Oh, I am pleased to see you back. But what horrid clothes you have on! Do go and change them.

PRISM. Cecily!

CHAS. My child! my child! [CECILY goes towards JACK; he kisses her brow in a melancholy manner.]

CECIL. What is the matter, Uncle Jack? Do look happy! You look as if you had a toothache, and I have such a surprise for you. Who do you think is in the dining-room? Your brother!

JACK. Who?

CECIL. Your brother Ernest. He arrived about 10 half hour ago.

JACK. What nonsense! I haven't got a brother.

CECIL. Oh, don't say that. However badly he may have behaved to you in the past he is still your brother. You couldn't be so heartless as to disown him. I'll tell him to come out. And you will shake hands with him, won't you, Uncle Jack? [Runs back into the house.]

CHAS. These are very joyful tidings.

PRISM. After we had all been resigned to his loss, his sudden return seems to me peculiarly distressing.

JACK. My brother is in the dining-room? I don't know what it all means. I think it is perfectly absurd.

Enter ALGERNON and CECILY hand in hand. They come slowly up to JACK.

JACK. Good heavens! [Motions ALGERNON away.]

ALGER. Brother John, I have come down from 30 town to tell you that I am very sorry for all the trouble I have given you, and that I intend to lead a better life in the future. [JACK glares at him and does not take his hand.]

CECIL. Uncle Jack, you are not going to refuse your own brother's hand?

JACK. Nothing will induce me to take his hand. I think his coming down here disgraceful. He knows perfectly well why.

CECIL. Uncle Jack, do be nice. There is some 40 good in everyone. Ernest has just been telling me about his poor invalid friend, Mr. Bunbury, whom he goes to visit so often. And surely there must be much good in one who is kind to an invalid, and leaves the pleasures of London to sit by a bed of pain.

JACK. Oh, he has been talking about Bunbury, has he?

CECIL. Yes, he has told me all about poor Mr. Bunbury, and his terrible state of health.

50 JACK. Bunbury! Well, I won't have him talk to you about Bunbury or about anything else. It is enough to drive one perfectly frantic.

ALGER. Of course I admit that the faults were all on my side. But I must say that I think that Brother John's coldness to me is peculiarly painful. I expected a more enthusiastic welcome, especially considering it is the first time I have come here.

CECIL. Uncle Jack, if you don't shake hands with Ernest, I will never forgive you.

JACK. Never forgive me?

CECIL. Never, never, never!

JACK. Well, this is the last time I shall ever do it. [Shakes hands with ALGERNON and glares.]

CHAS. It's pleasant, is it not, to see so perfect a reconciliation? I think we might leave the two brothers together.

PRISM. Cecily, you will come with us.

CECIL. Certainly, Miss Prism. My little task of reconciliation is over.

CHAS. You have done a beautiful action today, dear child.

PRISM. We must not be premature in our judgments.

CECIL. I feel very happy. [They all go off.]

JACK. You young scoundrel, Algy, you must get out of this place as soon as possible. I don't allow any Bunburying here.

Enter MERRIMAN.

MERRI. I have put Mr. Ernest's things in the room next to yours, sir. I suppose that is all right?

JACK. What?

MERRI. Mr. Ernest's luggage, sir. I have unpacked it and put it in the room next to your own.

JACK. His luggage?

MERRI. Yes, sir. Three portmanteaus, a dressing-case, two hat-boxes, and a large luncheon-basket.

ALGER. I am afraid I can't stay more than a week this time.

JACK. Merriman, order the dog-cart at once. Mr. Ernest has been suddenly called back to town.

MERRI. Yes, sir. [Goes back into the house.]

ALGER. What a fearful liar you are, Jack. I have not been called back to town at all.

JACK. Yes, you have.

ALGER. I haven't heard anyone call me.

JACK. Your duty as a gentleman calls you back.

ALGER. My duty as a gentleman has never interfered with my pleasures in the smallest degree.

JACK. I can quite understand that.

ALGER. Well, Cecily is a darling.

JACK. You are not to talk of Miss Cardew like that. I don't like it.

ALGER. Well, I don't like your clothes. You look perfectly ridiculous in them. Why on earth don't you go up and change? It is perfectly childish to be in deep mourning for a man who is actually staying for a whole week with you in your house as a guest. I call it grotesque.

JACK. You are certainly not staying with me for a whole week as a guest or anything else. You have got to leave . . . by the four-five train.

ALGER. I certainly won't leave you so long as you are in mourning. It would be most unfriendly. If I were in mourning you would stay with me, I suppose. I should think it very unkind if you didn't.

JACK. Well, will you go if I change my clothes?

ALGER. Yes, if you are not too long. I never saw anybody take so long to dress, and with such little result.

JACK. Well, at any rate, that is better than being always over-dressed as you are.

ALGER. If I am occasionally a little over-dressed, I make up for it by being always immensely over-educated.

JACK. Your vanity is ridiculous, your conduct an outrage, and your presence in my garden utterly absurd. However, you have got to catch the four-five, and I hope you will have a pleasant journey back to town. This Bunburying, as you call it, has not been a great success for you. [Goes into the house.]

ALGER. I think it has been a great success. I'm in love with Cecily and that is everything. [Enter CECILY at the back of the garden. She picks up the can and begins to water the flowers.] But I must see her before I go, and make arrangements for another Bunbury. Ah, there she is.

CECIL. Oh, I merely came back to water the roses. I thought you were with Uncle Jack.

ALGER. He's gone to order the dog-cart for me.

CECIL. Oh, is he going to take you for a nice drive?

ALGER. He's going to send me away.

CECIL. Then have we got to part?

ALGER. I am afraid so. It's very painful parting.

CECIL. It is always painful to part from people whom one has known for a very brief space of time. The absence of old friends one can endure with equanimity. But even a momentary separation from anyone to whom one has just been introduced is almost unbearable.

ALGER. Thank you.

Enter MERRIMAN.

MERRI. The dog-cart is at the door, sir. [ALGERNON looks appealingly at CECILY.]

CECIL. It can wait, Merriman . . . for . . . five minutes.

MERRI. Yes, miss. [Exit MERRIMAN.]

ALGER. I hope, Cecily, I shall not offend you if I state quite frankly and openly that you seem to me to be in every way the visible personification of absolute perfection.

CECIL. I think your frankness does you great credit, Ernest. If you will allow me I will copy your remarks into my diary. [Goes over to table and begins writing in diary.]

ALGER. Do you really keep a diary? I'd give anything to look at it. May I?

CECIL. Oh no. [Puts her hand over it.] You see, it is simply a very young girl's record of her own thoughts and impressions, and consequently meant for publication. When it appears in volume form I hope you will order a copy. But pray, Ernest, don't stop. I delight in taking down from dictation. I have reached "absolute perfection." You can go on. I am quite ready for more.

ALGER. [somewhat taken aback.] Ahem! Ahem!

CECIL. Oh, don't cough, Ernest. When one is dictating one should speak fluently and not cough. Besides, I don't know how to spell a cough. [Writes as ALGERNON speaks.]

ALGER. [speaking very rapidly.] Cecily, ever since I first looked upon your wonderful and incomparable beauty, I have dared to love you wildly, passionately, devotedly, hopelessly.

CECIL. I don't think that you should tell me that you love me wildly, passionately, devotedly, hopelessly. Hopelessly doesn't seem to make much sense, does it?

ALGER. Cecily!

Enter MERRIMAN.

MERRI. The dog-cart is waiting, sir.

ALGER. Tell it to come round next week, at the same hour.

MERRI. [looks at CECILY, who makes no sign.] Yes, sir. [MERRIMAN retires.]

CECIL. Uncle Jack would be very much annoyed if he knew you were staying on till next week, at the same hour.

ALGER. Oh, I don't care about Jack. I don't care for anybody in the whole world but you. I love you, Cecily. You will marry me, won't you?

CECIL. You silly you! Of course. Why, we have been engaged for the last three months.

ALGER. For the last three months?

CECIL. Yes, it will be exactly three months on Thursday.

ALGER. But how did we become engaged?

CECIL. Well, ever since dear Uncle Jack first confessed to us that he had a younger brother who was very wicked and bad, you of course have formed the chief topic of conversation between myself and Miss Prism. And of course a man who is much talked about is always very attractive. One feels there must be something in him after all. I daresay it was foolish of me, but I fell in love with you, Ernest.

ALGER. Darling! And when was the engagement actually settled?

CECIL. On the 14th of February last. Worn out by your entire ignorance of my existence, I determined to end the matter one way or the other, and after a long struggle with myself I accepted you under this dear old tree here. The next day I bought this little ring in your name, and this is the little bangle with the true lovers' knot I promised you always to wear.

ALGER. Did I give you this? It's very pretty, isn't it?

CECIL. Yes, you've wonderfully good taste, Ernest. It's the excuse I've always given for your leading such a bad life. And this is the box in which I keep all your dear letters. [Kneels at table, opens box, and produces letters tied up with blue ribbon.]

ALGER. My letters! But my own sweet Cecily, I have never written you any letters.

CECIL. You need hardly remind me of that, Ernest. I remember only too well that I was forced to write your letters for you. I always wrote three times a week, and sometimes oftener.

ALGER. Oh, do let me read them, Cecily.

CECIL. Oh, I couldn't possibly. They would make you far too conceited. [Replaces box.] The three you wrote me after I had broken off the engagement are so beautiful, and so badly spelled, that even now I can hardly read them without crying a little.

ALGER. But was our engagement ever broken off?

CECIL. Of course it was. On the 22nd of last March. You can see the entry if you like. [Shows diary.] "Today I broke off my engagement with Ernest. I feel it is better to do so. The weather still continues charming."

ALGER. But why on earth did you break it off? What had I done? I had done nothing at all. Cecily, I am very much hurt indeed to hear you broke it off. Particularly when the weather was so charming.

CECIL. It would hardly have been a really serious engagement if it hadn't been broken off at least once. But I forgave you before the week was out.

ALGER. [crossing to her, and kneeling]. What a perfect angel you are, Cecily.

CECIL. You dear romantic boy. [He kisses her, she puts her fingers through his hair.] I hope your hair curls naturally, does it?

ALGER. Yes, darling, with a little help from others.

CECIL. I am so glad.

ALGER. You'll never break off our engagement again, Cecily?

CECIL. I don't think I could break it off now that I have actually met you. Besides, of course, there is the question of your name.

ALGER. Yes, of course. [Nervously.]

CECIL. You must not laugh at me, darling, but it had always been a girlish dream of mine to love someone whose name was Ernest. [ALGERNON rises, CECILY also.] There is something in that name that seems to inspire absolute confidence. I pity any poor married woman whose husband is not called Ernest.

ALGER. But, my dear child, do you mean to say you could not love me if I had some other name?

CECIL. But what name?

ALGER. Oh, any name you like—Algernon—for instance. . . .

CECIL. But I don't like the name of Algernon.

ALGER. Well, my own dear, sweet, loving little darling, I really can't see why you should object to the name of Algernon. It is not at all a bad name. In fact, it is rather an aristocratic name. Half of the chaps who get into the Bankruptcy Court are called Algernon. But seriously, Cecily . . . [Moving to her.] . . . if my name was Algy, couldn't you love me?

CECIL. [rising]. I might respect you, Ernest, I might admire your character, but I fear that I should not be able to give you my undivided attention.

ALGER. Ahem! Cecily! [Picking up hat.] Your Rector here is, I suppose, thoroughly experienced in the practice of all the rites and ceremonials of the church?

CECIL. Oh, yes. Dr. Chasuble is a most learned man. He has never written a single book, so you can imagine how much he knows.

ALGER. I must see him at once on a most important christening—I mean on most important business.

CECIL. Oh!

ALGER. I sha'n't be away more than half an hour.

CECIL. Considering that we have been engaged since February the 14th, and that I only met you today for the first time, I think it is rather hard that you should leave me for so long a period as half an hour. Couldn't you make it twenty minutes?

ALGER. I'll be back in no time. [Kisses her and rushes down the garden.]

CECIL. What an impetuous boy he is! I like his hair so much. I must enter his proposal in my diary.

Enter MERRIMAN.

MERRI. A Miss Fairfax has just called to see Mr. Worthing. On very important business, Miss Fairfax states.

CECIL. Isn't Mr. Worthing in his library?

MERRI. Mr. Worthing went over in the direction of the Rectory some time ago.

CECIL. Pray ask the lady to come out here; Mr. Worthing is sure to be back soon. And you can bring tea.

MERRI. Yes, miss. [Goes out.]

CECIL. Miss Fairfax! I suppose one of the many good elderly women who are associated with Uncle Jack in some of his philanthropic work in London. I don't quite like women who are interested in philanthropic work. I think it is so forward of them.

Enter MERRIMAN.

MERRI. Miss Fairfax.

Enter GWENDOLEN.

[Exit MERRIMAN.]

CECIL. [advancing to meet her]. Pray let me introduce myself to you. My name is Cecily Cardew.

GWEND. Cecily Cardew? [Moving to her and shaking hands.] What a very sweet name! Something tells me that we are going to be great friends. I like you already more than I can say. My first impressions of people are never wrong.

CECIL. How nice of you to like me so much after we have known each other such a comparatively short time. Pray sit down.

GWEND. [still standing up]. I may call you Cecily, may I not?

CECIL. With pleasure!

GWEND. And you will always call me Gwendolen, won't you?

CECIL. If you wish.

GWEND. Then that is all quite settled, is it not?

CECIL. I hope so. [A pause. They both sit down together.]

GWEND. Perhaps this might be a favorable opportunity for my mentioning who I am. My father is Lord Bracknell. You have never heard of papa, I suppose?

CECIL. I don't think so.

GWEND. Outside the family circle, papa, I am glad to say, is entirely unknown. I think that is quite as it should be. The home seems to me to be the proper sphere for the man. And certainly once a man begins to neglect his domestic duties he becomes painfully effeminate, does he not? And I don't like that. It makes men so very attractive. Cecily, mamma, whose views on education are remarkably strict, has brought me up to be extremely short-sighted; it is part of her system; so do you mind my looking at you through my glasses?

CECIL. Oh! not at all, Gwendolen. I am very fond of being looked at.

GWEND. [after examining CECILY carefully through a lorgnette]. You are here on a short visit, I suppose.

CECIL. Oh no, I live here.

GWEND. [severely]. Really? Your mother, no doubt, or some female relative of advanced years, resides here also?

CECIL. Oh, no. I have no mother, nor in fact, any relations.

GWEND. Indeed?

CECIL. My dear guardian, with the assistance of Miss Prism, has the arduous task of looking after me.

GWEND. Your guardian?

CECIL. Yes, I am Mr. Worthing's ward.

GWEND. Oh! It is strange he never mentioned to me that he had a ward. How secretive of him! He grows more interesting hourly. I am not sure, however, that the news inspires me with feelings of unmixed delight. [Rising and going to her.] I am very fond of you, Cecily; I have liked you ever since I met you! But I am bound to state that now that I know that you are Mr. Worthing's ward, I cannot help expressing a wish you were—well, just a little older than you seem to be—and not quite so very alluring in appearance. In fact, if I may speak candidly—

CECIL. Pray do! I think that whenever one has anything unpleasant to say, one should always be quite candid.

GWEND. Well, to speak with perfect candor, Cecily, I wish that you were fully forty-two, and more than usually plain for your age. Ernest has a strong upright nature. He is the very soul of truth and honor. Disloyalty would be as impossible to him as deception. But even men of the noblest possible moral character are extremely susceptible to the influence of the physical charms of others. Modern, no less than Ancient History, supplies us with many most painful examples of what I refer to. If it were not so, indeed, History would be quite unreadable.

CECIL. I beg your pardon, Gwendolen, did you say Ernest?

GWEND. Yes.

CECIL. Oh, but it is not Mr. Ernest Worthing who is my guardian. It is his brother—his elder brother.

GWEND. [sitting down again]. Ernest never mentioned to me that he had a brother.

CECIL. I am sorry to say they have not been on good terms for a long time.

GWEND. Ah! that accounts for it. And now that I think of it I have never heard any man mention his brother. The subject seems distasteful to most men. Cecily, you have lifted a load from my mind.

20 I was growing almost anxious. It would have been terrible if any cloud had come across a friendship like ours, would it not? Of course you are quite, quite sure that it is not Mr. Ernest Worthing who is your guardian?

CECIL. Quite sure. [A pause.] In fact, I am going to be his.

GWEND. [enquiringly]. I beg your pardon?

CECIL. [rather shy and confidently]. Dearest Gwendolen, there is no reason why I should make 30 a secret of it to you. Our little county newspaper is sure to chronicle the fact next week. Mr. Ernest Worthing and I are engaged to be married.

GWEND. [quite politely, rising]. My darling Cecily, I think there must be some slight error. Mr. Ernest Worthing is engaged to me. The announcement will appear in the Morning Post on Saturday at the latest.

CECIL. [very politely, rising]. I am afraid you must be under some misconception. Ernest proposed to me exactly ten minutes ago. [Shows diary.] GWEND. [examines diary through lorgnette carefully]. It is certainly very curious, for he asked me to be his wife yesterday afternoon at 5:30. If you would care to verify the incident, pray do so. [Produces diary of her own.] I never travel without my diary. One should always have something sensational to read in the train. I am so sorry, dear Cecily, if it is any disappointment to you, but I am afraid I have the prior claim.

CECIL. It would distress me more than I can tell you, dear Gwendolen, if it caused you any mental or physical anguish, but I feel bound to point out that since Ernest proposed to you he clearly has changed his mind.

GWEND. [meditatively]. If the poor fellow has been entrapped into any foolish promise I shall consider it my duty to rescue him at once, and with a firm hand.

CECIL. [thoughtfully and sadly]. Whatever unfortunate entanglement my dear boy may have got into, I will never reproach him with it after we are married.

GWEND. Do you allude to me, Miss Cardew, as an entanglement? You are presumptuous. On an occasion of this kind it becomes more than a moral duty to speak one's mind. It becomes a pleasure.

CECIL. Do you suggest, Miss Fairfax, that I entrapped Ernest into an engagement? How dare you? This is no time for wearing the shallow mask of manners. When I see a spade I call it a spade.

GWEND. [satirically]. I am glad to say that I have never seen a spade. It is obvious that our social spheres have been widely different.

Enter MERRIMAN, followed by the footman. He carries a salver, tablecloth, and plate-stand. CECILY is about to retort. The presence of the servants exercises a restraining influence, under which both girls chafe.

MERRI. Shall I lay tea here as usual, miss?

CECIL. [sternly, in a calm voice]. Yes, as usual. [MERRIMAN begins to clear table and lay cloth. A long pause, CECILY and GWENDOLEN glare at each other.]

GWEND. Are there many interesting walks in the vicinity, Miss Cardew?

CECIL. Oh, yes, a great many. From the top of one of the hills quite close one can see five counties.

GWEND. Five counties! I don't think I should like that. I hate crowds.

CECIL. [sweetly]. I suppose that is why you live in town? [GWENDOLEN bites her lip, and beats her foot nervously with her parasol.]

GWEND. [looking around]. Quite a well-kept garden this is, Miss Cardew.

CECIL. So glad you like it, Miss Fairfax.

GWEND. I had no idea there were any flowers in the country.

CECIL. Oh, flowers are as common here, Miss Fairfax, as people are in London.

GWEND. Personally I cannot understand how anybody manages to exist in the country, if anybody who is anybody does. The country always bores me to death.

CECIL. Ah! This is what the newspapers call agricultural depression, is it not? I believe the aristocracy are suffering very much from it just at present. It is almost an epidemic amongst them, I have been told. May I offer you some tea, Miss Fairfax?

GWEND. [with elaborate politeness]. Thank you. [Aside.] Detestable girl! But I require tea!

CECIL. [sweetly]. Sugar?

GWEND. [superciliously]. No, thank you. Sugar is not fashionable any more. [CECILY looks angrily at her, takes up the tongs and puts four lumps of sugar into the cup.]

CECIL. [severely]. Cake or bread and butter?

GWEND. [in a bored manner]. Bread and butter, please. Cake is rarely seen at the best houses nowadays.

CECIL. [cuts a very large slice of cake, and puts it on the tray]. Hand that to Miss Fairfax. [MERRIMAN does so, and goes out with footman. GWENDOLEN drinks the tea and makes a grimace. Puts down cup at once, reaches out her hand to the bread and butter, looks at it, and finds it is cake. Rises in indignation.]

GWEND. You have filled my tea with lumps of sugar and though I asked most distinctly for bread and butter, you have given me cake. I am known for the gentleness of my disposition, and the extraordinary sweetness of my nature, but I warn you, Miss Cardew, you may go too far.

CECIL. [rising]. To save my poor, innocent, trusting boy from the machinations of any other girl there are no lengths to which I would not go.

GWEND. From the moment I saw you I distrusted you. I felt that you were false and deceitful. I am never deceived in such matters. My first impressions of people are invariably right.

CECIL. It seems to me, Miss Fairfax, that I am trespassing on your valuable time. No doubt you have many other calls of a similar character to make in the neighborhood.

Enter JACK.

GWEND. [catching sight of him]. Ernest! My own Ernest!

JACK. Gwendolen! Darling! [Offers to kiss her.]

GWEND. [drawing back]. A moment! May I ask if you are engaged to be married to this young lady? [Points to CECILY.]

JACK [laughing]. To dear little Cecily! Of course not! What could have put such an idea into your pretty little head?

GWEND. Thank you. You may. [Offers her cheek.]

CECIL. [very sweetly]. I knew there must be some misunderstanding, Miss Fairfax. The gentleman whose arm is at present around your waist is my dear guardian, Mr. John Worthing.

GWEND. I beg your pardon?

CECIL. This is Uncle Jack.

GWEND. [receding]. Jack! Oh!

Enter ALGERNON.

CECIL. Here is Ernest.

ALGER. [goes straight over to CECILY without noticing anyone else]. My own love! [Offers to kiss her.]

CECIL. [drawing back]. A moment, Ernest! May I ask you—are you engaged to be married to this young lady?

ALGER. [looking round]. To what young lady? Good heavens! Gwendolen!

CECIL. Yes! to good heavens, Gwendolen, I mean to Gwendolen.

ALGER. [laughing]. Of course not! What could have put such an idea into your pretty little head?

CECIL. Thank you. [Presenting her cheek to be kissed.] You may. [ALGERNON kisses her.]

GWEND. I felt there was some slight error, Miss Cardew. The gentleman who is now embracing you is my cousin, Mr. Algernon Moncrieff.

CECIL. [breaking away from ALGERNON]. Algernon Moncrieff! Oh! [The two girls move towards each other and put their arms round each other's waists as if for protection.]

CECIL. Are you called Algernon?

ALGER. I cannot deny it.

CECIL. Oh!

GWEND. Is your name really John?

JACK [standing rather proudly]. I could deny it if I liked. I could deny anything if I liked. But my name certainly is John. It has been John for years.

CECIL. [to GWENDOLEN]. A gross deception has ⁴⁰ been practiced on both of us.

GWEND. My poor wounded Cecily!

CECIL. My sweet wronged Gwendolen!

GWEND. [slowly and seriously]. You will call me sister, will you not? [They embrace. JACK and ALGERNON groan and walk up and down.]

CECIL. [rather brightly]. There is just one question I would like to be allowed to ask my guardian.

GWEND. An admirable idea! Mr. Worthing, ⁵⁰ there is just one question I would like to be permitted to put to you. Where is your brother Ernest? We are both engaged to be married to your brother Ernest, so it is a matter of some importance to us to know where your brother Ernest is at present.

JACK [slowly and hesitatingly]. Gwendolen—Cecily—it is very painful for me to be forced to speak the truth. It is the first time in my life that I have ever been reduced to such a painful position, and I am really quite inexperienced in doing anything of the kind. However I will tell you quite ¹⁰ frankly that I have no brother Ernest. I have no brother at all. I never had a brother in my life, and I certainly have not the smallest intention of ever having one in the future.

CECIL. [surprised]. No brother at all?

JACK [cheerily]. None!

GWEND. [severely]. Had you never a brother of any kind?

JACK [pleasantly]. Never. Not even of any kind.

GWEND. I am afraid it is quite clear, Cecily, that ²⁰ neither of us is engaged to be married to anyone.

CECIL. It is not a very pleasant position for a young girl suddenly to find herself in. Is it?

GWEND. Let us go into the house. They will hardly venture to come after us there.

CECIL. No, men are so cowardly, aren't they?

[They retire into the house with scornful looks.]

JACK. This ghastly state of things is what you call Bunburying, I suppose?

ALGER. Yes, and a perfectly wonderful Bunbury it is. The most wonderful Bunbury I have ever had in my life.

JACK. Well, you've no right whatsoever to Bunbury here.

ALGER. That is absurd. One has a right to Bunbury anywhere one chooses. Every serious Bunburyist knows that.

JACK. Serious Bunburyist! Good heavens!

ALGER. Well, one must be serious about something, if one wants to have any amusement in life. I happen to be serious about Bunburying. What on earth you are serious about I haven't the remotest idea. About everything, I should fancy. You have such an absolutely trivial nature.

JACK. Well, the only small satisfaction I have in the whole of this wretched business is that your friend Bunbury is quite exploded. You won't be able to run down to the country quite so often as you used to do, dear Algy. And a very good thing, too.

ALGER. Your brother is a little off color, isn't he, dear Jack? You won't be able to disappear to London quite so frequently as your wicked custom was. And not a bad thing, either.

JACK. As for your conduct towards Miss Cardew, I must say that your taking in a sweet, simple, innocent girl like that is quite inexcusable. To say nothing of the fact that she is my ward.

ALGER. I can see no possible defense at all for your deceiving a brilliant, clever, thoroughly experienced young lady like Miss Fairfax. To say nothing of the fact that she is my cousin.

JACK. I wanted to be engaged to Gwendolen, that is all. I love her.

ALGER. Well, I simply wanted to be engaged to Cecily. I adore her.

JACK. There is certainly no chance of your marrying Miss Cardew.

ALGER. I don't think there is much likelihood, Jack, of you and Miss Fairfax being united.

JACK. Well, that is no business of yours.

ALGER. If it was my business, I wouldn't talk about it. [Begins to eat muffins.] It is very vulgar to talk about one's business. Only people like stock-brokers do that, and then merely at dinner parties.

JACK. How you can sit there, calmly eating muffins, when we are in this horrible trouble, I can't make out. You seem to me to be perfectly heartless.

ALGER. Well, I can't eat muffins in an agitated manner. The butter would probably get on my cuffs. One should always eat muffins quite calmly. It is the only way to eat them.

JACK. I say it's perfectly heartless your eating muffins at all, under the circumstances.

ALGER. When I am in trouble, eating is the only thing that consoles me. Indeed, when I am in really great trouble, as anyone who knows me intimately will tell you, I refuse everything except food and drink. At the present moment I am eating muffins because I am unhappy. Besides, I am particularly fond of muffins. [Rising.]

JACK [rising]. Well, that is no reason why you should eat them all in that greedy way. [Takes muffins from ALGERNON.]

ALGER. [offering tea-cake]. I wish you would have tea-cake instead. I don't like tea-cake.

JACK. Good heavens! I suppose a man may eat his own muffins in his own garden.

ALGER. But you have just said it was perfectly heartless to eat muffins.

JACK. I said it was perfectly heartless of you, under the circumstances. That is a very different thing.

ALGER. That may be. But the muffins are the same. [He seizes the muffin-dish from JACK.]

JACK. Algy, I wish to goodness you would go.

ALGER. You can't possibly ask me to go without having some dinner. It's absurd. I never go without my dinner. No one ever does, except vegetarians and people like that. Besides I have just made arrangements with Dr. Chasuble to be christened at a quarter to six under the name of Ernest.

JACK. My dear fellow, the sooner you give up that nonsense the better. I made arrangements this morning with Dr. Chasuble to be christened myself at 5:30, and I naturally will take the name of Ernest. Gwendolen would wish it. We can't both be christened Ernest. It's absurd. Besides, I have a perfect right to be christened if I like. There is no evidence at all that I ever have been christened by anybody. I should think it extremely probable I never was, and so does Dr. Chasuble. It is entirely different in your case. You have been christened already.

ALGER. Yes, but I have not been christened for years.

JACK. Yes, but you have been christened. That is the important thing.

ALGER. Quite so. So I know my constitution can stand it. If you are not quite sure about your ever having been christened, I must say I think it rather dangerous your venturing on it now. It might make you very unwell. You can hardly have forgotten that someone very closely connected with you was very nearly carried off this week in Paris by a severe chill.

JACK. Yes, but you said yourself that a severe chill was not hereditary.

ALGER. It usedn't to be, I know—but I daresay it is now. Science is always making wonderful improvements in things.

JACK. [picking up the muffin-dish]. Oh, that is nonsense; you are always talking nonsense.

ALGER. Jack, you are at the muffins again! I wish you wouldn't. There are only two left. [Takes them.] I told you I was particularly fond of muffins.

JACK. But I hate tea-cake.

ALGER. Why on earth then do you allow tea-cake to be served up for your guests? What ideas you have of hospitality!

JACK. Algernon! I have already told you to go. I don't want you here. Why don't you go?

ALGER. I haven't quite finished my tea yet, and there is still one muffin left. [JACK groans, and sinks into a chair. ALGERNON still continues eating.]

ACT III

SCENE:—Morning-room at the Manor House.

GWENDOLEN and CECILY are at the window, looking out into the garden.

GWEND. The fact that they did not follow us at once into the house, as anyone else would have done, seems to me to show that they have some sense of shame left.

CECIL. They have been eating muffins. That looks like repentance.

GWEND. [after a pause.] They don't seem to notice us at all. Couldn't you cough?

CECIL. But I haven't got a cough.

GWEND. They're looking at us. What effrontery!

CECIL. They're approaching. That's very forward of them.

GWEND. Let us preserve a dignified silence.

CECIL. Certainly. It's the only thing to do now. ²⁰

Enter JACK, followed by ALGERNON. They whistle some dreadful popular air from a British opera.

GWEND. This dignified silence seems to produce an unpleasant effect.

CECIL. A most distasteful one.

GWEND. But we will not be the first to speak.

CECIL. Certainly not.

GWEND. Mr. Worthing, I have something very particular to ask you. Much depends on your reply. ³⁰

CECIL. Gwendolen, your common sense is invaluable. Mr. Moncrieff, kindly answer me the following question. Why did you pretend to be my guardian's brother?

ALGER. In order that I might have an opportunity of meeting you.

CECIL. [to GWENDOLEN.] That certainly seems a satisfactory explanation, does it not?

GWEND. Yes, dear, if you can believe him.

CECIL. I don't. But that does not affect the wonderful beauty of his answer.

GWEND. True. In matters of grave importance, style, not sincerity, is the vital thing. Mr. Worthing, what explanation can you offer to me for pretending to have a brother? Was it in order that you might have an opportunity of coming up to town to see me as often as possible?

JACK. Can you doubt it, Miss Fairfax?

GWEND. I have the gravest doubts upon the subject. But I intend to crush them. This is not the moment for German skepticism. [Moving to CECILY.] Their explanations appear to be quite satisfactory, especially Mr. Worthing's. That seems to me to have the stamp of truth upon it.

CECIL. I am more than content with what Mr. Moncrieff said. His voice alone inspires one with absolute credulity.

GWEND. Then you think we should forgive them?

CECIL. Yes. I mean no.

GWEND. True! I had forgotten. There are principles at stake that one cannot surrender. Which of us should tell them? The task is not a pleasant one.

CECIL. Could we not both speak at the same time?

GWEND. An excellent idea! I nearly always speak at the same time as other people. Will you take the time from me?

CECIL. Certainly. [GWENDOLEN beats time with uplifted finger.]

GWEND. and CECIL. [speaking together.] Your Christian names are still an insuperable barrier. That is all!

JACK and ALGER. [speaking together.] Our Christian names! Is that all? But we are going to be christened this afternoon.

GWEND. [to JACK.] For my sake you are prepared to do this terrible thing?

JACK. I am.

CECIL. [to ALGERNON.] To please me you are ready to face this fearful ordeal?

ALGER. I am!

GWEND. How absurd to talk of the equality of the sexes! Where questions of self-sacrifice are concerned, men are infinitely beyond us.

JACK. We are. [Clasps hands with ALGERNON.]

CECIL. They have moments of physical courage of which we women know absolutely nothing.

GWEND. [to JACK.] Darling!

ALGER. [to CECILY.] Darling! [They fall into each other's arms.] ⁴⁰

Enter MERRIMAN. When he enters he coughs loudly, seeing the situation.

MERRI. Ahem! Ahem! Lady Bracknell!

JACK. Good heavens!

Enter LADY BRACKNELL. The couples separate in alarm. Exit MERRIMAN.

LADY B. Gwendolen! What does this mean?

GWEND. Merely that I am engaged to be married to Mr. Worthing, Mamma.

LADY B. Come here. Sit down. Sit down immediately. Hesitation of any kind is a sign of mental decay in the young, of physical weakness in the old. [Turns to JACK.] Apprised, sir, of my daughter's sudden flight by her trusty maid, whose confidence I purchased by means of a small coin, I followed her at once by a luggage train. Her unhappy father is, I am glad to say, under the impression that she is attending a more than usually lengthy lecture by the University Extension Scheme on the Influence of a Permanent Income on Thought. I do not propose to undeceive him. 10 Indeed I have never undeceived him on any question. I would consider it wrong. But of course, you will clearly understand that all communication between yourself and my daughter must cease immediately from this moment. On this point, as indeed on all points, I am firm.

JACK. I am engaged to be married to Gwendolen, Lady Bracknell!

LADY B. You are nothing of the kind, sir. And now, as regards Algernon! . . . Algernon!

ALGER. Yes, Aunt Augusta.

LADY B. May I ask if it is in this house that your invalid friend Mr. Bunbury resides?

ALGER. [stammering]. Oh, no! Bunbury doesn't live here. Bunbury is somewhere else at present. In fact, Bunbury is dead.

LADY B. Dead! When did Mr. Bunbury die? His death must have been extremely sudden.

ALGER. [airily]. Oh, I killed Bunbury this afternoon. I mean poor Bunbury died this afternoon. 20

LADY B. What did he die of?

ALGER. Bunbury? Oh, he was quite exploded.

LADY B. Exploded! Was he the victim of a revolutionary outrage? I was not aware that Mr. Bunbury was interested in social legislation. If so, he is well punished for his morbidity.

ALGER. My dear Aunt Augusta, I mean he was found out! The doctors found out that Bunbury could not live, that is what I mean—so Bunbury died.

LADY B. He seems to have had great confidence in the opinion of his physicians. I am glad, however, that he made up his mind at the last to some definite course of action, and acted under proper medical advice. And now that we have finally got rid of this Mr. Bunbury may I ask, Mr. Worthing, who is that young person whose hand my nephew Algernon is now holding in what seems to me a peculiarly unnecessary manner?

JACK. That lady is Miss Cecily Cardew, my ward. 30 [LADY BRACKNELL bows coldly to CECILY.]

ALGER. I am engaged to be married to Cecily, Aunt Augusta.

LADY B. I beg your pardon?

CECIL. Mr. Moncrieff and I are engaged to be married, Lady Bracknell.

LADY B. [with a shiver, crossing to the sofa and sitting down]. I do not know whether there is anything peculiarly exciting in the air of this particular part of Hertfordshire, but the number of engagements that go on seems to me considerably above the proper average that statistics have laid down for our guidance. I think some preliminary enquiry on my part would not be out of place. Mr. Worthing, is Miss Cardew at all connected with any of the larger railway stations in London? I merely desire information. Until yesterday I had no idea that there were any families or persons whose origin was a Terminus. [JACK looks perfectly furious, but restrains himself.]

JACK [in a clear, cold voice]. Miss Cardew is the granddaughter of the late Mr. Thomas Cardew of 149, Belgrave Square, S.W.; Gervase Park, Dorking, Surrey; and the Sporrán, Fifeshire, N.B.

LADY B. That sounds not unsatisfactory. Three addresses always inspire confidence, even in tradesmen. But what proof have I of their authenticity?

JACK. I have carefully preserved the Court Guide of the period. They are open to your inspection, Lady Bracknell.

LADY B. [grimly]. I have known strange errors in that publication.

JACK. Miss Cardew's family solicitors are Messrs. Markby, Markby, and Markby.

LADY B. Markby, Markby, and Markby? A firm of the very highest position in their profession. Indeed I am told that one of the Mr. Markbys is occasionally to be seen at dinner parties. So far I am satisfied.

JACK [very irritably]. How extremely kind of you, Lady Bracknell! I have also in my possession, you will be pleased to hear, certificates of Miss 40 Cardew's birth, baptism, whooping cough, registration, vaccination, confirmation, and the measles; both the German and the English variety.

LADY B. Ah! A life crowded with incident, I see; though perhaps somewhat too exciting for a young girl. I am not myself in favor of premature experiences. [Rises, looks at her watch.] Gwendolen! the time approaches for our departure. We have not a moment to lose. As a matter of form, Mr. Worthing, I had better ask you if Miss Cardew has any little fortune?

JACK. Oh, about a hundred and thirty thousand pounds in the Funds. That is all. Good-by, Lady Bracknell. So pleased to have seen you.

LADY B. [sitting down again]. A moment, Mr. Worthing. A hundred and thirty thousand pounds! And in the Funds! Miss Cardew seems to me a most attractive young lady, now that I look at her. Few girls of the present day have any really solid qualities, any of the qualities that last, and improve with time. We live, I regret to say, in an age of surfaces. [To CECILY.] Come over here, dear. [CECILY goes across.] Pretty child! your dress is sadly simple, and your hair seems almost as Nature might have left it. But we can soon alter all that. A thoroughly experienced French maid produces a really marvelous result in a very brief space of time. I remember recommending one to young Lady Lancing, and after three months her husband did not know her.

JACK [aside]. And after six months nobody knew her.

LADY B. [glares at JACK for a few moments. Then bends, with a practiced smile, to CECILY.] Kindly turn round, sweet child. [CECILY turns completely round.] No, the side view is what I want. [CECILY presents her profile.] Yes, quite as I expected. There are distinct social possibilities in your profile. The two weak points in our age are its want of principle and its want of profile. The chin a little higher, dear. Style largely depends on the way the chin is worn. They are worn very high, just at present. Algernon!

ALGER. Yes, Aunt Augusta!

LADY B. There are distinct social possibilities in Miss Cardew's profile.

ALGER. Cecily is the sweetest, dearest, prettiest girl in the whole world. And I don't care twopence about social possibilities.

LADY B. Never speak disrespectfully of Society, Algernon. Only people who can't get into it do that. [To CECILY.] Dear child, of course you know that Algernon has nothing but his debts to depend upon. But I do not approve of mercenary marriages. When I married Lord Bracknell I had no fortune of any kind. But I never dreamed for a moment of allowing that to stand in my way. Well, I suppose I must give my consent.

ALGER. Thank you, Aunt Augusta.

LADY B. Cecily, you may kiss me!

CECIL. [kisses her]. Thank you, Lady Bracknell.

LADY B. You may also address me as Aunt Augusta for the future.

CECIL. Thank you, Aunt Augusta.

LADY B. The marriage, I think, had better take place quite soon.

ALGER. Thank you, Aunt Augusta.

CECIL. Thank you, Aunt Augusta.

LADY B. To speak frankly, I am not in favor of long engagements. They give people the opportunity of finding out each other's character before marriage, which I think is never advisable.

JACK. I beg your pardon for interrupting you, Lady Bracknell, but this engagement is quite out of the question. I am Miss Cardew's guardian, and she cannot marry without my consent until she comes of age. That consent I absolutely decline to give.

LADY B. Upon what grounds, may I ask? Algernon is an extremely, I may almost say an ostentatiously, eligible young man. He has nothing, but he looks everything. What more can one desire?

JACK. It pains me very much to have to speak frankly to you, Lady Bracknell, about your nephew, but the fact is that I do not approve at all of his moral character. I suspect him of being untruthful. [ALGERNON and CECILY look at him in indignant amazement.]

LADY B. Untruthful! My nephew Algernon? Impossible! He is an Oxonian.

JACK. I fear there can be no possible doubt about the matter. This afternoon during my temporary absence in London on an important question of romance, he obtained admission to my house by means of the false pretense of being my brother. Under an assumed name he drank, I've just been informed by my butler, an entire pint bottle of my Perrier-Jouet, Brut, '89; a wine I was specially reserving for myself. Continuing his disgraceful deception, he succeeded in the course of the afternoon in alienating the affections of my only ward. He subsequently stayed to tea, and devoured every single muffin. And what makes his conduct all the more heartless is that he was perfectly well aware from the first that I have no brother, that I never had a brother, and that I don't intend to have a brother, not even of any kind. I distinctly told him so myself yesterday afternoon.

LADY B. Ahem! Mr. Worthing, after careful consideration I have decided entirely to overlook my nephew's conduct to you.

JACK. That is very generous of you, Lady Bracknell. My own decision, however, is unalterable. I decline to give my consent.

LADY B. [to CECILY]. Come here, sweet child. [CECILY goes over.] How old are you, dear?

CECIL. Well, I am really only eighteen, but I always admit to twenty when I go to evening parties.

LADY B. You are perfectly right in making some slight alteration. Indeed no woman should ever be quite accurate about her age. It looks so calculating. . . . [In meditative manner.] Eighteen, but admitting to twenty at evening parties. Well, it will not be very long before you are of age and free from the restraints of tutelage. So I don't think your guardian's consent is, after all, a matter of any importance.

JACK. Pray excuse me, Lady Bracknell, for interrupting you again, but it is only fair to tell you that according to the terms of her grandfather's will Miss Cardew does not come legally of age till she is thirty-five.

LADY B. That does not seem to me to be a grave objection. Thirty-five is a very attractive age. London society is full of women of the very highest birth who have, of their own free choice, remained thirty-five for years. Lady Dumbleton is an instance in point. To my own knowledge she has been thirty-five ever since she arrived at the age of forty, which was many years ago now. I see no reason why our dear Cecily should not be even still more attractive at the age you mention than she is at present. There will be a large accumulation of property.

CECIL. Algy, could you wait for me till I was thirty-five?

ALGER. Of course I could, Cecily. You know I could.

CECIL. Yes, I felt it instinctively, but I couldn't wait all that time. I hate waiting even five minutes for anybody. It always makes me rather cross. I am not punctual myself, I know, but I do like punctuality in others, and waiting, even to be married, is quite out of the question.

ALGER. Then what is to be done, Cecily?

CECIL. I don't know, Mr. Moncrieff.

LADY B. My dear Mr. Worthing, as Miss Cardew states positively that she cannot wait till she is thirty-five—a remark which I am bound to say seems to me to show a somewhat impatient nature—I would beg of you to reconsider your decision.

JACK. But, my dear Lady Bracknell, the matter is entirely in your own hands. The moment you consent to my marriage with Gwendolen, I will most gladly allow your nephew to form an alliance with my ward.

LADY B. [rising and drawing herself up]. You must be quite aware that what you propose is out of the question.

JACK. Then a passionate celibacy is all that any of us can look forward to.

LADY B. That is not the destiny I propose for Gwendolen. Algernon, of course, can choose for himself. [Pulls out her watch.] Come, dear; [GWENDOLEN rises] we have already missed five, if not six, trains. To miss any more might expose us to comment on the platform.

Enter DR. CHASUBLE.

CHAS. Everything is quite ready for the christenings.

LADY B. The christenings, sir! Is not that somewhat premature?

CHAS. [looking rather puzzled, and pointing to JACK and ALGERNON]. Both these gentlemen have expressed a desire for immediate baptism.

LADY B. At their age? The idea is grotesque and irreligious! Algernon, I forbid you to be baptized. I will not hear of such excesses. Lord Bracknell would be highly displeased if he learned that that was the way in which you wasted your time and money.

CHAS. Am I to understand then that there are to be no christenings at all this afternoon?

JACK. I don't think that, as things are now, it would be of much practical value to either of us, Dr. Chasuble.

CHAS. I am grieved to hear such sentiments from you, Mr. Worthing. They savor of the heretical views of the Anabaptists, views that I have completely refuted in four of my unpublished sermons. However, as your present mood seems to be one peculiarly secular, I will return to the church at once. Indeed, I have just been informed by the pew-opener that for the last hour and a half Miss Prism has been waiting for me in the vestry.

LADY B. [starting]. Miss Prism! Did I hear you mention a Miss Prism?

CHAS. Yes, Lady Bracknell, I am on my way to join her.

LADY B. Pray allow me to detain you for a moment. This matter may prove to be one of vital importance to Lord Bracknell and myself. Is this Miss Prism a female of repellent aspect, remotely connected with education?

CHAS. [somewhat indignantly]. She is the most cultivated of ladies, and the very picture of respectability.

LADY B. It is obviously the same person. May I ask what position she holds in your household?

CHAS. [severely]. I am a celibate, madam.

JACK [interposing]. Miss Prism, Lady Bracknell, has been for the last three years Miss Cardew's esteemed governess and valued companion.

LADY B. In spite of what I hear of her, I must see her at once. Let her be sent for.

CHAS. [looking off]. She approaches; she is nigh.

Enter Miss PRISM hurriedly.

PRISM. I was told you expected me in the vestry, dear Canon. I have been waiting for you there for an hour and three-quarters. [Catches sight of LADY BRACKNELL, who has fixed her with a stony glare. Miss PRISM grows pale and quails. She looks anxiously round as if desirous to escape.]

LADY B. [in a severe, judicial voice]. Prism! [Miss PRISM bows her head in shame.] Come here, Prism! [Miss PRISM approaches in a humble manner.] Prism! Where is that baby? [General consternation. The Canon starts back in horror. ALGERNON and JACK pretend to be anxious to shield CECILY and GWENDOLEN from hearing the details of a terrible public scandal.] Twenty-eight years ago, Prism, you left Lord Bracknell's house, Number 104, Upper Grosvenor Street, in charge of a perambulator that contained a baby, of the male sex. You never returned. A few weeks later, through the elaborate investigations of the Metropolitan police, the perambulator was discovered at midnight, standing by itself in a remote corner of Bayswater. It contained the manuscript of a three-volume novel of more than usually revolting sentimentality. [Miss PRISM starts in involuntary indignation.] But the baby was not there! [Everyone looks at Miss PRISM.] Prism, where is that baby? [A pause.]

PRISM. Lady Bracknell, I admit with shame that I do not know. I only wish I did. The plain facts of the case are these. On the morning of the day you mention, a day that is forever branded on my memory, I prepared as usual to take the baby out in its perambulator. I had also with me a somewhat old, but capacious hand-bag, in which I had intended to place the manuscript of a work of fiction that I had written during my few unoccupied hours. In a moment of mental abstraction, for which I never can forgive myself, I deposited the manuscript in the bassinette, and placed the baby in the hand-bag.

JACK [who has been listening attentively]. But where did you deposit the hand-bag?

PRISM. Do not ask me, Mr. Worthing.

JACK. Miss Prism, this is a matter of no small importance to me. I insist on knowing where you deposited the hand-bag that contained that infant.

PRISM. I left it in the cloak-room of one of the larger railway stations in London.

JACK. What railway station?

PRISM [quite crushed]. Victoria. The Brighton line. [Sinks into a chair.]

JACK. I must retire to my room for a moment. Gwendolen, wait here for me.

GWEND. If you are not too long, I will wait here for you all my life.

[Exit JACK in great excitement.]

CHAS. What do you think this means, Lady Bracknell?

LADY B. I dare not even suspect, Dr. Chasuble. I need hardly tell you that in families of high position strange coincidences are not supposed to occur. They are hardly considered the thing. [Noises heard overhead as if someone was throwing trunks about. Everybody looks up.]

CECIL. Uncle Jack seems strangely agitated.

CHAS. Your guardian has a very emotional nature.

LADY B. This noise is extremely unpleasant. It sounds as if he was having an argument. I dislike arguments of any kind. They are always vulgar, and often convincing.

CHAS. [looking up]. It has stopped now. [The noise is redoubled.]

LADY B. I wish he would arrive at some conclusion.

GWEND. This suspense is terrible. I hope it will last.

Enter JACK with a hand-bag of black leather in his hand.

JACK [rushing over to Miss PRISM]. Is this the hand-bag, Miss Prism? Examine it carefully before you speak. The happiness of more than one life depends on your answer.

PRISM [calmly]. It seems to be mine. Yes, here is the injury it received through the upsetting of a Gower Street omnibus in younger and happier days. Here is the stain on the lining caused by the explosion of a temperance beverage, an incident that occurred at Leamington. And here, on the lock, are my initials. I had forgotten that in an extravagant mood I had had them placed there. The bag is undoubtedly mine. I am delighted to have it so unexpectedly restored to me. It has been a great inconvenience being without it all these years.

JACK [in a pathetic voice]. Miss Prism, more is restored to you than this hand-bag. I was the baby you placed in it.

PRISM [amazed]. You?

JACK [embracing her]. Yes . . . mother!

PRISM [recoiling in indignant astonishment]. Mr. Worthing! I am unmarried!

JACK. Unmarried! I do not deny that is a serious blow. But after all, who has the right to cast a stone against one who has suffered? Cannot repentance wipe out an act of folly? Why should there be one law for men and another for women? Mother, I forgive you. [Tries to embrace her again.]

PRISM [still more indignant]. Mr. Worthing, there is some error. [Pointing to LADY BRACKNELL.] There is the lady who can tell you who you really are.

JACK [after a pause]. Lady Bracknell, I hate to seem inquisitive, but would you kindly inform me who I am?

LADY B. I am afraid that the news I have to give you will not altogether please you. You are the son of my poor sister, Mrs. Moncrieff, and consequently Algernon's elder brother.

JACK. Algy's elder brother! Then I have a brother after all. I knew I had a brother! I always said I had a brother! Cecily,—how could you have ever doubted that I had a brother? [Seizes hold of ALGERNON.] Dr. Chasuble, my unfortunate brother, Miss Prism, my unfortunate brother. Gwendolen, my unfortunate brother. Algy, you young scoundrel, you will have to treat me with more respect in the future. You have never behaved to me like a brother in all your life.

ALGER. Well, not till today, old boy, I admit. I did my best, however, though I was out of practice. [Shakes hands.]

GWEND. [to JACK]. My own! But what own are you? What is your Christian name, now that you have become someone else?

JACK. Good heavens! . . . I had quite forgotten that point. Your decision on the subject of my name is irrevocable, I suppose?

GWEND. I never change, except in my affections.

CECIL. What a noble nature you have, Gwendolen!

JACK. Then the question had better be cleared up at once. Aunt Augusta, a moment. At the time when Miss Prism left me in the hand-bag, had I been christened already?

LADY B. Every luxury that money could buy, including christening, had been lavished on you by your fond and doting parents.

JACK. Then I was christened! That is settled. Now, what name was I given? Let me know the worst.

LADY B. Being the eldest son you were naturally christened after your father.

JACK [irritably]. Yes, but what was my father's Christian name?

LADY B. [meditatively]. I cannot at the present moment recall what the General's Christian name was. But I have no doubt he had one. He was eccentric, I admit. But only in later years. And that was the result of the Indian climate, and marriage, and indigestion, and other things of that kind.

JACK. Algy! Can't you recollect what our father's Christian name was?

ALGER. My dear boy, we were never even on speaking terms. He died before I was a year old.

JACK. His name would appear in the Army Lists of the period, I suppose, Aunt Augusta?

LADY B. The General was essentially a man of peace except in his domestic life. But I have no doubt his name would appear in any military directory.

JACK. The Army Lists of the last forty years are here. These delightful records should have been my constant study. [Rushes to bookcase and tears the books out.] M. Generals . . . Mallam, Maxbohm, Magley, what ghastly names they have—Markby, Migsby, Mobbs, Moncrieff! Lieutenant 1840, Captain, Lieutenant-Colonel, Colonel, General 1869, Christian names, Ernest John. [Puts book very quietly down and speaks quite calmly.] I always told you, Gwendolen, my name was Ernest, didn't I? Well, it is Ernest after all. I mean it naturally is Ernest.

LADY B. Yes, I remember that the General was called Ernest. I knew I had some particular reason for disliking the name.

GWEND. Ernest! My own Ernest! I felt from the first that you could have no other name!

JACK. Gwendolen, it is a terrible thing for a man to find out suddenly that all his life he has been speaking nothing but the truth. Can you forgive me?

GWEND. I can. For I feel that you are sure to 40 change.

JACK. My own one!

CHAS. [to Miss Prism]. Lætitia! [Embraces her.]

PRISM [enthusiastically]. Frederick! At last!

ALGER. Cecily! [Embraces her.] At last!

JACK. Gwendolen! [Embraces her.] At last!

LADY B. My nephew, you seem to be displaying signs of triviality.

JACK. On the contrary, Aunt Augusta, I've now realized for the first time in my life the vital 50 Importance of Being Earnest.

TABLEAU

CURTAIN

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE OF AUTHORS AND EVENTS

BEFORE CHRIST

Authors	Historical Events
	Age of Abraham (Palestine), c. 2000
Vedic Hymns (India), 14th century
Tale of the Two Brothers (Egypt), 14th century	Exodus of Hebrews from Egypt, c. 1300
	End of Mycenaean Age in Greece, 1200?
Homer, 10th or 9th century	Trojan War, c. 1200
Hesiod (Gr.), 8th century	David, king of Israel, c. 1000
	First Olympiad, 776
	Rome founded, 753
Sappho, 7th century	Israelites deported, 721
	Colonial expansion of Greece, 750-500
Thales, 7th and 6th century	Jews carried off to Babylon, 586
Anacreon, 563?-478	Return of Jews to Jerusalem, 537
	Persian Empire in power, 6th century
	Buddha, c. 550
	Confucius, c. 550
	Peisistratus died (Athens), 527
Æschylus, 525-456	Battle of Marathon, 490
	Æschylus wins his first prize for tragedy, 484
Pindar, 522-448	Battles of Thermopylæ and Salamis, 480
Sophocles, 496-406
Herodotus, 484-425	Age of Pericles, 445-431
Euripides, 480-406
Thucydides, 471?-400?	Peloponnesian War, 431-404
Socrates, 469-399
Democritus, 460?-362?
Aristophanes, 448?-380?
Xenophon, 430?-352
Plato, 427?-347
Demosthenes, 384-322	Philip becomes king of Macedonia, 359

Authors

Aristotle, 384-322
Epicurus, 342?-270
Zeno, 336?-264?
Theophrastus, d. 287?
Theocritus, 3d century
Plautus, 254-184
Terence, 194-159
Cicero, 106-43
Panchatantra (India), 1st century?
Lucretius, 96-55
Catullus, 87-54
Virgil, 70-19
Horace, 65-8
Livy, 59 B.C.-17 A.D.
Ovid, 43 B.C.-17 A.D.

Historical Events

Conquests of Alexander the Great, 336-323
Rise of Rome in importance, 338-290
Wars of Rome and Carthage, 264-146
Carthage destroyed, 146
Cæsar's conquest of Gaul, 58-50
Julius Cæsar assassinated, 44
Battle of Actium, 31
Augustus Cæsar emperor, 27 B.C.-14 A.D.
Birth of Jesus, 4 B.C.

ANNO DOMINI

Seneca, 2-66	Crucifixion of Jesus, 30
Petronius, d. A.D. 66
Plutarch, 46?-120?	Nero, emperor, 54-68
Tacitus, 55-120	Eruption of Vesuvius, 79
Juvenal, 60?-140?	Conquest of Britain by Rome, 84
Pliny the Younger, 62?-114?	Trajan, emperor, 98
Epictetus, 95-175	Hadrian, Roman Empire at greatest extent, 117
Apuleius, b. 125?	Marcus Aurelius, emperor, 161
Lucian, 125?-200	Marcus Aurelius' death begins a century of disorder in Rome, 180
	Constantine makes Christianity the official religion of Rome, 313

Authors	Historical Events	Authors	Historical Events
St. Augustine, 354-430	Rome sacked by Visigoths, 410 Invasion of Britain by Anglo-Saxons, 449 End of Roman Empire in the West, 476 Justinian closes schools of Athens, 529	Erasmus, 1466?-1536 Machiavelli, 1469-1527 Rabelais, 1490?-1553 Cellini, 1500-71 Ronsard, 1524-85	Discovery of America by Columbus, 1492 Vasco da Gama reaches India by sea, 1498 Henry VIII of England, 1509-47 Reformation in Germany, 1517-55 Elizabeth of England, 1558-1603
Beowulf (England), before 8th century	The Hegira: the beginning of Mohammedanism. The first year of the Moslem calendar, 622 Mohammedanism extends from Pyrenees to China, 715 Reign of Charlemagne, 768-814 Charlemagne crowned Emperor of the West, 800 Egbert, first king of England, 828 Settlement of Iceland, 874	Ercilla, 1530?-1600? Montaigne, 1533-92 Tasso (Italy), 1544-95 Cervantes (Spain), 1547-1616 Bruno, 1548-1600 Dyer, 1550-1607 Spenser, 1552-99 Raleigh, 1552?-1618 Lyly, 1554?-1606 Greene, 1560?-92 Bacon, 1561-1626 Lope de Vega (Spain), 1562-1635 Drayton, 1563-1631 Marlowe, 1564-93 Shakespeare, 1564-1616 Donne, 1573-1631 Jonson, 1573-1637 Gracián, 1601-1658 Wither, 1588-1667 Herrick, 1591-1674 Herbert, 1593-1633 Carew, 1598?-1639 Calderón (Spain), 1600-81 Waller, 1606-87 Milton, 1608-74 Suckling, 1609-42 La Rochefoucauld, 1613-80 Lovelace, 1618-58 Marvell, 1621-78 La Fontaine, 1621-95 Vaughan, 1622?-95 Molière, 1622-73	Massacre of St. Bartholomew (France), 1572 Defeat of the Spanish Armada, 1588 Virginia settled, 1607 Thirty Years' War, 1618-1648 Massachusetts settled, 1620 Louis XIV of France, 1643-1715 Execution of Charles I of England, 1649 Restoration of Charles II, 1660
Firdausi (Persia), 940?-1020?
Deirdre, 9th to 11th centuries	Norman conquest of England, 1066 First Crusade, 1095
Omar Khayyam (Persia), c. 1100
Marie de France
Aucassin and Nicolette, 12th century	Kubla Khan, 1260
Nibelungenlied, c. 1200	End of Crusades, 1291
St. Francis, 1182-1226
Sa'di, 1184-1291
Dante, 1265-1321
Petrarch, 1304-1374	Hundred Years' War, 1337-1453 The Black Death, 1348
Boccaccio, 1313-1375
Hafiz, 14th century
Chaucer, 1340?-1400
Thomas À Kempis, 1380-1471	Constantinople captured by Turks, 1453
Villon, 1431-after 1463	Cape of Good Hope rounded by Diaz, 1488
Malory, fl. 1470

Authors	Historical Events	Authors	Historical Events
Pascal, 1628-62		Hugo, 1802-85
Bunyan, 1628-88		Emerson, 1803-82
Dryden, 1631-1700		Hawthorne, 1804-64	Queen Victoria, 1837-1901
Pepys, 1632-1703	London Fire, 1666	Elizabeth Barrett Browning, 1806-61
Boileau, 1636-1711	New York becomes English, 1674	Mill, 1806-73
Racine, 1639-99		Longfellow, 1807-82
Defoe, 1659-1731		Poe, 1809-49
Swift, 1667-1745	Rise of Russia, 1689-1796	Gogol, 1809-1852
Le Sage, 1668-1747		Lincoln, 1809-65	American Civil War, 1861-65
Addison, 1672-1719		Tennyson, 1809-92
Steele, 1672-1729		Holmes, 1809-94
Pope, 1688-1744		Robert Browning, 1812-89
Montesquieu, 1689-1755	English power established in India, 1757-1857	Thoreau, 1817-62	Franco-Prussian War, and unification of Germany, 1870-71
Voltaire, 1694-1778	Peace of Paris: British dominant in America, 1763	Marx, 1818-83	Unification of Italy, 1871
Franklin, 1706-90		Turgenev (Russia), 1818-83
Goldoni (Italy), 1707-93		Lowell, 1819-91
Johnson, 1709-84		Melville, 1819-91
Rousseau, 1712-78		Whitman, 1819-92
Gray, 1716-71		Flaubert, 1821-80
Collins, 1721-59	American Revolution, 1775-83	Dostoyevsky, 1821-81
Goldsmith, 1728-74		Arnold, 1822-88
Lessing, 1729-81	American Constitution, 1787	Dante Gabriel Rossetti, 1828-82
Jefferson, 1743-1826	French Revolution, 1789-99	Ibsen (Norway), 1828-1906
Goethe, 1749-1832		Tolstoi (Russia), 1828-1910
Blake, 1757-1827		Christina Rossetti, 1830-94
Burns, 1759-96		Morris, 1834-96
Schiller, 1759-1805		Swinburne, 1837-1909
Chateaubriand, 1768-1848		Zola, 1840-1902
Wordsworth, 1770-1850		James, 1843-1916
Coleridge, 1772-1834	Battle of Waterloo, 1815	Nietzsche, 1844-1900
Lamb, 1775-1834	First railway, 1825	Henley, 1849-1903
Hazlitt, 1778-1830		Maupassant, 1850-93
De Quincey, 1785-1859	Greece independent, 1829	Stevenson, 1850-94
Byron, 1788-1824	Beginnings of the Industrial Revolution, c. 1830	Wilde, 1856-1900	Japan's victory over China, 1895
Shelley, 1792-1822		Housman, 1859-1936
Lamartine, 1790-1869		Chekhov, 1860-1904
Keats, 1795-1821	Democratic movement in Europe, 1830-48	Hauptmann, 1862-	Japan's defeat of Russia and her rise to the rank of a World Power, 1904
Carlyle, 1795-1881	English Reform Bill and triumph of democracy, 1832		World War, 1914-18
Heine, 1797-1856
Balzac, 1799-1850

INDEX OF MYTHOLOGICAL SUBJECTS

- Achilles, 40 ff.
 Acrisius, 24
 Actæon, 21
 Adonis, 23, 264
 Æacus, 218 ff.
 Ægeus, 28, 32
 Ægis, 14, 25
 Ægisthus, 151 ff.
 Æneas, 41
 Æsculapius, 33
 Æson, 26 f.
 Ætes, 26
 Agamemnon, 40 ff., 151 ff.
 Aglaia, 15
 Agriculture, goddess of, 14
 Ajax, 14
 Alecto, 15
 Alfadur, 510
 Althea, 28
 Amazons, 30, 33
 Ambrosia, 13
 Andromache, 41, 51
 Andromeda, 25
 Antæus, 31
 Anteros, 14
 Antigone, 174 ff.
 Antiope, 33
 Aphrodite, 258, 264, 345 f. See also
 Venus
 Apollo, 13, 14, 18, 41 ff., 192 ff.
 Apple of discord, 40, 345 ff.
 Apples of Hesperides, 31
 Ares. See Mars
 Argonauts, 26
 Argus, 19
 Ariadne, 33
 Arrows of love, 13
 Artemis. See Diana
 Asgard, 508, 510
 Aske, 510
 Astræa, 17
 Atalanta, 28-30
 Athene (Minerva), 345 f. See also Minerva
 Atlas, 14, 31
 Atreus, 41, 151
 Atropos, 15
 Audhumbla, 510
 Augean stables, 30
 Aulis, Iphigenia at, 41, 154

 Bacchus, 14, 22, 210 ff.
 Baldur, 507 ff.
 Bear (constellation), 21
 Bellerophon, 50 f.
 Bellona, 15
 Bifrost, 509, 510
 Blacksmith of the gods, 13
 Blessed, Isles of the, 13
 Boreas, 187
 Box, Pandora's, 16
 Bragi, 511
 Brazen Age, 17
 Brising's necklace, 518

 Cacus, 31
 Caduceus, 14
 Calliope, 15
 Callisto, 20
 Calydonian hunt, 28
 Cassandra, 151 ff.
 Cassiopeia, 25
 Centaur, 32
 Cepheus, 25
 Cerberus, 31, 218
 Ceres, 14, 309
 Cestus (Venus' girdle), 14
 Chaos, 13
 Charon, 214, 341 ff.
 Cicones, 70
 Clio, 15
 Clotho, 15
 Clytæmnestra, 151 ff.
 Cocytus, 166
 Colchis, 26
 Creation, 16
 Creon, 174 ff.
 Creusa, 28
 Crocale, 21
 Cronos, 15. See also Saturn
 Cupid, 14, 19, 311 ff.
 Cybele, 30
 Cyclops, 71, 261

 Dædalus, 34
 Danaë, 24
 Danaüs, 35
 Daphne, 18
 Dawn, 13
 Dead, god of the, 14; queen of, 14
 Dejanira, 32
 Deluge, 17
 Demeter. See Ceres
 Deucalion, 17
 Diana, 14
 Diana and Actæon, 21
 Diomedes, 40, 50
 Dione, 14
 Dionysus. See Bacchus
 Dis. See Pluto, 309
 Discord, apple of, 40
 Dress of the goddesses, 13
 Dwelling of the gods, 13

 Earth, shape of, 12
 Echo, 23
 Elder gods, 13
 Elli, 507
 Elves, 509, 511
 Elysian fields, 13
 Embla, 510
 Epimetheus, 16
 Erato, 15
 Erebus, 13
 Erinnyes, 15, 173
 Eris (discord), 40
 Eros, 13. See also Cupid
 Eteocles, 174 ff.
 Ethiopians, 12
 Eumenides, 15, 173

 Euphrosyne, 15
 Eurydice, 34
 Eurynome, 13
 Eurytion, 31
 Euterpe, 15

 Fates, 15
 Faunus, 15
 Fenris wolf, 509, 511-12
 Flood, 17
 Flora, 15
 Frey, 509, 511
 Freyja, 510-11
 Frigg, 508
 Furies, 15

 Galatea and Cyclops, 261; and Pyg-malion, 308
 Genius, 16
 Geryon, 31
 Giallar horn, 509
 Glaucus and Diomedes, 50
 Gleipnir, 512
 Gods, Greek, 12
 Golden Age, 17; Fleece, 25
 Gorgon, 25
 Graces, 15
 Gulltop, 509
 Gyll river, 508

 Hebe, 13
 Hecate, 26 f.
 Hector, 41
 Hecuba (Hekabe), 53
 Heidrum, 511
 Heimdall, 509, 511
 Hel, 508
 Hela, 508, 511-12
 Helen, 33, 40, 52 ff., 347; and Paris, 156, 160
 Helle, 25
 Hellespont, 25
 Hephæstus, 48, 59. See also Vulcan
 Hera. See Juno
 Heracles. See Hercules
 Hercules, 30 ff., 77, 198 ff., 211 ff.
 Hermes, 341 ff., 345 f. See also Mercury
 Hermod, 508
 Hesperides, 31
 Hestia, 15
 Hippolyta, 33
 Hippomenes, 29
 Hlorrithi, 519
 Hodur, 508
 Houses of the gods, 13
 Hringham, 508
 Hugl, 507
 Hyale, 21
 Hydra, 30
 Hymen, 34
 Hyperboreans, 12
 Hyperion, 13

 Iapetus, 13
 Icarus, 34

- Iduna, 511
 Io, 19
 Iphigenia, 41; at Aulis, 154
 Iris, 14
 Iron Age, 17
 Isles of the Blessed, 13
 Ismene, 174 ff.
 Ixion, 35
 Janus, 15
 Jason, 26
 Jocasta, 174
 Jotunheim, 504 ff., 510
 Jove. See Jupiter
 Judgment of Paris, 40, 345
 Juno (Hera), 14, 40 ff., 47 ff., 345 f.
 Jupiter, 13, 15, 40, 345
 Labors of Hercules, 30 ff.
 Labyrinth, 33
 Lachesis, 15
 Laius, 140 ff., 174
 Laomedon, 48
 Lares, 15
 Latona, 14
 Liber, 15
 Logi, 507
 Loki, 504 ff., 510 ff.
 Lotos-eaters, 70
 Love (Eros), 13
 Lucina, 15
 Lyre, invention of, 14
 Madness of Hercules, 31
 Man, creation of, 16, 18
 Mars, 14
 Medea, 26 ff.
 Medusa, 24
 Megæra, 15
 Meleager, 28
 Melpomene, 15
 Menelaus, 40
 Mercury, 14; and Argus, 20
 Metis, 13
 Midas, 22
 Midgard, 510, 511; serpent, 509
 Milky Way, 17
 Minemosyn, 13
 Minerva, 14, 54, 345 f.
 Minos, 33
 Minotaur, 33
 Mnemosyne, 14
 Momus, 15
 Moon, goddess of, 14
 Mulciber, 15
 Muses, 14
 Muspelheim, 509
 Nanna, 508
 Narcissus, 23
 Nectar, 13
 Nemean lion, 30
 Nemesis, 15
 Nephele, 21
 Neptune, 14
 Nereïds (listed), 55
 Nessus, 32
 Nestor, 40
 Nidhogge, 510
 Nifflenheim, 509, 510
 Night, 13
 Ocean, river, 12; god of, 14
 Oceanus, 13
 Odin, 508, 510
 Odysseus, 62 ff. See also Ulysses
 Œdipus, 139 ff., 174
 Olympus, home of the gods, 12, 13, 47
 Ophion, 13
 Ops. See Rhea
 Orestes, 150 f., 173
 Orpheus, 34
 Palamedes, 40
 Pales, 15
 Pallas. See Minerva
 Pan, 15, 22
 Pandora, 16
 Paris, judgment of, 40, 151, 345 f.
 Peleus, 40
 Pelias, 26
 Pelops, 259
 Penates, 15
 Penelope, 40, 77 ff.
 Persephone. See Proserpine
 Perseus, 24
 Phædra, 33
 Phineus, 187
 Phæbus. See Apollo
 Phryxus, 26
 Pillars of Hercules, 31
 Pirithous, 33
 Pluto, 14, 231, 309
 Plutus, 15
 Polydectes, 24
 Polyhymnia, 15
 Polykneikes, 174 ff.
 Polyphemus, 261. See also Cyclops
 Pomona, 15
 Poseidon. See Neptune
 Priam, 40
 Procrustes, 32
 Prometheus, 16, 18
 Proserpine, Proserpina, 14, 309
 Psyche, 311 ff.
 Pygmalion and Galatea, 308
 Pylades, 173
 Pyrrha, 17
 Python, 18
 Quirinus, 15
 Race, Atalanta's, 29
 Ragnarok, 509
 Rainbow bridge, 509
 Rainbow, goddess of, 14
 Reign of Saturn, 13
 Rhea, 13
 River Gyll, 508
 River Ocean, 12
 Roman divinities, 15
 Saturn, 13, 15
 Satyrs, 15
 Schrimnir, 511
 Seasons (goddesses), 13
 Semele, 14
 Shield of Achilles, 60 f.
 Shirt, Nessus', 32
 Silenus, 22
 Silver Age, 17
 Skrymir, 505
 Skuld, 510
 Sleipnir, 508
 Sphinx, riddle of, 139, 174
 Stars, 13
 Stygian river, 24
 Styx, 24
 Sun, boat of the, 13
 Sun-god, 13
 Surtur, 509
 Symplegades, 26
 Syrinx, 20
 Tantalus, 35, 260
 Tartarus, 14
 Tauri, Iphigenia at, 41
 Teiresias, 140, 174 ff.
 Telemachus, 62, 77
 Tellus, 27
 Terminus, 15
 Terpsichore, 15
 Tethys, 21
 Thalia, 15
 Thaukt, 508
 Thebes, seven against, 176
 Themis, 13, 15
 Theseus, 32
 Thetis, 40, 55 f., 59
 Thialfi, 504
 Thor, 504 ff., 511
 Thrym, 510 ff.
 Tisiphone, 15
 Titans, 13
 Trojan war, 40 ff., 152 f.
 Tyr, 512
 Ulysses, 40. See also Odysseus
 Urania, 15
 Urdur, 510
 Utgard-Loki, 505 ff.
 Valhalla, 509-11
 Valkyri, 509-11
 Ve, 510
 Venus, 14, 40, 311 ff., 345 f.
 Venus and Adonis, 23
 Verdandi, 510
 Vesta, 15
 Vigrid, 509
 Vili, 510
 Voluptas, 319
 Vulcan, 13, 14
 Wine, god of, 14
 Wisdom, goddess of, 14
 Woman, creation of, 16
 Ygdrasill, 510
 Ymir, 510
 Zeus. See Jupiter

GENERAL INDEX

AUTHORS, TITLES, FIRST LINES

A baby's feet, like sea-shells pink.....	1341	At the midnight in the silence of the sleep-time..	1329
A balmy warmth comes wafted o'er the seas....	269	At times I am fast confined by my Master.....	1014
A Cobbler sang from morn till night.....	745	At times I travel in tracks undreamed of.....	1014
A dream it was in which I found myself.....	658	Aucassin and Nicolette	554
A knock, Come in! Who now would break my rest?	814	AUGUSTINE, SAINT	449
A late lark twitters from the quiet skies.....	1342	Auld Lang Syne	1246
A man found a treasure; and, what's very strange	265	Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones	1163
A pine tree standeth lonely.....	838	Aye, tear her tattered ensign down!.....	1352
A slumber did my spirit seal.....	1253	BACON, FRANCIS	1174
A stern destroyer struck out my life	1016	Ballad of Dead Ladies, The	671
A thing of beauty is a joy for ever.....	1274	Ballad of the Women of Paris	672
A tumult in a Syrian town had place.....	491	BALZAC, HONORÉ DE.....	757
A widow poor, somewhat advanced in age.....	1077	Banks o' Doon, The	1248
ABELARD	570	Bard of Love, The	267
Abelard to Heloise	570	Battle of Marathon, The	111
Abenamar, Abenamar	575	Beautiful Evelyn Hope is dead.....	1324
Abraham and Isaac	417	Beautiful Hsi-Shih, The	478
ADDISON, JOSEPH.....	1204	Before	1341
Address at Gettysburg	1312	Before Sunrise	842
Æneid, The	279	Beginnings of Civilization	396
ÆSCHYLUS	151	Behold her, single in the field.....	1254
Æe fond kiss, and then we sever.....	1247	Behold me waiting—waiting for the knife.....	1341
Agamemnon	151	Behold, My Servant	434
Ah, Sunflower! weary of time.....	1250	Behold, my servant shall deal prudently.....	434
A KEMPIS, THOMAS.....	454	Behold, the Meads	552
Alas, my Postumus, our years.....	272	Behold, the meads are green again.....	552
Alas, so all things now do hold their peace!	618	Beowulf	990
Albeit the Venice girls get praise.....	672	BHAGAVAT GITA	467
Alcestis	192	Bible, A	1016
Alexander's Feast, or, The Power of Music	1214	BIBLE, THE	414
All that I know.....	1325	Birthday, A	1336
Amadan of the Dough, The	538	Biryuk	926
Ambitious Guest, The	1369	BLAKE, WILLIAM.....	1249
ANACREON	266	Blessed Damsel, The	1334
ANACREONTICS	267	Blow, blow, thou winter wind.....	1145
Analects	475	BOCCACCIO	619
And now to what remains!—Since I've resolved..	393	Bonny Barbara Allen	1062
And Paris be it or Helen dying.....	672	Book of the Dead	460
And so an easier life our Cyclops drew.....	261	Bore, The	336
And there shall come forth a rod.....	434	Bought Locks	338
Annabel Lee	1354	Bowl of Roses, A	1342
Announced by all the trumpets of the sky.....	1348	Break, break, break.....	1320
Anonymous Alba	552	Bridging the Hellespont	114
Answering Vice-Prefect Chang	477	Bright star! would I were steadfast as thou art...	1274
Antigone	174	Bringing in the Wine	477
Anxiety of a Young Lady to Get Married	478	BROWNING, ELIZABETH BARRETT.....	1329
Apollo and Daphne	18	BROWNING, ROBERT.....	1323
Apology of Socrates, The	355	BRUNO, GIORDANO.....	638
Apparition of Mrs. Veal, The	1186	Brute Neighbors	1307
Appelles' Song	1140	BULFINCH, THOMAS.....	12, 40, 173, 174, 504
APULEIUS	311	Buried Life, The	1332
Arabian Nights, The	493	BURNS, ROBERT.....	1242
Areopagitica	1176	Bustan, The	491
ARISTOPHANES	210	Busy Man Sighs for the Country, A	327
ARISTOTLE	142, 385	By the rude bridge that arched the flood	1349
ARNOLD, MATTHEW.....	4, 521, 1330	By ways remote and distant waters sped.....	269
As biting Winter flies, lo, Spring with sunny skies	270	BYRON, LORD.....	1267
Ashamed at times that I am silent, yet.....	619	CALDERON DE LA BARCA.....	658
As late I sought the spangled bowers.....	267	Callisto	20
As the years go by, give me but peace.....	477	Calm was the day, and through the trembling air ..	1142
Atalanta	29	Candide	751
Attending a Greek Play	138
At the gate of old Granada.....	576

Canterbury Tales, The	1068	Days	1349
Canticle of the Sun	453	De Profundis	1337
Captain, or Colonel, or Knight in arms.....	1163	DE QUINCEY, THOMAS.....	1289
Captives, The	234	Dead Sparrow, The	269
CAREW, THOMAS.....	1152	Dear Sirmio, that art the very eye.....	268
CARLYLE, THOMAS.....	1292	Death of Baldur, The	507
Cask of Amantillado, The	1373	Death of Cleopatra, The	271
Cast thy bread upon the waters.....	428	Death of Ivan Ilyitch, The	930
Casting of the Perseus, The	633	Death, of thee do I make my moan.....	671
CATULLUS	268	Decameron, The	619
CELLINI, BENVENUTO.....	633	Declaration of Independence	1299
CERVANTES, MIGUEL DE.....	641	Definitions	1211
Chambered Nautilus, The	1352	DEFOE, DANIEL.....	1186
Character of Mr. Spectator	1204	Deirdre	523
Characters, The	321	Deor's Lament	1013
CHAUCER, GEOFFREY.....	1068	Der Mond Ist Aufgegangen	838
CHEKHOV, ANTON.....	961	Description of Egypt	107
CHENEY, SHELDON.....	138	Deserted Village, The	1235
Cherry Orchard, The	961	Destruction of Sennacherib, The	1268
Child Moses, The	424	Dialogues of the Dead	341
Chinese Poems	477	Dialogues of the Gods	345
Chloe, thou fliest me like a fawn.....	271	Diana and Actæon	21
Choric Song from the Lotos-Eaters	1317	Diary	1180
Chorus	1339	Dies Irae	452
Christening	787	Discourse on Inequality, A	763
Christmas Tree and the Wedding, The	957	Disdain Returned	1152
Cicada, A	479	Doll's House, A	844
Cicada, The	268	Don Quixote	641
CICERO	322	DONNE, JOHN.....	1149
Cloak, The	912	DOSTOYEVSKY, FIODOR M.....	957
Cloud, The	1271	Dover Beach	1333
Cobbler and the Rich Man, The	745	DRAYTON, MICHAEL.....	1142
COLERIDGE, SAMUEL TAYLOR.....	1258	Dream Called Life, The	658
Collar, The	1153	Dream of the Rood	1016
COLLINS, WILLIAM	1231	Dream-Children: A Reverie	1280
Come, dear children, let us away.....	1330	Drink, comrades, drink; give loose to mirth.....	271
Come live with me and be my Love.....	1141	Drink to me only with thine eyes.....	1148
Come up from the fields, father, here's a letter from our Pete.....	1362	DRYDEN, JOHN.....	1214
Complaint, A	478	Du Bist Wie Eine Blume	840
Complaint by Night of the Lover, A	618	Du Schönes Fischer-Mädchen	839
Composed by the Seaside near Calais, August, 1802	1253	DYER, EDWARD.....	1141
Composed upon Westminster Bridge, Sept. 3, 1802	1253	Dying Eusebio's Address, The	658
Concord Hymn	1349	Early Christians, The	331
Confessions	449	Earth has not anything to show more fair.....	1253
CONFUCIUS	475	Echo and Narcissus	23
Constant Lover, The	1152	Edward	1061
Corinna's Going a-Maying	1150	Ein Fichtenbaum Steht Einsam	838
Corinthian Bronze Statue, A	327	Elcgy Written in a Country Churchyard	1232
Council Held by the Rats, The	744	Elves, The	509
Country House for a Professor, A	328	EMERSON, RALPH WALDO.....	1301, 1348
Creation and First Ages, The	16	ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH BALLADS.....	1061
Creation Hymn, The	466	Epigrams	1209
Creator Spirit, by whose aid.....	451	Epilogue	1345
Cromwell, our chief of men, who through a cloud	1163	Epilogue to Asolando	1329
Crossing the Bar	1323	Epistle in Form of a Ballad to His Friends	672
Cupid and my Campaspe played.....	1140	Epitaph in Form of a Ballad, The	673
Cupid and Psyche	311	ERCILLA, ALONSO DE.....	653
Customs of the Germans	304	Eruption of Vesuvius, The ..	328
Cyclops, The	261	Essay on Criticism, An	1225
Dædalus	34	Essays	682
Dancer, The	492	Étude Réaliste	1341
DANTE ALIGHIERI.....	582	EURIPIDES	192
Daughters of Time, the hypocritic Days.....	1249	Evelyn Hope	1324
David and Bathsheba	426	Fable for Critics, A	1355
Day Is Done, The	1350	Fables (La Fontaine)	742

- Fair daffodils, we weep to see..... 1151
 Fair flower of fifteen springs, that still..... 673
 Fair Star of evening, Splendor of the west..... 1253
 Falcon of Sir Federigo, The..... 624
 Farewell to Bithynia..... 269
 Fate of the Sons of Usnach, The..... 523
Faust..... 814
 Fear death?—to feel the fog in my throat..... 1329
 Fear no more the heat o' the sun..... 1145
 First Voyage of Es-Sindibad of the Sea, The..... 493
 Five years have passed; five summers, with the length..... 1250
 FLAUBERT, GUSTAVE..... 773
 Flower in the crannied wall..... 1323
 For France two grenadiers held their way..... 838
 Forsaken Merman, The..... 1330
 Fountain of Bandusia, The..... 273
 Fragment of a Sonnet..... 673
 Fragment on Death..... 672
 FRANCE, ANATOLE..... 800
 FRANCIS OF ASSISI, SAINT..... 453
 FRENCH TROUBADOUR SONGS..... 552
 Frogs, The..... 210
 From Endymion..... 1274
 From Slavery to Slavery..... 491
 Full fathom five thy father lies..... 1145
 Full many a glorious morning have I seen..... 1146
 Funeral of Baldur, The..... 508
 Funeral Oration of Pericles, The..... 130
 Fuscus, the man of life upright and pure..... 271

 Garden, The..... 1155
 Garden of Eden, The..... 414
 Garden of Proserpine, The..... 1340
Gargantua..... 674
 Garland for Heliodora, A..... 265
 Gather ye rosebuds while ye may..... 1151
Germinal..... 789
 Get up, get up for shame! The blooming morn..... 1150
 Give me the harp of epic song..... 266
 Go and catch a falling star..... 1149
 Go, lovely Rose—..... 1149
 GOETHE, J. W. VON..... 814
 GOGOL, NIKOLAY V..... 912
 Gold..... 767
 Golden Fleece, The..... 25
 GOLDSMITH, OLIVER..... 1235
 Good Crop, A..... 327
 Good Heirs..... 328
 Gospel of Love, The..... 444
 GRACIÁN, BALTASAR..... 658
 GRAY, THOMAS..... 1232
 Great Physician, The..... 491
 Great trees in the south..... 477
 GREEK ANTHOLOGY, THE..... 265
 Greek Gods, The..... 12
 GREENE, ROBERT..... 1140
 Grenadiers, The..... 838
 Grow old along with me!..... 1326
 Growing Old..... 1333
 Guests of a Snob, The..... 327
 Gulistan, The..... 490
 Gulliver's Travels..... 1190

 Halls of Admetus, hail! I stooped my pride..... 192
Hamlet..... 1088
 Hannibal's March Across the Alps..... 300
 Happy Marriage, A..... 1207
 Hark, hark! the lark at heaven's gate sings..... 1145
 HAUPTMANN, GERHART..... 875
 Have pity, pity, friends, have pity on me..... 672
 HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL..... 1369
 Haystack in the Floods, The..... 1337
 HAZLITT, WILLIAM..... 1284
 Hear'st thou, my soul, what serious things..... 452
 He Hopes That Time Will Render Her More Merciful..... 619
 He that loves a rosy cheek..... 1152
 Hebraism and Hellenism..... 4
 HEINE, HEINRICH..... 838
 Helen, thy beauty is to me..... 1353
 Hell-Ride of Brynhild, The..... 516
 HELOISE..... 567
 Heloise to Abelard..... 567
 Hence, loathed Melancholy..... 1159
 Hence, vain, deluding Joys..... 1161
 HENLEY, WILLIAM ERNEST..... 1341
Heraclitus..... 265
 HERBERT, GEORGE..... 1153
Hercules..... 30
 Here, where the world is quiet..... 1340
 HERODOTUS..... 107
 Heron That Liked Crab-meat, The..... 471
 HERRICK, ROBERT..... 1150
Hesperus the Bringer..... 258
 He that owns wealth, in mountain, wold, or waste..... 491
 He unto whom thou art so partial..... 337
 Highland Mary..... 1248
 Hinted Wish, A..... 337
 His glory, by whose might all things are moved..... 606
 History..... 107
 HOLMES, OLIVER WENDELL..... 1352
 Home..... 477
 Home to Sirmio..... 268
 Home they brought her warrior dead..... 1320
 HOMER..... 41
 Homeric Hymn..... 258
 Homeward..... 479
 HORACE..... 270, 336
 Horn, A..... 1015
 HOUSMAN, A. E..... 1343
 How do I love thee? Let me count the ways..... 1330
 How sleep the brave who sink to rest..... 1232
 How soon hath Time, the subtle thief of youth..... 1162
 How the Crow-Hen Killed the Black Snake..... 471
 How vainly men themselves amaze..... 1155
 Hymn to Intellectual Beauty..... 1269
 Hymn to Rā..... 460
 Hymn to the Night..... 1350
 Hymn, Homeric..... 258
 Hymns, Latin..... 451
 Hymns of Praise..... 427

 I arise from dreams of thee..... 1271
 I ask the Gods a respite from these toils..... 151
 I bring fresh showers for the thirsting flowers..... 1271
 I can love both fair and brown..... 1149
 I cannot tell what's coming o'er me..... 839
 I care not for the idle state..... 267
 I could resign that eye of blue..... 337
 I find no peace, and all my war is done..... 618

I hate and love—the why I cannot tell.....	269	L'Allegro	1159
I have borne the anguish of love.....	493	La Araucana	653
I heard how, to the beat of some quick tune.....	492	LA ROCHEFOUCAULD	746
I heard the trailing garments of the Night.....	1350	Labor	1292
I like a church; I like a cowl.....	1348	Ladies that have intelligence in love.....	615
I long to talk with some old lover's ghost.....	1150	Lady, if grace to me so long be lent.....	619
I met a traveler from an antique land.....	1270	LA FONTAINE, JEAN DE	742
I said—Then, dearest, since 'tis so.....	1325	LAMB, CHARLES	1280
I said to heaven that glowed above.....	493	Lamb, The	1250
I saw Eternity the other night.....	1153	Lamentation for Celin, The	576
I saw him once before.....	1352	Last Leaf, The	1352
I saw the smiling bard of pleasure.....	266	Last Ride Together, The	1325
I struck the board, and cry'd, "No more.....	1153	Last Supper, The	442
I thought once how Theocritus had sung.....	1329	Last Words ..	840
I traveled among unknown men.....	1252	Latin Hymns	451
I wandered lonely as a cloud.....	1257	La Vita Nuova	615
I was asking for something specific and perfect for my city	1363	Lay, The, Called the Short Lay of Sigurd	512
I was once an armed warrior. Now the worthy youth	1015	Lay of the Honeysuckle, The	553
I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills.....	428	Lay of Thrym, The	517
I wish to tune my quivering lyre.....	267	Leap and Creep	473
IBSEN, HENRIK	844	Lecinius Murena	272
If all the world and love were young.....	1141	LESSING, GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM	812
If aught of oaten stop, or pastoral song.....	1231	Let me not to the marriage of true minds	1148
Iliad, The	41	Let us, Lesbia darling, still.....	268
I'll frame, my Heliodora, a garland for thy hair..	265	Letter Dedicatory	321
Il Penseroso	1161	Letter to Lord Chesterfield	1211
Importance of Being Earnest, The	1390	Letters (Cicero)	322
In Absence	479	Letters (Pliny the Younger)	326
In Babylon, where first her queen, for state.....	309	Letters of Abelard and Heloise	567
In Freedom's war, of "Thirty Years" and more....	840	Levana and Our Ladies of Sorrow	1189
In holy night we made the vow.....	265	Light flows our war of mocking words, and yet..	1332
In Memoriam A. H. H.	1321	Like the sweet apple which reddens upon.....	258
In the beginning there arose the Golden Child....	466	LINCOLN, ABRAHAM	1312
In the midway of this our mortal life.....	582	Lines (Tintern Abbey)	1250
In Xanadu did Kubla Khan.....	1258	Listen to the Muse's lyre.....	266
Indian Serenade, The	1271	Little Lamb, who made thee?.....	1250
Indifferent, The	1149	Little Testament, The	668
Inferno ..	582	LIVY	300
Introduction to Songs of Innocence	1249	Lo, I shall tell you the truest of visions.....	1016
Invictus	1341	London, 1802	1254
Io	19	LONGFELLOW, HENRY WADSWORTH	1350
Irony, An ..	265	Lord Randal	1062
"Is my team plowing.....	1343	Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle?.....	427
Is there, for honest poverty.....	1248	Loreley	839
Ismene, mine own sister, darling one!.....	175	Lost Child—Enfant Perdu	840
It chanced that I, the other day.....	336	Love a bee, that lurked among.....	268
It is a beauteous evening, calm and free.....	1253	Love he to-morrow, who loved never	275
It is an ancient Mariner.....	1259	Love is All	268
It is time to be old ..	1349	Love Lyrics (Bible)	429
It little profits that an idle king.....	1319	Love's Deity	1150
It was a bowl of roses.....	1342	Love's Inconsistency	618
It was in and about the Martinmas time.....	1062	Love's Unreason	269
It was many and many a year ago.....	1354	LOVELACE, RICHARD	1151
JAMES, HENRY	1381	Lovelier than all the rest.....	478
JEFFERSON, THOMAS	1299	Loveliest of trees, the cherry now.....	1343
Jephthah's Daughter	425	LOWELL, JAMES RUSSELL	1355
Job's Questions ..	435	LUCIAN	341
John Anderson, my jo, John.....	1247	LUCRETIVUS	393
JOHNSON, SAMUEL	1209	Lycidas	1157
JONSON, BEN	1148	LYLY, JOHN	1140
Joseph and His Brethren	417	Lyrics from The Princess	1320
Judgment of Paris, The	345	MACMANUS, SEUMAS	538
KEATS, JOHN	39, 1274	MACHIAVELLI, NICCOLÒ ..	626
Kubla Khan	1258	Madly Singing in the Mountains	479
		Maid of Athens, ere we part.....	1267
		MALORY, THOMAS	1052

- Man's a Man for A' That, A*..... 1248
Mannabatta 1363
 Man that is born of woman..... 435
 MARCUS AURELIUS..... 402
Margarite Sorori 1342
 MARIE DE FRANCE..... 553
 MARLOWE, CHRISTOPHER..... 1141
 MARTIAL 337
 MARVELL, ANDREW 1154
Mary Hamilton..... 1065
Mary Morison 1245
 Master, shall I begin with the usual jokes..... 210
 MAUPASSANT, GUY DE..... 787
Medea and Æson 27
Meditations (Marcus Aurelius)..... 402
Meditations in Westminster Abbey..... 1206
Meleager 28
 MELVILLE, HERMAN..... 1376
 Men, brother men, that after us yet live..... 673
Messiah, The 274
Metamorphoses 308
Mice That Ate Iron, The..... 474
Midas 22
 MILTON, JOHN..... 1157, 1176
 Milton! thou shouldst be living at this hour..... 1254
Miser, The 695
Moby Dick 1376
 MOLIÈRE 695
 MONTAIGNE, MICHEL DE 682
 MORRIS, WILLIAM..... 1337
Morte d'Arthur, Le..... 1052
Much have I traveled in the realms of gold..... 39
 MURRAY, GILBERT 93
 My bonnie blithe fisher-maiden..... 839
 My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains... 1275
 My heart is like a singing bird..... 1336
 My heart leaps up when I behold..... 1253
My Jean..... 1246
My Last Duchess..... 1324
 My mind is settled, dear Theramenes..... 723
 My mind to me a kingdom is..... 1141
 My name, my country, what are they to thee?... 265
 My robe is noiseless when I roam the earth..... 1015
My Star (Browning, Robert)..... 1325
My Star (Plato)..... 265
 My tameless will doth recklessly pursue..... 618
Myths of Greece and Rome..... 12
Myths of the Trojan War..... 40

Nathan the Wise..... 812
Nature of Tragedy, The..... 142
 Nature withheld Cassandra in the skies..... 673
 "Nay, with my goodwill..... 516
News-making 321
Nicomachean Ethics, The..... 385
 NIETZSCHE, FRIEDRICH 842
 No letters to the frontier come..... 479
 No longer mourn for me when I am dead..... 1147
No Marvel Is It..... 552
 No marvel is it if I sing..... 552
No Matter 265
 No more shall meads be decked with flowers..... 1152
Noah and the Flood..... 415
 None could ever say that she..... 269
 Not marble, nor the gilded monuments..... 1146
 Not mine own fears, nor the prophetic soul..... 1147
 Not of ladies, love, or graces..... 653

Nun's Priest's Tale, The..... 1077
Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd, The..... 1141

 O babbling Spring, than glass more clear..... 273
 O blithe New-comer! I have heard..... 1257
 O Captain! my Captain! our fearful trip is done.. 1362
 O come, let us sing unto the Lord..... 428
 O Hesperus, thou bringest all good things..... 258
 O Lord our Lord..... 427
 O Mary, at thy window be..... 1245
 O Mistress mine, where are you roaming?..... 1145
 O most high, almighty, good Lord God, to thee belong praise, glory, honor, and all blessing.... 453
 O my Love's like a red, red rose..... 1246
 O thou Moor of Moreria..... 575
 O universal Mother, who dost keep..... 258
 O wert thou in the cauld blast..... 1249
 O where hae ye been, Lord Randal, my son?..... 1062
 O wild West Wind, thou breath of Autumn's being 1270
Oak and the Reed, The..... 743
Obscure Night of the Soul, The..... 652
Ode (Collins) 1232
Ode (Wordsworth)..... 1254
Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College..... 1234
Ode on a Grecian Urn..... 1275
Ode to a Nightingale..... 1275
Ode to Aphrodite..... 258
Ode to Evening..... 1231
Ode to the West Wind..... 1270
Odes (Hafiz)..... 493
Odes (Horace) 270
Odes of Anacreon..... 266
Odyssey, The..... 62
 O'er better waves to speed her rapid course..... 593
 Of a' the airts the wind can blow..... 1246
Of Democritus and Heraclitus 693
Of His Foolish Passion for Laura..... 618
Of Loki and His Progeny 511
 Of Man's first disobedience, and the fruit..... 1164
Of Marriage and Single Life..... 1175
Of Studies..... 1176
Of the Education of Children..... 682
Of the Imitation of Christ..... 454
Of the Joys of Valhalla..... 511
Of the Nature of Things..... 393
Of Thor and the Other Gods..... 511
Of Truth..... 1174
 Oft have I said, I say it once more..... 493
 Oft have I seen at some cathedral door..... 1351
 Oh why is heaven built so far..... 1337
Old and New Tables..... 843
Old China..... 1282
Old Ironsides..... 1352
 Old Rodilard, a certain Cat..... 744
Olympian Ode I..... 259
 OMAR KHAYYAM..... 484
On a Drop of Dew..... 1154
On First Looking into Chapman's Homer..... 37
On Going a Journey..... 1284
On His Blindness..... 1163
On His Having Arrived at the Age of Twenty-three 1162
On the Burial of His Brother 269
On the Extinction of the Venetian Republic..... 1254
On the Grasshopper and Cricket..... 1274
 On the idle hill of summer..... 1344
On the Late Massacre in Piedmont..... 1163

- On the Study of Celtic Literature*..... 521
On Translating the Divina Commedia..... 1351
 On Wenlock Edge the wood's in trouble..... 1344
 On your verdant throne elate..... 268
 Once did She hold the gorgeous east in fee..... 1254
One Girl..... 258
 Or ever the knightly years were gone..... 1342
Origins and Savage Period of Mankind..... 395
Origins of Vegetable and Animal Life..... 393
Orpheus and Eurydice..... 34
 Others abide our question. Thou art free..... 1330
 Out of the night that covers me..... 1341
 Out upon it, I have loved..... 1152
 OVID..... 308
Ozymandias..... 1270
Panchatantra, The..... 471
Pantagruel..... 679
Paradise..... 606
Paradise Lost..... 1164
 PASCAL, BLAISE..... 747
Passionate Shepherd to His Love, The..... 1141
Paste..... 1381
 PEPYS, SAMUEL..... 1180
Pericles..... 119
Perseus and Medusa..... 24
Persian Song, A..... 492
 Persia's pomp, my boy, I hate..... 271
 PETRARCH..... 618
 PETRONIUS..... 338
Phædo..... 367
Phædra..... 723
Philosophy of the Infinite Universe, A..... 638
 PINDAR..... 259
 Piping down the valleys wild..... 1249
 PLATO..... 355
 PLAUTUS..... 234
 PLINY THE YOUNGER..... 326
 PLUTARCH..... 119
Pluto and Proserpine..... 308
 POE, EDGAR ALLAN..... 1353, 1373
 POITIERS, GUILLAUME DE..... 552
 POPE, ALEXANDER..... 1216
Porphyria's Lover..... 1323
Post-Obits and the Poets..... 337
Praises of Laura Transcend His Poetic Power, The..... 619
Prefatory (Pliny's letters)..... 326
Prince, The..... 626
Problem, The..... 1348
Procrastination..... 338
Procurator of Judea, The..... 800
Prologue, The (Canterbury Tales)..... 1068
Prospect..... 1329
Protestation, The..... 1152
Prothalamion..... 1142
 Psalms..... 427
Pulley, The..... 1153
Pulvis et Umbra..... 1294
 Pure of heart and therefore hungry..... 479
Purgatory..... 593
Purgatory May Be Paradise..... 490
Pygmalion and Galatea..... 308
Pyramus and Thisbe..... 309
Python, The..... 18
Rabbi Ben Ezra..... 1326
 RABELAIS, FRANÇOIS..... 674
 RACINE, JEAN..... 723
Ragnarok, the Twilight of the Gods..... 509
 RALEIGH, WALTER..... 1141
Rape of the Lock, The..... 1216
 Receive, dear friend, the truths I teach..... 272
Recommending a Husband for a Young Lady..... 326 Reconciliation, The..... 273
Red Cockatoo, The..... 479
Red, Red Rose, A..... 1246
Reflections; or, Sentences and Moral Maxims..... 746
 Remember me when I am gone away..... 1336
Republic, The..... 383
Requiescat..... 1333
Reveille..... 1343
Riddles..... 1014
 RIG-VEDA, THE..... 466
Rime of the Ancient Mariner, The..... 1259
 Ripe, the plums fall from the bough..... 478
Rod of Jesse, The..... 434
Roman Divinities..... 15
 RONSARD, PIERRE DE..... 673
 ROSSETTI, CHRISTINA..... 1336
 ROSSETTI, DANTE GABRIEL..... 1334
 ROUSSEAU, JEAN-JACQUES..... 763
Rubaiyat..... 484
Ruth, The Story of..... 430
 SA'DI..... 490
Sag, Wo Ist Dein Schönes Liebchen..... 838
 SAINT AUGUSTINE..... 449
 SAINT FRANCIS OF ASSISI..... 453
 ST. JOHN OF THE CROSS..... 652
 SAPPHO..... 258
Satyricon, The..... 338
 Say, where is the maiden sweet..... 838
 Scots, wha hae wi' Wallace bled..... 1248
 Sculptor, wouldst thou glad my soul..... 267
Sea Hath Its Pearls, The..... 839
Sea-Monster, The..... 25
 Season of mist and mellow fruitfulness..... 1276
Second Inaugural Address..... 1312
 See, how the orient dew..... 1154
 See how the Yellow River's waters move from
 heaven..... 477
Selections from The Bible..... 414
Self-Reliance..... 1301
 Sent as a present from Annam..... 479
Serenade..... 1350
Sermon on the Mount, The..... 439
Sermon to the Birds..... 453
Shakespeare..... 1330
 SHAKESPEARE, WILLIAM..... 1088, 1144
 Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?..... 1146
 Shall I, wasting in despair..... 1148
 She dwelt among the untrodden ways..... 1252
 She walks in beauty, like the night..... 1267
 She was a phantom of delight..... 1257
 SHELLEY, PERCY BYSSHE..... 1269
 Sheltered beneath white hawthorn boughs..... 552
Ship of State, The..... 270
 Ship of state, beware!..... 270
Short Lay of Sigurd, The..... 512
 Should auld acquaintance be forgot..... 1246
 Sicilian Muse, begin a loftier strain..... 274
 Sigurd of yore..... 512
Sigurd, The Lay Called the Short Lay of..... 512
Simple Heart, A..... 773
 Since beauty is honored all over the empire..... 478

- Since brass, nor stone, nor earth, nor boundless sea 1147
 Since there's no help, come, let us kiss and part!.. 1142
Sing-Song 1336
Sir Gawain and the Green Knight..... 1021
Sir Patrick Spens..... 1064
Snow-storm, The 1348
Solitary Reaper, The..... 1254
Song (Greene) 1140
Song (Donne) 1149
Song (Christina Rossetti).... 1336
Song of Roland..... 547
Sonnet from "Idea" 1142
Sonnets from the Portuguese..... 1329
Sonnets (Shakespeare)..... 1146
 SOPHOCLES .. 174
Spanish Ballads 575
Spartans at Thermopylae, The..... 116
 SPENSER, EDMUND 1142
 Splendor-throned Queen, immortal Aphrodite.... 258
Stanza for Music..... 1268
 Star-gazing, O my Star; would I could be..... 265
 Stars of the summer night!..... 1350
 STEELE, RICHARD 1207
 STEVENSON, ROBERT LOUIS..... 1204
 Still to be neat, still to be dressed..... 1148
Stories from Norse Mythology..... 504
Storm, A 1014
Story of Ruth, The..... 430
 Strew on her roses, roses..... 1333
 Strong Son of God, immortal Love..... 1321
Stung 268
 SUCKLING, JOHN 1152
Summer Is Come..... 618
 Sunset and evening star..... 1323
Superstitiousness 322
Susanna and the Elders 432
Swan, A 1015
 Sweet and low, sweet and low..... 1320
 Sweet are the thoughts that savor of content..... 1140
 Sweet Auburn! loveliest village of the plain..... 1235
 Sweet maid, if thou wouldst charm my sight.... 492
 SWIFT, JONATHAN..... 1190
 SWINBURNE, ALGERNON CHARLES..... 1339
Syracusan Ladies, The..... 262
 TACITUS 304
 Take, O, take those lips away..... 1145
Tam O'Shanter 1242
 Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean.... 1320
Te Deum, The..... 452
 Tell me not, Sweet, I am unkind..... 1151
 Tell me now in what hidden way is..... 671
 Tell me now, what should a man want..... 477
 TENNYSON, ALFRED LORD..... 1317
 Terence, this is stupid stuff..... 1345
Terminus 1349
 That innocence is not a shield..... 744
 That time of year thou mayst in me behold..... 1147
 That's my last Duchess painted on the wall..... 1324
 The Assyrian came down like a wolf on the fold 1268
 The awful shadow of some unseen Power..... 1269
 The blessed damozel leaned out 1334
 The curfew tolls the knell of parting day..... 1232
 The day is done, and the darkness..... 1350
 The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof.. 428
 The face of all the world is changed, I think.... 1330
 The Golden hair that Gulla wears..... 338
 The heavens declare the glory of God..... 427
 The king sits in Dumferling toune..... 1064
 The lily has a smooth stalk..... 1336
 The Lord is my shepherd..... 428
 The moon is fully risen..... 838
 The nightingale has a lyre of gold..... 1342
 The oak one day addressed the reed..... 743
 The poetry of earth is never dead..... 1274
 The rain set early in tonight..... 1323
 The sea hath its pearls..... 839
 The sea is calm tonight..... 1333
 The skies they were ashen and sober..... 1353
 The soote season, that bud and bloom forth bring 618
 The splendor falls on castle walls..... 1320
 The voice of my beloved..... 429
 The wind blows from the north..... 478
 The women tell me every day..... 267
 The world is too much with us; late and soon.... 1254
 Thee, Sovereign God, our grateful accents praise. 452
 Then was not non-existent nor existent..... 466
 THEOCRITUS 261
 THEOPHRASTUS 321
 There be none of Beauty's daughters..... 1269
 There comes Emerson first, whose rich words,
 every one 1355
 There is no one among men that has not a special failing 479
 There is sweet music here that softer falls..... 1317
 There lived a wife at Usher's Well..... 1063
 There was a time when meadow, grove, and stream 1254
 There was two sisters in a bower..... 1062
 There were three ravens sat on a tree..... 1065
 There's not a joy the world can give like that it takes away 1268
Theseus 32
 They told me, Heraclitus, they told me you were dead 265
 This, for my soul's peace, have I heard from thee 467
 This is the ship of pearl, which poets feign.... 1352
 This rudely sculptured porter-pot..... 265
 This year of fourteen fifty-six.... 668
Thor's Visit to Jotunheim..... 504
 THOREAU, HENRY DAVID..... 1307
 Thou art even as a flower is..... 840
 Thou ling'ring star, with less'ning ray..... 1247
 Thou still unravished bride of quietness..... 1275
Thoughts 747
Thoughts of Death, The..... 454
Three Ravens, The..... 1065
[Three Rings, The]..... 812
 Three years she grew in sun and shower..... 1252
 THUCYDIDES 130
Thus Spake Zarathustra 842
 Tiger! Tiger! burning bright..... 1250
Tiger, The 1250
 'Tis hard to say if greater want of skill..... 1225
 'Tis of Aucassin and Nicolette..... 554
 To A. D. 1342
To Althea, from Prison..... 1151
To a Mouse 1245
To Aristius Fuscus 271
To a Skylark 1272
To Autumn 1276
To Celia..... 1148
To Chloe.. 271
To Cloe 318
To Daffodils..... 1151

To Death of His Lady	671	What dire offense from am'rous causes springs....	1217
To Earth, the Mother of All	258	What is it to grow old?	1333
To Helen (Poe)	1353	What man is so clever, so crafty of mind....	1014
To Helen (Ronsard)	673	What shall I say of the Great Peak?	478
To Hierq the Syracusan	259	What Should a Man Want?	477
To His Cup-Bearer	271	What slender youth, with perfumed locks....	270
To His Young Mistress	673	When April with his showers sweet with fruits...	1068
To Licinius Murena	272	When chapman billies leave the street	1242
To Lucasta, Going to the Wars	1151	When dangers press, a mind sustain	272
To Lucius Sestius	270	When God at first made man	1153
To Mary in Heaven	1247	When I am dead, my dearest	1336
To Postumus	272	When I consider every thing that grows....	1146
To Pyrrha	270	When I consider how my light is spent	1163
To Quintus Dellius	272	When I do count the clock that tells the time...	1146
To the Beloved Maiden	258	When I have fears that I may cease to be....	1274
To the Cuckoo	1257	When I have seen by Time's hand defaced....	1147
To the Lord General Cromwell, May, 1652	1163	When I heard the learn'd astronomer	1367
To the Muses	1249	When I was one-and-twenty	1343
To the Unknown God	466	When icicles hang by the wall	1144
To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time	1151	When, in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes..	1146
To W. A.	1342	When in the chronicles of wasted time	1147
To Weland came woes and wearisome trial....	1013	When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloomed	1363
TOLSTOY, LEV NIKOLAEVICH	930	When Love with unconfined wings	1151
Tomorrow you will live, you always cry	338	When Roland saw that life had fled	547
Transfiguration, The	467	When smoke stood up from Ludlow	1344
Tree, whereon the pitying skies	658	When the Assault Was Intended to the City	1163
Trimalchio's Dinner	338	When the hounds of spring are on winter's traces	1339
Troubadour Poetry	552	When the siege and assault ceased at Troy and the
True or False	269	city	1021
TURGENEV, IVAN SERGEEVICH	926	When to the sessions of sweet silent thought ..	1146
Twa Sisters, The	1062	When you are very old, at evening	673
'Twas at the royal feast for Persia won	1214	Whenas in silks my Julia goes	1151
Two Brothers, The	461	When'er I look into thine eyes	839
Two Doves, The	742	Whether on Ida's shady brow	1249
Two doves once cherished for each other	742	Whilst I was dear and thou wert kind	273
Ulamme	1353	White gleam the gulls across the darkling tide...	479
Ulysses	1319	WHITMAN, WALT	1362
Under the greenwood tree	1144	Who has seen the wind?	1336
Undying Thirst	265	Who is Silvia? what is she?	1144
Upon an obscure night	652	Who is this that darkeneth counsel	435
Upon Julia's Clothes	1151	Who's there?	1088
Valkyrior, The	511	Why dois your brand sae drap wi bluid	1061
Value of Greece to the Future of the World, The	93	Why so pale and wan, fond lover?	1152
Vanity	438	Wife of Usher's Well, The	1063
VAUGHAN, HENRY	1153	Wild was Vingthor when he awoke	517
Veni Creator Spiritus	451	WILDE, OSCAR	1390
VENTADOUR, BERNARD DE	552	With Her Beauty	478
Venus and Adonis	23	With rue by heart is laden	1343
View of T'ai-Shan, A	478	WITHER, GEORGE	1148
Vigil of Venus, The	275	Wolf and the Lamb, The	744
VILLON, FRANCOIS	668	Word's gane to the kitchen	1065
VIRGIL	274, 279	WORDSWORTH, WILLIAM	1250
Voice Out of the Whirlwind, The	435	World, The	1153
VOLTAIRE	751	Would I Might Go Far Over Sea	553
Vulcan! hear your glorious task	266	Wrestler, The ..	490
Wake! For the Sun, who scatter'd into flight	484	Writ in Water	265
Wake: the silver dusk returning	1343	Ye banks and braes and streams around	1248
WALLER, EDMUND	1149	Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon	1248
[War Between Gargantua and Picrochole]	674	Ye Cupids, droop each little head	269
Water the first of elements we hold	259	Ye distant spires, ye antique towers	1234
Wealth	491	Yet once more, O ye laurels, and once more....	1157
Weavers, The	875	You all can see two prisoners standing here....	234
Wee, sleekit, cow'rin', tim'rous beastie	1245	You told me, Maro, whilst you live	337
Wenn Ich in Deine Augen Seh'	839	Youth and Age	428
		ZOLA, ÉMILE	789

INDEX OF LITERARY TYPES

MYTHOLOGY

BULFINCH
Myths of Greece and Rome	12, 40, 173, 174
Stories from Norse Mythology	504
OVID, Metamorphoses	308
APULEIUS, Cupid and Psyche	311
The Short Lay of Sigurd	512
The Hell-Ride of Brynhild	516
The Lay of Thrym	517

THE EPIC

HOMER
The Iliad	41
The Odyssey	62
VIRGIL, The Æneid	279
The Short Lay of Sigurd	512
The Hell-Ride of Brynhild	516
The Lay of Thrym	517
Song of Roland	543
Beowulf	988
DANTE
Inferno	582
Purgatory	593
Paradise	606
ERICILLA, La Araucana	653
MILTON, Paradise Lost	1164

THE MEDIEVAL ROMANCE

Aucassin and Nicolette	554
Sir Gawain and the Green Knight	1021
MALORY, Le Morte d'Arthur	1052
MARIE DE FRANCE, The Lay of the Honeysuckle	553

TRAGIC DRAMA

ÆSCHYLUS, Agamemnon	151
SOPHOCLES, Antigone	174
EURIPIDES, Alceste	192
SHAKESPEARE, Hamlet	1088
GOETHE, Faust	814
RACINE, Phædra	723
IBSEN, A Doll's House	844
CHEKHOV, The Cherry Orchard	961
HAUPTMANN, The Weavers	875

COMIC DRAMA

ARISTOPHANES, The Frogs	210
PLAUTUS, The Captives	234
MOLIÈRE, The Miser	695
WILDE, The Importance of Being Earnest	1390

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY

HERODOTUS
Description of Egypt	107
The Battle of Marathon	111
Bridging the Hellespont	114
The Spartans at Thermopyla	116
PLUTARCH, Pericles	119
THUCYDIDES, The Funeral Oration of Pericles	130

LIVY, Hannibal's March Across the Alps	300
TACITUS, Customs of the Germans	304
THE BIBLE
The Garden of Eden	414
Noah and the Flood	415
Abraham and Isaac	417
The Last Supper	442

DIARY AND AUTOBIOGRAPHY

SAINT AUGUSTINE, Confessions	449
CELLINI, The Casting of the Perseus	633
PEPYS, Diary	1180

PHILOSOPHY, PROPHECY, AND WISDOM

THE BIBLE
Youth and Age	428
The Rod of Jesse	434
Behold, My Servant	434
Job's Questions	435
The Voice Out of the Whirlwind	435
Vanity	438
The Gospel of Love	444
PLATO
The Apology of Socrates	355
Phædo	367
The Republic, Book VII	383
ARISTOTLE, The Nicomachean Ethics, Book II	285
LUCRETIUS, Of the Nature of Things	393
MARCUS AURELIUS, Meditations	402
À KEMPIS, Of the Initiation of Christ	454
BIJAGAVAT GITA, The Transfiguration	467
CONFUCIUS, Analects	475
BRUNO, A Philosophy of the Infinite Universe	638
GRACIÁN, Worldly Wisdom	658
LA ROCHEFOUCAULD, Reflections	746
PASCAL, Thoughts	747
JOHNSON
Epigrams	1209
Definitions	1211
LESSING, Nathan the Wise	812
NIETZSCHE, Thus Spake Zarathustra	842

THE FABLE

THE PANCHATANTRA	471
SA'DI, The Gulistan	490
LA FONTAINE, Fables	742

POLITICAL WRITINGS

MACHIAVELLI, The Prince	626
ROUSSEAU, A Discourse on Inequality	763
JEFFERSON, Declaration of Independence	1299

THE SERMON AND THE ADDRESS

THUCYDIDES, The Funeral Oration of Pericles	130
PLATO, The Apology of Socrates	355
THE BIBLE, Sermon on the Mount	439
ST. FRANCIS OF ASSISI, Sermon to the Birds	453
LINCOLN
Address at Gettysburg	1312
Second Inaugural Address	1312

SATIRE

HORACE, The Bore	336
MARTIAL, (Five Poems)	337
LUCIAN
Dialogues of the Dead	341
Dialogues of the Gods	345
PLTRONIUS, The Satyricon	338
RABELAIS
Gargantua	674
Pantagruel	679
VOLTAIRE, Candide	751
CERVANTES, Don Quixote	641
SWIFT, Gulliver's Travels	1190
POPE, The Rape of the Lock	1216

THE ESSAY

ARNOLD, Hebraism and Hellenism	4
MURRAY, The Value of Greece to the Future of the World	93
THEOPHRASTUS, The Characters	321
MONTAIGNE
Of the Education of Children	682
Of Democritus and Heraclitus	693
BACON
Of Truth	1174
Of Marriage and Single Life	1175
Of Studies ..	1176
MILTON, Areopagitica	1176
ADDISON
The Character of Mr. Spectator	1204
Meditations in Westminster Abbey	1206
STEELE, A Happy Marriage	1207
LAMB
Dream-Children: A Reverie	1280
Old China	1282
HAZLITT, On Going a Journey	1284
DE QUINCEY, Levana and Our Ladies of Sorrow ..	1289
CARLYLE, Labor	1292
HEINE, Last Words	840
STEVENSON, Pulvis et Umbra	1294
EMERSON, Self-Reliance	1301
THOREAU, Brute Neighbors	1307

CRITICISM

CHENEY, Attending a Greek Play	138
ARISTOTLE, The Nature of Tragedy	142
ARNOLD, On the Study of Celtic Literature	521
POPE, An Essay on Criticism	1225
LOWELL, A Fable for Critics	1355

THE LETTER

CICERO, (Four Letters)	322
PLINY THE YOUNGER, (Eleven Letters)	326
HELOISE, Letter to Abelard	567
ABELARD, Letter to Heloise	570
JOHNSON, Letter to Lord Chesterfield	1211

THE PROSE TALE

THE BIBLE
Joseph and His Brethren	417
The Child Moses	424
Jephthah's Daughter	425
David and Bathsheba	426

The Story of Ruth	430
Susanna and the Elders	432
The Two Brothers	461
Deirdre: The Fate of the Sons of Usnach	523
MACMANUS, The Amadan of the Dough	538
THE ARABIAN NIGHTS	493
BOCCACCIO, The Decameron	619

THE VERSE TALE

OVID, Metamorphoses	308
The Short Lay of Sigurd	512
The Hell-Ride of Brynhild	516
The Lay of Thrym	517
CHAUCER
The Canterbury Tales	1068
Nun's Priest's Tale	1077
BURNS, Tam O'Shanter	1242
COLERIDGE
Kubla Khan	1258
The Rime of the Ancient Mariner	1259
MORRIS, The Haystack in the Floods	1337

THE SHORT STORY

PETRONIUS, Trimalchio's Dinner	338
DEFOE, The Apparition of Mrs. Veal	1186
GOGOL, The Cloak	912
TURGENEV, Biryuk	926
HAWTHORNE, The Ambitious Guest	1369
MAUPASSANT, Christening	773
BALZAC, Gold	767
DOSTOYEVSKY, The Christmas Tree and the Wedding	957
FRANCE, The Procurator of Judæa	800

THE NOVELETTE

FLAUBERT, A Simple Heart	773
TOLSTOY, The Death of Ivan Ilyitch	930

THE NOVEL (EXTRACTS)

CERVANTES, Don Quixote	641
MELVILLE, Moby Dick	1376
ZOLA, Germinal	789

THE LYRIC

THE BALLAD

Abenamar, Abenamar	575
The Lamentation for Celin	576
Edward	1061
Lord Randal	1062
Bonny Barbara Allen	1062
The Two Sisters	1062
The Wife of Usher's Well	1063
Sir Patrick Spens	1064
The Three Ravens	1065
Mary Hamilton	1065

THE ELEGY

THEOCRITUS, The Psalm of Adonis	264
MILTON, Lycidas	1157
COLLINS, How Sleep the Brave	1232
TENNYSON, In Memoriam A. H. H.	1321

THE ODE

SAPPHO, Ode to Aphrodite	258
PINDAR, Olympian Ode I	259
ANACREON, Odes	266
HORACE, Odes	270
HAFIZ, Odes 11, 12, 13	493
COLLINS, Ode to Evening	1231
GRAY, Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College	1234
WORDSWORTH, Ode on Intimations of Immortality	1254
SHELLEY
Ode to the West Wind	1270
To a Skylark	1272
KEATS
To Autumn	1276
Ode on a Grecian Urn	1275
Ode to a Nightingale	1275

THE PASTORAL

THEOCRITUS
The Cyclops	261
The Syracusan Ladies	262
The Psalm of Adonis	264
VIRGIL, Eclogue IV: The Messiah	274
MILTON, Lycidas	1157

THE SONNET

DANTE, La Vita Nuova	615-618 passim
PETRARCH, (Six Sonnets)	618
RONSARD, To Helen	673
DRAYTON, Sonnet from Idea	1142
SHAKESPEARE, (Fourteen Sonnets)	1146
MILTON, (Five Sonnets)	1162
WORDSWORTH, (Six Sonnets)	1253-1254
SHELLEY, Ozymandias	1270
KEATS, (Three Sonnets)	1100
BROWNING, E. B., Sonnets from the Portuguese	1329
ARNOLD, Shakespeare	1330
ROSSETTI, CHRISTINA, Remember	1336
HENLEY, Before	1341
LONGFELLOW, (Four Sonnets)	1351

OTHER LYRICAL POETRY

HOMERIC HYMN	258
SAPPHO, (Two Poems)	258
THEOCRITUS, (Three Poems)	261
THE GREEK ANTHOLOGY, (Seven Poems)	265
ANACREONTICS, (Three Poems)	267
CATULLUS, (Seven Poems)	268
HORACE, (Twelve Poems)	270
The Vigil of Venus	275
THE BIBLE
Psalms	427
Youth and Age	428
Love Lyrics	429
BOOK OF THE DEAD, Hymn to Rā	460
CHINESE POEMS, (Fourteen)	477
THE RIG-VEDA, (Two Poems)	466
LATIN HYMNS, (Three Poems)	451
SA'DI, (Three Poems)	491, 492
HAFIZ, A Persian Song	492
RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM	484
FRENCH TROUBADOUR POEMS, (Three)	552

MARIE DE FRANCE, Would I Might Go	553
ST. FRANCIS OF ASSISI, Canticle of the Sun	453
ST. JOHN OF THE CROSS, The Obscure Night of the Soul	652
CALDERÓN, (Two Poems)	658
HEINE, (Ten Poems)	838
VILLON, (Seven Poems)	668
RONSARD
Fragment of a Sonnet	673
To His Young Mistress	673
ANGLO-SAXON POEMS (Eight)	1013
LYLY, Apelles' Song	1140
GREENE, Song	1140
MARLOWE, The Passionate Shepherd to His Love	1141
DYER, My Mind to Me a Kingdom Is	1141
RALEIGH, The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd	1141
SPENSER, Prothalamion	1142
SHAKESPEARE, Nine Songs from the Plays	1144
JONSON, (Two Poems)	1148
WITHER, Shall I, Wasting in Despair	1148
WALLER, Go, Lovely Rose	1149
DONNE, (Three Poems)	1149
HERRICK, (Four Poems)	1150
LOVELACE, (Two Poems)	1151
SUCKLING, (Two Poems)	1152
CAREW, (Two Poems)	1152
HERBERT, (Two Poems)	1153
VAUGHAN, The World	1153
MARVELL, (Two Poems)	1154
MILTON
L'Allegro	1159
Il Penseroso	1161
DRYDEN, Alexander's Feast	1214
GOLDSMITH, The Deserted Village	1235
BURNS, (Thirteen Poems)	1242
BLAKE, (Five Poems)	1249
WORDSWORTH
Lines Written above Tintern Abbey	1250
She Dwelt among the Untrodden Ways	1252
I Traveled among Unknown Men	1252
Three Years She Grew	1252
A Slumber Did My Spirit Seal	1253
My Heart Leaps Up	1253
The Solitary Reaper	1254
To the Cuckoo	1257
She Was a Phantom of Delight	1257
I Wandered Lonely as a Cloud	1257
BYRON, (Four Poems)	1267
SHELLEY
Hymn to Intellectual Beauty	1269
The Indian Screenshot	1271
The Cloud	1271
KEATS, From Endymion	1274
TENNYSON, (Ten Poems)	1317
BROWNING, R., (Eight Poems)	1323
ARNOLD, (Five Poems)	1330
ROSSETTI, D. G., The Blessed Damozel	1334
ROSSETTI, C., (Four Poems)	1336
SWINBURNE, (Three Poems)	1339
HENLEY, (Five Poems)	1341
HOUSMAN, (Nine Poems)	1343
EMERSON, (Five Poems)	1348
LONGFELLOW, (Three Poems)	1350
HOLMES, (Three Poems)	1352
POE, (Three Poems)	1353
WHITMAN, (Five Poems)	1362

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY

135 720

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY

